according to law, he may put us to death without law, that after he hath violated all right, he might escape and save himself. But I blame not Herod in this action, for that he hath a more inward regard of his particular profit, then of the law: but I accuse both you and the King, who have given him such assurance. Know therefore, that there is a soveraign God, that will one day punish both you and the King, and him whom you will deliver by the Kings means. And so generally fell it out as he had said: For as soon as Herod had obtained the Kingdome, he put all those of the councell to death, and Hircanus himself likewise, onely Sameas was exempted: for he held him in great estimation, because of his wisedome and justice, and because that at such time as the City was besieged by Herod and Sosius, Sameas perswaded the people to receive Herod, telling them that by reason of their sinnes and offences, they might not escape from him; whereof we will speak in place convenient. Hircanus perceiving that the Judges were inclined to condemn Herod, deferred the sentence till the next day, and sent secretly unto Herod, counselling him to flie out of the City, assuring him that there was no other means to save his life. Thus posted he to Damasco (as if he had fled from the Kings presence) and presenting himself before Sextus Cæsar, after he had assured his person, he resolved with himself, that if the councel should call him once more to answer, he would not obey them. But after his departure the councel were displeased with Hircanus, and laboured to perswade him, that all these things tended to his destruction: which he well perceived, yet knew he not what to do, he was so negligent and void of foresight.

Herod honoureth Sameas.

Herod astonished by Hircanus, saveth himself by flight, and appeareth no more in judgment.

When Sextus had made Herod Governour of Cœlosyria (which estate he sold unto him for ready money) Hircanus was afraid lest Herod should make War against him: neither passed there long time before the effect grew answerable to his fear. For Herod marched forth against him, with a great army, supposing himself to be much wronged by the assignation he had sent him, and in that he was summoned to give a reason of his actions before the councel. But his father Antipater, and his brother Phasalus came forth against him to hinder his approach towards Jerusalem, striving to appease his fury, and counselling him not to attempt any thing by way of action; but that contenting himself that he had threatned and affrighted Hircanus, he should not attempt any further against him, who had raised him to that high degree. They told him also, that it became him not onely to remember that he was cited to answer, but that he was absolved also, and permitted to depart without danger or any violence. Moreover, that he ought to think, that God governeth the ballance of War, and that the issues of battels are uncertain, and for that cause he ought not to expect the victory, if he made War against the King who was his familiar, and from whom he had received far more kindness, and no displeasure: who though he made some appearance and shadow of severity, touching the accusation intended against him, yet notwithstanding it proceeded not so much from him, as from his evill counsellers. Herod in some sort pacified by these perswasions, obeyed his father, supposing that it sufficed him, in regard of his future hopes, that he had given the people so large a testimony of his power. This was the estate of the Jews at that time.

Alias, chap. 11. Sextus Cæsar selleth his Presidents place to Herod for ready money.

Herod marcheth against Hircanus with a great army, and is disswaded from war by his father Antipater, and his brother Phasælus.

But Cæsar arriving at Rome, prepared himself to set saile towards Affrick, with an intent to make War against Scipio and Cato. To him Hircanus sent Embassadours, beseeching him to confirme the amity and association that he had with him. But now at this present, I think it very convenient to declare all the prerogatives, and associations that the Romans and their Emperours made with those of our nation, to the end that all other people might know, that the Kings of Asia and Europe have been well affected towards us, and have made great account of our valour and fidelity. And although divers men lewdly affected towards us, beleeve not that which the Macedonians and Persians have written of us, because the same matters are not extant in all places, neither set down in publike writings, but onely amongst our selves and some Barbarians; yet is it manifest that they cannot contradict the declarations made by the Romans, which are manifestly affixed in publike places in Cities; as likewise at this present they are written in the Capitol in brazen pillars. Julius Cæsar in like manner in a brazen pillar erected by him, hath declared unto the Jews that inhabited Alexandria, that they were free Citizens therein. And to the intent that these things may more manifestly appeare, I will propose the decrees of the Senate, and of Julius Cæsar, made in the favour of Hircanus and our nation. Caius Julius Cæsar Emperour, high Priest, Dictator the second Time, to the Governours, Senate and people of the Sidonians, Health: If you are well, we are in health, both our selves and our army. I have sent you the copy of an inscription, registred in favour of Hircanus Alexanders son, high Priest and Prince of the Jews, to the "end it may be placed among publike monuments: and my will is, that it be engraven in a ta"ble of brass, both in Greek and Latine letters; the tenour whereof is this that followeth:

"Because Hircanus Alexanders son the Jew, both at this present as also heretofore, as well
"in peace as in War, hath expressed his fidelity towards us and our estate, as divers Chief-
"tains of our armies yield testimony of him, and for that in our last Alexandrine War, he "seconded us in the battel with fifteen hundred men; and having been sent by us to Mi-
"thridates, hath surmounted all those of his company in valour. For these causes my will is,
"that Hircanus Alexanders son and his successours, be Princes of the Jews: and further, that "they continue alwaies in the high Priesthood, according to the ordinance and custome of "their countrey: and that both he and his children be our associates; and be inrowled likewise,
"and that our chiefest friends: and all that which appertaineth to the Priesthood, according "to the ordinances of the Jews, be attributed to him and his. And if there happen any diffe"rence as touching the discipline of the Jews, our pleasure is, that it be determined by him.
"And as touching the munitions of War, and the money to be levied for the entertainment "of Souldiers, we think it not meet that they should be charged. The Decrees made and "granted by Caius Cæsar being Consul, are these:

"That the sonnes of Hircanus be Princes over the nation of the Jews, and enjoy the places "granted unto them. That the high Priest and Prince of the Jews give favour and aid unto "those that are offended. That Embassadors be sent to Hircanus the son of Alexander high "Priest of the Jews, to intreat of amity and association with us. That a brazen table be erected "in the Capitol: and likewise at Sidon, at Tyre, and at Ascalon in the Temples, wherein shall "be engraven the contents hereof in Roman and Greek letters, to the end that all the Trea"surers that are in the Cities, and all other Magistrates may by this our Decree understand, "that they are our friends, and that their Embassadours be entertained with kindness and
"presents, and that these Edicts be sent into all places.

"Caius Cæsar Emperour, Dictator, Consul, for the good of the Senate and people of Rome, "hath granted to the honour, vertue, and humanity of Hircanus the son of Alexander,
"that both he and his children shall be high Priests in Jerusalem, and of the whole Na"tion, according to the Rites and Customes whereby their ancestors have enjoyed the "Priesthood.

"Caius Cæsar, Consul the fifth time, hath ordained that they shall inhabit Jerusalem, and "build again the walls of the City; and that Hircanus (Alexanders son, the high Priest and "Prince of the Jews) shall govern as best him liketh, and that every second year of their tri"bute, there be a Chore deducted out of the rent they owe, and that they be exempt from "all other impositions, and tributes.

"Caius Cæsar, twice Emperour, hath ordained, that the Jews shall contribute every year for "their Cities, except Joppe; he acquitteth them also every seventh year (which they call the "year of the rest) because that therein they neither reape, nor sow, neither gather the fruit of "trees. His further pleasure is, that every second year, they bring their tributes unto Sidon, "which shall be the fourth part of that which shall be sown; and besides this, that they pay the "tenths to Hircanus and his sons, which they have paid to their Predecessours unto this day.
"Commanding that no man, whether he be Governour, Captain, or Embassadour, or any o"ther whatsoever he be, levy Souldiers within the Countrey of Judæa, or draw any thereout:
"neither exact any money, whether it be for garrisons in winter, or for any other cause, but "that the Iews be exempt from all troubles in all places, and enjoy all that which sithence they "have had, bought, and possessed. It is our pleasure also, that the city of Ioppe be under their "government (which they have ever enjoyed since the beginning of their friendship with the "Romans.) We further grant, that Hircanus Alexanders son and his children, receive the "tribute of that City (both by them that till the land, as by the gates, entries, and issues of "merchandizes that are transported unto Sidon) twenty thousand, six hundred, seventy and "five bushels every year, exempting the seventh year, which is called the year of rest, wherein
"they neither labour nor gather any fruit of the trees. It is the Senates pleasure also, that Hir-
"canus and the Iews have those villages which are in the great champain, which he and his "predecessors have possessed and that with the like interests that they held them before this;
"and that the same customes continue therein, whereby they held and governed them. Their "will is likewise, that the same lawes which have from the beginning been respectively obser"ved between the Iews, and their high Priests, be continued; and whatsoever benefits were "granted them, by the consent of the Senate and people of Rome. Moreover it shall be law-

It is lawfull "alſo for Hircanus and his ſons, and their Embaſſadours ſent by them, to behold the Juſts and "Combates, and to ſit among the Senators, and that at all and every time or times wherein "they ſhall require to be brought into the Senate by the Dictator, or by the Maſter of the "horſe, they may have free entrance; and that within ten daies at the moſt they receive their "anſwer, if there be any decree ratified by the Senate. The year of the World, 3922. before chriſts birth, 42.

For at ſuch time as Caius Cæſar Conſul had prohibited "by Edict, that in celebrating the Bacchanals, no one ſhould dance about the City; yet were "the Jews alone exempted from this inhibition: and neither have they been prohibited to "contribute, neither to banquet together. My ſelf alſo in like caſe, in the defence I have made "to forbid all other ſodalities, have excepted the Jews therein, and have given them leave "and licence to aſſemble and demean themſelves according to the cuſtomes, ceremonies, "and ordinances of their countrey. If therefore you have made any ſuch decrees againſt our "friends and aſſociates, you ſhall do well to diſanul them, by reaſon of the vertue of the "Jews, and the forwardneſs they have proteſted in performance of our ſervice.

"After Caius Cæſars death, the Conſuls Marcus Antonius, and Publius Dolobella, aſſembled "the Senate, and having brought in Hircanus Embaſſadours, they declared their requeſt, and "contracted amity with them: The Senate likewiſe ordained, that each thing ſhould be "granted them that they required. Cæcilius Baſſus murthereth Sextus Cæſar.

Thus have we ſufficiently declared the amity and aſſociation, that in times paſt we have had with the Romans. About this time it came to paſs, that the eſtate of Syria was ſore troubled upon the occaſion that enſueth: Cæcilius Baſſus, one of Pompeys partakers, laid an ambuſh for Sextus Cæſar and ſlew him, and ſeizing upon his army, uſurped the government: whereby there aroſe great War nigh Apamea. For Cæſars Captains marched out againſt Cæcilius, with great force both of foot and horſemen, to whom Antipater ſent his ſonnes with a power to ſecond them (in remembrance of the benefits he had received at Cæſars hands) ſuppoſing it to be an act of juſtice, that the murtherer ſhould be puniſhed for his ſo hainous offence. Now whereas this War continued a long time, Marcus came and ſucceeded Sextus. Mean-whiles Cæſar was ſlain by Caſſius and Brutus in the midſt of the Senate, after he had commanded three years and ſix moneths, as it is expreſſed in another place.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 20.

After Cæſars death, the brand of civill War began to flame, and the greateſt men of Rome travelled the one this way, the other that way, to gather men of War. But Caſſius came into Syria, with an intent to take the army that was near to Apamea: and having levied the ſiege, he drew both Baſſus and Marcus to be of his faction, and travelling from City to City, he gathered a number of Souldiers, and much furniture, and impoſed huge tributes: but eſpecially he afflicted Iewry, and exacted of that countrey more then ſeven hundred talents of ſilver. Antipater ſeeing the State in ſo great fear and trouble, committing the exaction of the two parts of this money to his ſonnes; the other he commanded to be aſſigned to Malichus, who was his enemy, and the other part unto another. Herod firſt of all gathered that which was commanded him in the Countrey of Galilee, and for this cauſe was greatly beloved by Caſſius: for he being prudent and diſcreet, thought it no ſmall policy at that time to win the Romans good will by other mens expence. Under the other governours the Cities were ſet to ſale, together with their inhabitants: and amongſt them theſe foure were the chiefeſt, namely, Gophna, Emaus, Lydda, and Thamna: for Caſſius ſold the people thereof to them that would give moſt. Furthermore, Caſſius was ſo much tranſported with choler, that he had ſlain Malichus (ſo much was he moved againſt him) if Hircanus had not reſtrained his fury, by ſending him one hundred talents of his own money by Antipater. But as ſoon as Caſſius was departed out of the countrey of Iudæa, he practiſed Antipaters death, ſuppoſing that his cutting off would aſſure Hircanus ſtate the more ſtrongly. But Antipater was not ignorant of this his reſolution; for having an inkling thereof, he got himſelf on the other ſide of Iordan, aud aſſembled an army of Souldiers both Iews and Arabians. Hereupon, Malichus (who was a politique and ſubtill fellow) denied ſtoutly that he had intended any Treaſon, purging himſelf with an oath before Antipater and his children, that he had never any ſuch intent, eſpecially for that he ſaw that Phaſelus held Ieruſalem, and Herod had an army at command. And in the end, perceiving the difficulty wherein he was, he reconciled himſelf to Antipater, and they agreed at that time that Marcus governed Syria: who perceiving that Malichus began to raiſe troubles in Iewry, reſorted thither, and there wanted little but that he had ſlain him, had not Antipater by earneſt requeſt obtained his life.

CHAP. XIX.

Malichus poyſoneth Antipater.

But imprudent Antipater ſaved Malichus to his own miſchiefe: For when Caſſius and Marcus had aſſembled their army, they committed all the charge into Herods hands, and made him Governour of Cœloſyria, and delivered him great forces both of foot and horſe, and ſhips by Sea: They promiſed him likewiſe the Kingdome of Iudæa, after they had had finished the War, that was at that time betwixt them and Anthony and Cæsar the younger. Whereupon Malichus mightily fearing Antipaters power, determined to make him away; and having corrupted Hircanus butler with money (with whom both of them celebrated a feast) he made him away by poyson, and afterwards assembling many men of War about him, he made himself master of the City. When Herod and Phasælus understood of the traiterous conspiracy attempted against their father, they were grievously inceased against Malichus. But he denied all, and in especiall abjured the intent or practice of the murther. Thus died Antipater a just and vertuous man, and such a one as dearly loved his countrey. But Herod, who was his younger son, incontinently resolved to revenge his fathers death, and came forth with an army against Malichus: But Phasælus, who was the elder, determined to circumvent him by policy, for fear lest he should raise a civill War. He therefore accepted of Malichus justifications, and made a shew that he supposed that he had in no such sort sought Antipaters death, and onely intended his fathers monument and funerals. Mean while, Herod resorting to Samaria, and finding it in desperate estate, restored the same, and pacified the dissentions that were amongst the inhabitants. Not long after (by reason of a feast) he came to Jerusalem with his men of War. Whereupon Malichus being afraid of this his access, perswaded Hircanus that he should not permit him to enter into the City: whereunto Hircanus condescended, alleadging for pretext of his defence, that amongst the holy people it was not lawfull to intermix a troop of polluted men. But Herod made small reckning of them that brought him this news, and notwithstanding this command, entred the City by night: whereat Malichus was much amazed. Whereupon, according to his wonted dissimulations, he openly wept and bewailed the death of Antipater as his especiall friend; but under-hand he prepared a guard for his own safety. Notwithstanding it was thought meet by Herods friends, to take no notice of this dissimulation; but to make a shew for their parts, that they were well-affected towards Malichus.

CHAP. XX.

HEreupon Herod certified Cassius of Antipater his fathers death, who knowing very well of what conversation Malichus was, wrote back unto Herod that he should revenge the death of his father: besides, he sent secret letters to the Captains that were in Tyre, commanding them to aid and assist Herod in that so just execution which he intended. After therefore that Cassius had taken Laodicea, and the inhabitants of the countrey came together, bringing with them crowns and silver to present him, Herod expected that Malichus in that place should receive his punishment: but the entring into suspition of some practice, at such time as they drew near unto Tyre in Phœnicia, attempted far greater things. For whereas his son was an hostage in Tyre, he entred the City with intent to draw him thence, and afterwards to return into Judæa. After this, usurping upon that opportunity which he had by reason of Cassius troubles (who hastily marched forward to meet with Anthony) he determined to draw the people to an insurrection, and to make himself Lord of the countrey: but God disappointed his unjust purposes: For Herod being a man of a ripe judgement, incontinently discovered his pretence, and sent one of his servants before, as it under purpose to prepare a banquet, because he had told him beforetime that he would entertain all his followers: but in effect, he sent him to the Captains to command them to issue out with their daggers, and to meet Malichus; who marching forth and meeting him near unto the shore of the City upon the Sea-coast, stabbed him in that place with their daggers. Which act did so much astonish Hircanus, that through amaze he waxed speechless: and finally being much moved, he demanded of Herods men, what accident had happened, and who it was that had slain Malichus? Whereof when they certified him, and how nothing was done without Cassius command: he answered that all things were well done, for that Malichus was a wretched man and a traitour to his countrey. See here how Malichus was justly punished for the wickedness he committed against Antipater.

When Cassius was departed out of Syria, there arose a new tumult in Iudæa: for Felix, who was left in Jerusalem with an army, marched forth against Phasælus, and all the people were in arms. For which cause Herod speedily repaired to Fabius, Governour of Damasco, and intending to succour his brother, was prevented by a sickness: so that Phasælus obtaining the victory by his own forces against Felix, enclosed him up in a tower, whence afterwards he he dismissed him under composition. Whereupon he presently and grievously rebuked Hircanus, for that being forgetfull of divers benefits which he had received by him, he had given aid unto his enemies. For Malichus brother being at that time revolted, planted garrisons in divers fortresses, and namely in Masada, which was the strongest of them all. As soon as Herod therefore had recovered his health, he drew forth his forces against him, and dispossessed him of divers places that he held, and after suffered him to depart with his life and goods.

Ptolomey Mennæus drew unto him by force of his money Aristobulus son the young Antigonus, who had gathered a power, and hired Fabius, and was likewise drawn by Ptolomey, under titles of consanguinity and adoption. With him joyned Marion (whom Cassius had made Governour in Tyre:) For this man having occupied Syria by tyranny, kept garrison therein: Marion also invaded Galilee, which confined his countrey; and having seized three strong fortresses therein, he kept garrisons in the same. Herod also marching forth against him, dispossessed him of them all; and graciously dismissed those Tyrians that had the keeping thereof, bestowing benefits on some of them, for the love he bare unto their City. And that done, he came and encountred with Antigonus, and fought with him, and overcame him before he had scarcely entred on the marches of Judæa, and drave him from thence. When he was come to Jerusalem, Hircanus and all the people honoured him with crowns: for already was he inserted into Hircanus family, for that by promise he was his son in law; by which means, he had more willingly undertaken his defence, for that he was to marry Alexanders the son of Aristobulus daughter, who was Hircanus neece: on whom he begat three sonnes and two daughters. Before her also had he married a wife of his own nation, who was called Doris, on whom he begat Antipater his eldest son.

CHAP. XXII.

Herod meeting with Antonius in Bithynia, giveth him a great sum of money, to the end he should not give eare to those that would accuse him.

Antonius and Cæsar having overcome Cassius near unto the City of Philippi; Cæsar went from thence into France, and Antonius into Asia. And being in Bithynia, Embassadours resorted unto him from all parts: Thither also repaired certain principall men among the Jews to accuse Phasælus and Herod; saying that Hircanus had onely the name, but he the authority of the Kingdome. But Antonius greatly honoured Herod, who came unto him to answer those accusations that they had imposed on him: for which cause they that were his opposites could obtain no audience: for Herod had bought that priviledge from them with his money. As soon as Antonius was arrived in Ephesus, Hircanus the high Priest and all our nation presently sent an Embassadour unto him, with a crown of gold; requiring him that he would write unto the Provinces, that the Jews whom Cassius had taken prisoners (contrary to the law of arms) might be set at liberty, and that their countrey which was taken from them in Cassius time) might be restored. Antonius supposing that the demands which the Jews had proposed, were reasonable, wrote back presently to the high Priest Hircanus and the Jews; and sent an Edict also to the Tyrians, to this effect:

The Judge corrupted with money. Hircanus Embassadours present Antonius with a crown of gold, and require the captive Jews liberty sold by Cassius.

Marcus Antonius Emperour, to Hircanus high Priest and Prince of the Jews, Health: If you are well, all goeth well. I and mine army are in perfect estate. Lysimachus the son of Pausanias, and Joseph the son of Mennæus, and Alexander the son of Theodore, your Embassadours, came unto me to Ephesus, and have renued the same Embassage which they heretofore brought to Rome, and at this present likewise they have duely and faithfully acquitted themselves of the Embassage which they present in the behalf of you, and your Nation, by giving us to understand what affection you bear towards us: so that I esteeme you for our friend, sith I am given to understand how friendly you have behaved your self towards us both in words and deeds, since we have had any knowledge of your good and honest conversation

A "versation and piety. For at such time as our adversaries and enemies of the Romane nation "spoiled all the countrey of Asia, and without regard of their oaths spared neither Cities nor "Temples; we have opposed our selves against them, not onely for our private respect, but in "the quarrel of the common-weal, to the intent to punish the authors of such offences com- "mitted against men, and of such impieties perpetrated against God: for which we suppose "that the Sun hath in a manner obscured himself, by beholding with unwilling eyes what an "hainous offence was committed against Cæsar. But we have gotten the upper hand of their "impious enterprizes, which are fallen upon Macedonia, as on the countrey and aire, from "whence proceed such detestable and ungracions designes: and we have likewise cut off "the course of their desperate resolution, which made them encounter us near to Philippi a B "City of Macedonia, where we seized their places fortified by nature, and enclosed with "mountains as if it were with walls, as far as the Sea, in such manner as the passage was barred "up, as it were with a gate, had not the gods given us way by resisting their unjust exploits, "and furthering ours. Brutus is likewise compelled to flie to Philippi, where being inclosed "by us, he suffered the like ruine with his consort Cassius; and since they have been punished "as they deserved, me seemeth that we are seized of peace, and that Asia hath had repose "from War, and all the body thereof is relieved from a grievous maladie, by the means of "our victory. For which cause remembring us of you and your Nation, to the end to increase "your good fortunes, we will bethink us of that which shall be commodious for you: and we "have already sent letters from City to City, to the intent that if any one among you, either C "captive or free-man, have been sold to the utmost by Caius Cassius, or any of that army, they "may be set at liberty. And our will is, that you make use of the bounty which we bestow upon "you, both in our self as in Dolabellas right, forbidding the Tyrians to molest you, and com- "manding them to restore all that which they have taken from the Jews in goods or possessi- "ons. As for the crown which you sent me, I accept the same.

Marcus Antonius writeth to the Magistrates of Tyre to restore Hircanus and the Jews their lands, goods, and liberty.

"Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the Governours, Senate and people of Tyre, Health: I "have been informed in Ephesus by Hircanus Embassadours (who is high Priest and Prince of "the Jews) that you have seized their countrey, and spoiled the same, at such time as our ad- "versaries held that Province. But in as much as we have undertaken the War for the Em- "pire, and that in defence of right and piety, we have punished these ingratefull, disloyall and D "perfidious persons; our will is, that you suffer our allies to live in peace: and as touching "that which you have obtained by our adversaries, our pleasure is, that you restore the same "to those that are dispossessed. For no one of them hath obtained either Province or Army "by the consent of the Senate; but have ravished them by force, and afterwards bestowed "them on those who have been ministers of their impieties and injustice. But since they have "been punished according to their deserts, we require that our allies may enjoy their own, "without any impeachment: and if you hold any places at this present, which belong to Hir- "canus Prince of the Jews (that were seized since the time that Caius Cassius by injust War "invaded our Provinces) restore them unto him, without offer of any violence, to hinder him "from the possession of his own. And if you have, or pretend to have any right in them; at such E "time as I shall repair to those places, it shall be lawfull for you to debate your right, and we "will so judge, as that our allies shall receive no wrong.

"Marcus Antonius Emperour, to the Governors, Senate, and people of Tyre, Health: I have "sent you my edict, which my pleasure is that you carefully look unto, and that you register "it amongst your publicke records in Roman and Greek letters, and set it up in writing in an "open place, to the end that it may be read by all men.

"Marcus Antonius Emperour and Triumvir, in the presence of the Tyrians assembled for "their publike affairs, hath declared, that Caius Cassius during the troubles, by the assistance "of his Souldiers, hath ravished another mans Province; and hath in like sort spoiled our "allies, and hath ransackt the nation of the Jews, who are friends to the people of Rome: and F "for that by our valour we have represt his insolence, by our edicts and judgements we will "correct his offences, to the end that all things may be restored to our allies, and that all "whatsoever hath been sold, and appertained to the Jews (whether they be prisoners or pos- "sessions) be restored to their masters; to the end that each man be at liberty as he was be- "fore, and that each mans possession may be restored to his first owner. And my pleasure is, "that whosoever disobeyeth this ordinance, he may be punished. And he that shall be con- "victed to have disobeyed the same, he shall be punished according to his demerit. He wrote "to the like effect to the Sidonians, Antiochians, and Arabians; all which we will insert in "a convenient place, to testifie what account the Romans made of our nation.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 11. Cleopatra cometh into Cilicia to Antonius. Herod accused by one hundred Jews before Antonius.

AFter this, Antonius retired himself into Syria, and Cleopatra came forth to meet him near unto Silicia, and entangled him in her love. At that time also hundred of the chiefest reckning among the Jews one came once again in Embassage to him to accuse Herod, and his adherents: who to this end had chosen out the most esteemed Orator that might be found. Messala likewise undertook the defence of the young men that were accused, and made them answer. Hircanus also was there in person, who was already by marriage allied unto them. After that Antonius had heard both the one and the other in the City of Daphen, he demanded of Hircanus, which of both the parties governed the common-weal best? who returned him answer, that they who were on Herods side, were most studious of the weal publike. Antonius (who long since had born good affection towards them, by reason of the ancient hospitality that he had received with their father during the time that Gabinius was in Judæa) established them both for Tetrarchs, committing to their hands the affairs in Judæa: And to this effect wrote he his letters, and committed fourteen of their enemies to prison; whom had not Herod besought for their lives, he had condemned them to death. This notwithstanding, as soon as they returned from their Embassage, they could not contain themselves in quiet, but resorted once more unto Antonius, to the number of ten thousand, to the City of Tyre where Antonius sojourned. But Antonius (already corrupted by store of money by Herod and his brother, who commanded in that place) ordained that the Embassadours of the Jews should be punished, for that they had attempted and affected some innovation; where contrariwise he confirmed Herods government. At that time Herod, who walked by the Sea side, came unto them, advising both them and Hircanus (who at that present was with them) to give over their appeal, for fear lest some grievous mistortune should befall them. Whereunto since they gave no regard, certain Jews and inhabitants of that City, all at once ranne upon them, who slew some of them, and hurt other some, and the rest taking their flight towards their countrey, ever afterwards contained themselves and lived in quiet, through the fear they had conceived. But when the people ceased not to exclaim and protest against Herod, Antonius was in such sort displeased, that he commanded all those whom he held prisoners should be slain.

Antonius maketh Phasælus and Herod Tetrarchs.

A thousand Jews repair to Tyre to accuse Herod, who are partly slain, partly wounded, and partly put to flight.

The year after, Pacorus the Kings son, and Barzapharnes a Prince among the Parthians, invaded and seized Syria. And about this time died Ptolomey the son of Mennæus; and his son Lysias reigned in his stead, who plighted friendship with Antigonus the son of Aristobulus, who obtained his favour at his hands by the councel and sollicitation of a certain Prince of great authority and credit with him.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Parthians make War in Syria, to restore Antigonus the son of Aristobulus to his Kingdome.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 22. Antigonus promiseth the Parthians a great sum of money to install him in the Kingdome. Pacorus sendeth horsemen to Antigonus in Judæa. The Jews inhabiting about mount Carmel, joyn themselves with Antigonus.

AFter this, Antigonus promised the Parthians to give them one thousand talents of silver, and five hundred women, if so be they would deprive Hircanus of the Kingdome, and restore it unto him, and withall put Herod and his friends to death. Yet did he not deliver them that he promised, notwithstanding the Parthians head their army into Jewry to restore Antigonus, to wit, Pacorus by the Sea-coast, and Barzapharnes to the landward. The Tyrians locked their gates against Pacorus, but the Sidonians and Ptolomaidans received them into their City. He sent a troop of horsemen into Jewry to discover the estate of the countrey, and to give succours to Antigonus. The chiefstain of these horsemen was the Kings butler; who in like sort was called Pacorus. But for that certain Jews (inhabiting about the mount Carmel) joyned themselves with Antigonus, and were prepared with him to invade his enemies, he conceived some hope that he might by their means reduce a certain part of the region under his government, which is called Drymæ: and certain of his wel-willers meeting him in the way, perswaded him to press forward as far as Jerusalem; where being seconded by others (and his followers already much increased in number) they address themselves to assault the Kings palace. And whereas those of the faction of the brethren brought present supplies, and the skirmish was maintained in the market place, place, the young men repulsed the enemy, and drave him into the Temple. Which done, they sent certain armed men into the houses near adjoyning, to guard them: but the people rushing in upon them, and seeing they were destitute of aid, burned both them and the houses wherein they were. But this iniquity of theirs was presently revenged by Herod, who in a skirmish that he had with them, slew a great number of them. And whereas there were daily assaults between both parties, the enemies expected untill such time as the people (assembled from all parts of the Countrey) should repair to Jerusalem to celebrate the feast of Pentecost. Which being come, many thousands of men assembled about the Temple, both armed and unarmed, who seized both the Temple and the City; except the Kings house onely, which Herod made good with a few men of War. The wall thereof did Phasælus his brother keep. But Herod with a company of his followers sallied out upon the enemy, who were planted in the suburbs, and fighting valiantly against them, he put divers thousands of them to flight, whereof some retired themselves into the City; other some into the Temple; the rest into a certain bulwark near at hand. In this battel also Phasælus shewed no little valour.

Herod fighteth with his enemies in the suburbs.

Pacorus chieftain of the Parthians entring the city, perswadeth Phasælus to go Embassadour to Barzapharnes.

But Pacorus conductor of the Parthians, came into the City with some few horsemen at Antigonus request, making shew that he came to appease the sedition; but the effect and scope of his coming was, to obtaine the soveraignty for Antigonus. Furthermore, after that Phasælus was come out to meet with him, and had courteously entertained him in his house, Pacorus perswaded him to go Embassadour with him to Barzapharnes, laying a baite under this pretence to surprize him. He suspecting no treacheries, was easily perswaded, notwithstanding that Herod misliked the course, who knowing the perfidious manner of the Barbarians, exhorted him rather to assaile Pacorus, and to assault and oppress his forces, when they were come unto him. Nevertheless Hircanus and Phasælus undertook this Embassage, and Pacorus (leaving with Herod two hundred horsemen, and ten of those whom they call free-men) conducted the Embassadours. Now as soon as they came into Galilee, the governours of the Cities in that countrey, came forth armed to meet them: Barzapharnes also at the first gave them friendly entertainment, and honoured them with presents; but anon after he began to practise treachery. For Phasælus and his attendants were conducted to a lodging that adjoyned the sea; where hearing tidings that Antigonus had promised one thousand talents, and five hundred virgins to the Parthians, he began already to supect the Barbarians. For a certain friend of his had given him an inkling that there were treasons intended against him that very night, and that his lodging was privily beset with a guard. And surely they had been surprised, had they not expected that the Parthians (who were round about Jerusalem) should be seized of Herod, fearing lest he having an inkling of their disaster, should betake himself to flight. And that this was true, they incontinently gathered by the guard that was set about them: For which cause there were certain of Phasælus friends, who counselled him, that without any more delay, he should betake him to his horse, and fly from thence: and amongst the rest, Ofilius was most earnest, who had wrought out of Saramalla a rich Syrian (who offered them his ships that road hard by to further their flight) all that which they pretended. But Phasælus would neither forsake Hircanus, nor leave his brother Herod in danger, but repairing to Barzapharnes, he told him, that he did him wrong to use these sinister practices against them. For that if he had need of money, he was more likely to receive it at his hands, then from Antigonus; and howsoever he wrought, it was an intolerable injury to put Embassadours to death, who came unto him under pledge of his honour, and had no waies offended him. But the Barbarian hearing these things, protested by an oath, that no one point of that which he had suspected was true; but that he was onely troubled with false surmize: whereupon he presently departed to Pacorus.

The Parthians complot treacheries against Phasælus.

CHAP. XXV.

The Parthians lead away Hircanus and Phasælus into captivitie.

AS soon as he was departed, certain of the Parthians took Hircanus and Phasælus prisoners, who mightily detested their perjuries. But the Eunuch that was sent unto Herod, had commandment given him to entice and train him without the city walls, and afterwards to aprehend him. But Herod was forewarned of this treachery, by certain messengers (who were sent by Phasælus to give him notice thereof) who being intercepted by the enemy in the way, and Herod getting notice thereof, he addressed himself to Pacorus (and

(and those in greatest authority among the Parthians) as to them that were the masters: who subtilly dissembled, notwithstanding they knew how all things went, telling him that he should do well to repair with them without the wall to go and meet those messengers, who brought him letters; who had not as yet been seized by their adversaries, but came to certifie him of Phasælus good estate. But Herod gave them no credit, because he was already otherwaies advertised of his brothers surprisall, and had also far greater suspition of the Parthians by the sollicitation of Hircanus daughter, whom he had married. And although the rest made no account of her advertisements, yet Herod gave credit unto her, for that she was a most wise woman. Now whilest the Parthians were in deliberation what were best to be done (in that it was held no policy to make open assault upon such a man) they deferred the whole matter untill the next morning. Whilest thus they were debating of their differences, Herod came unto them, who rather giving credit to that which he had heard as concerning his brother (and touching the treasons intended against him by the Parthians) then to his adversaries, as soon as it was night, concluded to make use of the time, and to make away, without staying any longer amongst those uncertain dangers, which his enemies intended against him. For which cause he fled with those men of War which he had with him: and mounting his mother, his sister and his betrothed, whom he was to marry (who was Alexanders daughter, the neece of Aristobulus) and her mother (who was Hircanus daughter) and her younger brother, with all their family and train, he departed into Idumæa without espiall or suspition of the enemy. Amongst whom there was not one so hard or iron-hearted, who seeing such a pitifull spectacle, could not be moved to compassion, beholding the mothers drag away their little children, and abandon their countrey with tears and complaints: and that which was worse, to leave their friends in bondage, without any hope of comfort or redress.

The Parthians lay a plot to surprise Herod: he discovereth it, and preventeth them by flight.

Herod comforteth his friends in their flight.

But Herod mastered these misfortunes by his invincible courage, and for that he was a constant man in all fortunes, he exhorted every one of them whom he met in the way, to be of good courage; and not abandon themselves to immeasurable sorrow, for that by such means they might hinder his retreat, on which their sole and securest conservation depended: whereupon they for their part indeavoured themselves to digest their griefs, according to Herods exhortation. Mean-while he hardly refrained from laying violent hands on himself, by reason of the chariot wherein his mother rode, which overturned and had almost slain her; yea so much did this casualty terrifie him (for fear lest the enemy in pursuit should surprize him during these delaies) as that he drew and prepared his sword to kill himself, had not some assistants and followers stept in to him and staied the stroke, beseeching him instantly not to forsake them, and leave them subject to the enemies violence: assuring him that it was not the part of a valiant man to respect his own private interest, and neglect his friends perill. By these perswasions he was induced to hold his hands, both by reason of the apprehension of these words, which were spoken unto him, as also for that he was overruled by the multitude of those who would not permit his hand to execute his will: so that taking up his mother, and doing her all the service that the time permitted, he followed on his way, and with the speediest and neareſt means he could, he retired toward the Castle of Massada; where in the way, he oftentimes fought against the Parthians that charged and pursued him, and returned alwaies with victory from them. The Jews also were not in peace with him during this his flight; for scarcely had he travelled sixty stounds out of the City, but that they assailed him in the high way: but he put them to flight and obtained the victory, not like a desperate man enforced thereunto through necessity, but like a discreet, well furnished and valiant Souldier. So that in the very place where he obtained the victory against the Jews (after such time as he was made King) he builded a most sumptuous palace, and near unto the same a City which he called Herodium. Whilest he remained at Ressa (a borough of Idumæa) Joseph his brother came forth to meet him, and to consult with him as touching their whole estate, and to know of him what should become of that great multitude that followed them, considering that they had no Souldiers in pay, and the castle of Massada (whither he intended to flie) was too little to hold all the people: for which cause he sent away many to the number of nine thousand, willing them to disperse themselves here and there in the countrey of Idumæa; and for the better dispatch of their journey, he furnished them with victuals. As for himself, he took with him his most able Souldiers and inward friends, and repaired to the castle of Massada, in which place he left the women and their train, to the number of eight hundred or thereabouts: and furnishing the place with corn, water, and other provisions necessary, he went unto Petra the chiefest City of Arabia. As soon as it was day, the Parthians sacked all that which appertained to the Citizens of Jerusalem; and among other other things they ſpoiled the palace; notwithſtanding they medled not with Hircanus money, which amounted to ſome three hundred talents. They left divers other things behind them alſo that appertained to Herod, and eſpecially that which had been tranſported into Idumæa by his mature providence. Neither were the Parthians content with the ſpoil of the City, but they forraged all the countrey round about, and razed Mariſſa a very rich City. Thus Antigonus, brought back into his countrey by the King of the Parthians, received Hircanus and Phaſælus that were priſoners: yet was he vehemently diſpleaſed, becauſe the women had eſcaped, whom according to his promiſe he intended to have delivered with the money: and fearing leſt Hircanus through the favour of the people ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed in his Kingdome (who then was priſoner in the cuſtody of the Parthians) he cut off both his ears, depriving him by that means from enjoying the Prieſthood any more, by reaſon of that maim, becauſe the law commandeth that they who are in that dignity ſhould be ſound in all their members. But Phaſælus is to be admired for his great courage at that time: for underſtanding that he muſt needs die, he was no waies diſmaied with death, but that which he held moſt miſerable and diſhonourable was, that he muſt needs die by the hands of his enemy. Seeing therefore that he could not diſpatch himſelf by other means, (becauſe he was bound and chained) he knockt out his own brains againſt a ſtone, and ſo ended his life (with as great honour as may be imagined in ſuch a deſperate eſtate) depriving his enemy of that power which he intended to practiſe in tyrannizing over him at his pleaſure. It is ſaid that the wound being very deep, Antigonus ſent privily Chirurgeons to cure him; and that under colour of healing him, they ſhould put poyſon into the ſame, where through he might die. But before Phaſælus gave up the ghoſt, he underſtood by a certain woman, that his brother Herod had eſcaped from his enemies: for which cauſe he endured his death with far greater cheerfulneſs and conſtancy, ſeeing that he left behind him ſuch a man as would revenge his death, and puniſh his enemies. But Herod was no ways diſcomforted with the greatneſs of thoſe adverſities which environed him round about, but was the more whetted on to finde out new inventions, and to adventure dangerous attempts. For he went unto Malchus King of the Arabians (to whom beforetime he had ſhewed much courteſie) hoping to receive the like of him in this time of his great neceſſity, and to draw ſome money from him either by loan or gift, according as he had often and very bountifully pleaſured him. For being ignorant of his brothers death, he endeavoured himſelf to ranſome him ſpeedily from his enemies, by paying his ranſome (which amounted to three hundred talents) and for that cauſe he led with him the ſon of Phaſælus, who was only ſeven years old, to leave him in pleadg amongſt the Arabians for the ſum that was demanded. But certain meſſengers came to him from Malchus, who charged him in the Kings behalf to retire back again, for that the Parthians had enjoyned him that he ſhould neither receive nor retain Herod. And this colourable pretence uſed he, becauſe he would not pay his debts: and hereunto was he perſwaded by the advice of the greateſt in authority among the Arabians, who pretended thereby to make themſelves maſters of that treaſure that Antipater had committed to their cuſtody. Herod anſwered them, that he repaired not into their countrey to give them cauſe of any trouble, but onely to conſult with them about certain matters of great importance touching his own eſtate, and that afterwards he was reſolved to depart, and withdraw himſelf into Egypt as ſecretly as might be poſſible. He returned therefore to a certain Temple, where he had left divers of his followers; and the next day he came to Rhinocura, in which place he heard tidings of his brothers death. But afterwards Malchus repented himſelf of his ingratitude, and ſpeedily ſent after Herod, but he could not overtake him: for he had gotten far onward on his way, and was already arrived in poſt near to Peluſium: where being denied his paſſage to Alexandria in thoſe ſhips that were there, he addreſſed himſelf to the Magiſtrates of the place, who highly reſpected and honoured him, and ſent him to the City where Cleopatra was; who entertained him kindly: yet notwithſtanding could ſhe not perſwade him to remain with her. Whereupon he repaired towards Rome (notwithſtanding the winter and thoſe grievous troubles that at the very ſame time afflicted Italy, as it was reported.) Embarking himſelf therefore to ſail into Pamphilia, he was toſt with a moſt cruel ſtorme; ſo that with great danger at laſt he arrived in Rhodes, having been inforced in the tempeſt to caſt into the Sea a good part of his ſubſtance. There met he with Sappinas and Ptolomey, two of his endeared friends. He found alſo that the City of Rhodes had ſuffered much miſery by Caſsius Wars: and although his means were very ſcant, yet profited he them in what he might, and cauſed their walls to be repaired, notwithſtanding that by ſo doing he greatly hindred himſelf. After that, he cauſed a little frigot to be built, and embarked himſelf with

CHAP. XXVI.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 23. al. 25.

Antonius loved Herod, and hated Antigonus.

Cæsar Augustus Herods friend.

Antonius hearing all those alterations that had befallen Herod had compassion of his misery (bethinking himself of the estate and condition of great men, who are likewise subject to no less casualties) and the rather was he induced to do him good, both in remembrance of the friendship he had with Antipater his father, as also by reason of Herods promises of certain summes of money, if so be he were made King by his means, as he had been beforetime declared Tetrarch. But that which most moved him hereunto, was the hatred which he bare unto Antigonus, whom he accounted to be a mutinous man, and an enemy to the Romans fortune. On the other side, Cæsar was well inclined to succour him, both in regard of those armies which Antipater had brought into Egypt in his fathers service, as also becaus of the good hospitality and kindness that he had shewed him in all things; as in especial to gratifie Antonius, who was well affected towards Herod.

Herod admitted into the Senate, and declared King.

Whereupon the Senate being assembled, Messala and Atratinus brought forth Herod, and after they had praised him, and recited the benefits which the Romans had received by his father, and the great affection and good will which he bare to the people of Rome; they accused and declared Antigonus for the Romans enemy, not onely for his ancient crimes, but also for that in contempt of the Romans he had received the kingdome from the Parthians. Whilest the Senate was sore displeased at the report of these things, Antonius arose, and declared openly before them all, that in furtherance of the Parthian War, it were not amiss that Herod should be made King: which opinion of his was generally allowed, and finally ratified. The principall demonstration of the love and affection which Antonius bare unto Herod, was, that he not onely obtained him the kingdome, beyond all hope: for never thought he that the Romans would grant that dignity unto him, who were wont to reserve that honour to those of the Kings blood; and therefore he intended to have demanded it for his wives brother Alexander, and nephew to Aristobulus by the fathers side, and to Hircanus by the mother (which Alexander Herod afterwards put to death, as it shall be declared in place convenient) but also for that, within the term of seven daies, he sent him out of Italy with the unexpected titles of his felicity.

Herod intending the kingdome for his wives brother, enjoyeth the same himself

Herod ascendeth the Capitoll with Antonius and Cæsar.

As soon as the Senate was risen, Antonius and Cæsar issued forth, leading Herod between them, and being accompanied by the Consuls and other magistrates, went up into the Capitol to do sacrifice, and to place there this decree the Senate had made as touching this matter. The first day of Herods reign Antonius feasted him; and after this sort was he established King in the hundred eighty and fourth Olympiade, in the year wherein C. Domitius Calvinus twice Consul, and Caius Asinius Pollio were Consuls. Mean while Antigonus besieged those that were in the Castle of Massada, who were plentifully furnished with all things necessary (except it were water) for which cause Joseph, Herods brother, that was within, and two hundred of his friends, had concluded to flie unto the Arabians: for that they understood that Malchus had repented himself of the fault he had committed against Herod. But whilest they stood upon these terms, God poured down a huge rain on a certain night, that in short time filled their cisterns in such sort as that they had no more necessity to flie; and from that time forward they waxed confident: and for that this abundance of water befell them by Gods providence, they made a sally upon their enemies, in which they charged Antigonus Souldiers after such a manner, sometimes in open field, sometimes by covert assault, that they slew a great number of them. At that time Ventidius, a Roman Captain, was sent into Syria to drive the Parthians from thence, and after their departure he arrived in Jewry, making shew that he would assist Joseph: but in effect all his pretence was to draw money from Antigonus.

Being therefore encamped near unto Jeruſalem, and having drawn ſufficient money from Antigonus, he retired himſelf with the greater part of his forces: and to the intent his deceitfull dealing might not be diſcovered, he left Silo with a company of his Souldiers: who likewiſe was honoured by Antigonus, for fear leſt he ſhould be cauſe of ſome new trouble, before ſuch time as the Parthians, whoſe coming he expected ſhould yield him aid.

CHAP. XXVII.

Herod returneth from Rome by ſea, and fighteth againſt Antigonus.

B

AFter that Herod was come from Italy by ſea to Ptolomais, and that he had aſſembled no ſmall number of Souldiers both ſtrangers and his own countrey-men, he marched forward againſt Antigonus, and paſſed thorow Galilee. Silo and Nentidius alſo gave him aſſiſtance in this action, having received direction by Gellius from Antonius, that they ſhould aſſiſt Herod to recover his Countrey. But Ventidius was employed in appeaſing the troubles that were taiſed in the Cities by the Parthians: and as touching Silo he kept in Judæa, having been corrupted by Antigonus. But the further that Herod daily marched into the countrey, the more and more increaſed his forces; and all Galilee (except a very few) ſubmitted themſelves unto him. Whileſt therefore he C marched forward towards Maſſada, (being urged thereunto in that he was to relieve his parents that were beſieged therein) the City of Joppe would not grant him paſſage: for the Citizens thereof were his enemies: ſo that it behoved him firſt of all to ruinate the ſame, to the end he might leave no retreat or place of reſcous for his enemy on his back, if ſo be he made toward Jeruſalem. Upon which occaſion Silo laying hold, diſlodged his army and made thitherward: whom when the Jews did purſue, Herod ſallieth out with a ſmall company, and put them to flight, and ſaved Silo, notwithſtanding he fought very coldly and cowardly. Afterwards being ſeized of Joppe, he haſted onwards to deliver his friends that were beſieged in Maſſada; but part of the inhabitants ſubmitted themſelves unto him for the friendſhip they had born unto his father: another ſort of them, for the honour that they bare unto D him: the reſt admitted his government, in acknowledgement of thoſe benefits they had received from them both. But the greateſt part was thereunto moved by the hope they had conceived of their new elected King, and the confirmation of his government. Thus by theſe means was his army mightily increaſed.

Herod returning back out of Italy, leadeth forth his army againſt Antigonus.

Herod aſſaulteth Joppe, and taketh it.

Many ſubmit themſelves to Herod.

Whileſt thus he marched forward, Antigonus ſeized thoſe places that were fitteſt to lay ambuſhes in, or to fight at advantages by the way (notwithſtanding that by thoſe means and ſtratagems he did but ſmall or no hurt at all to his enemy;) ſo that Herod raiſed the ſiege, and diſcharged his friends out of the Caſtle of Maſſada: and after he had taken the fort of Reſſa, he approached Jeruſalem, being attended to Silo's army, and by divers Citizens of the City, who were afraid of his power. And when as he had pitched his camp to the weſt- E ward of the City, thoſe that kept the watch and guard on that ſide, ſhot their arrows and caſt ſome ſtones againſt him: divers likewiſe trouped forth, and fought, hand to hand againſt thoſe that were planted there: For which cauſe firſt of all Herod cauſed proclamation to be made round about the walls, ſignifying unto them that he reſorted thither for the common profit of the people, and for the conſervation of the City, without intent of revenge or memory of any wrongs that his private enemies had offered him, promiſing his moſt free pardon to all thoſe whoſoever had hainouſly offended him. Hereunto Antigonus made this anſwer (turning his ſpeech to Silo and the Romane Souldiers) that contrary to all juſtice they gave the kingdome to Herod, who was a private man, and an Idumæan (that is to ſay, a half Jew) whereas it hath been a cuſtome to beſtow the ſame on them that are of the line of the F Prieſts. For albeit at that preſent they were diſpleaſed with him, for that he was ſeized of the Kingdome by the means of the Parthians, and had reſolved with themſelves to diſpoſſeſs him; yet that there were divers others of that royall race, who might be made Kings according to the law, who have no wayes miſdemeaned themſelves towards the Romanes; and moreover there are Prieſts, who ſhould not be juſtly and uprightly dealt withall, if they ſhould be deprived of that honour which appertaineth unto them. Whileſt they debated the matter after this manner between them, and grew to hot and injurious taunts the one againſt the other, Antigonus commanded his men to aſſail thoſe that were near unto the wall: who ſhooting many arrows with great courage againſt them, drave them eaſily from the Tower they kept.

The year of the world, 3927. before Christs Nativity, 37.

At that time Silon gave manifest proof that he had been corrupted by money: for he suborned divers of his souldiers, who cried out that they had want of victuals, and demanded greater pay for their maintenance, and requested that they might be placed in some convenient garrisons to winter in, for that the places round about the City were desolate; because all necessaries for maintenance of life had been taken away and wasted by Antigonus Souldiers. Thus was the whole army troubled; so that each of them prepared themselves to dislodge. But Herod importuned and cried out upon the Captains and Souldiers that were under Silons charge, telling them that it concerned them not to abandon him whom Cæsar, Antony and the Senate of Rome, had sent thither: That for his own part he would give order that they should have abundance and foison of whatsoever they demanded; and incontinently departing from them (after he had presented them with this request) he deprived Silon of all colour and pretext of flight, for he caused an incredible quantity of victuals to be brought them; and commanded his friends that inhabited the confines of Samaria, to bring them corn, wine, oyl, cattel, and all other such provision from Jericho, to the end that from that time forward the Souldiers might want nothing. Antigonus was not ignorant thereof, so that he incontinently sent men thorowout the countrey, who might intercept and surprize the purveiours and victuallers. Who folllowing Antigonus commandment, assembled a great number of Souldiers near unto Jericho, and encamping in the mountains, espied and watched those that brought the victuals. Mean-while Herod lay not still, but took with him ten companies, five of Romane Souldiers, and five of Jews, with whom he intermixed some forrain Souldiers, with some few horsemen, and came to Jericho; where being arrived, he seized the Town, which was abandoned by the inhabitants, of whom five hundred with their wives and children were retired into the top of the mountains, whom he took, and afterwards set at liberty: but the Romane Souldiers, entring into their houses, and finding them full of all sorts of moveables, they spoiled the same. And the King having left a garrison in Jericho, returned to his own place, dismissing the Romane army to go and winter in the conntries lately surrendred unto him; namely, in Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus also purchased this favour at Silons hands by store of bribes, that part of his army was lodged in Lydda, all which he did to currie favour with Antony.

Silon suborneth some of his Souldiers, to take an occasion to depart from Jerusalem.

Herod procured & furnished the army with victuals and abundant munition.

Antigonus sendeth out Souldiers to surprize Herods victualers.

The Romans sent to their garrisons to winter.

Whilest thus the Romans lived in all abundance and bare no arms; Herod would not be still, but sent his brother Joseph into Idumæa, with one thousand footmen, and four hundred horse; and himself resorted to Samaria, where his mother and his other parents kept, who beforetime were departed out of Massada. After this he went into Galilee to surprize certain castles which were held by Antigonus garrisons, and being arrived at Sephoris (during a great snow) after that Antigonus garrisons were departed out of the foresaid castles, he found a great abundance of all sorts of necessary munition. And there having notice of certain theeves, who inhabited in caves, he sent a troop of horsemen, with three companies of footmen, against them: whom he commanded to do justice on those robbers (now the place where they kept, was not far from a borough called Arbela:) and fourty daies after, he himself with all his army resorted thither. Now whereas the enemies issued out against him with a hardy resolution, the left wing of his squadron retired and fainted; but he coming on with his main battel, put them to flight, who were already almost masters of the field, and made those of his followers that fled, to turn their faces, and to pursue their enemies as far as the floud Jordan: who fled some of them by one way, some by another; so that he drew all Galilee under his subjection, except those that inhabited and held the caves. He distributed money also amongst his Souldiers, and gave each Souldier an hundred and fifty drachmes, and far more unto their chieftains, and afterwards sent them to winter in garrisons near at hand.

Robbers.

Herod fighteth with his enemies in Galilee, and overcometh them, and bringeth all Galilee under his subjection.

About this time Silon and his Captains, who had passed the Winter in the said garrisons, came unto him (for that Antigonus would no more furnish them with victuals:) for he gave them maintenance for no more time then a moneth, commanding those that dwelt round about them, to spoil the countrey, and afterwards to retire themselves into the mountains, to the end that the Romans might be destitute of necessary maintenance, and by that means might be consumed with famine. Herod gave Pheroras his youngest brother the charge of that provision, commanding him to inclose the fort of Alexandrion with a wall; who speedily brought to pass that the Souldiers had all sorts of necessaries at commandment: he re-edified also the fort of Alexandrion which had been laid desolate. About that time Antony sojourned in Athens, and Ventidius was in Syria, who having sent for Silon to accompany him against the Parthians, did first of all charge him to assist Herod in that War: and afterwards

Antigonus refuseth to victuall the Romane army.

A afterwards to excite the provincial confederates to further his War. But Herod diſmiſſing Silon and his company to follow their deſtinated Wars with Ventidius, did in his own perſon lead out his Souldiers againſt thoſe theeves that lived in dens. Now theſe caves were ſcituate in the moſt higheſt and inacceſſible mountains, impregnable through narrow paths enviroined with ſharp rocks, wherein the robbers inhabited ſecretly, with all their families. King Herod cauſed a certain number of coffers to be made, faſtned to iron chains, which he cauſed to be let down by an engine from the top of the mountain (becauſe it was neither poſſible by reaſon of the ſteepineſs of the hill to aſcend the ſame from beneath, neither from above to creep downward againſt them.) Theſe cheſts were filled with Souldiers, armed B with great hooks to draw theſe theeves unto them, and to break their necks headlong from the height to the bottome. But the uſe of theſe coffers was dangerous, for it was neceſſary to let them down an infinite depth into the caves, eſpecially for that the theeves had neceſſary munition among them: notwithſtanding when they had gotten down, none of the theeves durſt peep out of the mouthes of their caves, but fear conſtrained them to hold themſelves quiet; but a certain Souldier having girt his ſword by his ſide, and taken hold of the chain with both his hands whereto the coffer was faſtned, ſlid down as far as the entry of the cave: and being diſpleaſed that no one iſſued out, he ſhot divers arrows at thoſe that were within, and wounded them; and after that, with his hook he drew thoſe unto him who reſiſted him, and tumbled them down headlong from the ſteepy rock: which done, he ruſhed in upon thoſe that were within the cave, and ſlew many of them, and afterwards C returned and reſted himſelf in his coffer. Divers hearing the groans of thoſe that were wounded, were ſurpriſed with fear and deſpair of their life, but the nights approach was the cauſe that the matter was not fully atchieved, and many of them (receiving notice of the Kings free pardon by a Herauld) ſubmitted themſelves. The next day they renewed and continued the ſame manner of fight, and divers iſſued out of their coffers to fight upon the outward entrances of the caves, into which they caſt fire, which (for that there was great quantity of wood in the caves) did quickly burn. Within theſe caves there was a certain old man apprehended, with his wife and ſeven ſonnes: who being required by them that he would ſuffer them to go and ſubmit themſelves to their enemies, took up the entry of the cave, and as his ſonnes advanced themſelves to iſſue out he ſlew them, untill ſuch time as D he had maſſacred them all, and after them his wife; and finally, when he had caſt their dead bodies down the rocks, he threw himſelf down headlong after them, preferring death before ſervitude. Yet before his death he reviled Herod in bitter words, and upbraided him of his obſcurity and ignoble race: and although Herod (who ſaw all that which had happened) ſtretched out his hand unto him and promiſed him pardon, yet would he not reſpect him; and by this means were all theſe caves entred, and the theeves therein taken.

Now when the King had eſtabliſhed Ptolomey captain over the ſouldiers in that region, he retired himſelf into Samaria, with ſix hundred horſemen, and three thouſand footmen, with a reſolution to fight with Antigonus, and to end their quarrel. But Ptolomey had but E very ſlender ſucceſs in his government: for they that before-time had troubled the countrey of Galilee, ſallied out upon him, and overthrew him. After which execution they fled into the Mariſhes and unacceſſible places, where they robbed and ſpoiled all the countrey. But Herod returning and ſetting upon them, puniſhed them: for he ſlew ſome of them, and the reſt were conſtrained to flie into ſtrong places, where he beſieged them and entring their fortreſſes perforce, ſlew the men, and deſtroyed their fortifications: and having brought this rebellion to an end, he condemned the Cities to pay him the ſum of one hundred talents. Mean while, Pacorus was ſlain in the War, and the Parthians were diſcomfited with him; which was the cauſe that Ventidius ſent Machæras to ſuccour Herod with two legions and 1000, horſe, and that by the commandment of Antonius. But Machæras was drawn F by Antigonus, who corrupted him with money: and notwithſtanding Herods contradiction & diſſwaſion, yet reſorted he unto him, alleadging that he did it to look into his actions. But Antigonus ſuſpecting his ſudden approach, entertained him not, but cauſed him to be darted at and driven thence, giving him to underſtand by his entertainment, what opinion he had of him, and how he was affected towards him: who at that time perceived plainly that Herod had given him good counſel, and that himſelf had miſdone in misbeleeving his advice: for which cauſe he returned to the City Emaus, and ſlew all thoſe Jews whom he met withall in the way, whether friends or enemies: ſo highly diſpleaſed was he at that which had happened. Herod ſore moved hereat, came to Samaria, reſolving with himſelf to poſte unto Antonius to complain of theſe aggrievances; conſidering that he had no need of ſuch associates, who did him more harm then his enemies; whereas of himself he was able to make good his War against Antigonus. But Macheras hasted after him, requiring him to stay, and to travel no further on that journey, of if he might not be delivered, he prayed him to leave his brother Joseph behind him, who might with them make War against Antigonus. By these perswasions and instant intreaties of Macheras, he was somewhat appeased: so that he left his brother Joseph behind him, with an army; charging him no way to hazzard his fortune, or to fall at oddes with Macheras. As for himself he hasted toward Antony, who at that time besieged Samosata (a City scituate near unto Euphrates) having with him an army of his associates, both horsemen and footmen. When Herod was arrived in Antioch, he found divers men assembled there, who were desirous to go and seek out Antony: but they durst not set forward on the way, for fear lest certain Barbarians should set upon them, and kill them in their journey: these did Herod assure, and offered himself to be their guide upon the way. Now when they came to their second bait, some two daies journey off Samosita, the Barbarians laid an ambush for them, and had barred up the way with hurdles, and had likewise hidden certain horsemen thereabouts, who should lie in covert untill such time as the passengers had recovered the Plain. Now when the foremost were past, the ambush consisting of about some five hundred horsemen, suddenly charged Herod who was in his rereward; when as therefore they had broken the former ranks whom they had met, Herod with his troop that was about him, incontinently repulsed them; and after he had encouraged his followers, and whetted them on to the fight, he wrought so much, that he made those that fled to turn their faces, and to fight, so that the Barbarians were put to the sword on all sides. The King also pursued them so long, untill at last he recovered that which had been taken by them, which was a certain number of sumpter-horses and slaves. But being charged afresh by others, and they in greater number then those who encountred him at first, he likewise (rallying his forces together) charged and overcame them; and killing divers of them, he secured the way to those that followed after, who all of them acknowledged him for their preserver and guide.

Herod was honourably entertained by Antonius and his host.

When he drew near unto Samosata, Antony sent out his army in goodly array to meet and honour him, and withall to succour him, in that he had heard that the Barbarians had assailed him. As soon as he came to Antony's presence, he entertained him kindly; and after he had heard that which had befaln him in the way, he embraced him in admiration of his vertue, and did him great honour, as to him whom a little before he had raised to a royal dignity. Not long after this, Antiochus surrendred the sort of Samosata to Antony, and upon this occasion the War was ended. Whereupon Antony committed the Province with the army to Sosius: and after he had commanded him to succour Herod, he departed into Egypt. Sosius therefore sent two legions of Souldiers before into Judæa to succour Herod, and afterwards he followed with the rest of his army.

In the mean while Joseph died in Jewry, on this occasion that ensueth: For forgetting his brother Herods commandment which he gave him at such time as he repaired to Antony, he took to him five companies of Souldiers which Macheras had left him, and marching towards Jericho to gather in the fruits of the field, he pitched his tents upon the mountains: And for that the Roman troops were but newly levied, and consisted of those men who were untrained in the Warres, and for the most part were gathered out of the countrey of Cœlosyria: the enemies having advertisement hereof, assailed and surprized him in certain places of disadvantage, where there was a hot skirmish between them, in which Joseph died fighting valiantly; and all his army was discomfited: for six companies of them were slain. After that the dead bodies were at Antigonus command, he cut off Josephs head, which Pheroras his brother ransomed for the price of fifty talents. Which done, the Galileans revolting from their Governours, drowned Herods partakers in the lake; so that divers commotions and troubles were raised in Jewry. Macheras he fortified the castle of Gath. This misfortune of Josephs was reported to the King, in a certain suburb of Antioch called Daphne, who before the tidings, had already conceived some suspition and fear, grounded upon certain dreams, which gave him certain intelligence of his brothers death. Departing therefore from thence with all expedition, he arrived near to the mount Libanus, where he took about eight hundred men with him, and the Roman legion which he had, and from thence came to Ptolomais; from whence he departed with his army by night, and crossed Galilee with them. Whereupon the enemies came forth against him, and were overcome by him, and shut up in a fort from whence they were departed but the day before; where Herod assailed them by break of day: But being unable to offer them any prejudice, by reason of the indisposition of the weather, he led his men into the villages near adjoyning. But when Antonius

A second legion was come, and annexed to his forces; they that were within the fort were dismayed, and forsook the same by night. So that Herod marched with all diligence to Jericho, with an intent to revenge his brothers death; and being encamped near unto the same, he banquetted and entertained the Chieftains of his army; and after the feast was ended, and he had dismissed his company, he withdrew himself into his lodging. In which place it appeared, how much God loved the King: for the roof of the house where he had solemnized his feast fell down without hurt to any one whomsoever: for no one was left within it. Whence it came to pass, that each one perswaded himself that Herod was beloved by God; considering he had avoided so great and unexpected a peril.

The year of the world, 3928. before Christs Nativity, 36.

The house wherein Herod solemnized his feast, fell down when the guests were gone, without any mans detriment.

The next day, six thousand of enemies came down from the top of the mountains to fight with him, who affrighted the Romans, and their forlorn hope chased Herods Souldiers
B with darts, and stones, who was himself also hurt in the thigh with an arrow. Antigonus sent a Captain to Samaria, whose name was Pappus, with some Souldiers, intending thereby to signifie unto his enemies, that he had more men of War then he needed. Pappus drew near to Macharas the Roman Captain: and as touching Herod, he took five Cities by force, and put some two thousand of them that were in garrison to the sword; and afterwards (having set the houses on fire) he went out to encounter Pappus; who was encamped in a borough called Isanas. Divers that came from Jericho and Jewry submitted themselves to Herod, who drawing near the enemy (who marched forward with great hardiness, fought with him and overcame him, and being inflamed with a great desire he had to revenge his brothers death, he pursued them that fled, and slew them even within their borough. These houses were
C incontinently filled with men of war, and divers fled and hid themselves upon the tops thereof, who were at last taken; for the roofs of the houses were beaten down, and he saw that all were filled with Souldiers, whereby divers were slain by stones that were darted at them from above, and afterwards cast and killed them by heaps; which was the most grievous spectacle of all those that had hapned in those Wars, to see an infinite number of bodies hidden one under another amidst the rooms of the houses.

Fight in the houses.

This exploit of Herod did very much abate the courage of his enemy, who hereafter expected far more worse fortunes at his hands: For a man might have seen them flie away in heaps: and had not a sudden and forcible tempest faln upon them, the triumphant army of Herod had incontinently entred Jerusalem with assurance of victory, which had made a final
D end of all that War. For Antigonus each day bethought him how to flie away, and to forsake the City. But for that it was already grown dark, Herod commanded his souldiers to refresh themselves; and for that he himself was weary, he entred into his lodging to bathe himself, in which place he overwent a mighty misfortune, from which he escaped by Gods providence. For (whereas he was naked and accompanied with one only servant to attend him) at such time as he bathed, there were a certain number of armed enemies hidden in that lodging, who were fled thither for the fear they had: and during the time that Herod bathed, the first amongst them issued with his naked sword and got the door; and after him the second; and the third no less armed, without offending the King, for the fear that they had of his
E presence: and content to escape in their own persons, without the prejudice of other men. The next day he sent Pappus head to his brother Pheroras, who was slain by his own sword in revenge of the injury offered to Joseph. When the tempest was done, he departed from thence, and approached near to Jerusalem, and encamped near unto the City. This was about the third year since he was created King at Rome; and encamping himself in the places which were (as he thought) fittest for battery; he addressed himself towards the Temple side, resolving to batter and make breach in that place in like manner as Pompey had done before him. Having therefore erected three bulwarks in three places, he builded Towers thereon by the assistance of many workmen: and by means of a great quantity of wood, which he caused to be cut down round about the place: and having appointed such men as F were of ripe judgement to oversee these works, he left his army well provided, and resorted to Samaria, to marry with the daughter of Alexander, who was Aristobulus son, to whom he was betrothed, according as I have heretofore declared.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Antigonus is discomfited by Sosius and Herod.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 26. al. 27.

After this marriage was solemnized, Sosius repaireth thither through the countrey of Phœnicia, and having first of all sent his army thorow the continent, he himself also resorted thither with many as well footmen as horsemen: thither also repaired the King from Samaria, with no small army, to annex himself with the old bands: for he had about thirty thousand men. All these assembled themselves together near unto the walls of Jerusalem, and planted their siege nigh unto the wall of the City that extendeth towards the Northward. The army contained eleven legions of footmen, with six thousand horsemen: besides the succours that came from Syria. Of this army there were two Generals: namely, Sosibius who was sent by Antonius to succour Herod: and Herod himself, who made War for himself, with an intent that having dispossessed Antigonus (whom he had proclaimed enemy to Rome) he himself might be King in his place, according to the Senates decree. Those Jews that were within the enclosure of the walls (that is to say, almost all the nation) resisted the Herodians with great courage and affection, vaunting and boasting much of the Temple of the Lord, and wishing all good hap and success to the people; namely, that God would deliver them from all dangers: and spoiling all provision without the City, that was either behoveful for the use of man and beast, by their secret thefts and excursions also they made the very besiegers destitute of relief and victuals. Which inconvenience Herod so well prevented, that he forestalled their means of theft, and laid ambushes in place convenient to cut them off. As for victuals, he sent his footmen to fetch his provision from far; so that within a very little space they had abundance of all that which was necessary in the campe. He erected also with no less carefulness three bulwarks, by the diligent labour of a great number of workmen: for it was summer time, and neither was the air incommodious, or negligence of the workmen such, but that they presently furnished and finished them. Afterwards having raised their engines upon them, they battered the wall, with as much violence and diligence as was possible: notwithstanding all this, they did no waies amate those that were within; who for their parts used all the cunning that might possible be to defend themselves, and by divers sallies set fire upon the enemies engines; and burnt not onely those that were half made, but those that were wholly perfected: and when necessity drave them to handy-strokes, they shewed no less valour then the Romanes courage; but they were inferiour unto them in skill and martial discipline. And when as the first wall was beaten down, they builded up a new, and countermined against those mines that were made by the enemy; so that they fought under ground hand to hand. Thus using despaire rather then courage, they sustained the War to the uttermost; yea, notwithstanding they were besieged by a great army, and pressed by famine and want of victuals: for the year wherein the siege was continued was the seventh, in which the earth was unmanured, which by us is called the year of rest. But finally, twenty chosen Souldiers first of all mounted upon the wall; and after them one of Sosius Centurions: for the first wall was taken in the fourtieth day after the siege, and the second on the fiftieth, and some galleries were burned, which were near unto the Temple: which (as Herod said) were burned by Antigonus, to bring him into more hatred among the Jews. When the outward part of the Temple, and the lower part of the City were taken, the Jews fled into the Temple, and into the higher Town, for fear they had, lest the Romans should hinder them from offering their daily and ordinary sacrifices unto God: and they sent Embassadours to their enemies, to require that it might be lawfull for them onely to bring in certain beasts to offer them for sacrifices. Which Herod their King granted them, hoping by this means that they would submit themselves and yield up the places. But perceiving that his opinion failed him herein, and that they obstinately resisted him, to continue the soveraignty in Antigonus, he gave the assault, and took the City by force: where all things were incontinently filled with murthers, in that the Romans were displeased, because they had so long time continued the siege; and the Jews that were on Herods side enforced them utterly to exterminate all those that were of the contrary party, so that continual slaughters ranged and raigned every where, both in porches, and in the houses whereinto they entred: Neither did the religious reverence of the Temple save those suppliants that resorted thither for safety, but that without all compassion both old and young were slaughtered: Neither did their murthering hand spare or refrain from women; nay not so much as from young infants. And although the

A the King beſought and requeſted them to forbear them, yet no man gave over, but all ſorts of perſons were murthered by them, without reſpect either of ſex or age. Antigonus inconſiderate of that eſtate wherein he had been, or the fortune and diſaſter that at that preſent attended him, came down from the Tower and humbled himſelf on his knees before Soſius feet; who having no compaſſion of the change of that eſtate wherein he ſaw him, outragiouſly ſcorned him, calling him Madam Antigona: yet left he him not without guard after the manner of a Woman, but faſt bound for his further aſſurance. But Herod was buſied in deviſing how he might moderate his aſſociates and ſtrangers, after he had the upper hand over his enemies: For the ſtrangers ſwarmed into the City by heapes, and not onely into the Temple, but alſo into the Sanctuary. He therefore exhorted ſome, and threatned other ſome, and reſtrained the reſt by force of arms; and he was more troubled at that preſent in B being a Conquerour, then if he had been conquered: for that thoſe things that were not lawfull to be ſeen, were beheld by prophane men. He prevented likewiſe the ſpoile of the City, as much as in him lay: Beſeeching Soſius moſt inſtantly, to preſerve it to the utmoſt, asking him if the Romans would leave him King of a deſart, after they had voided the City of men and goods? Alleadging furthermore, that he eſteemed the government of the whole World of no value, in regard of the life of one of his Citizens. Soſius anſwered, that it was reaſon that the pillage ſhould be given to the Souldier, who had borne the hazard of the ſiege: whereunto Herod anſwered, that he would ſatisfie every man out of his own treaſury; and by this means, he ranſomed the reſt of the City by fulfilling thoſe promiſes: For he gave many mighty gifts unto every one of the Souldiers, and by proportion unto the C Captains: but above all, he royally rewarded Soſius; ſo that every one of them departed very rich in ſilver.

These calamities hapned in the City of Jeruſalem, in the year wherein Marcus Agrippa and Canidius Gallus were Conſuls, which was in the hundred, foureſcore and fifth Olympiade, in the third moneth, on the daies wherein the ſolemn faſt was celebrated; as if this affliction had jumpt together in one iſſue and inſtant with that of Pompeys; for on the ſame day had the ſame City been taken twenty and ſeven years before. Soſius offered a crown of gold unto God, and afterwards departed from Jeruſalem, leading Antigonus priſoner with him unto Antony. But Herod fearing leſt if Antigonus ſhould be kept by Antony, and ſent to Rome, he ſhould debate his title with him before the Senate by proteſt that he was deſcended of the royall Line; whereas Herod was but a Plebeian and common perſon; and that although he had offended the Romans, and thereby might not deſerve to be King; yet at leaſt his children, who were of the Princely Line, were not to be denied their title: Herod, I ſay, fearing theſe things, wrought ſo much by force of his money with Antony, that he cauſed him to put Antigonus to death, ſo that at that time Herod was truly delivered from all his fear. Thus ended the eſtate of the Aſmoneans, after one hundred twenty and ſix years. This family was famous both for their nobility, and alſo by reaſon of their Sacerdotal dignity, and for the noble actions and exploits which their anceſtors had atchieved for our nation; but they loſt their authority through their mutual factions; which ſoveraignty was derived to Herod E Antipaters ſon, who was ignoble by birth, and of mean friends; who were ſubjects and vaſſals to Kings. Jeruſalem being taken by Soſius and Herod, Antigonus is healed by Antony's command: Herod maketh away all his chiefeſt friends.

IN the former book I have declared how Soſius and Herod took the City of Jeruſalem by force, and with it Antigonus priſoner: now will we alſo declare that which hath ſubſequently followed: for after that Herod had obtained the abſolute government over the whole land of Judæa, he advanced all thoſe among the common people, who favoured his proceedings: as for thoſe who were oppoſed againſt him, there paſſed not a day wherein ſome one or other of them ſuffered not puniſhment. But amongſt the reſt, Pollio the Phariſee, and Sameas his Diſciple, were highly honoured by him: For during the time of the ſiege of Jeruſalem, they counſelled the inhabitants to receive and entertain Herod: for which cauſe he reſpected them accordingly. This Pollio in times paſt (when Herod was found guilty of death) foretold Hircanus and the reſt of the Judges in way of exprobration, that being abſolved by them, he ſhould one day inflict puniſhment on them all. Which prediction God in proceſs of time approved by the event: no ſooner therefore became he maſter of Jeruſalem, but he gathered together all the rich houſhold ſtuffe that was in the Palace; and furthermore having ſpoiled the rich men of their goods, and by this means levied a great ſum of gold and ſilver, he ſent great preſents to Antony and his friends. Moreover, he condemned five and fourty of Antigonus principal and nobleſt favourites to death, ſetting ſtraight watch about their doors, that none of them might be carried out under colour of being dead. The dead bodies likewiſe were trodden under foot: and all the gold, ſilver, or jewels that was to be found amongſt them, was carried to the King, and converted to his uſe, ſo that there was no end of theſe miſeries. For the covetouſneſs of the Conquerour (whoſe greedy and thirſty deſire could hardly be quenched) laid hold on whatſoever was theirs. And for that it was the ſeventh year, it neceſſarily came to paſs that the land was left left unmanured; for we are forbidden to sow in this year. Antony having taken Antigonus prisoner, resolved to keep him in prison untill the time of his triumph: But after he had received tidings that the nation of the Jews were ready to innovate and rebell, and continued their good affection towards Antigonus, in regard of the hatred they conceived against Herod; he concluded with himself to take his head from him at Antioch: for the Jews could scarcely contain themselves. Strabo of Cappadocia testifieth no less in these words: Antony having brought Antigonus the Jew to Antioch, caused his head to be cut off; and was the first among the Romanes that hath caused a King to be beheaded in this manner: supposing that the Jews might never otherwise be induced to change their opinions, and receive Herod: yet this opinion of his was not answerable to equity. For notwithstanding whatsoever impulsion he might devise, yet could they not be induced to call him King: in so high estimate and account held they their former King. But Antony supposed that that infamy would obscure his renown, and lessen the general hate that they bare to Herod. See here what Strabo writeth.

CHAP. II.

How Hircanus dismissed by the Parthians, returned unto Herod.

Phraates King of Parthia, understanding how nobly Hircanus was descended, who was brought prisoner unto him, entertained him graciously: and for this cause drew him out of prison, permitting him to converse in Babylon, in which place there were a great number of Jews, who honoured Hircanus very much; and no less then their high Priest and King. The like also did all they of that nation inhabiting as far as Euphrates, which did not a little content Hircanus. But after that he was advertised that Herod was possessed of the Kingdome; he transferred his hopes another way, being of his own nature tenderly affected towards his friends, expecting that one day Herod would requite him, for that he had delivered him from death whereunto he was condemned, and in danger likewise of the penalty and punishment. He began therefore to consult with the Jews as touching his journey, who in way of duty and love came to visit him, and who besought him, and importuned him to abide with them, offering him all service and honour; assuring him that he should in no less manner be respected among them then their high Priest and King; yea, in far higher regard then he might any waies be in his own countrey, by reason of the maime he had in his body through Antigonus tyranny: alleadging that Kings do not ordinarily call to their remembrance those pleasures that they have received in their infant fortunes, because that with their estates they change both their manners and inclinations. But notwithstanding all these or such like allegations, yet could not Hircanus be withdrawn from the desire he had to repair homeward. Herod also wrote unto him, that he should require Phraates and the Jews that inhabited his Kingdome, in no sort to envy his felicity, in that he should partake with him both in dignity and royalty, alleadging that the time was now come wherein he might acknowledge the benefits he had received, by being heretofore nourished and preserved by him. With these letters he sent Samaralla likewise on an Embassage to Phraates furnished with great and rich presents, endeavouring by that means to win him, that he in no sort should hinder his gratulation and good intent towards one that had so highly deserved at his hands: yet were not his protestations answerable to his pretence. For in so much as he governed not with that uprightnes which became a just King, he feared lest some alteration might befall him, according to his demerits: for which cause he sought to get Hircanus under his power, or at leastwise to dispatch him out of his life, which he afterwards performed. When as therefore Herod had perswaded the Parthian to dismis Hircanus, and the Jews to furnish him with money sufficient to bear his expence in his journey, he received him with all honour. In common assemblies he gave him alwaies the highest place, and in the time of festivals, he made him alwaies sit down before him; and the more closely to deceive him, he called him brother, endeavouring himself by all means wholly wholly to extinguish in him all colour and cause of suspition of treachery: neither intermitted he any other stratagems, whereby in his opinion he might any wayes further or promote his cause; and yet by these means occasioned he no small sedition in his own family. For carefully providing lest any one among the nobility should be established high Priest, he sent to Babylon for a certain man of base condition, called Ananel, and gave him the Priesthood. For which cause Alexandra grew suddenly displeased, not being able to endure that outrage. This woman was Hircanus daughter, and Alexanders wife, who was King Aristobulus son, who had two children by her husband, the one wondrous beautifull, who was called Aristobulus: the other was Mariamne, who was likewise fair, and married to Herod. She was sore moved and highly displeased to see her son so much indignified, for that during his life another was called to the honour of high Priesthood: for which cause she wrote unto Cleopatra by the means of a certain Musitian, beseeching her to beg the high Priesthood at Antonius hands for her son. But for that Antonius made little reckoning of those suits, a certain friend of his called Gellius, who was come into Jewry about certain of his affais, and who had seen Aristobulus, fell in love with him by reason of his beauty: and being abashed likewise at his great and goodly stature, and allured by Mariamnes admirable beauty, he openly protested, that he accounted Alexandra a happy mother in her children: and devising to this effect with her, he perswaded her to send the pictures of her two children to Antonius; for that if he should but behold them, he would refuse him in nothing wherein he should request his friendship. Alexandra perswaded by these words, sent their pictures unto Antonius. Gellius also made the matter more wonderfull, telling him that the children seemed rather to be ingendred of no mortal strain, but by some divine power, labouring as much as in him lay, that Antonius might be allured to affection them. Who supposing it to be a matter ill beseeming him to send for Mariamne, who was married to Herod, and desirous likewise to avoid Cleopatras suspitions, wrote unto Herod, that under some honest pretext he should send Alexandras son unto him (with this addition, if it might not seem troublesome unto him.) Which matter when Herod understood, he thought it no waies incident to his security to send Aristobulus, (who was a fair young man, and little more at that time then sixteen years old, and so nobly born: considering that Antonius was at that present in such authority, that no one in Rome was in greater credit then he; and who besides that, was very much addicted to his pleasures, which he openly hunted after without fear of punishment in regard of his greatness and power. He therefore wrote him this answer, that if the young man should but onely depart out of the countrey, all the land would incontinently be filled with War and Troubles, for that the Jews pretended alteration in government, and sought to innovate by preferring a new King. When as therefore he had in this sort excused himself unto Antonius, he resolved to entertain both the younger Aristobulus and his mother Alexandra, with more respect. Moreover his wife Mariamne did continually importune him to give the Priesthood to her brother, alleadging that by that honour he might prevent the occasion of his travel. For which cause assembling his friends together in councel, he grievously accused Alexandra before them, protesting that she secretly conspired against the Kingdome, and that by the mediation of Cleopatra she laboured to dispossess him of the soveraignty, to the intent that her son by Antonius meanes might govern in his stend. Which practice of hers was so much the more unjust, because she deprived her own daughter of that honour wherein she was instated, and raised up troubles likewise in that Kingdome which he had conquered with great travel, and extreme danger: Yet notwithstanding that he willingly forgat that which was past, and forgave those wrongs she had urged against him, and was ready notwithstanding to shew all kindness and courtesie both to her and hers. Furthermore he gave the high Priesthood to young Aristobulus, alleadging that heretofore he had established Ananel in that place for no other respect, then for that Aristobulus was under years.

After that he had thus seriously and considerately discoursed in the presence of the Ladies, and consistory of his friends, Alexandra almost beside her self, not onely through the joy she had conceived by this unexpected good fortune, but also for the feat she had to be suspected, began to defend her self with tears and protestations, saying, that all whatsoever she had either practised or done, was to prefer her son unto the Priesthood whom she saw dishonoured: but as touching the Kingdom, that she had never pretended, neither would (if so be she should be presented therewith) receive the same, thinking her self for the present sufficiently honoured, both for that she saw Aristobulus in that estate, for the assurance that all her progeny should receive, in that he was lifted up in dignity above the rest. Being therefore overcome by those merits, she accepted willingly the honour for her son, Herod preferreth Ariſtobulus, his wife Mariamnes brother, to the Prieſthood; and afterwards putteth him to death.

HEreupon Herod took away the Prieſthood inſtantly from Ananel, who was not that countrey-man born (as we have heretofore declared) but was born amongſt thoſe Iews that inhabit and were planted beyond Euphrates by the Aſſyrians. For divers thouſand Iews inhabit the countrey of Babylon, and from thence took he his Original alſo, being otherwiſe of the race of the Prieſts, and intirely affected toward Herod for a long time before, with wh om he had familiar acquaintance. He had preferred him to this honour at ſuch time as he was made King, and degraded him likewiſe, to appeaſe the troubles C of his family; demeaning himſelf herein contrary to the law of the Countrey: for whereas any one hath once been inſtalled in that degree, he is never to be diſplaced. The firſt that tranſgreſſed this Ordinance, was Antiochus Epiphanes, who diſpoſſeſſed Joſuah, and preferred his brother Onias to his place. The ſecond was Ariſtobulus, who took it away from his brother Hircanus, and uſurped it himſelf. Herod was the third, who gave the Prieſthood to Ariſtobulus, eſtabliſhing him in Ananels place before he was dead: and by this means ſuppoſing that he had found out a remedy to appeaſe the diſcords of his family, he notwithſtanding all this, lived not without ſuſpition what event would follow after this reconciliation: for he feared Alexandra, leſt demeaning her ſelf in ſuch ſort as before-time ſhe had done, ſhe ſhould ſeek occaſion hereafter to raiſe new troubles. He commanded her D therefore to contain her ſelf within the royal Palace, and to do nothing of her own authority. Beſides that he had appointed certain intelligencers, who ſhould diligently obſerve that nothing ſhould be done without his knowledge, no not concerning her particular expences and table. All which things exaſperated her hate, and increaſed the ſame againſt Herod, for being full of feminie pride, ſhe diſdained to ſee her ſelf thus wrongfully ſuſpected, deſiring rather to ſuffer any thing, then to be deprived of the liberty of free ſpeech; and under colour to be honoured, to live continually in ſervitude and fear. Whereupon ſhe ſent certain of her truſty friends to Cleopatra to complain and lament unto her the importable miſeries of her preſent eſtate, requiring her according to her power, to give ready and ſpeedy relief. Whereupon Cleopatra ſent her word, that both ſhe and her ſon ſhould reſort unto her E into Egypt with as great ſecrecie as might be poſſible. Upon which advice and the allowance thereof, ſhe practiſed this policy. She cauſed two coffins to be made, ſuch as men were wont to bury their dead in, in which ſhe hid her ſelf and her ſon, commanding thoſe ſervants of hers that were privy to her deliberation to carry them out in the night time, and to bend their courſe directly towards the ſea, where there was a Bark in readineſs prepared to ſhape their courſe and convoy them into Egypt. But Eſop one of her houſhold ſervants declared this enterprize of hers to Sabbion one of Alexandras friends, ſuppoſing that he had been made privy thereunto: who had no ſooner inkling thereof, but (for that beforetimes he was Herods enemy, by reaſon he was ſuſpected to have been one of thoſe that ſought to poyſon Antipater) he determined by diſcovery of this ſecret flight to convert F Herods hate into aſſured friendſhip: and preſently diſcovered Alexandras ſecret enterprize to the King. Who diſſembling the matter untill it was upon the point of execution, ſurprized her at ſuch time as ſhe thought to fly, and yet notwithſtanding, he pardoned her that fault (in that he durſt not decree any puniſhment againſt her, though he could have found in his heart to have uſed ſeverity) for that Cleopatra would not have contained her ſelf, had ſhe but had ſuch an occaſion offered her to expreſs her hatred againſt Herod. For which cauſe, under the colour of a high and magnanimous ſpirit, he made ſhew to pardon her of his meere clemency: yet inwardly reſolved he to make young Ariſtobulus away; yet not raſhly upon the inſtant, leſt the act ſhould grow apparent and palpable.

festival dayes, intending both in himself, and in the presence and company of the people, to follow all kind of pleasure and delight; yet did his envie incite him to hasten the execution of his will. Aristobulus was at that time some seventeen years old, who at such time as he approached the Altar to offer sacrifices, according to the law, apparelled in the high Priests ornaments to perform the ceremonies, he (who for amiable countenance and goodly stature, surpassed the youngness and tenderness of his years) expressing in his countenance the dignity and nobility of his Race, drew the eyes and good affection of all the people unto him; so that they openly called to remembrance the noble actions of Aristobulus his grandfather. All the people being therefore surmounted by those their affections, and at that present time being all of them troubled with the joy they conceived, they brake out by little and little into happy acclamations, mixed with wishes and prayers: so that the good will the people bare to Aristobulus discovered it self openly, and they manifestly (although too hastily in such a kingdome) declared what evils they generally endured: For all which causes Herod concluded to execute that which he had heretofore complotted and conceited against Aristobulus. As soon therefore as the feast was over-passed, he sojourned in Iericho, where Alexandra entertained him. In that place he used Aristobulus with all kindness, to the end to draw him to some place where he feared nothing, playing also with him, and counterfeiting to sport, after the fashion of the young men, to gratifie him. Now for that the place where they disported themselves was by nature too hot, they quickly wearied left their sport, and went out together to take fresh aire, and recovering a pleasant shade under certain Arbours, and near certain fish-pools, which were largely spread round about, they beheld certain of their servants and friends that swom therein, with whom not long after Aristobulus began to swim, being perswaded thereunto by Herod. Whereupon Herods confederates (who were deputed to execute the murther) laid hands on him and thrust him under the water pretending to duck him in sport, and never gave him over untill such time as they had stifled him in the water. This happened about the evening, and after this manner died Aristobulus after he had lived in all for the space of eighteen years, and administred the Priesthood one whole year: and after this, Ananel presently recovered his former dignity.

Aristobulus is drowned by Herod direction

Ananel restored to the Priesthood.

Now when this accident was reported to the women, all of them were suddenly devoured in tears, and transported with strange lamentations, which they spent over the dead body. All the City also was marvellously amated, neither was there any private family that thought not it self touched by this inconvenience, but imagined the losse in particular to concern himself and no other. But above all, when Alexandra had notice of this wicked deed, she was more passionate and perplexed then any other, being so much the more discomforted, for that she knew how all things had hapned. But the fear of a far greater mischief constrained her to repress her passion, in such sort, that divers times she was ready to bereave her of her own life, and dispatch her self out of misery with her own hands. But she contained her self, to the end, that surviving (and living after her son, who was so traiterously and fraudulently slain, and prolonging her own life, without giving any suspition or shadow, that she supposed her son to be thus cursedly murthered) she might with more opportunity expect the occasion to revenge herself: For which cause she dissembled all things, governed her grief, and made shew that she knew nothing of that which was either intended, or had hapned. As for Herod, he laboured by all means to perswade the strangers, that this death had befallen Aristobulus without his knowledge; and did not onely prepare that which was requisite for the funerall, but vext himself likewise, and made shew of a man truely devoured in this sorrow: and it may be, that in remembrance of Aristobulus beauty and flourishing young years, he was truly touched with compassion, notwithstanding, that he imagined that this death of his should be a means of his intire security, demeaning himself in all things very circumspectly, with intent to purge himself of that crime. But especially, he shewed his great magnificence in the interring of his body, both in the furnishing and preparation of the Herse, as in the perfumes and other things thereunto belonging, in such sort, as the grief which the Ladies had conceived was pacified after this manner of consolation.

CHAP. IV.

The year of the World, 3931. before Christs Nativity, 165.

Cleopatra thirsting after the Kingdome of Arabia and Jewry, laboureth to beg a part of them at Antonies hands.

BUt none of all these things could either move or mollifie Alexandra, but that daily more and more she increased her sorrow, and in the height of her tears kindled her wrath and heat with a desire of revenge. She therefore certified Cleopatra by her private letters of Herods Treasons, and her sons most miserable and untimely death: Cleopatra long before that time desirous to assist her, and having compassion of her misery, undertook the matter, and ceased not to incite Antony to revenge Aristobulus death, telling him that it was an unpardonable errour, that Herod being created King in such a state, whereunto he had no right, should be suffered to practise such conspiracies against the true and lawfull Kings. Antony perswaded by these her words (as soon as he came to Laodicea) sent for Herod, to the end, that making his appearance he might answer that which might be objected against him, as touching Aristobulus death: for he disliked the act, notwithstanding, that Herod himself had attempted it. But although Herod was affraid of this accusation, and did not a little suspect Cleopatras displeasure (for that she ceased not continually to provoke Antony against him) yet obeyed he this commandement, and transported himself thither (the rather for that he durst not otherwise do;) notwithstanding, he left his Uncle Joseph behind him, committing the government both of the Kingdome and his private estate unto him, giving him secret instructions to kill Mariamne, if so be that Antony should happen to do him any mischief. For he loved her so extreamly by reason of her beauty, that he supposed himself injuried, if after his decease she should be beloved by any other; and he openly declared that all that misery which befel him proceeded from Antonies passion, and intire affection, and admiration of her beauty, whereof he had beforetime heard some report. As soon therefore as he had in this sort disposed his affairs, notwithstanding he had little hope of good hap, yet repaired he to Antony.

Herod ready to repair unto Antony, commandeth Joseph, to whose charge he committed the kingdome, to kill his wife.

But Joseph governing that Kingdome that was committed to his hands, conversed divers times upon this occasion with Mariamne, and communicated oftentimes with her, not onely for publike profit sake, but also to do her that honour which so great a Princess deserved. At such time therefore as he secretly devised with her, as touching the friendship and ardent affection which Herod bare unto her, his speeches were jeasted at after the manner of Ladies, but especially flouted at by Alexandra. For which cause Joseph, being over-forward to express the Kings good will towards her, proceeded so far, that he discovered the commandment that was given him; thereby to make manifest, that it was not possible for Herod to live without her, and that if any inconvenience should happen unto him, he would not in death also be dis-joyned from her. This discourse of Josephs was not interpreted by the Ladies, as a demonstration of his good will, but rather as a manifestation of Herods maligNity; who dying, desired also that they should perish, and interpreted, that which he had spoken, as the testimony of his tyrannous and malicious heart. At that time there was a rumour spread in the City of Jerusalem by Herods maligners, that Antony had in such sort tormented him, that he was dead. Whereupon all those of the Kings house were troubled, and in especial the Ladies; so that Alexandra incited Joseph to forsake the Palace, and take the Ladies, and to retire himself under the Ensignes of the Roman legion, who at that time were about the City for the security of the Kingdome, under the conduct of the Tribune Julius, to the end first of all, that if any trouble should happen in the Kings house, they might be by this means in safety, having the Romans to friend; and afterwards, for that they hoped that if Antony should see Mariamne, she might obtain all things at his hands whatsoever she desired, assuring him that he would restore the Kingdome unto her, and deprive her of nothing that concerned, or was answerable to her royal estate.

A fooliſh rumour of Herods death.

But whilest they were distracted with these deliberations, there came letters from Herod, contrary to some few mens report, and all mens expectation. For as soon as he came unto Antony he compassed his favour by his many presents, which he had brought with him to that intent from Jerusalem, and suddenly debating the matter with him, he appeased him in such sort, as he was no more displeased against him: and from that time forward, Cleopatras speeches were but coldly conceited of in regard of his so ample satisfaction. For Antony said, that there was no reason that a King should be answerable for that which he had done in his Kingdome; for that in so doing, he should no more be King: but that when the honour is once given him, he hath the authority likewise left him to use his regall power. Urging further, that it concerned Cleopatra likewise her self, not to search too curiously into the affairs and government of Kingdomes. Herod certified all this by his letters, and signified further what other honours he had received at Antonies hands in assemblies and feasts to which he invited him allwayes; notwirhstanding that Cleopatra seemed to be displeased therewith, detracting him; and being desirous to get the Kingdome of Jewry into her hands, strove with all means possible to put him to death: but that he had found Antony alwayes an upright man, and feared not henceforward that any evil should befall him: and returning presently upon this, he brought with him a more ample testimony of Antonies most assured affection, both in respect of his own Kingdome, as of his particular affairs. And as touching Cleopatra, she pretended not to seek any further then that which she had; because that Antony had given her Cœlosyria in stead of that which she had demanded, forbearing thence-forward to metion Jewry any more, becausе that Antony wholly rejected those suites.

After these letters came unto their hands, the trouble and disturbance wherein they were and the desire to retire unto the Romanes, as if Herod had been dead, was wholly extinguished. Yet was not this their resolution hidden from the King; but that Herod after he had brought Antony on his way (who at that time set forward in his Wars against the Parthians) he returned into Jewry. Upon his arrival, his sister Salome, and his mother certified him exactly of Alexandras intent, and the determination of her friends. Salome likewise spake against Joseph her husband, and slandred him, objecting against him that he had Mariamnes company. All which she spake through the malice she had long time conceived against him, for that in a certain debate Mariamne had in her rage despightfully hit them in the teeth with their obscure birth. Herod (who was alwaies inflamed with the earnest affection which he bare unto his wife Mariamne) was suddenly troubled hereat: and although jealousie pressed him forward, yet love restrained him and kept him from doing any thing rashly, through passion or affection: for which cause he called Mariamne aside, and demanded of her in secret, what familiar company she had kept with Joseph? She by solemn oaths, and by all possible allegations in her own defence appeased the King by little and little, and pacified his choler. For in such sort was he transported with the love that he bare unto his wife, that he believed she had sufficiently purged her self of those slanders, that had been inforced against her; yielding her most hearty thanks for her honest affection towards him, and declaring unto her openly the great esteem and love that he bar unto her. Finally, (as it often falleth out amongst lovers) they fell to tears, and embraced each other with great affection: for that she gave him no credit, he endeavoured the more to draw her to belief. Whereupon Mariamne said unto him: It is not the act of a Lover to have given commandment, that if any thing should befall thee otherwaies then well with Antony, I should presently be done to death with thee; notwithstanding I have no wayes offended thee. No sooner were these words out of her mouth, but the King entred in a strange passion, and giving over his embraces, he cried out with a loud voice, and tore his haire, saying, that he had a most evident proof that Joseph had committed adultery with her: for that he would not have discovered those things which had been spoken to him in secret, except they had greatly trusted the one the other: and in this emotion or rage of jealousie hardly contained he himself from killing his wife. But the force of love overcame him so much, that he bridled his rage, notwithstanding it were irksome and grievous unto him. Yet gave he order that Joseph should be slain, without either audience or justification of his innocency: and as touching Alexandra, who was these cause of all these troubles, he kept her prisoner.

About the same time there grew certain troubles and alterations in Syria: for that Cleopatra continually sollicited and importunrd Antony, and whetted on his displeasure against all, perswading him to remove all from their governments, and to bestow the same on her self. And for that Antony loved her extreamly, she was in great estimation and credit with him: and being in her own nature inclined to covetousnes, she abstained from no kind of corrupt dealing and wickedness. For knowing that the kingdome should descend unto her brother, she caused him to be poysoned, when as he was but fifteen years old: as for her sister Arsinoe, she caused her to be slain by Antonies means, at such time as she made her prayers in the Temple of Diana in Ephesus. Moreover, in what place soever she understood that there was any hope to get money, whether it were in robbing of Temples, or in breaking open Sepulchres, she would be possessed thereof: neither was there any religious place so sacred, from whence she took not away the Ornaments. Furthermore, there was not any thing so prophane and interdicted, which she laid not hands on to satisfie her unbridled avarice. Neither ther was the whole world sufficient enough to content this magnificent Lady, who was made slave to her own desires; and her disordinate appetite was such, that all the riches in the world were not able to satisfie and fill the same. For this cause she incessantly importuned Antonius to take from others, to be liberal towards her: and therefore entring into Syria with him, she presently bethought her self how she might get it into her possession. For she caused Lysanias, Ptolomeys son, to be put to death, objecting against him that he had private intelligence with the Parthians. She begged Jewry also at Antonius hands, and required him besides that, to dispossess the Kings of Arabia. He was in such sort possessed by this woman, that he seemed not onely to be bewitched with her words, but also inchanted by her poysons, to obey her in whatsoever she thought meet: yet was he ashamed to commit so manifest an iniquity, for fear lest being so far over-ruled by her, he should happen to offend in matters of more consequence. Lest therefore either by denying her he should draw her to discontent; or by condescending to her demands he should seem to be the wickedest man alive, he deducted a several portion of both their Dominions, and presented her with the same. He gave her likewise those Cities that are scituate between the floud Elutherius and Egypt, except Tyre and Sidon, which he knew to be free Cities of long continuance: although by earnest sollicitation she thought to be seized of these also.

After that Cleopatra had obtained all these things, and had accompanied Antonius as far as Euphrates, who at that time went to make War in Armenia: she returned back again, and by the way visited Apamea and Damasco, and at last took her progress into Jewry: where King Herod met with her, and assured that portion which had been given unto her in Arabia, with all the revenues of Jericho, unto her. This Countrey bringeth forth that balm which of all other ointments is the most precious, and onely groweth in that place, and no other, to the bigness of great Dates. Being arrived in that place, and grown inwardly familiar with Herod, she sought to allure and draw him to her lust, being of her self naturally addicted to such pleasures and intemperance; and haply also being somewhat touched with love, or rather (as it seemeth most likely) she in this sort laid the foundation to intrap him, under colour to revenge her self of some outrage by that means. But in effect she generally manifested, that she was overcome by her desire and sensual lust. But Herod was not over-kindly bent towards Cleopatra; knowing of long time how badly she was inclined towards all men; and at that time he conceived the greater hatred against her, because by that intemperance of hers she pretended to destroy him: and although that from the beginning he had rejected her sollicitations; yet determined he to revenge himself on her, if so be by these her subtill underminings she should prosecute and continue her subtil policies to betray him. He asked counsel also of his friends, whether having her in his possession, he should put her to death. For in so doing, all those should be delivered from divers evils, whom either in time past she had molested, or hereafter should bring in trouble. Moreover, that it should be profitable for Antonius also, whom without all doubt she would forsake, if any occasion or necessity should enforce him to make trial of her friendship. But whilest he debated and discoursed upon this resolution, his friends restrained and disswaded him; assuring him that it was a great indignity for him, who was a Prince of high thoughts and haughty resolutions, to cast himself into manifest perill, beseeching him to attempt nothing rashly: For that Antonius would not endure the same, notwithstanding, it might be approved that it stood with his profit: nay, rather that by this means he should encrease his desire, for that by force and subtilty he might seem to have lost her. Further, that no one colour of excuse should be left him, in that she was the woman of greatest note and nobility of that time; and that whatsoever profit might redound unto him by her death, should be annexed with Antonius injury. Whereby it most evidently appeared, how great and remedilesse damages would befall both to the Kingdome and the Kings family also; whereas nothing letted him by repulsing her unlawfull demand, to dispose all things for the present State with great discretion. By these and such like reasons and probable conjectures, they deterred and disswaded him from adventuring upon his apparent danger, and attempting so hainous an act: so that contrariwise they induced him to offer Cleopatra many rich presents, and to conduct her onward on her way towards Egypt.

Cleopatra, with all those precious Jewels likewise, which were taken by him, or found in the Kingdom. But Artaxias his elder son (who at that time had saved himself by flight) reigned in Armenia: whom Archelaus and Nero the Emperour drove out of his Kingdome, and placed his younger brother Tigranes in his room, as it shall be declared hereafter. As for the tributes of the countries which Herod was bound to pay unto Cleopatra, for the lands bestowed on her by Antonius, he without deceit justly paid them, supposing it to be very incident to his security, to continue himself in her good favour. As for the Arabians, they seeing that Herod had the levying of such a tribute, paied him for some little time two hundred talents a year; but afterwards they grew slow and negligent in their payments, and scarcely satisfied the half, and that also very negligently.

CHAP. VI.

Herod maketh War with Aretas at the same time that Antonius is overthrown by Augustus Cæsar in the Actian War.

Aretas demeaning himself thus ungratefully, and refusing to do that which in right he ought to perform; Herod made a shew to take arms against him, but deferred his revenge in regard of the contentions amongst the Romans. For at that time nought else was expected then the Actian War (which fell in the hundred, eighty and seventh Olympiade) in which Augustus Cæsar determined to trie his Title with Antonius for the Monarchy. In the mean while Herod, who had already for many years been Master of a peaceable and fruitfull Countrey, from whence he drew rich revenues and many forces, gathered divers companies of men with the greatest expedition that he might, to succour Antonius. But he by letters signified unto him, that he had no need of his assistance: notwithstanding, he commanded him to make a road upon the Arabian, whose perfidious dealing Antonius had not onely understood by Herod himself, but also by Cleopatras advertisements. For she very cunningly conceived, that it would redound unto her profit, if one of these two should overthrow the other. Herod according to these instructions from Antonius, returned back into his Countrey, and retained his Army alwayes ready about him, and incontinently with the same invaded Arabia, and with his forces both horsemen and footmen came directly to Diospolis, where the Arabians (having notice of his intended War against them) came out to meet him. In this place fought they a most cruel battel, wherein at last the Jews had the upper hand. After this, a great Army of Arabians assembled themselves at Cana, a certain place in Cœlosyria. Whereof when Herod was foreadvertised, he marched forth against them, accompanied with the greater part of his forces. As soon as he drew near to Cana, he determined to incamp in that place, and after he had well fortified and entrenched his forces, to set on the enemy upon the first opportunity: but whilest he imployed himself in the execution hereof, all the Army of the Jews cried out, requiring him without delay to leade them forward against the Arabians. And thus highly were they encouraged, both in respect of the confidence they had in the good administration and ordering of their army, as in regard of their forwardness, who had been actors in the former War, and partakers of the victory; so that they scarce gave their enemies leisure to settle themselves to their weapons. When as therefore Herod perceived that the heat and forwardness of the Souldiers could hardly be appeased; he thought good to make use of the readiness of his army, and arming himself, he marched formost; being seconded by his Souldiers in battel array, with a souldier-like march. This sudden approach of his wonderfully abashed the Arabians: For although for a while they made head against them; yet perceiving their enemies full of heart, and themselves unable to resist them, divers of them retreated, and betook themselves to flight: so that all of them had been utterly defeated, had not Athenio endamaged Herod and the Jews. For he having the command of that army which Cleopatra had in that place; and besides that, bearing a privy grudge towards Herod, disposed his army in a readiness, and expecting the event of the battel, resolved with himself to contain his forces if the Arabians overcame the Jews; and so if they had the worst (as indeed it came to pass) to set upon the Jews, who should be spent by that time; and surprizing them at unawares even in the height of their hope of good hap, to massacre and slaughter them with his fresh supplies. When as therefore the Jews had spent all their strength against their professed enemies, and expected nothing less then the assurance of the victory, he charged and overcame them who had retreated into certain rough & difficult places (whereunto their enemies were better accustomed then themselves) where being grievously wounded and ill intreated by the Arabians, who returned back and set upon them, divers of

From that time forward, Herod began to make certain incursions and roades into Arabia, preying on the Countrey, and doing them much mischief: He incamped himself likewise upon the mountains, forbearing to draw his whole forces into the field; notwithstanding by his diligence and industry in travel, his labours were not fruit-
B less; but that prevailing in some exploits, he sought out all means to abolish and put away the ignominy of his former discomfiture.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Earthquake that hapned in Jewry.

AT such time as Cæsar and Antony made triall of their titles in the Actian War, and in the seventh year of the reign of King Herod, there hapned such an earthquake in the Countrey of Judæa, that never the like was seen in any other place: so that
C divers beasts were slain thereby, and many men were overwhelmed with the ruines of their houses, and perished to the number of ten thousand. Onely the men of War received no damage, because they encamped in the open field. The Arabians hearing tidings hereof (which were far greater by report, then they were in effect, by such, who in favour of the Arabians, and hate of the Jews, reported the same) waxed proud: yea, so much was their courage increased hereby, as if all the Cities of Jewry had been already overthrown, and the men thereof extinguished; and as if they had no adversaries remaining alive to contradict them. For which cause laying hold of those Embassadours of the Jews, who came unto them to intreat of peace in their desperate estates, they slew them, and afterwards in the heat of their spleen, set upon their enemies camp. But the Jews not daring to expect or prevent their
D assault, for their present miseries had dejected their mindes, seemed to neglect their Common-weale, and in a manner to despaire of their safety. These thus affected did the King encourage, and called unto him their Captains, and (as much as in him lay) awaking and reviving their drooping spirits; and when he had restored those of better hope, to more successfull good hap, at length he attempted to speak unto all the army, who in the former overthrows would yield no respect or allowance to perswasion. These did he both comfort and exhort in such manner as followeth.

Herods Oration to his army.

FRiends and fellow Souldiers, there is not one of you but knoweth, at this time, there are so many present and impendent misfortunes attending our estates, as are able to wearie and amaze those men that are of the greatest resolution. But sith we must needs fight, and that all those things that have befallen us unto this present, are of that kinde, that by your own vertue and magnanimity they may be recovered; I have resolved to inform, and confirm you in those means, whereby you may retain and continue your accustomed valour and noble courage.

Herod comforteth and exhorteth his Souldiers.

First of all therefore I will approve unto you (as touching our War) that it consisteth on just F grounds, for that we are inforced thereunto through the outrage of our enemies: the knowledge whereof should chiefly make you recover your courage. Secondly, I will apparently approve unto you, that our estates are not so desperate, but that we have great and assured hopes to obtain the victory. First of all therefore, I will discourse of that which formerly I proposed, and will make your selves judges of those things which I will discourse upon. For your selves are privy to the Arabians injustice, and how perfidious they are to their friends, & impious and barbarous towards all men; but in especial, they have alwaies troubled us, provoking us through their extreme avarice and malignant envie, with perpetual injuries. And yet to let slip all other our benefits to that nation, who is he that delivered them from their imminent perill and thraldome, that was hazarded by Cleopatras means, but our selves? For the friendship I had with Antony, and his benevolence towards me, was the cause that their bur- then of miseries was so lightned; for that Antony forbore to commit any thing that might draw us to suspition. G

Besides, after she had wrought him by her sollicitation to cut off certain portions of the two Kingdomes to be given unto her, the matter was so handled by me, that by divers presents particularly bestowed upon him by my hands, I have obtained security for us both, and by disbursing two hundred talents of mine own, and giving my word for two hundred more for others, for the revenues of that very land which in times past was ours, and these now possess and enjoy. Notwithstanding, reason it were in my opinion, that we that are Jews should not be tributaries, or give any portion of our Countrey to any man; and if we must needs do it, it ill becometh us to pay it for these, who enjoy their lives by our means. It should not be reasonable for the Arabians, who after they had confessed with many plausible protestations and thanksgivings, that H they enjoy their liberty by our benefit, to have deprived and thrust us from our own, and to have unjustly dealt with us; yea even with us, I say, who were not their enemies, but rather on the contrary side their chiefest friends in the time of peace. And if fidelity should be respected even amongst those that are our most hated enemies, much more necessarily ought it to be observed by those that are friends. But these men set light thereby, who think nothing honest, but that which is annexed with lucre; and think no wrong unexcusable, nor impunity injury, that hath but a shew of profit. Is there any question then, whether we should chastise these unjust men by a just War? sith both God commandeth no less, and enjoyneth us alwaies to hate outrage, and revenge injustice, especially in that War which is not onely just, but necessary? For that which both in the confession of the Grecians, and opinion of the Barbarians is most hatefull and hainous, this have they perpetrated in murthering our Embassadours. I

Legates inviolable.

For the Greeks say, that Embassadours are sacred and inviolable, and we our selves have received our wholsome and holiest precepts of the Law of God by Angels, that is, from his Heraulds and messengers: for this name can both bring God to mans knowledge, and reconcile enmy to enemy.

What impietie therefore is more unpardonable, then to put those Embassadours to death, who bring tidings of right and justice? or what prosperitie can they expect either in their Warrs or felicity in their whole lives, after so hainous a crime? Truely I cannot imagine any: But perhaps some man will say, that right and equitie is on our side; but that the greater number of men and meanes are with them: but this their speech is unworthy of my followers. For K with those with whom justice is, with those also is God; and where God is, there neither wanteth multitude nor fortitude. But let us wade further, and weigh our own forces by themselves. In the first battel we had the victory, in the second, upon the first charge we put them to flight, and found them unable to make their party good against us. Afterwards, when the victory was ours, behold, Athenio, not by lawfull war, but by subtill treachery assaulted us. But shall this be called their fortitude, or rather their fraud and second iniquitie? why therefore should we have less courage, who ought to have the greater confidence? or why should we fear them who are alwaies inferiours, if they fight openly, and without fraud; and when they seem to overcome, they do it by unjustice?

With whomsoever justice is, there is God also.

Moreover, if any man suppose them to be valiant, this should the rather incite them more and L more unto vertue; for it is no honour for a generous and noble minde to overcome his inferiour, but to have means and might to conquer his superiour. And if any one be terrified by our domestick and homebred miseries, and by our late earthquake, first of all let him think with himself, that he erreth in that which deceiveth the Arabians, by supposing the same to be more grievous and terrible then indeed it was. And afterwards let him think, that it becometh them not to draw matter of fear from thence, whence the other took occasion of courage. For as touching themselves, they conceive not any hope thorow any good that is in themselves, but onely in the trust they have that we are already dejected by our calamities. But when they shall see us march forth against them, their courage will be weakned, and our confidence by this means shall be awakened, M for that we are not at this time to encounter with desperate men: For neither are we overmuch afflicted; neither (as some think) hath this misery befallen us thorow Gods displeasure, but these are the casualties of fortune. And if by the will of God these things are come to pass, it is marvel if by the same will our calamity cease not; and that our punishment should not satisfie his displeasure. But that this present War is approved by him for just, he himself hath evidently declared. For whereas divers thorow the whole region have been oppressed by the earthquake, none of you that bear arms have incurred any mischief; but all of you have been preserved, which is a manifest taken of the will of God; and if your children and wives had generally followed the Warres as you do, none of you should have been wanting. When as therefore you shall have bethought

A bethought your ſelves of theſe things, and moreover in regard that God hath at all times an eſpeciall care over you, fail not to purſue this injurious Nation with a juſt war that neither reſpecteth the laws of friendſhip nor keepeth the league of covenant; valiant in murthering ſacred Embaſſadours; and abject and villanous, where things are to be attempted by valour. The year of the World 3935. before Chriſts Nativity 29.

Theſe perſwaſions of his did not a little encourage the Jews to the battell, and made them more forward then before. As for Herod, after he had offered ſacrifice, according to the cuſtome, he drew his army forth, and led them with great confidence againſt the Arabians, and paſſing Jordan, he encamped near unto the enemy, with an intent to ſurpriſe a fort ſcituate between them both: making this account that it would further him much, either if upon the preſent he ſhould be drawn forth to fight, or if it concerned him to march onward, for that this place ſhould ſerve him to encamp in with more ſecurity. The ſame reſolution alſo had the Arabians, for which cauſe they fell to skirmiſh in that place, wherein the firſt on both ſides that gave the charge, and afterwards ſome other followers were ſlain: ſo that thoſe of the Arabians ſide being overcome betook them to retreat. This ſucceſs of theirs bred no little hope in the Jews, who ſeeing the enemies army addreſſed to attempt any thing rather then to fight, waxed the more hardy to aſſail the Arabian in his trenches, and beat him from his camp. They being forced by theſe aſſaults, drew forward to their defence in great diſorder, bringing neither courage nor hope of victory with them: yet notwithſtanding they defended themſelves, both in regard of their great number, as alſo in reſpect of that neceſſity whereunto they were inforced by the Jews. The skirmiſh on both ſides was hot, and divers on either party were put to the ſword: but in the end, the Arabians being put to the worſt, turned their backs. The ſlaughter was ſo great, that they not onely periſhed by their enemies ſwords, but they themſelves alſo murthered one another in the preſs, and diſorderly flight, in which they were trodden under foot, and lay ſlaughtered in a manner by their own weapons. So that in that diſcomfiture there died ſome five thouſand: the reſt haſtily fled on the other ſide of the rampire: but being overpreſſed with want of victuals, and in eſpecial with lack of water, they had not any ground or aſſurance to eſcape. After them poſted the Jews, and being unable to recover the fortreſs with them, they begirt the camp with a ſiege, and ſhut up all the paſſages that no ſuccour could come unto them, and took from them all opportunity to eſcape, although they ſhould affect flight.

B The Arabians are overcome by Herod.

When as therefore they ſaw themſelves reduced into ſuch extremity, they ſent Embaſſadours unto Herod, firſt of all to demand a truce: and afterwards for that they were oppreſſed with thirſt, to crave ſome remedy for their preſent neceſſities. But he neither reſpected the Embaſſadours, neither the proffered ranſome for the captives, nor any other whatſoever reaſonable demand, deſiring earneſtly to revenge himſelf of thoſe injurious treacheries they had practiſed againſt his Embaſſadours. Being therefore inforced by thirſt (which amongſt other plagues moſt grievouſly afflicted them) many of them forſook their trenches, and offerred themſelves to bonds and to be led away captives; ſo that within five dayes ſpace four thouſand of them yielded themſelves priſoners. On the ſixth day, all the reſt determined to ſally out, and aſſail the enemy; rather making choice of aſſured death, then thus lingeringly and ignominiouſly to pine away. When as therefore they had all concluded hereupon, they incontinently brake out of their trenches, but like unapt ſouldiers for a skirmiſh, decayed not onely in body, but in minde; reputing their death for advantage, to eſcape thereby their extream misfortunes. For which cauſe upon the firſt onſet, about ſome ſeven thouſand of them were ſlain: and thus the fierceneſs of this Nation being allaied by this overthrow, they ſubmitted themſelves to Herod, whom to their own ſorrow they had approved to be a valiant Souldier.

The Arabians enforced by thirſt, require truce at Herods hands.

Herod conſtrained to repair unto Auguſtus Cæſar, putteth Hircanus to death.

Hedio & Ruſſinus, chap. 7.

Herod puffed up with his ſucceſsfull good fortune, returned back into his own Countrey, having obtained great eſtimation and reputation by his valour and vertue. But at ſuch time as he ſuppoſed his ſtate to be moſt aſſured, he grew in danger both to loſe his dignity and life, by reaſon of that victory that Cæſar obtained againſt Antony in the Actian War. For at that time he not only ſuppoſed himſelf to be utterly overthrown, but both his friends and enemies that were round about about him loſt their hopes, for that it was unlikely that he ſhould eſcape unpuniſhed, who had been ſo inwardly united in friendſhip with Antony. Whereby it came to paſs, that his friends in no ſort concealing their deſpair, and his enemies under their colourable and diſſembled griefs, covered their joy, promiſing themſelves thereafter a better and more pleaſing adminiſtration of the common-weal. Hereupon Herod perceiving that, except Hircanus, there was not any one of the blood royal alive, determined to cut him off, reſolving with himſelf, that if he hapned to eſcape the danger, that a man who at that time was more worthier the Kingdome then himſelf, ſhould not entermeddle amongſt his affairs: and if any misfortune ſhould befall him in regard of Cæſar, he deſired to diſpoſſeſs Hircanus of the Kingdom, in regard of the envy which he bare him, for that he was the onely man who deſerved to be advanced to that dignity. Whileſt thus he was tormented and travelled in his thoughts, he had an occaſion offered him by Hircanus own followers to execute his intention. For Hircanus being of a milde and gentle nature, during all his life-time forbare to entermeddle with ſtate affairs, committing all things to fortune, and contenting himſelf with whatſoever condition it pleaſed her to allot him.

The year of the World, 3935. before Chriſts Nativity, 29.

Herod determineth to make away Hircanus.

But Alexandra being an ambitious woman, and unable to conceal with modeſty the hope ſhe conceived of change, ſollicited her father that he ſhould not any longer endure the ſubjection of Herod, who was the very ſcourge of their family, but rather that he ſhould ſtand upon his own guard, and reſerve himſelf to his better hoped fortunes. She furthermore gave him counſel to write unto Malchus, who had the government of Arabia, requeſting him to grant him both protection and entertainment; for that if Herod ſhould chance to be cut off by Cæſars diſpleaſure, doubtleſs the Kingdome would return unto him, both in regard of his nobility, as alſo of the peoples favour. Theſe perſwaſions of hers Hircanus at the firſt repulſed, but afterwards being overcome by the importunity of the woman, who ceaſed not day and night to ſing the ſame ſong of future hope, and of Herods treaſons, he gave certain letters to a friend of his, written to the Arabian, wherein he required him to ſend him certain horſemen, who might conduct him to the Aſphaltite lake, which lieth diſtant from the confines of Jeruſalem ſome three hundred furlongs. And therefore eſpecially committed he theſe letters to Doſitheus truſt, both for that he favoured Hircanus and his daughter, and ſeemed likely for divers cauſes to hate Herod: for he was Joſephs kinſman, who was ſlain by Herod; and not long before, certain of his brothers were ſlain amongſt others at Tyre by Antonies command: yet for none of thoſe occaſions continued he faithfull to Hircanus. For he ſetting more by the preſent favour of the King that then reigned, then the reſt, diſcovered the letter unto the King; who firſt of all giving him thanks, required one office of friendſhip more at his hands; which was, that folding up the letter, and ſealing it, he ſhould conveigh and deliver the ſame to Malchus, and return his anſwer, for that it neerly concerned him, if he knew his reſolution alſo. Which when Doſitheus had diligently performed, the Arabian returned this anſwer, that he was ready to entertain both himſelf and his whole family, and all thoſe Iews likewiſe which were of his faction, promiſing to ſend him a band of Souldiers, who ſhould be able to conduct him ſafely thither, and ſhould be obedient to his command in all things. Now as ſoon as Herod was ſeized of theſe letters, he called for Hircanus, and demanded of him whether he had any confederacy with Malchus: who denied the ſame. But Herod proteſting and bringing forth his letter in an open aſſembly, commanded him afterwards to be put to death. Thus are theſe matters regiſtred in Herods commentaries: for by ſome are they delivered otherwiſe, namely, that he was executed, not for this crime which he had committed, but for ſome treaſons againſt the King. For they write to this effect, that Herod at a certain banquet (diſſembling his ſuſpition) demanded of Hircanus, whether he had received any letters from Malchus: and that he anſwered, that he had received letters, but ſuch as contained nothing elſe but officious ſalutations. Further, that another asked him, whether he had received any preſent therewithall: and when he had anſwered, that he had received nothing but four courſers for his ſaddle: the King wreſted this to a capitall offence of corruption and treaſon, and commanded him preſently to be led to death. Now that he died guiltleſs, they alledge this for a moſt approved argument; namely, his gentle diſpoſition, who even in his youthfull years never gave ſigne or appearance of raſhneſs, or pride, or ſignification of audaciouſneſs, no not even then when he had the royall government in his hands, but in that freedome of authority diſpoſed the moſt things by Antipaters advice. But at that time he was more then foureſcore years old, and knew that Herods eſtate was ſecured: and paſſing Euphrates alſo, and living on the other ſide of the river, he left ſuch as held him in great honour, and returned home into his own countrey, to the end he might live under Herods government. Whereby it is leſs likely, that he would attempt any alteration ſo

Thus ended Hircanus life, after his variable and adverse fortunes, wherewith during all his life time he was afflicted. For at such time as his mother Alexandra lived, he was created high Priest of the Jews, and obtained that honour for the space of nine years: and after his mothers death, he had scarcely governed the Kingdome for the space of three moneths, but that he was expulsed by his brother Aristobulus; and afterwards restored by Pompeys assistance, and receiving all his former honours, he lived in full possession of them for the space of fourty years. After this he was once more distasted by Antigonus; and being maimed in his body, lived certain years in captivity among the Parthians: from whence not long after he returned home; and though he had many things promised him by Herod, yet after so many
B alterations of fortune, he obtained nothing at his hands; and that which amongst all the rest is most of all to be lamented, as we have said, he was unjustly put to death, an innocent, and in his old age. For he was a lover of justice, and an observer of perpetual modesty, and governed his Kingdome for the most part by other mens direction, being onely guilty in himself of ignorance and the love of idleness. Truly, Antipater and Herod by this mans goodness obtained their so great riches: For which deserts of his, against all law and right, he was cruelly put to death.

But Herod, after Hircanus death, addressed himself to perform his journey towards Cæsar: and having little hope of any good fortune, in regard of his friendship with Antonius, he grew desperately jealous of Alexandra, for fear lest she taking opportunity of the time, should
C incite the people to rebell, and fill the Kingdome with domestical sedition: for which cause, committing the government or the estate to his brother Pheroras, he left his mother Cypros, his sister, and all his Kindred in the castle of Massada, and commanded his brother, that if any misfortune should befall him, he should retain the Kingdome in his own hands and maintain it. As for his wife Mariamne, for that by reason of certain dislikes betwixt her, his mother, and sister, they might not live together, he left her with her mother in the castle of Alexandrion, and committed them to the custody of his Treasurer Joseph, and Sohemus the Itu.ean, and with her the keeping of his Castles, both which had alwayes been his faithfull friends, and to whom, in way of honour, he committed the custody of these princely Ladies. But he gave them also this commandment, that if they should be certi-
D fied that any sinister mishap had befallen him, they should presently kill them both, and to the utmost of their power continue the Kingdome in his children, and his brother Pheroras.

E AFter he had in this sort given order for all his affairs, he withdrew himself unto Rhodes, intending there to meet with Cæsar. And as soon as he arrived in that City, he took the Diadem from his head, and laid it apart, but as for his other princely ornaments, he changed them in no sort; and being admitted to Cæsars presence, he at that time gave a more ample testimony of the greatness of his magnanimity and courage: for neither addressed he his speech to intreat his favour (according to the custome of suppliants) neither presented he any request, as if he had in any sort offended him, but gave account of all that which he had done, without concealing or mistrusting any thing.

Herod cometh to Cæsar, and declareth unto him what pleasures he had done Antony, promising him no less duty and love, if so be he might be received into his favour.

F For he freely confessed before Cæsar, that he had intirely loved Antonius, and that to the utmost of his power he had done him service, to the end that he might obtain the soveraignty and monarchy; not by annexing his forces unto his, in that he was otherwise imployed in the Arabian War, but in furnishing him both with wheat and money, and that this was the least office which it behoved him to perform towards Antonius; for that being once his professed friends, it behoved him not onely to imploy his best endeavours on his so princely benefactor, but also to hazard both his head and happiness to deliver him from perils. All which (said he) I have not performed according as I ought to have done; yet notwithstanding I know, that at such time as he was overcome in the Actian battel, I did not alter my affection with his fortune: neither did I restrain my self; for although I befriended not Antonius with my presence and assistance in the Actian War, yet at leastwise I assisted him with my counsel, certifying him that he had but one onely means left him for his security, and prevention of his utter ruine, which was, to put Cleopatra to death, for that by cutting her off, he might enjoy her estate, and might more easily obtain his peace, and G pacifie thy displeasure against him. And for that he gave but slender regard to these mine admonitions by his own sottishness and indiscretion, he hath hurt himself, and profited you, because, as I said, he did not follow my counsell. Now therefore (O Cæsar) in regard of the hate which you bear unto Antony, you condemne my friendship also. I will not deny that which I have done; neither am I afraid freely and publikely to protest how much I have loved him: but if without regard of persons, you consider how kindly I am affected toward my benefactors, and how resolute and constant a friend I am, and how mindfull of kindness the effect of that which I have done may make me known unto thee. For if the name be onely changed, the friendship notwithstanding may remain, and deserve a due praise.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 8. Cæsar confirmeth Herods authority.

By these words (which were manifest testimonies of his resolute and noble courage) he so H inwardly indeared himself unto Cæsar, who was a magnificent and worthy Monarch, that he converted this his accusation into an occasion to winne and work him to be his friend: for which cause Cæsar, setting the Diademe upon his head, exhorted him that he should no less respect his friendship, then he had in former time Antonies: and withall did him much honour; certifying him moreover, that Capidius had written unto him, how much Herod had assisted him in his Warres that he had with the Monarchs of Syria. Herod seeing that he was thus entertained, and that contrary to his expectation, the Kingdome was more surely confirmed unto him, then beforetime, both by Cæsars bounty, and also by the decree of the Senate, which he had practised to obtain for his greater assurance, accompanied Cæsar as far I as Ægypt, presenting both himself and his friends with many rich gifts, beyond the proportion of his estate: endeavouring by these means both to winne their favour, and to shew also the greatness of his courage, requiring moreover at Cæsars hands, that Alexander, who was one of Antonies dearest friends, might not be sought out to be punished: yet notwithstanding he could not obtain the same, by reason of an oath that Cæsar had past before he sollicited him. That done, he returned back again unto Iewry, with more greater honour and assurance, then before; whereby he struck them with wonderfull amazement, who expected his contrary success, as if by Gods especial providence he alwayes over-went his dangers, to his great honour. Incontinently therefore he prepared himself to entertain Cæsar, who returned out of Syria to take his journey into Ægypt, and received him at Ptolemais, with all royall honour, and gave his army presents with all abundance of munition: so K that he was accounted for one of Cæsars most affectionate friends, and rode about with him, at such time as he took the view of his army: he entertained him also and his friends with one hundred and fifty men, adorned with most rich and sumptuous apparel. And for that they were to pass thorow a countrey, wherein there was great scarcity of water, he furnished them both with water and wine; so that they needed neither of them. He gave Cæsar also eight hundred talents, and so royally satisfied he all men, that they confessed themselves to have had far greater entertainment, then the revenues and profits of his Kingdome could affoord them. By which means he gave the more ample testimony of his forward friendship, and free affection to deserve well: and making use of the opportunity of the time, he obtained the reputation of a Prince of an heroick and noble spirit; so that he was held in- L ferior unto no man, for the good entertainment that he gave to the chiefest Romans in their return out to Egypt.

CHAP. IX.

Herod being incensed by false accusations, putteth his wife Mariamne to death.

Mariamne and Alexandra displeased with Herod.

But as soon as he returned into his Kingdome, he found all his houshold troubled, M and both his wife Mariamne and her mother Alexandra grievously displeased with him. For they supposed (and not without cause) that they were not shut up in that Castle for their securities sake, but as it were in a prison; so that, in as much as they neither might make use of other mens, nor enjoy their own goods, they were highly discontented. Mariamne also supposed that her husband did but dissemble his love, rather for his own profit and commodity, then for any intire affection he bare towards her. But nothing more grieved her, then that she had not any hope to live after him, if so be he should happen to die, especially for the order he had left concerning her: neither could she ever forget what commandment before that time he had left with Joseph; so that by all means possible, she laboured to win the affections of those that had the charge of her, and especially especially Sohemus, knowing very well that her safety depended wholly on his hands. Who in the beginning behaved himself very wisely and faithfully, containing himself very circumspectly within the bounds of his commission; but after these Ladies had with pretty presents and feminine flatteries mollified and wrought him by little and little, at last he blabbed out all that which the King had commanded him; especially, for that he hoped not that he should return with the same power and authority, which before he had: and for that cause he thought thus in himself, that without incurring any danger in regard of Herod, he might greatly gratifie the Ladies; who in all likelihood should not be deprived of that dignity wherein they were at that time; but would return them the like kindness when Mariamne should be Queen, or next unto the King. Furthermore, he hoped, that if Herod also should return with all things answerable to his desires, that he would perform nothing without his wifes consent; or upbraid him with the act, if she contradicted: for he knew too well that the King loved her in such sort, as it was impossible to equal or express his affections; and for these causes he disclosed the trust that was committed unto him. But Mariamne was very sore displeased to hear that there was no end of her miseries, but they were altogether united and tied to the dangers of Herod; and she oftentimes wished that he might never more return again in safety, supposing that her life with him should be very intolerable: all which she afterwards dissembled not, but openly confessed that which afflicted her with discontent. For when as Herod beyond all expectation arrived in his countrey, being adorned with mighty fortune, he first of all, as it became him, certified his wife of his good tidings and happy success, whom onely amongst all other his friends and wives, he embraced and saluted, for the pleasing conversation and affection that was in her. But she, whilest he repeated unto her these fortunate events of his affairs, rather entertained the same with a displeasant attention, then applauding joy: and these affections of hers likewise she could not conceale. For at such time as he folded his armes about her neck, she unfolded her sorrow in her sighes; so simple and unfeigned were her affections; and seemed rather to be displeased then appeased by his narrations. Whereupon Herod was sore troubled, perceiving these things not onely suspected, but also fully manifest: but above all things he was distracted, when he considered the incredible and apparent hatred that his wife had conceived against him, which in such sort incensed him, that he could not resist the love that had attainted him, so that he neither could continue in wrath, nor listen long to peace, and being unresolved in himself, he now was attempted by this; straight distracted by a contrary affection: so much was his mind travelled between love and hatred, that when as oftentimes he desired to punish the womans pride, his heart by loves mediation failed him in the enterprize. For nothing did more torment him then this fear, left executing his displeasure against her, he should by this means more grievously wound himself, through the desire he bare unto his deceased delight. Whilest thus he was sweltered and devoured in his passions, and conceived sinister opinions against Mariamne his wife, Salome his sister, and his mother, having an inkling of his discontents, thought that they had gotten a fit opportunity to express and execute their hatred towards Mariamne: for which cause they conferred with Herod, and whetted his spleen and displeasure with variety of slanders, sufficient at one assault to engender hatred, and kindle his jealousie against her. To these reproaches of theirs he lent no unwilling ears; yet had he not the heart to attempt any thing against his wife, or to give free credit to their report; notwithstanding his displeasure increased and was inflamed more and more against her, for that neither she could colour her cares and discontents, nor he contain himself from exchanging his love into hatred: and perhaps at that time he had published some fatal doom against her, had not a happy messenger brought him word, that Anthony and Cleopatra being dead, Cæsar was become Lord of Egypt: for which cause hasting forward to meet and entertain him, he left his family in that present estate. Upon his departure, he recommended Mariamne to Sohemus, giving him great thanks for the care he had had of her, and granted him in way of gratuity a part of Jewry to govern.

When Herod was arrived in Egypt, and had friendly and familiarly conferred with Cæsar, he was highly honoured by him: for Cæsar gave him those four hundred Frenchmen that were of Cleopatra's guard; and restored that part of his Countrey unto him again, which was taken away and spoiled by her. He annexed also unto his kingdome Gadara, Hippon, and Samaria, and on the Sea coasts the Cities of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppe, with the tower of Straton: which when he had obtained, he grew more mighty then before: and after he had accompanied Cæsar as far as Antioch, he returned into his own Countrey. Upon his arrival, he found that fortune which was favourable unto him abroad, too froward at home, especially in regard of his wife, in whose affection beforetime he seemed to be most happy.

Mariamne a froward woman.

For he was as inwardly touched with the lawfull love of Mariamne, as any other of whom the Histories make report; and as touching her, she was both chaste and faithfull unto him; yet had she a certain womanly imperfection and natural frowardness, which was the cause that she presumed too much upon the intire affection wherewith her husband was intangled; so that without regard of his person, who had power and authority over others, she entertained him oftentimes very outragiously: All which he endured patiently, without any shew of discontent. But Mariamne upbraided and publickly reproached both the Kings mother and sister, telling them that they were but abjectly and basely born.

Whereupon there grew a great enmity and unrecoverable hatred between the Ladies; and from thence also there arose an occasion of greater accusations and calumniation then before. These suspitions were nourished amongst them, for the space of one whole year after Herods return from Cæsar; and finally this long-contrived and fore-imagined hatred at last brake out violently upon this occasion that ensueth: When as about mid-day the King had withdrawn himself into his chamber to take his rest, he called Mariamne unto him to sport with her, being incited thereunto by the great affection that he bare unto her. Upon this his command she came in unto him; yet would she not lie with him, nor entertain his courtings with friendly acceptance, but upbraided him bitterly with her fathers and brothers death. The King took these reproachfull words in very evil part, and was almost ready to strike her: but his sister hearing a greater stir and noise within then was usual, sent in the Butler, who long before that time was suborned by her, whom she commanded to tell the King, that Mariamne had prepared a drink for him to incite and quicken him unto love; willing him that if the King should be moved thereat, and should demand what he meant, he should certifie him, that Mariamne having prepar'd a poyson for his grace, had dealt with him to deliver it to his Majesty. Charging him moreover, that if the King in hearing him speak of this potion, should seem to be moved therewith, that then he should proceed no further in his discourse. He therefore (being in this manner before-hand instructed what he ought to do) at that very instant was sent to discover his treachery unto the King; for which cause with a sober and staied countenance he entred in unto him, being seriously and well prepared to discourse, and told him that Mariamne had bribed him to present his Majesty with an amorous cup of drink. Now when he perceived that the King was troubled with these words, he prosecuted his discourse, alleadging that the potion was a certain medicine which Mariamne had given him, the vertue whereof he knew not, which he had received according as he had told him, knowing that it concerned both his own security, and the Kings safety.

Herod, who before this was highly displeased, hearing these words, was so much the more incensed: for which cause he presently commanded Mariamnes most faithfull servant to be examined by torments, as concerning the poison, supposing that it was impossible for her to undertake any thing whatsoever, without his privity. He being tried and tormented after this cruel manner, confessed nothing of that for which he was tortured; but declared unto the King, that the hatred which his wife had conceived against him, proceeded from certain words that Sohemus had told her. Scarcely had he finished these words, but that the King cried out with a loud voice, saying, that Sohemus, who before time had been most faithfull both to him and his kingdome, would not have declared these his privy commands, except there had been some more inward familiarity and secrecy betwixt him and Mariamne: for which cause he presently commanded his Ministers to lay hands on Sohemus, and to put him to death. As for his wife, he drew her to her tryal, and to this effect he assembled his most familiar friends, before whom he began to accuse her with great spight and spleen, as touching these potions and poisons aforesaid; wherein he used intemperate and unseemly speeches, and such as for their bitterness did ill become him in cause of justice; so that in the end, the assistants, seeing the butt and bent of his desire, pronounced sentence of death against her: which being past, both he, and all other the assistants were of his opinion, that she should not so speedily be executed, but that she should be kept close prisoner in some sure place in the Palace. But by Salomes solicitations Herod was incited to hasten her death, for that she alleadged that the King ought to fear, lest some sedition should be raised amongst the people, if he should keep her alive in prison. And by this means Mariamne was led unto her death.

Sohemus suspected by Herod in Mariamnes behalf is put to death. Mariamne is accused by Herod, and condemned, and imprisoned. Mariamne by Salomes instigations is led to execution.

Alexandra her mother considering the estate of the time, and fearing no less mischief from Herods hands, then her daughter was assured of; she undecently changed her mind, and abjectedly laid aside her former courage and magnanimity. For intending to make it known, that she was neither party nor privy to those crimes wherewith Mariamne was charged, she went out to meet her daughter, and entertained her injuriously, protesting publickly

A likely that she was a wicked woman, and ungratefull towards her husband; and that she well deserved the punishment that was adjudged her, for that she durst be so bold to attempt so hainous a fact, neglecting to requite her husbands entire love, with her unfained loyalty. Whilest thus dishonestly she counterfeited her displeasure, and was ready to pull Mariamne by the hair, the assistants, according to her desert, condemned her generally for her shameful hypocrisie: but she that was led to be punished, convicted her herself by her milde behaviour. For first of all, she gave her no answer, neither was any waies altered by her reproaches; neither would so much as cast her eye upon her; making it appear that she B discreetly concealed and covered her mothers imperfections, and was aggrieved that she had so openly shewed so great indignity: expressing for her own part a constant behaviour, and going to her death without change of colour, so that those that beheld her perceived in her a kind of manifest courage and nobility, even in her utmost extremity. Thus died Mariamne, having been a woman that excelled both in continence and courage: notwithstanding that she defaulted some what in affability and impatience of nature: for the rest of her parts, she was an admirable and pleasing beauty, and of such a carriage in those companies wherein she was entertained; that it was impossible to express the same, in that she surpassed all those of her time; which was the principall cause that she lived not graciously and contentedly with the King. For being entertained by him, who intirely loved her, and from whom she received nothing that might discontent her, she presumed upon a great C and intemperate liberty in her discourse. She digested also the loss of her friends very hardly, according as in open tearmes she made known unto the King; whereby also it came to pass, that both Herods mother, and sister, and himself likewise grew at odds with her, and in especial her husband, from whom onely she expected no hard measure.

Alexandra undecently striveth to acquit her self of Mariamnes treason.

After her death the King began more powerfully to be inflamed in his affections; who beforetimes as we have declared, was already miserably distracted. For neither did he love after the common manner of married folk: but whereas almost even unto madness he nourished this his desire, he could not be induced by the too unbridled manners of his wife to allay the heat of his affection, but that daily more and more by doting on her, he increased the same. And all that time especially he supposed that God was displeased with him D for the death of Mariamne his wife. Oftentimes did he invocate her name, and more often undecently lamented he her. And notwithstanding he devised all kind of delights and sports that might be imagined, by preparing banquets, and inviting guests with Princely hospitality, to pass away the time; yet all those profited him nothing, for which cause he gave over the charge and administration of his kingdome. And in such sort was he overwhelmed with grief, that oftentimes he commanded his Ministers to call his wife Mariamne, as if as yet she had been alive. Whilest thus he was affected; there befell a pestilence within the City, that consumed a great sort of the people, and the better part of the nobility, and each man interpreated that this punishment was inflicted by God upon them, for the unjust death of the Queen. Thus the Kings discontents being by this meanes in- E creased, he at last hid himself in a solitary wilderness, under pretext of hunting; where afflicting himself incessantly, at last, he fell into a most grievous sickness. This disease of his was an inflammation or pain in the neck: he seemed also in some sort to rave and wax mad; neither could any remedies relieve him of his agony: but when as the sickness seemed rather to increase, all men at last grew almost desperate of his recovery. For which cause his Physician, partly in respect of the contumacy of his disease, partly, because in so great a danger there was not any free election of dyet, they gave him leave to taste whatsoever best pleased his appetite; committing the uncertain event of his health to the hands of fortune.

Herods miserable estate, and moan after the death of his wife.

A plague invadeth Jerusalem.

Herod falleth grievously sick;

Whilest thus he sojourned in Samaria, which now is called Sebaste, Alexandra inhabiting at that time in Jerusalem, having notice of this his estate, sought to reduce all the strong fortresses that were within the City under her subjection: the one of which abutted upon the Temple; the other was scituate within the City: for they that are Lords of these keep all the rest of the nation under their awe; because that without these, neither the usual and daily sacrifices may be performed; neither may the Jews live without such sacrifices and oblations, who had rather lose their lives then contemn their religion. She therefore laboured those that had the government thereof, to surrender them up to her and Herods children begotten of her daughter Mariamne, for fear lest he being dead, they should be seized by others: and if it should fortune him to recover his health, in the mean while they might be kept and held by no man more securely, then such as were his domestical friends. who at other times shewed themselves alwaies faithfull, at that time were the rather far more constant in their duty, both for that they hated Alexandra, as also for that they thought it a great offence to despair of the health of their Prince. For these were the Kings old friends, and one of them was Herods own nephew, whose name was Achiabus. For which cause they sent present messengers unto him to certifie him of Alexandras intent: who having heard these news, presently commanded her to be slain: and at length overcoming his sickness, he grew so badly affected both in body and mind, that he waxed hatefull unto all men; so that all those who offended him, and for how little cause soever, were readily sought for to be punished. In this his intemperance he imbrued his hands in the blood of divers of his inward friends, as Costabarus, Lysimachus, Antipater, sirnamed Gadias, and Dositheus, for this occasion that ensueth. Costabarus was an Idumæan, and one of the greatest account amongst his countrey-men, who was descended from the Priests of Cozas, whom the Idumæans esteem for a god. Now after that Hircanus had drawn the pollicy of the Idumæans to the reformed customes of the Jews, Herod was made King of the Jews, and appointed Costabarus to be Governour in Idumæa and Gaza, giving him Salome his sister to wife, after he had put Joseph to death, to whom she had been married beforetime, as we have heretofore declared. Costabarus seeing himself in this estate beyond his expectation, grew more elate and proud then this good fortune required, and in a little time forgot himself so far, that he thought himself dishonoured, if he should perform that which Herod commanded him, and scorned that the Idumæans should be under the Jews subjection, notwithstanding they had received their manner of government from them. He therefore sent messengers unto Cleopatra, giving her to understand, that Idumæa had alwaies been under her ancestors subjection; and for that cause she ought upon just cause to demand and begge that countrey at Antonius hands, and that in respect of himself he was ready to become her servant. All which he practised not to gratifie Cleopatra in any sort whatsoever, but to the intent that if Herods fortunes should be any waies weakned, he might more easily by this means both enlarge and obtain the Kingdome of Idumæa. And with these foolish hopes was he transported, in regard of his birth and riches, which he had heaped together by such dishonest means as he continually practised, as he that intended no small matters. But notwithstanding Cleopatras often and earnest petition to obtain his soveraignty, yet could she not obtain it at Antonius hands. When Herod had notice of these covert and cunning practices, he was ready to kill Costabarus. But upon the earnest supplications of his sister and her mother, he dismissed and pardoned him; yet held him alwaies in suspition, by reason of this his practice. Not long after it hapned, that Salome fell at debate with Costabarus, for which cause she sent a libel of divorce to her husband, notwithstanding it were against the laws and ordinary customes of the Jews. For according to our ordinances, it is onely lawfull for the husband to do the same; and as touching the wife, notwithstanding she were separated, yet it is not lawfull for her to marry again, except her husband first give her licence. But Salome without respect of the laws of the countrey, grounding her self too much upon her own authority, forsook her husband: saying, that she separated her self from her husband, by reason of the great friendship which she bare unto her brother, for that she had received some notice that Costabarus practised some innovation with Antipater, Lysimachus and Dositheus. And this accusation of hers confirmed she by Babas children, whom he had already kept with him in all security for the space of twelve years. All which was true, and at that time beyond all mens expectation wonderfully troubled Herod, as soon as he heard it. For as touching Babas sonnes, he had heretofore resolved to cut them off, for that they had been alwaies badly affected towards him and all his enterprizes; but all that time he had let them pass, because by continuance they were grown out of his remembrance. Now the cause of this enmity and hatred which he bare towards them, was gathered from this ground; at such time as Antigonus enjoyed the soveraignty, and Herod besieged the City of Jerusalem with an army: now those incommodities and necessities that ordinarily happen unto those that are besieged, were the cause that divers acknowledged Herod, and fixed their hopes upon him. But Babas sons being in authority, and besides that, attended by a great number of men, persevered in their faithfull observation of Antigonus, and blamed Herod continually, encouraging the inhabitants to continue the kingdome in those to whom it appertained by descent: and they themselves followed that course, which in their opinion was most profitable for the Common-weal. But after that the City was surprized by Herod, and he grew master of the estate, Costabarus, who was appointed to keep the City gates, and to lie in wait that none of those who were accused to have forsaken the Kings side, should escape, knowing that the sons of Babas were greatly esteemed and honoured among the people

A people, and foreseeing that their safety might be no small furtherance to himself, if at any time there might ensue any alteration, he discharged and hid them within his own possessions: and notwithstanding that at that time he had protested to Herod by an oath, that he knew not what was become of them; yet though suspected of perjury, he concealed them. And afterwards when the King had by Proclamation promised a reward to him that should discover them, and sought for them by all means, neither then also would he confess the fact. For being affraid lest he should be punished for his first denial he continued through concealment, being not onely now driven thereunto by friendship, but also by necessity.

Now when the King had notice hereof by his sisters report, he sent certain messengers to the place where they were hidden, and slew them, and all those that were partakers of the B same crime; so that no one of Hircanus kindred was now left alive; but all of them being slain who excelled in nobility and dignity, he did what himself listed without any contradiction or controulement: for which cause he by little and little forsook the ceremonies and ordinances of his Countrey, and corrupted the decrees an institutions of their ancestors, which he ought to have kept inviolable, by his new and strange inventions. In whose time there was a very great change and alteration of the ancient and good manner of living; for all fell from bad to worse: and the politick order, whereby the people ought to be governed and kept within compass of their duty, went to decay. For first of all, he ordained certain wrastlings from five years to five years, in honour of Cæsar; and builded a Thea- C ter for that purpose within Jerusalem. He erected also a most huge Amphitheater within the Plain, which were two piles worthy the regard and beholding, by reason of the sumptuousness thereof; but wholly estranged from the fashions of the Jews. For neither the use, nor the presentation of these spectacles, hath ever been practised or taught by our ancestors: yet was it his pleasure to ennoble this assembly, to the end it might be continued from five to five years, and this proclaimed he publikely in the Countries round about him, and to this spectacle assembled he all the nations. The wrastlers also and all that which concerned their exercise, were sought out from all corners of the world, under the hope to obtain the proposed palm and victory; and all the most excellent in those exercises that were to be found, were invited to that assembly. For he proposed most huge rewards, not D onely to those that exercised wrastling, but also to those who are called Musicians, and to all sorts of players on instruments, labouring to his utmost power, that all the most famous in those professions should be assistant in those pastimes. He appointed also a reward of great value for such as ran upon the chariots of three, four, or of one horse; and all that which was both sumptuous and magnificent to behold, for every one was most carefully provided in that he strove to have the honour of a most magnificent preparation for his games. The Theater was hung all about with Cæsars titles, and the trophees of those nations which were overcome by him, altogether set out and shining with gold and silver. As for the instruments thereof, there wanted neither furniture, costly vestments, or precious stones. Thither also were drawn certain savage beasts, as Lions and other wild beasts, which were E worthy to be placed in this famous shew, being admirable both for their force and rareness of nature, who fought the one with the other, and against such men likewise who were condemned to die: whereby the strangers conceived, together with the admiration of his expence an uncomparable and unaccustomed pleasure. But his countrey-men interpreted this thing for a manifest corruption of those disciplines and manners which before-time they had entertained, and honoured amongst them. For it was an act most manifestly impious, to hazard men against wild beasts, to delight the eyes of other men: It was also a matter as impious, to change and prophane the ordinances of the countrey, for forrain exercises: But the most hated of all these were the Trophees: for in that they were certain images attired in armour, the use and veneration whereof were forbidden by our lawes, this displeased and grieF ved them more then any thing whatsoever: neither was Herod ignorant of those troubles which they procured. But he thought it to be a matter of danger to attempt the same for the present by force; and for that cause he familiarly debated the same with some few of them, and discoursed unto them his occasions, to the end to rid them of their superstition, although herein he profited nothing. For all of them, with one consent, cried out against the indignity which they saw him commit: telling him that although all other things were to be tolerated; yet the Trophees, which were images of men, were unsupportable because they were unusual in their countrey. Herod perceiving that they were discontented, and that they would not be easily wrought upon, except they had some contentment, he called the most worthiest men amongst them, and led them into the Theater, demanding of them what they thought these Trophees were: and when they cried out that they were images of men: he incontinently caused all the ornaments to be taken off from them, letting them see that they were nought else but naked stocks of wood; so that suddenly their displeasure was turned into a laughter, and their doubts were presently discussed. Thus appeased he the people, and moderated the fury of their mislikes; so that divers of them changed their opinions, and were no more displeased. Notwithstanding there were some of these that persisted in the indignity they conceived in those accustomed exercises, supposing that the corruption of their ancient discipline was an inducement to their grievous calamities; and they imagined that it rather concerned them to undertake all dangers, then to endure any alteration in their policy, by permitting that Herod should introdure new and extraordinary fashions, who onely in word was their King, but in effect an enemy of their whole nation. For this cause there were ten men amongst them, who bound themselves by oath to hazard all extremities, and to this intent they hid certain short swords under their garments: amongst these there was one that was blind, who urged and egged on by the strangeness of those things which he had heard, not for that he was of ability to execute any thing with his hand, but to testifie that he was ready to suffer with the rest, if any misfortune should befall them, by his example the rest of them were not a little confirmed: These having mutually undertaken this their resolution, repaired to the Theater, under hope that Herod should not escape them, for that they intended to assail him unawares: at leastwise if they failed of him, their hope was to fall foul on some of his favourites and followers, accounting this to be some solace in their expected death, if in regard of their violated religion they might bring the King in hatred with the common people. And these intending to offer themselves as Chieftains and Leaders unto the rest, resolved to execute these things. But one of those intelligencers that Herod had sent abroad to pry and search into such like actions, having discovered all this their conspiracy, signified the same unto the King, at such time as he was ready to enter into the Theater. He knowing full well what hatred was continually hatched against him, betook himself to his Palace, and sent for the conspirators by their names: who being apprehended in the fact, and knowing that there was no way for them to escape, resolved to endure their present misfortunes with a valiant courage: for being no waies dismaied, with a constant countenance they drew out their weapons. protesting that their conspiracy was honest and holy, not attempted by them for private affection, or their own profit sake, but in the behalf of their publike discipline, which no good man would either see or suffer to be violated, no though it cost him his life.

Ten men conspire against Herod.

Herod hath intelligence of the conspiracy.

The ten men are executed, and the intelligencer is cut in pieces.

Now when with great confidence they had alleadged these things for their justification they were led away by the Kings Ministers to be slaughtered by divers sorts of torments. Not long after this, that intelligencer who had betrayed them, growing hatefull in all mens eyes, was slain by certain men, and chopt in pieces with their swords, and afterwards cast unto the dogs in sight and presence of many men. Yet did no man discover this act, untill after long and wearisome inquisitions made by Herod, it was wrought out of certain poor women (who were privy to the fact) with divers torments. Then were all the actors of that murther punished, with their whole families: and notwithstanding all this, the common people was in no sort dismaid, but were ready to defend their lawes, except they were restrained by some greater power. Which when the King perceived, he resisted their endeavours with all diligence, lest haply through these alterations in affaires, the people should be drawn to an open rebellion. Whereas therefore he had two strong Castles within the City, one wherein his palace was, another called Antonia, that adjoyned near unto the Temple, fortified by him; he thought good to strengthen a third called Samaria, the name whereof he changed, and called it Sebaste (which was distant from Jerusalem some daies journey) to contain those of the common sort that were abroad, under his obedience, and very fit to bridle any uproars that might be raised in the City and fields. And for the whole Nation he builded a Fort, which in times past was called Straton, and afterwards he named it Cæsarea. He builded also a Fort in Galilee, which was called Gabala in a large Plain, where by course he kept his horsemen. Besides these, he builded the Fort of Esthmonites in the Countrey of Peræa on the other side Jordan.

Now when he had fitly disposed all these Castles through his whole countrey, for the security and safety of his kingdome, the matter of rebellion was taken from the common people, who upon every light cause are subject to commotions, in that he had prepared a remedy against all privy conspiracies, by planting such forces alwaies near at hand, who might prevent and pacifie all alterations upon their originall. After this, betaking himself to encompass Samaria with a wall, he brought to pass that divers of those who had born armes

A with him againſt his enemies, and divers of the people likewiſe that dwelt round about, came to inhabit it, both in regard of the Temple, which he intended to build in that place, as alſo for that he fortified the ſame for his own ſecurity (although that beforetime it was not in the number of famous Cities.) He therefore changed the name thereof, and called it Sebaſte, and diſtributed the lands that confined the City among the inhabitants of the ſame (which was by nature a fruitfull and goodly countrey) to the intent that within a little ſpace they might inrich themſelves. He invironed the City alſo with a ſtrong wall, being aſſiſted by the natural ſtrength and ſteepineſs of the place: and beſides the whole circuit, he included ſo much ground, that it was no waies inferiour to any of the famous Cities; B for it contained the circuit of twenty furlongs or ſtadia. And in the midſt there of there was a ſacred place, containing a furlong and a half, wonderfully adorned; in which there was a Temple builded, famous both for beauty and bigneſs. And as for the other parts of the City, he decked them with all ſorts of ornaments. And ſeeing how nearly it concerned him to provide for the ſecurity of his perſon in this walled City, he erected a Fortreſs for himſelf. And as touching the beauty thereof, his intent was that it ſhould remain for a monument to poſterity, of his magnificence and liberality.

CHAP. XII.

A famine invadeth the land of Judæa.

C THat very year, which was the thirteenth year of Herods reign, very great calamities hapned in that countrey (either through Gods diſpleaſure, or for that the revolution of time would have it ſo.) For firſt of all, there were ſuch continual droughts, that by reaſon thereof the earth grew barren, and produced not thoſe fruits which of it ſelf it was accuſtomed to bear. And after this, the ordinary courſe of mens diets being altered by reaſon of the want of corn, the want of ſuſtenance was accompanied with a bodily ſickneſs (for that by cuſtome theſe two plagues do ordinarily entertain one another:) For this made the plague and ſickneſs more vehement, for that the ſick in this great penury could neither have care of themſelves, as was expedient, nor get convenient nouriſhment for preſervation of life: And many died daily; and thoſe D alſo that remained alive were in deſpair, becauſe they could not relieve their want and neceſſities, what diligence ſoever they uſed. For which cauſe, after the old fruits of that year were wholly conſumed, and all the reſt of their ſtore was utterly ſpent, there appeared not any means whereupon they might hope; namely, for that the miſery increaſed more then was expected; yea and extended it ſelf beyond that year: ſo that they had nothing remaining by them, and the ſeed that was ſowed at that time mouldred away, and the earth for all their labours afforded them no intereſt. The neceſſity therefore being thus great, conſtrained men to ſearch out many new inventions to maintain their life: and the King likewiſe was in no leſs perplexity; in that he was deprived of thoſe ordinary revenues which he received by the fruits of the earth; and the rather, for that he had ſpent his money in repairing E his Cities, according as before this we have declared: and in ſuch ſort were all things waſted by divers calamities, that a man could conceive no hope of remedy. Beſides this, the people grew in hatred of their King; for that it is their cuſtome ordinarily to accuſe their Governors, as if they were the authors of all their evils. Yet did the King bethink himſelf how he might remedy theſe inconveniences, but hardly could he find the means, for that their neighbours had no means to ſell them victuals, becauſe they were no leſs afflicted then themſelves: and although he might have recovered ſome little means for a great ſum of money, yet wanted he it alſo to defray the charges: notwithſtanding in that he knew, that it behooved him to imploy his uttermoſt indeavours in yielding a general remedy to ſuch and ſo violent an oppreſſion, he melted down all thoſe movables he had either of gold or ſilver within his Palace, and ſpared nothing either for the matter, the excellency, or the faſhion; no not ſo much as the veſſels wherein he was ordinarily ſerved. This money ſent he into Egypt, where at that time, under Cæſar, Petronius held the government. This man being Herods friend, in that he deſired the ſafety of his ſubjects, at ſuch time as divers of them retired themſelves unto him, by reaſon of that their neceſſity, he permitted them to buy up corn; and aſſiſted them in all things, both in their bargains, and in their carriages; ſo that the greater or the whole ſum of their ſuccours was attributed to him. But after their return, Herod wrought ſo much, that the care that was taken by him did not only change the affections of thoſe which beforetime were his enemies, but beſides all this, he purchaſed great praiſe and commendation for his liberality and ſingular providence. For, firſt of all, he diſtributed a certaine quantity of

of corn to all those who were not able of themselves to supply their own wants, using herein both great care and diligence. After this for that there were a great number of such, who in regard of their age, or some other infirmity, were unable to prepare their victuals, he took order for their relief, and appointed them certain Bakers, who should furnish them with bread, both sufficient and meet for their sustenance. He gave order also, that they should not pass the winter disfurnished of cloathing, but provided for such as were naked sufficient raiment, considering that the sheep were partly dead, and partly devoured, and that there was no wool to set them awork, or other stuffe to make garments of. Now after he had furnished his subjects with these things, he thought good also to shew kindness to the neighbouring Cities, and stored the Syrians with Seed-corne to sowe their lands; which yielded him no little profit: for the earth incontinently gave him a large and plentifull tribute for that she had received: so that all of them had abundance of victuals; and as soon as the harvest was ready, he sent fifty thousand men into that countrey which he had relieved: and by this means he with all diligence restored his afflicted Kingdome, and comforted his neighbours, who were oppressed with the like calamity. For there was not any man in necessity, that according to his quality was not assisted and succoured.

The villages likewise and the Cities, and those of the common sort who entertained great households, and were in want, having their recourse unto him, received that which they had need of; so that to reckon up all the corn which he gave unto those who were not his subjects, it appeareth that he employed ten thousand Cores of wheat: now the Core containeth ten Athenian bushels: and within the compass of his Realme he imployed eighty thousand: which care of his, and discreetly imployed favour; wrought so much in the hearts of the Jews, and was so highly renowned amongst other nations, that the ancient hatred which they had conceived against him, for that he had altered certain customes of their Kingdome, was wholly forgotten, and he was supposed by them to have made a sufficient recompence, by the diligence he had shewed in assisting them in their necessities; and no less either grace or glory obtained he amongst strangers: so that by these miseries the Kings honour was not a little magnified, and whatsoever damage he received at home, so much honour and reputation atchieved he abroad. For whereas in strangers necessities he had shewed himself so full of magnanimity, each man did not respect what he had been before, but such as they lately found him to be.

The Jews favour Herod for his bounty.

About the same time also he sent Cæsar certain supplies, namely, five hundred chosen men of his guard, whom Ellius Gallus led into the wars in Arabia, and had often use of them in his most dangerous attempts. When as therefore his Kingdom was restored to his former felicity, he builded a royal Palace in the higher part of the City, furnished with many large buildings, and decked with gold and marble seats; so as they might receive a great number of men: he named also each room of the house according to their several names, and called one the lodging of Cæsar, and another of Agrippa. After this, being intangled with love, he married a wife, lest he should be distracted by vain desires; and the cause of this his new marriage was this: There was amongst those that dwelt in Jerusalem a certaine citizen called Simon, the son of Bathas the Alexandrine, who was a Priest, and one of the chiefest in nobility amongst them: this man had a daughter, the faireſt and comliest creature of that age, whose beauty being renowned by the common voice, it came to pass, that with her fame Herod at one time entertained a good affection towards her, and afterwards obtaining the sight of her, he grew in love with her; yet would not use his authority, lest he should seem to behave himself tyrannically, but chose rather to accept her for his betrothed wife. Whereas therefore Simon seemed unworthy his affinity, and yet too worthy to be blasted by contempt, he made election of a convenient means to obtain the fulness of his desire, which was, to raise both Simon and his to higher dignities. For which cause he presently deposed the high Priest Jesus the son of Phabetes, and established Simon in his place; and that done, he contracted affinity with him. After the marriage was consummate, he builded a new castle in that place wherein he had overcome the Jews, upon the time and incontinently after the overthrow of Antigonus, and when he had taken upon him the government.

Herod removeth Jesus fron his Priesthood, and placeth Simon in his room, and marrieth his daughter.

This place is distant from Jerusalem some sixty furlongs or stades, strong by nature, and fit for defence and good fortification. For near unto the same there is a certain steepy hill made by Art, after the manner of a round dug, environed with round Towers, with a steepy ascent of two hundred steps cut out of hewed stone. Within the same there are divers places builded with great and sumptuous workmanship, made both for defence and delight. At the foot of this hill there are two houses worthy the sight, for divers their singularities, and namely, by reason of those conduits of water, which although they spring not in that place, yet notwithstanding are they brought from far with great cost and expence. The Plaine that adjoyneth upon it, is all full of buildings after the manner of a City, and the top of the Castle commandeth all the Paine. As soon as therefore he had disposed all his affairs, according to his hearts desire, he possessed the Kingdome in great quietness, for that he made his subjects obedient unto him, both by fear, in shewing himself inexorable when it concerned him to punish; and by liberality, whereby he provided for their publike necessities: he therefore took an especial care of himself, as if the life and safety of his person had been the security of his people. He behaved himself officiously and favourably towards all forraign Cities; he entertained the Princes by presents, which according to his occasions he sent unto them, to insinuate himself into their favours, being in his own nature magnificent and fit to govern: so that all his fortunes increased, and all things fell out happily according to his hearts desire. True it is, that the care which he imployed in honouring Cæsar and other mighty Magistrates of Rome, caused him to outstrip his customes, and to falsifie divers ordinances of his Countrey, in building Cities, and erecting Temples in honour of them, although he builded them not in the land of Jury; for the Jews would not have endured it, because we are forbidden to honour images and figures, formed according to the likeness of a man, as the Greeks are accustomed to do, but he did this in the countrey and forrain Cities, and excused himself to the Jews; saying, that he did it not of his own head, but performed that according to the charge and commandment which he had from others, who were greater then himself: and in the mean-while gratified Cæsar and the Romanes, in that he respected their honour more then he did the ordinances of his countrey: although in all things he had respect to his particular advantage, and determined with himself to leave behind him after his death, large and ample testimonies of his power and greatness; which was the cause that he builded Cities with great charge and expence.

CHAP. XIII.

The building of the City Cæsarea.

When as therefore he had found out a fit and convenient place upon the Sea-coast, to build a City on, which of long time had been called the Tower of Straton, he both magnificently designed and set down the module and forme thereof, and made many sumptuous buildings, both of royal places, and of other private lodgings, not builded after a slight manner, or of weak and fading matter, but of marble-stone. But the greatest and busiest work of all, was the haven which he made exempt and free from stormes and tempests, that in greatness resembled that of Piræus, and was so spacious, that it was able to receive many great ships into the road, and had divers rooms and ware-houses to lay up the merchandize therein. And the more admirable was this pile, because the stuffe that was fit to finish this so great work, was not gathered or gotten in that place, but must needs be brought from another place, upon great charge and expence. This City is seated in Phœnicia, upon the coast in the way to Egypt, between Joppa and Dora, certain villages scituate upon the Sea-coasts, unfit either for landing or harbour, by reason of the Affrick wind, that driving the Sand of the Sea upon the shore, giveth not any quiet road unto the ships, but that the Merchants are enforced for a long time to ride at anchor. To correct this incommodity of the place, he made the circuit round about the port so spacious, that it was able to receive a great Fleet: and he cast down to be bottom thereof, which was about some twenty fathoms deep, certain huge stones, that for the most part were fifty foot long, eight foot broad, and nine foot high, some more and some less. The pile that was erected upon this to affront the Sea, was a pane of two hundred foot, the half whereof was opposed against the waves to break the fury of the stream, and for this cause was called in the Greek tongue Procymation, that is to say, Before flood: The other half served as a foundation to bear up a wall of stone fortified with divers Towers, the chiefest whereof was a fair pile or building, which was called Drusus, in memory of Drusus, Cæsars son in law, who died very young: yet had also divers retreats or hostries in the same, into which the Mariners were received and lodged.

The port of Cæsarea.

The descent being hard by, incompassed all the port like a round plat-form, that served for a pleasant walking place for whomsoever listed. The entrance and mouth of the haven was toward the north, which is a wind that of all other most purifieth and cleanseth. The supporter and strength of all the circuit on the left hand upon the entrance to the port, was an ample and huge Tower, to fasten it the more strongly; and on the right hand, were two huge pillars of stone, more higher then the Tower that stood opposite against them, erected and fastened together together. All round about the haven there were certain buildings, abutting one upon another, of polished marble, and in the midst there was a little hillock, on which there was a certain monument placed in honour of Cæsar, which presented it self to their sight who sailed to the port, in which there were the figures of the City of Rome and of Cæsar. This City also was called Cæsarea, as much to be wondred at for the matter whereof it was built, as for the Art whereby it was erected: and no less cunning was there shewed in the vaults and conduits under ground, then in those buildings that were about them: some of them were conveyed toward the port, and discharged themselves into the Sea by certain compassed spaces: but there was one that went athwarts, that comprehended all the rest, to the end that thereby the rain-water, and the cleansings of the City might be conveyed into the Sea, and that when the Sea should flow, it might wash and cleanse all the City.

The Theater and Amphitheater.

He erected also a Theater of stone, and behind the same, to the Southward, an Amphitheater, that was able to receive a great number of men, and so pleasantly and fitly scituated, that from the same a man might discover the Sea. This City was finished at the end of twelve years, during which time the King was never wearied by intending the work, nor negligent in furnishing the necessary charges. After this, perceiving that the City of Sebasta was already inhabited also, he resolved to send his two sons Alexander and Aristobulus to Rome, to present them unto the Emperour Cæsar, who no sooner resorted thither, but they were lodged in Pollios house, who amongst all the rest was an intire friend of Herods. They might have lien also at Cæsars house, who entertained them with as great familiarity and kindness, as might be possible, and gave Herod licence in like manner to confirme the kingdome in one of his children, which soever best liked him, annexing to his government, the countries of Trachona, Baranea and Auranita, for the occasion which ensueth. A certain man, called Zenodorus, had hired Lysanias demaines or Lordship: and not contenting himself with those revenues which he gathered, but desirous to gather more, he lived upon spoiles and robberies in Trachona, which is a countrey the inhabitants whereof commonly live by pillage and spoile, which they purchase from the Citizens and Merchants of Damasco. And so far was Zenodorus from prohibiting these robberies, that he himself also was partaker of the booty: so that the nations neighbouring round about, seeing themselves thus abused, sought for remedy at Varus hands who was their Governour, requiring him to certifie Cæsar of Zenodorus wrongs and outrages. Which when he understood, he commanded that such lawless ryoaters should be punished, and that the countrey should be added unto the jurisdiction of Herod, to the intent, that by his vigilancy the inhabitants of Trachona should no more molest their neighbours. For it was hard to restrain them, considering that they were accustomed and traded in such theft, and could not live otherwaies. For they neither had Towns nor Lands, neither heritages nor any possessions, but onely certain retreats and caves under ground, and lived pell mell like beasts: and having made abundant provision of water and victuals, they might easily endure War a long time, and maintaine themselves in their caves, when their enemies assailed them without.

Zenodorus liveth by spoil.

The doors of these dens were so harrow, that they could be entred but by one at once: but within it was incredible spacious and large: the upper part thereof was not steepy, but plain, and in form of a smooth earth: for the whole place naturally consisted of a sharpe and ragged rock, with a hard and difficult passage thereon, unless a man be guided thorow the paths. For the way was not direct and straight, but full of winding and many turnings. At such time as they wanted opportunity to spoil their neighbours, they robbed one another; and omitted no kind of wickedness. Herod having received the gift of this countrey at Cæsars hands, resorted thither under the conduct of certain guides that knew the wayes, and having brought their power and proling to an end, he left the neighbour nations in assured peace. But Zenodorus being partly whetted on with envy, partly incited by the grief which he conceived through the loss of his possessions, resorted to Rome to accuse Herod; yet could affect nothing of that which he intended.

Agrippa is sent into Asia.

When Agrippa was sent into Asia by Cæsar to govern the Provinces beyond the seas, Herod, because he was his very friend and familiar, went to salute him at Mitylene where he wintered, for that he was one of his inward friends, and afterwards returned into Jewry. But certain Gadareans came unto Agrippa with an intent to accuse Herod: but he sent them bound unto the King, and vouchsafed them no audience. On the other side, the Auranites who of long time hated Herods government, stirred up commotions, & laboured to draw the countrey into rebellion, and that upon a just ground, as it seemed, at that time: for Zenodorus despairing of his affairs, went and sold them a certain part of the Lordship in Auranita (which was comprehended within Cæsars donation to Herod) for the sum of fifty talents

A of yearly revenue, wherewith they grew discontented, for that they were unjustly deprived of their estates: and hereupon they made often incursions, endeavouring themselves sometimes to recover the same by force; and otherwhile contending for the right of their possession by course of justice. They drew also unto them certain needy Souldiers; who according to the custome of wretched men, expected their better fortunes by change and innovation: which though Herod knew, and could have providently prevented them, yet exhorted he them to maintain their titles rather by good means then open violence, being loth to give any occasion of new trouble or disquiet. At length, in the seventeenth year of his reign, Cæsar came into Syria: upon whose arrival divers of the Gadareans began to exclaim against Herod, accusing him of his severity and tyranny: which accusation they the rather attempted, because they were chiefly incited thereunto by the instigations and false suggestions of Zenodorus, who bound himself by an oath, that he would never give over, untill that delivering them from Herods tyranny, they were reduced under Cæsars protection. The Gadareans, perswaded by these his protestations, began to continue their exclamations, and that somewhat the more audaciously, for that they perceived that they lived as yet unpunished whom Agrippa had delivered into Herods hands: for Herod had set them at liberty without any punishment, notwithstanding that in regard of his own subjects he was inexorable as ever man was; and most patient in induring those injuries that were offered him by strangers, whom he alwaies dismissed without revenge. When as therefore they accused him of violence and rapine, and for violating and razing down their Temples, Herod being nothing dismaied thereat, presented himself before the Emperour to justifie his actions. But Cæsar entertained him very kindly, and diminished nothing of the good affection which he bare unto him, notwithstanding all the uproares and insolent tumults of the people. Thus was the first day spent in audience of their complaints, and in those daies that followed there were no further objections to be heard of: for the Gadareans perceiving both Cæsars disposition and the inclination of his Councel, and fearing (as it was most likely) to be delivered into Herods hands, the next night after some of them slew themselves; other some for fear of torments brake their own necks; and some of them also drowned themselves in the river. And thus whereas they seemed to fore-judge themselves, Cæsar presently absolved Herod.

D And this felicity of his was seconded with another of small consequence. For Zenodorus having his bowels broken through an extream flux of blood, finished his life at Antioch in Syria. Whereupon Cæsar gave Herod his Countrey, which was a large and ample signiory, and was situate between Trachonita and Galilee, containing Ulatha, Paneas, and the Countries thereabouts. He made him one of the Governours of Syria also, commanding them to execute nothing without his advice. At this time attained he to the height of all worldly felicity; For whereas within the huge and ample Romane Empire all things were disposed by Cæsar and Agrippa, Cæsar honoured no man more then Herod next to Agrippa; and Agrippa respected him above all men next to Cæsar. Whereupon he grew to be so confident, that he begged a Tetrarchy at Cæsars hands, for his brother Pheroras: on whom he bestowed one hundred talents, of his revenue out of his own kingdome, to the intent that if he should happen to die, Pheroras estate might be assured and left no waies subject unto his children.

Ulatha, Paneas, and other regions are given to Herod. Herod highly esteemed by Cæsar, and Cæsar maketh Pherotas a Tetrarch.

As soon as therefore he had conducted Cæsar as far as the Sea, upon his return he builded a goodly Temple of white marble in honour of his name, in the countrey which belonged to Zenodorus, near to a place which is called Panion, which is a goodly cave in the heart of a mountain, and a place of great pleasure, under which there is a wide pool of immeasurable depth, which is full of standing water, and the upper part of the mountain is very high. From under this cave spring the fountain heads of the flood Jordan. This place of it self so famous and delightfull, was chosen out by Herod, and adorned also with a Temple which he built in honour of Cæsar. At that time also he released the third part of those tributes which his subjects paid unto him, to the end (as he said) that he might relieve his subjects after the penury they had endured. But the truth of his intention was, that he did it to that end to win their favours, who were sinisterly affected towards him. For they had conceived an hatred against him, because all piety was in a manner abolished, and the ordinances of the countrey in a sort disannulled by the means of those temples which he had built, and each man privily muttered with bitterness against him; so that well nigh they were addressed to mutiny. But Herod with great discretion prevented the same, and cut off all occasions of insurrection, commanding every one to intend his labour; forbidding them to make any assemblies in the City, or to talk one with another under colour of walking abroad for pleasure or feasts sake. Moreover he had sent out certain Intelligencers to discover all that which was done, appointing appointing grievous punishments for those that misliked, or maligned his government. For divers of them were led unto the Castle of Hircania, some openly, some privately; where they were no sooner imprisoned, but they were put to death; and both in the City, and in the countrey, there were certain men appointed to take note of all such that used any assemblies upon any occasion whatsoever. And so inwardly was he tormented with their dislikes, that as it is reported of him, he took upon him the habit of a private man, and thrust himself in the night time into the company of the people, to understand and gather what they thought of his government; and those whom he found to be untractable and obstinate, and would not be conformed to his will, he dispatched them by one means or other, binding the rest of the people by an oath to serve him faithfully, and constrained them to keep the oath they had sworn, and to acknowledge his soveraignty: whereunto divers through the fear they conceived, easily condescended. But they who had a more greater courage, and were discontented to see themselves constrained, he cut them short by all the means that he might. He required also an oath of divers of those sectaries who followed the Pharisees Pollio and Sameas: and notwithstanding they denied to take the oath, yet he did not punish them as he did the other for their refusal, in respect and reverence of Pollio their master. From this rigour also were they exempt, who amongst us are called Esseans, which is a sort of men that live after that manner that Pythagoras did among the Grecians, of whom I have more expressely discoursed in another place.

Herod bindeth the people by an oath.

Herod excuseth the Pharisees from swearing for Pollio's and Sameas sakes. The Esseans not much unlike the Pythagorists.

At this present I think it not a matter to be overslipt, neither estranged from the aime of my history, to report for what cause the King had so religious an opinion of those men. There was a certain Essean called Manahem, who in his sect was accounted an upright and just man, and one that had obtained from God the knowledge of things to come. He seeing Herod one day at such time as he was very young and went to school, saluted him and called him King of the Jews. Herod supposing that Manahem knew him not, or that he mocked him, reproved him sharply for that his speech, saying, that he acknowledged himself to be one of the common sort. Manahem smiling, hit him gently with his hand upon the back, and said unto him, Thou shalt be King, and shalt have a happy reign. For such is Gods pleasure; and at that time remember thy self of the words that Manahem spake unto thee, which shall serve for a testimony to put thee in mind of thy mutable estate. For it becommeth thee nothing more, then by justice, piety, and equity, to winne the hearts of thy subjects: yet know I by revelation from God, that thou wilt not follow these instructions; for thou shalt forget and neglect both divine and humane laws, though in other respects thou shalt be most fortunate, and purchase eternal glory. Yet shalt thou not escape Gods hands: for he shall chastise thee in the latter time of thy life with a grievous punishment.

Manahem foretelleth Herods government.

Herod questioneth with Manahem about the continuance of his kingdome, and loveth the Esseans for his sake.

At that time Herod gave small regard to those his words, in that he had no hope that any such thing should happen: but not long after, as soon as he had obtained the Kingdome to the fulness of his felicity, he in the greatness of his power sent for Manahem, and asked him how long he should reign. But he returned him a doubtfull answer. Which when Herod perceived, he asked him anew if he should reign ten years. Whereunto Manahem answered, and twenty, and thirty, without setting him down any prefixed terme. Herod contenting himself herewith, embraced Manahem, and gave him licence to depart, and continued his affections towards the Esseans for his sake. I have thought good to register these things, notwithstanding they may seem uncredible, to declare that divers of our nation have had communication with GOD by reason of their holiness.

CHAP. XIV.

Herod buildeth a new Temple in Jerusalem, after he had pulled down the old.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 14. al. 11.

IN the eighteenth year of his reign, Herod, after he had finished these many and admirable actions, conceited in his mind no mean, but a mighty project, which was to re-edifie Gods Temple of greater bigness and answerable height, hoping that this work which was the most admirable of all those he had undertaken (as indeed it was) in being finished would eternize his memory. But fearing lest the people, in regard of the greatness of the enterprize, would be hardly drawn thereunto, he determined to sound their intents by his discourse, and for that cause assembling them together, he spake after this manner:

Herod intendeth to re-edifie Gods Temple.

Herod certifieth the people that he will re-edifie the Temple.

Men and brethren, I hold it to be a matter both vain and superfluous, to recount unto you what things I have performed, during the time of my government. For they have been of

"that nature, that they have returned me but little honour, and your self great profit and "security. For you your selves know, that in those adversities that have befallen you, I have "been no wayes negligent in that which concerned your profit; and in those buildings I "have erected by Gods assistance, I have not so much regarded my self, as that which con- "cerneth you all: and my hope is by the will of God, that I have brought the estate of the "Jews to that degree of felicity, that they never had or expected before this time. As for "that which I have particularly exploited in the heart of the Countrey, and in the Cities "which I have augmented, as well with ornament and beauty, as with a number of inhabi- "tants; since you your selves know, I think it a ridiculous matter to reduce them to your "memory. But I must at this time assure you that the design which I will presently enter- "prize, is far more holy and more excellent, than may be performed by us. For our prede- "cessors, after they were returned from the captivity of Babilon, builded a Temple in Ho- "nour of our great and mighty God, which in height wanted sixty cubits of that which "Solomon first built: yet ought we not to object as a blame, or ascribe this action to any im- "piety in our Ancestors. For the Temple was not at their disposition, but the measure of their "building was set them down by Cyrus and Darius the Son of Hystaspes, to whom and their "successours, they have first of all been slaves; as after their time they have been under the "subjection of the Macedonians: so that they had not the means and opportunity to raise this "religious Monument, according to his first patern, to that requisite and convenient height. "But since at this present by Gods permission, I have obtained the Kingdom; and that for a "long time hitherto we have enjoyed a happy peace; and that neither money nor great reve- "nues are wanting; and that which is our greatest good, we are made happy by the favour of "the Romans, who in a sort are the Lords of the whole world, and in effect are our entire "friends: I will enforce my self to repair that defect, which hapned in times past through the "miseries, and weak means of our noble predecessors, resolving with my self to perfect that "which is requisite for the service of God, in acknowledgement of the benefits which I have "received from him, by whose mercy and means I have obtained my Kingdom.

The year of the world, 3947. before our Saviours Nativity, 17.

This sudden and unexpected speech of Herods filled all mens eats with wonder, and hearts with expectation, in that he seemed to promise such a thing, as was beyond their hope, and as they thought far greater, than his power: and that which most distracted them was, for that they had conceived a fear, lest after he had pulled down the old, he should not be of ability to erect a new. For which cause his counsel seemed to be dangerous, and attempt over difficult. But the King perceiving with what doubts they were detained, encouraged them, promising in no sort to deface the old Temple, before all that was prepared and po- lished which was requisite for the building of the new. And in this he kept his word. For he appointed a thousand chariots to draw stones unto the place, and chose out amongst the rest ten thousand cunning and expert workmen. He apparelled also at his own charge one thou- sand Priests in their accustomed Vestments, whereof some gave the Masons instructions how they should work, and the rest assisted the Carpenters. This done, after he had fitly and readily performed and prepared all things requisite, he caused them to fall to their building. As soon as therefore the former foundations were taken away, and other meer new were planted in their place, the temple was erected upon them, in length one hundred cubits, and twenty cubits in height, above those hundred cubits which the former contained, which twenty cubits were in some sort scantled, after that by succession of time the foundations began to be setled, and during Neroes reign our Countrey-men had thought to have raised it to the first height. The building was of white and strong marble stones, which were each of them twenty and five cubits long, eight cubits high, and about some twelve cubits broad. All the structure of the same was made after the manner of a Princely Palace on all sides, and the middle part thereof was higher than the rest: so that it might easily be discovered by the inhabitants of the countrey many furlongs off; and especially it was most apparent and subject to their sight, who dwelt opposite against it, or repaired unto the City. The doors thereof and their transomes were correspondent to the rest of the magnificence of the Tem- ple, garnished with divers tapestries, and azured flowers, which invested and adorned the pillars: under whose chapters a golden Vine spread it self on each side, replenished with many goodly clusters of Grapes hanging down; which was an admirable work to behold, both in respect of the greatness, as also for the workmanship and matter whereof it was made. He encompassed all the Temple with most goodly galleries and porches correspondent to the magnificence of the same, and surpassing those in times past for the cost; so that never any man before him so magnificently adorned the Temple. Two of which were underprop- ped with very strong walls, whose workmanship was so exquisite, as it is incredible to be reported amongst men. There was a stony rising or hillock, and very streight and high, the top whereof towards the Eastermost part of the Citie was somewhat smooth and upright. The first that encompassed it with a wall, was Solomon our King, who by Gods favour and the mediation and labour of divers workmen, did first of all build the higher part: Herod also invested the lower part thereof with another wall; under which to the Southward there lieth a most deep valley. This wall was made of huge stones, close fastned the one unto the other with Lead, shutting all within his enclosure, and extending it self very deep; so that the greatness and height of this four-square-building was an incredible thing to be imagined. The greatness of the Stones appeared in the Front, but on the inside they were fastned together with clapses of Iron, which fortified and strengthned the building for ever against all injuries of times. This work having been thus continued to the top, and the void space between the wall and the rising hillock filling up the floor above, was made plain and equal. The whole circuit of the Tower contained about four stades or furlongs, a stade or furlong in length to every pane from angle to angle. On the inside and neat unto the top there was another wall of stone extended along the Eastern side; having a double porch of equal greatness with that of the wall, and placed in the midst of the Temple, and openeth right upon the gates thereof, which the Kings beforetime had adorned. Round about the Temple were planted those spoils which were taken from the Barbarians, which King Herod had placed there, with all those spoils which he had taken from the Arabians. In a corner on the North side there stood a very strong and defenced Fortress, builded by the Asmonians, who were Herods predecessours, and had been both Kings and high Priests, and had imposed a name on that Tower which was Baris, in which they kept the Priestly Vesture, wherewith the high Priest was wont to be adorned at that time only, when he was to offer sacrifice. King Herod kept the same in that place, and there remained it after his death, untill the time of Tiberius Cæsar: under whom Vitellius Governour of Syria came unto Jerusalem; where he was entertained by all the people with as great magnificence, as was possible: and being desirous to acknowledge the favour that he had received at their hands, being requested by them that they might have the keeping of the high Priests Ornaments, he wrote unto Tiberius Cæsar to grant them that favour; and till the death of King Agrippa, the Jews had the same in their possession. But after that Agrippa was dead, Cassius Longinus that governed Syria, and Cuspius Fadus Lievtenant of Judæa, commanded the Jews to return the same into the Fortress Antonia, saying, that the Romans ought to be Lords thereof, as they had been in times past. For which cause the Jews sent Embassadours to Claudius Cæsar, to request his favour therein, who arriving at Rome, found the young King Agrippa there, who besought the Emperour that it might be lawfull for him to have the keeping of the habit: who commanded Vitellius the Governour of Syria, to deliver it into his hands. Beforetime it was kept under the seal of the high Priest, and the custody of the Treasurers, and on the Eve of a certain solemne Feast, the Treasurers went up to the Captain, who kept the Fortress for the Romans, and after they had opened their seal, they took the habit: and after the Feast was past, they returned it back again unto the same place, and shut it up under the same seal in the presence of the Captain. All which we have thought good to lay open, to make the diversity known that was used in that care.

The Tower of Antonia.

After that Herod had in this sort builded this strong Tower for the security and guard of the Temple, he called it Antonia, for the love of Antonius his friend, and one of the chiefest men in Rome. In the Western part of this porch, there were four gates, whereof the one opened upon the Kings Palace, to which there was a direct way thorow the midst of the valley; the two others led unto the suburbs: and the fourth opened upon the rest of the City, and gave open passage unto the same, by the means of a number of stairs, by which men might descend to the foot of the valley; and from thence there was an ascent by other stairs to ascend upwards. For the City was scituate near unto the Temple, after the manner of a Theater; and was bended to the Southward by a deep vally. As touching the fourth side turned toward the South, it had likewise certain gates in the midst thereof; and upon the same there was a triple gallery very royal and Princely, the length whereof extended from the oriental valley, as far as the Western. For it was impossible to extend it any further. This work was one of the most famous pieces that was ever seen under the Sunne. For the depth of the valley was so great, that it was impossible for a man to see the bottom if he looked downward from the higher part: and notwithstanding, on the same he erected this porch of so great a height, that but to look from the top thereof, and to consider the depth as well of the Valley, as the height of the Porch, it would make a man giddy, and his eye could not pierce unto the immeasurable bottom of the same. It had in length foure ranks of pillars oppoſed the one right over againſt the other (for the fourth pane of the Wall was fortified with a wall of hewn ſtone) the thickneſs of the pillars was ſuch, that it was as much as three men could fathom, holding one another by the hand, and the length was of twenty and ſeven foot, with a double baſe at the bottom. The whole number of them was one hundred ſixty and two; and they had Chapters engraven and damaskt with Corinthian work. All this building was ſo huge, that it moved admiration in thoſe that beheld the ſame. Betwixt theſe four ranks there were three Porches, whereof two were on either ſide, containing in breadth each of them thirty foot, and in length a ſtade or furlong: and more than fifty foot in height. That in the midſt was in breadth once and half as much as theſe two; and in height twice as much. For it ſurpaſſed the reſt by far. The floor was made of goodly planks, engraven with divers figures; and the roof thereof was far higher than any of the reſt, in which were certain huge beams morteiſed, on which there were certain pillars builded, united and annexed ſo fitly together, that it is a matter incredible to thoſe that have not ſeen the ſame, and admirable to him that beholdeth it. Such was the faſhion of the circuit of the firſt Porch. In the midſt, and not far off from the other, ſtood the ſecond; whereunto there was an aſcent made with few ſteps. It was incloſed with a ſeparation of ſtone, with an inſcription, forbidding any ſtranger to enter the ſame upon pain of death. This inward porch both to the ſouthward and the northward had three gates, in rank equidiſtant the one from the other; and toward the eaſtward had one great gate, by which thoſe men entred, who were cleanſed with their wives. For beyond that place it was not lawful for the women to have acceſs. But the third inward ſpace was only acceſſible by the Prieſts. In it was the Temple, and before the ſame the Altar, on which they were wont to offer burnt ſacrifices unto God. But Herod durſt not enter into the interiour ſanctuary, from whence profane men were excluded by the Law: but by the mediation of the Prieſts he intended the ſtructure and building of the inward Porch, and finiſhing in eight years ſpace the reſt of the edifice, at length alſo he finiſhed the Temple it ſelf by the endeavours of the ſame Prieſts, within the term of one year and ſix moneths. By which means the people were repleniſhed with the fulneſs of joy, and every one gave thanks unto God for that the whole work was finiſhed ſo ſpeedily, and wiſhed all happineſs to the King for his coſt and diligence in the execution and finiſhing thereof: and they celebrated a great Feaſt in honour of the reſtauration of the Temple. Then did the King offer up three hundred oxen unto God, and the reſt of them each one according to his ability offered ſo many ſacrifices, as that ſcarcely they may be comprehendred in number, for that their multitude exceeded their eſtimate.

The dedication of the Temple.

About the very time of the celebration of this Feaſt, in the honor of the re-edification of the Temple, the Kings day of Coronation fell out, which he was wont to ſolemnize every year with great joy: and for this two-fold occaſion the ſolemnity and joy was far more ſumptuous and compleat. The King alſo cauſed a conduit of water to be made, and conveighed by pipes under ground, drawing it from the Caſtle Antonia unto the Oriental gate of the Temple; near to which he builded another Tower alſo, to the end, that by the conduits he might aſcend privily unto the Temple, if haply the people ſhould practice any inſurrections againſt his Royalty. It is reported, that during the building of this Temple, it never rained by day time, but only by night, to the intent the work might not be interrupted: and our Predeceſſors have teſtified no leſs unto us. Neither is this thing incredible, if we attentively conſider thoſe other effects of Gods Providence. Hitherto concerning the re-edification of the Temple.

The year of the World, 3955. before Chriſts Nativity, 9.

AMongſt the reſt of the affairs of the Common-wealth, the King thought it behoved him to redreſs and hinder private injuries, both in the City and Countrey: for the which purpoſe he made a new Law unlike to the former, that it ſhould be lawful for ſuch as were Wall-breakers, to be ſold for ſlaves without the limits of his Kingdom: which Law did not ſeem ſo much to intend the puniſhment of malefactors, as the diſſolution of his own Countrey cuſtomes. For to ſerve forein Nations, who lived not after the manner of the Jews, and to do whatſoever they commanded them, was more prejudicial unto Religion than unto the parties convicted of that fact. Wherefore it was ſufficiently already in the old antient Laws provided for the puniſhment of ſuch people, to wit, that a thief ſhould reſtore four times as much as he ſtole: which if he was not able to do, that then he was to be ſold; not unto ſtrangers, nor into perpetual bondage, but only for ſeven years: at which time he ſhould again be ſet free. So that the common people did interpret this new Law to ſet down an unjuſt puniſhment, and rather to favour of tyranny, than of Princely dignity, and to be enacted not without contempt of their antient Laws: ſo that for this cauſe all men ſpake very ill of the King.

At the ſame time Herod ſailed into Italy to ſalute Cæſar, and to ſee his Children living at Rome. Where, Cæſar receiving him very courteouſly, permitted him to take his Sons home with him, as being now ſufficiently inſtructed in the Liberal Arts. Who returning into their Country, were joyfully received of all their Countrymen, both for that they were of comly ſtature, Herod ſailed into Italy, and brought home his Sons from Rome.

A stature, and of courteous conditions, and in their very behaviour did shew that they came of Kingly linage. Which things moved Salome and the rest, by whose false accusations their Mother Mariam was oppressed, to envy them; fearing their puissance, and verily perswading themselves that they would be revengers of their Mothers injuries. So taking hereby occasion, they began also falsely to accuse them, as misliking their Father, who had caused their Mother to be slain; and as though they had an aversion from him, whose hands were imbrued in their Mothers blood. For they well perceived that by such calumniation they might draw them into hatred, and avert their Fathers good will from them. Yet did they not carry these their inventions to the Kings ears, but contented themselves to bruit them abroad amongst the common people; which so in the end coming to his hearing, would cause B in him such enmity and hatred against his Sons, as that it would overcome in him all natural affection.

How Herod gave Wives unto Alexander and Aristobulus.

BUt the King as yet mistrusting nothing, moved with a Fatherly care over them, had them in such estimation as reason did require, and for that they were now come unto mans estate, he married them both: and unto Aristobulus he gave Bernice the daughter of Salome; and unto Alexander, Glaphyra the Daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, Which done, understanding that Marcus Agrippa was returned out of Italy into C Asia, he went unto him thither, and invited him into his Kingdom, requesting him to accept of his Friends entertainment. Which Agrippa yeelding unto, Herod omitted nothing that might delight him: for he received him in his Cities newly built, shewing him the fair houses and goodly Edifices, entertaining him and the rest of his friends and followers with all sorts of delights, pomp and magnificence, as well at Sebaste, as at the Haven of Cæsarea, and in the Castles he built, to wit, Alexandrium, Herodium, and Hircania. He also brought him to Jerusalem, where all the people met him apparelled in such goodly and brave attire, as they were accustomed to adorn themselves withal, when as they celebrate their Festivals, and with many joyful acclamations received and saluted him. Agrippa offered a hundred head of fat Oxen to God, and feasted all the people; and although D he would willingly have made a longer abode there, yet winter drawing nigh, fearing tempestuous weather, he was forced to sail away with all speed into Jonia, both he and his friends being honoured with very great presents.

CHAP. III.

How Herod sailed unto Agrippa.

HErod having past the winter at home, and hearing that Agrippa was now with an Army minded to go to Bosphorus, the spring time being now at hand, he sailed E unto him again, and taking his course by Rhodes and Cous, he came towards Lesbus, thinking there to find Agrippa: but by a contrary wind he was driven from thence, and forced to stay a while at Chius; where many privately coming to salute him, he rewarded with Princely rewards: and perceiving that the City gate, destroyed in the Wars against Mithridates, was not yet repaired, but still lay ruinated for want of money to repair it, he gave so much Money as largely sufficed to restore it to the former beauty and bigness; exhorting them with all expedition to re-edifie and adorn the City as it was in times past. At last the wind changing, he sailed first to Mitylene, and then to Byzantium; and there understanding that Agrippa had already past the rocks of Cyanes, he followed him with all speed, and overtook him at Synope a City of Pontus: who contrary to Agrippas expectation arrived there with his Navy: Herods coming was very grateful unto F Agrippa, and with especial affection they embraced one another. It was an evident sign of friendship, that the King omitting his own private business, would now come unto him in so convenient a time. Wherefore Herod abode still with him in the Army, always present either to assist him with counsel, or to bear part of the labour with him. He was also present with him at such times as he meant to be merry, being his only Counsellor in difficult matters; for the benevolence he bare unto him, and also in all his mirth, as being one whom he honoured. Agrippa having dispatcht the business in Pontus for which he came, it pleased him not to return by Sea, but to go by Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the greater Phrygia, and so they came by land to Ephesus: and there taking Herod sailed unto Agrippa to Chius, and gave a great sum of money to re-edifie the porch.

Herod found Agrippa at Synope a City of Pontus, and was by him honourably entertained.

ſhip they came to Samos. And in that whole Journey, almoſt in every City he gratified Herod, at his entreaty relieving many of their neceſſities. And Herod did in the way help many with money that wanted, and ſpent much upon his Gueſts: and moreover, if any one had any ſuit unto Agrippa, Herod was the only man that might obtain his ſuit for him. And although Agrippa alſo was both nobly minded and eaſily intreated to grant all ſuch things as were not prejudicial to any man; yet was it a matter of no ſmall moment and importance in King Herod, to incite him to uſe beneficence, being even of his own accord forward enough to put the ſame in practiſe. For firſt of all he reconciled Agrippa being angry againſt the Ilienſians, and himſelf paid the money that the people of Chius were indebted unto Cæſars receivers, obtaining for them an immunity: and he alſo aſſiſted and pleaſured others in whatſoever they needed.

CHAP. XIV.

How the Jews of Jonia accuſed thoſe Countreymen for offering to take from them their Priviledges, granted unto them by the Romans.

The Jews of Jonia complain unto Agrippa of the injuries offered them by thoſe Countreymen.

Nicholaus did make a ſpeech unto Agrippa in the behalf of the Jews.

WHen they came into Jonia, a great multitude of the Jews inhabiting that Countrey being gathered together, expected him to ſpeak unto him; and finding opportunity, they complained unto him of the wrongs that thoſe Countreymen offered them, not permitting them to live according unto their Laws; and that upon Feſtival days they pulled and haled them before their Tribunal: and that they would not permit them to ſend ſacred money unto Jeruſalem, and that they compelled them to do publike buſineſs, and to ſpend the Holy money in thoſe affairs, contrary to the Priviledges granted unto them by the Romans. Herod laboured to have the Jews complaints heard by Agrippa, & willed one of his friends and followers called Nicholaus, to plead the Jews cauſe: who made a ſpeech unto Agrippa, ſitting with the reſt of the Romans Nobility, and other Kings and Princes, in their behalf after this manner: "Moſt worthy Agrippa, true it is, that all "men that ſuffer injury, are conſtrained to flie for redreſs to the Higher Powers, and we "over & above hope to obtain our ſuit. For we ask nothing but that which your beneficence "hath already granted, & that which they endeavour to take from us that are, as we alſo are, "your Subjects. And although that your benefit beſtowed upon us was great, yet are we wor-"thy ſtill to enjoy it, only for that you your ſelf judged us worthy thereof. And ſuppoſe it "was a ſmall matter, it is a diſcredit for you not to grant ſo ſmall a trifle. Wherefore it is evi-"dent, that the injury done unto us, doth alſo redound unto you, whoſe decrees thoſe that "have injured us, fear not to contemn, and do diſanul your beneficence towards us. For if "any one ſhould ask any of them whether they had rather loſe their lives, than be deprived "of their Countrey Laws, rites, ſacrifices, and feſtivities, wherewith they honour their gods, I "know well they would rather endure any calamity, than to be forced to forſake their Coun-"trey cuſtoms. For many Wars ariſe only for defence of Religion: and the greateſt reward "and content that we reap by this happy peace, which through your means we enjoy, is this, "that we are every one permitted to live according to the cuſtome of his Countrey, and to "continue in piety. Wherefore they endeavour to take from others that, which by no means "they would permit to be taken from themſelves, as who would ſay, it was not as great of-"fence to hinder other mens piety and devotion, as neglect their own. Let us conſider whe-"ther there be any City or Nation, that doth not account their felicity to be ſituate in your "dominion, and the power of the Romans? or is there any that deſireth your honour and "power to decay and be of no force? Truly none that is wiſe: for there is none, whom either "publikely or privately it concerneth not: but theſe people endeavouring to take from us "your liberty, do alſo as it were deprive themſelves of all benefits which they have recei-"ved at your hands, which are infinite. For what a benefit is it, that whereas other Nations "living under the dominion of rigorous Kings conſtituted over them; theſe do only obey the "Romans, and live in happy peace and tranquility? But as for our affairs, were no man trou-"bleſome unto us, yet are they not ſuch as deſerve to be envied. For enjoying the common "felicity, which others your Subjects do, we deſire nothing of high eſtimate or worth, but "only requeſt that we may live according to the Religion of our Countrey, which of it ſelf "is not to be envied at, but may be profitable for them that permit it. For God doth always "love them, who honour him, and them who do not hinder his honour. What is there in our "Religion offenſive to any man? nay, what is there that is not according to all piety and ju-"ſtice, whereby all things continue and are preſerved? For neither do we conceal what life

A "we follow, nor the labours and exercise we use, but resting the seventh day from all labours, "we spend that day in learning our Religion, and the Laws and customs thereof, esteeming "this custome not to be of small force to correct and amend our manners. These our customs "having in them nothing that any that searcheth them, can justly reprehend, they are now al- "so, though many are perswaded the contrary, consecrated and confirmed by their antiquity: "So that we must needs make a conscience of it to forsake our Laws, that have endured so "many ages. These are the injuries that these people by violence offer us; they sacrilegi- "ously take from us the money dedicated to God: they impose tributes upon us, who are "free: they upon festival days force us to their tribunals, to Law, and other profane busi- "ness, without any necessity, but only in contumely and disgrace of our Religion, which they "know well in the mean time while that they persecute with unjust and unlawful hatred. For "your Empire, equally providing for the good of all your Subjects, doth not only nourish B "the mutual concord of them all, but also resisteth hatred and malice. These are the inju- "ries, most worthy Agrippa, whereof we seek redress at thy hands, requesting thee that "hereafter we may live according to our Religion as before-times, and that our adversaries "may have no more authority over us than we over them: which is not only justice and e- "quity, but already also granted by your clemencie. And there are yet extant to be seen in "the Capitol many decrees and ordinances of the Senate concerning this matter, engraven "in brass; which are read unto this day: doubtless for our truth and fidelity so oftentimes "tried: or at least, though we not deserving it, yet holy and inviolate. For you do not only "not withdraw from us and all other Nations your former benefits granted unto us, but you C "do rather every day beside all hope and expectation increase them: all which, time will not "suffer me to recount. And that we may not seem vainly to boast of our duties and officious- "ness towards you, and also omitting other things that are past; our King now sitting with "you can sufficiently testifie it so to be. For what kind of love and good will hath he omit- "ted to shew unto your Nation? where was he not proved trusty? what hath he not de- "vised to honor you? where stood you in need, when he was not the first man to help you? "Why therefore should not we receive some favour for his deserts? I will not omit to put "you in mind of the fortitude of his Father Antipater, who came in with 2000 Souldiers to "assist Cæsar in the Egyptian Wars, wherein he so valiantly behaved himself, that neither by "Sea nor Land any one in those Wars deserved more commendations than himself. I will D "not recount at this time how much good he did Cæsar in those Wars, and what and how "great rewards he therefore received: but rather I should first of all put you in remembrance "of the Letters that the Emperor writ unto the Senate concerning this matter, wherewith "he obtained for Antipater the honours and priviledges of the City. For this only argument "had been sufficient to have declared that we did not obtain such favour without desert, and "request thee now to confirm the same, of whom we might justly hope for new benefits, "seeing such friendship and familiarity between thee and our King. For we have understood "by our Nation that dwell in Judæa, how many offerings thou diddest there sacrifice unto "our God, and with what vows thou honouredst him: how thou feastedst the people, and "wast delighted in that mutual hospitality. All which was an argument of the friend- E "ship confirmed between so great a Roman Prince, and the Nation of the "Jews, even in Herods house. By all these, we humbly request in the presence of the King "nothing but this only, that thou wouldest not permit us deceitfully to be defrauded of "that, which you your selves have already granted unto the Nation of the Jews.

Now no one of the Greeks offered to oppose himself against that which Nicholaus did speak: for this was no contention to a Judge concerning their right, but only a deprecation and supplication to avoid injury. Neither did they deny it: only thus they excused themselves, that the Jews dwelling amongst them, were troublesome unto them. But the Jews shewed themselves to be free Citizens, and to live according to their Religion and Laws of their Countrey, without any mans molestation or injury. Wherefore Agrippa understanding F that they were wronged, answered thus: That he would not only gratifie them for his friend Herods sake, but also for that they seemed to him to demand a reasonable matter. Wherefore though they had demanded a greater thing of him, he would have granted them whatsoever he might, without prejudicing the people of Rome. And now seeing they only demand of him that which already the Romans had granted unto them, he would ratifie and confirm unto them the benefit which they had already received at the Romans hands, and provide that henceforth no man should molest them for living according to the institution and ordinances of their Countrey. Having thus spoken, he dismissed the Assembly. Then Herod arising, thanked him in all their names. And then after mutual embracing one another, they departed, taking their leaves from Lesbus.

The year of the World, 3956. after Christs Nativity, 8.

Herod returned to Jerusalem, and made a speech unto the people, and let them understand the cause of his injury, and remitted the fourth part of his tribute.

THe King having a prosperous wind, within a few days after arrived at Cæsarea; and from thence he went to Jerusalem, and calling together all the people, as well the Citizens as also the Countrey people there present, there he told them the cause of his journey, and how he had obtained immunities for the Jews living in Asia, that they might converse there among the Gentiles, without molestation. Then he recounted unto them, what felicity they had received and enjoyed by his reign, seeing that his greatest care was so to provide for his Subjects, that they might want nothing. And to gratifie them H the more, he told them, that he would freely remit the fourth part of the Taxes and Tribute they were to pay for the year past. The people greatly comforted as well with the Kings speech unto them, as with his liberality, departed joyfully, wishing the King all happiness.

CHAP. VI.

Of the discord in Herods house, between him and his Sons.

Hedio & Russinus, cap. 3. al. chap. 7. Salome persecuteth Mariammes children with natural hatred.

IN the mean time, the discord of his house was dayly increased; for Salome greatly maligned the two young men, as having an hereditary hatred rooted in her heart; and presumed by reason of her good success in her exploit practised against their Mother, to I labour all ways possible not to leave any alive, that might revenge her death, who died, not deserving it. And she wanted no occasion, for that it seemed the young men were not very well affected toward their Father, partly for the memory of their Mothers death, and partly also for that they desired the Kingdom. So that they upbraiding Salome and Pheroras, did renew their old hatred against them, who daily practised, by all means they could, to overthrow them: the young men also hated them, but not with like hatred that they were hated of them. For they for their ingenuous manners and noble race dissembled not their anger, but with lavish tongues declared their minds. But Salome and Pheroras contrariwise enviously and craftily prepared themselves a way by calumniations, always provoking the magnanimous spirits of these young men, whose fierceness might soon bring them into suspicion with their father, to the intent that he might gather hereby, that they wanted not K will to revenge their Mothers death; yea, even with their own hands, forasmuch as they were not ashamed to be the Children of such a Mother, and would contend that she was unjustly put to death. And now all the City talked of them, every one pitying the young mens simplicity: Salome not ceasing to gather by their own speeches probable arguments of suspicion, that they did not only take their Mothers death impatiently, but also raging like young men, did both bewail her death, and their own case, who were compelled to live with the murtherers of their unfortunate Mother, and as it were contaminate themselves with living amongst them. And the absence of the King greatly caused this their dissension; who being returned, and having made a speech unto the people, he presently L was admonished both by Pheroras and Salome his Sister, that he was in great danger, by reason of the two young men, who did openly boast that they would be revenged of them that killed their Mother: feining moreover, that they were encouraged, for that they hoped that Archelaus King of Cappadocia would help them, to accuse their father unto Cæsar. Herod hearing this, was greatly troubled; and so much the more, for that he heard the same also reported unto him by others: and hereby he was put in memory of that which was past, how that for the dissension of his house he could not long enjoy his friends and dearest wife. And as it were foreseeing by that that was past what would ensue, and fearing some greater calamity would befal him, he was altogether amazed. And truly as abroad he was most fortunate above all hope; so at home he was most unhappy and in- M fortunate beyond mens opinion: So that one may well doubt whether his fortunate success abroad did countervail his misfortunes at home; or whether it had been more expedient for him to have had neither the one or the other, but to have had only a common and ordinary favour at fortunes hands. Deliberating thus with himself, he thought it good to call unto the Court another Son of his, whom he begat when he was a private man, and to grace him with honours, and to oppose him against the other two Brethren, to the end, to bring down and repress their fierce and haughty minds: (this Son of his was called Antipater) not minded (which after overcome by affection he did) to make him sole heir of all,

But it fell out far otherwise than he expected, for the young men esteemed this fact as an injury done unto them: and Antipater was of that nature, that having gotten promotion contrary to his expectation, he did endeavour all ways possible to be in greater account with his Father than the two young men, who was now through false accusations alienated from them, and every day (as he also desired) ready to believe any thing that might incense
B him against them.

Antipater inciteth his father against his Brothers.

Wherefore this was all his labour: yet he had an especial care not to be thought an accuser of his Brethren, but he used others of his accomplices, whom the King nothing suspected; who for the trust the King put in them, might also have better credit given unto their words. For now this man had many followers and favourers, as it were, gaping after preferment by his means, who with a kind of counterfeit good will made a shew of love and good will towards Herod. And being many in number and trusty one to another, the young men were every day entrapped more and more: for many times they shed tears for very grief of the contumelies and injuries that they suffered; and many times they mentioned their Mother, and complained unto those whom they thought to be their friends, of their father, as one that dealt not well with them: all which Antipaters partakers maliciously noting, and adding
C thereunto something of their own invention, they did presently tell it unto Herod; and so did nourish the dissension of his house. For the King being moved hereat, and purposing to humble Mariammes children, did daily encrease and augment Antipaters honour, and at his entreaties at last brought his Mother into the Court; and many times writing secretly unto Cæsar in favour of Antipater, he especially commended him in particular unto him: and being to sail to salute Agrippa, who was now to depart out of Asia, having governed that Province ten years, he only took with him Antipater of all his Sons, whom he also committed unto Agrippa with many gifts, to go with him to Rome, and to be brought into favour with Cæsar; so that now all things seemed to be done, as it were by this mans beck, and the young men to be already dis-inherited.

Herod brought Antipaters Mother into the Palace.

CHAP. VII.

How Antipater living at Rome, Herod brought Alexander and his Brothers thither, and accused them before Cæsar.

THis journey did greatly advantage Antipater, and encrease his honour and pre-eminence above his Brethren: for he became famous at Rome, being by his Fathers Letters commended unto all his friends there: yet this was a great grief unto him, that he could not daily calumniate his Brethren; for he feared lest his fathers mind should E change, and so he should affect Mariammes Children most. This was his daily cogitation: but though he were absent, yet ceased he not by Letters to incite his Father against them, as having care of his safety; but indeed for that he thereby through his bad practices hoped to obtain the Kingdom: so that he increased Herod's wrath against them, that he now was become a deadly enemy unto the young men. But endeavouring to resist this affection, and fearing rashly in his anger to commit any thing to prejudice them, he determined to sail again to Rome, and there to accuse his Sons before Cæsar, lest he being led away through indignation and displeasure conceived against the young men, should seem to cast off all love and fatherly affection towards them. And repairing to Rome, and not finding Cæsar there, he followed him unto Aquileia: and coming to speech of him, and requesting him to take notice of his misfortunes, he presented his two Sons, and accused them be-
F fore Cæsar of insolencie, and for having attempted to poyson him, complaining their hatred to be gone so far, that now by any wicked and execrable way whatsoever they sought their Fathers Kingdom; notwithstanding that Cæsar had given him full power and liberty to leave the Kingdom to him, whom he found most dutiful and obedient unto him. And that, they though thereby they might not gain the Kingdom, yet they could be contented with their fathers death, and that they sought it with danger of their own lives, and that this horrible and detestable hatred was now rooted in their hearts. And that he having long endured this calamity, was now forced to open it unto Cæsar, and trouble his ears with these complaints. And spake after this manner: Have I deserved this at their hands? what wrong have have I done them? or how can they think it reason, that I who have exposed my self to so G many dangers, and undergone so difficult labours for a long time to obtain the Kingdom, should not peaceably enjoy the same, and suffer me to be Lord of my own Dominion, and permit me the liberty to leave it unto him who shall deserve such honour in the best performance of a Son-like duty? So that the beholders hereof seeing piety so rewarded, might hereby be the more incited hereunto, especially seeing that without violating the Law of Nature, it is not lawful to think any such thought: for no man can affect his Fathers Kingdom, but he doth also desire his Fathers death, seeing that it is not permitted men to succeed those in the Kingdom who are yet alive. He alleadged moreover, that for his part he had had a care that they should want nothing convenient for a kind Father to provide for Princely Children, neither ornaments, nor followers, nor delights: that also he had provided for them H wives of Noble race, and had married one of them unto his Sisters Daughter, and the other unto Archelaus his Daughter King of Cappadocia: and which was the greatest matter of all, he had not used the authority of a father against them after these their enterprizes, but brought them unto Cæsar their common benefactor; and that forsaking his own right of a father, who had been injured, or of a King, against whom treason had been wrought, he was now content to debate his matter with them before such a Judge, as well knew how to decide the thing in question according to right and equity: yet requested he him that the offence of theirs might not be left unpunished, nor he forced to lead the rest of his life still in perpetual fear: seing that it was expedient that they should never see light again after such hainous offences, and to escape unpunished, after the violating of all laws of God and nature. I Herod having with a vehement voice objected these accusations against his Sons before Cæsar; the young men were not able to abstain from tears whilest he was yet speaking, and having ended his speech, they wholly resolved into tears: not for that they were guilty of those impieties laid unto their charge, but for that they were accused by their father, against whom it was not decent to speak freely for themselves, nor expedient to refuse to defend their own cause. Wherein they remained doubtful what to do, moving the auditors to pity them by their tears and lamentations, and careful withal lest it should be thought that their guilty conscience did trouble them, that they were not able to speak in their own defence, seeing that indeed it was their want of skill and tender years, by reason whereof they were so amazed. Which also Cæsar well perceived, and all that were present were so moved to K compassion, that neither their father who was their accuser could long refrain from being moved hereat to compassion.

Alias, chap. 9. Alexander and Aristobulus move all that were present, even their father and accuser to tears and compassion.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Alexanders defence, and how the two Brethren were reconciled unto their Father Herod.

THen the young men perceiving both their Father and Cæsar to relent, and they that were present partly to pity them, partly to shed tears of compassion: the one of them named Alexander, who was the elder, framing his speech unto his Father, began thus to purge himself of the Crimes objected against them: L

Alexander speaketh in his own, and his Brothers defence.

My Father, how well and friendly minded thou art toward us, this present judgment declareth: for hadst thou determined any heavy sentence against us, thou wouldest not have brought us before him, who is the preserver of us all: for thou mightest being a King, or for thy authority over us as a father, have punished us for our offence according to thy power; but in that thou hast brought us to Rome, and made Cæsar our Judge, it is argument that thou seekest to save us: for no man brings any one to the Temple whom he purposeth to destroy: which greatly aggravateth our cause, who do censure our selves unworthy to live, rather than to incur an opinion of impiety committed against thee such a father. How far more expedient is it to die guiltless, than to live suspected of such offences? Wherefore, if truth be our patron, we shall be happy either by thy own judgment, or M for that we have escaped danger: but if calumniations do prevail against us, it is superfluous and to no purpose that we live. For what good will it do us, if we live in continual suspicion? It is a probable accusation to accuse our years, as having affected the Kingdom; and our unfortunate Mothers calamity maketh it seem more probable. But consider I beseech thee, if the same crime may not as well be framed against any one whomsoever, as against us. For any King having Children by a wife that is now dead, may if it please him suspect them, as practising treason against him their father. But suspicion is not sufficient to prove a man impious and guilty: wherefore bring any one forth that can tell any argument of this crime by us to have been attempted, which may add credit to this calumniation;

Can

A Can any man ſhew that poiſon was prepared by us for you; or that we conſpired with any; or that we corrupted any ſervants with money and gifts; or that we writ any letters againſt thee? yet may calumniation fain every one of theſe upon no occaſion. It is a grievous matter, for diſcord to be in a Princes Court; and the hope of dominion, which your Majeſty affirmed to be the reward of piety, doth often impell mens mindes unto hainous offences. But although it be moſt certain that we cannot be convicted of any crime; yet how can we clear our ſelves from accuſations forged againſt us, before them that will not hear us? But did we ſpeak ſome inſolent words; yet were they not againſt thee, O my father (for that had been impiety) but againſt them who tell all they hear. We bewailed our mothers misfortunes. It is true: but not becauſe ſhe is dead, but becauſe after her death ſhe is evill ſpoken of by thoſe, who ought not to do it. We affect the Kingdom B of our father, he being yet alive. Wherein? Is not that purpoſe of ours vain and frivolous, we having already been graced with Kingly honours? And ſuppoſe we were not; yet might we hope for them. But could we expect them with killing of thee, whom both earth and ſeas would diſdain after ſo execrable an offence? Or could we have expected that the loyalty of thy ſubjects, and the laws of our nation would have permitted us, having gotten the Kingdome by murthering our father; to have enjoyed the ſame, and entred into the holy Temple, which thou didſt repair: Or ſuppoſe we deſpiſed them all; yet could any one that murthered thee eſcape, Cæſar being living? Thy Children by thee begotten are not ſo impious nor fooliſh, though more infortunate, than thy eſtate requires. And ſeeing thou haſt nothing to accuſe us of, or nothing to prove any accuſation laid unto C our charge, how canſt thou be perſwaded that we are guilty of ſuch inhumane acts? Is it becauſe our mother was put to death? But her death ought rather to have made us more wary, than inſolent and raſh. We could ſpeak more in our own defence, than this, but what need is it to excuſe that, which was never done? Wherefore we beſeech Cæſar (who is Lord of all, and now our Judge) only this, that if thou canſt, O my father, put away out of thy mind all ſuſpicion of us, to ſuffer us to live hereafter, how unhappy and unfortunate ſoever: for what is more miſerable, than to be raſhly accuſed without cauſe? But if thou canſt not, we living, live without fear of us, let us die condemned by our own cenſure, For our lives are not ſo dear unto us that we deſire to keep them to his moleſtation that beſtowed them upon us.

The year of the world, 3906. before Chriſts Nativity, 8.

Cæſar with theſe words, though before not greatly crediting ſuch accuſations and ſlanders laid againſt them, was now more moved to beleeve that they were guiltleſs, and the rather, D for that fixing his eyes upon Herod, he perceived him alſo to be much moved, and all that were preſent were ſorrowful for the young men: ſo that all courtiers preſent thought hardly of the King, for the abſurd and frivolous accuſation framed againſt them; and the flower of their age, wherein they were now endangered, moved all mens mindes what they could to aſſiſt them: And much more were they incited, after that Alexander had ingenuouſly refuted his fathers accuſations, the accuſed remaining ſtill in the ſame habit and place, and for grief fixing their eies upon the ground. At laſt ſome hope appeared, ſo that the King himſelf ſeemed to need ſome excuſe, for having ſo raſhly accuſed his ſonnes, without any certain proof of his accuſations. At laſt, Cæſar having a while deliberated with himſelf, pronounced that the young men were innocent, and guiltleſs of the crimes laid unto their charge: yet E herein they were culpable, in that they had ſo behaved themſelves, that they gave their father occaſion herein to ſuſpect them. And as for Herod, he requeſted him to lay aſide all ſuſpicion, and to be reconciled to his Children. For it was unjuſtly done of him to beleeve ſuch forged accuſations againſt thoſe whom he had begotten, and that one might recompenſe another in time to come for their former offences, and renew the good will between them in times paſt, if to aboliſh all ſuſpicions, either did hereafter ſhew himſelf more friendly to other than before. Cæſar having thus admoniſhed the young men they prepared themſelves to intreat their Fathers wonted favour: he not expecting ſo long, came and embraced each of them one after another, they weeping exceedingly; and all thoſe that were preſent, both ſervants and others did the like.

All men do pity the young men.

Cæſar pronounceth the young men herein to have offended, that they gave occaſion of ſuſpicion, and he exhorteth the Father to be reconciled to his Children.

Herod is reconciled to his Children.

F Then giving humble thanks unto Cæſar, they departed together: and Antipater with them, counterfeiting himſelf to congratulate their good hap, for that they were now reconciled unto his Father. Within a few daies after, Herod gave Cæſar three hundreth talents, who was now beſtowing his gifts and preſents at Rome, and exerciſing his liberality upon the people. And Cæſar again beſtowed upon him halfe of the revenues out of the Mines of the metall in Cyprus; and the other half unto the overſeer thereof; and gracing him otherwiſe alſo, he gave him leave to chooſe which of his ſonnes he pleaſed for to ſucceed him in his Kingdom; or if he had rather, to diſtribute it amongſt them all: which Herod preſently would have done, but Cæſar would not permit him, affirming, that during his life he ſhould keep it all whole and undivided, and his ſonnes ſhould be ſubject unto him.

Antipater friendly doth congratulate his bretheren returned into his Fathers favour.

Herod did give Cæſar 300. talents.

Cæsar gave Herod halfe his revenues out of the Mines of Cyprus.

The rebels are conquered.

After this, Herod returned again into Judæa, in whose absence the Trachonites, that were no small part of his Kingdome, were revolted, yet by the industry of the Captains he left to oversee all in his absence, they were conquered again, and forced to do as they were commanded. As Herod and his sonnes were sailing towards home, arriving at Eleusa a City of Cilicia, which is now called Sabaste, he found Archelaus there, who was King of Cappadocia. Archelaus did courteously entertain Herod, and was very joyfull that his sonnes and he were made friends, and that Alexander his sonne in Law had so well cleared himself and his brother of the crimes laid unto their charge. And so each one bestowing upon the other princely gifts, they departed taking their leave one of the other. After this, Herod being newly returned into Judæa, and calling the people together into the Temple, told them all that had past in his absence from them, and the courtesy of Cæsar: and told them also of other affairs that he thought meet for them to know; and turning the latter end of his speech unto his sonnes, and exhorting the courtiers and common people to concord, he told them that his sonnes should reign after him, and first of all Antipater: and after him his sonnes that he had by Mariamme, Alexander and Aristobulus; in the mean time every one of them should honour him as King and Lord, nothwithstanding his old age, which for long experience was the fitter to govern, seeing there was nothing in him wanting to keep both his subjects and Children in their obedience; and that the souldiers also if they only respected him, should live in all happinesse and felicity without molestation. Having thus spoken, he dismissed the people; some thinking he had spoken according to equity; others thinking clean contrary: For having now as it were caused an emulation amongst his Children, there was as it were already a shew of some mutation.

How Herod having finished Cæsarea, for joy thereof did celebrate every first year certain sports.

The year of the world, 3957. before Christs Nativitie, 7.

Hegesip. & Ruffinus, chap. 5. al. 10.

Cæsarea is finished.

Quinquennale certamen.

ABout this time Cæsarea was finished, the tenth year after it was begun to be built, the 28. year of Herods reign, in the 192. Olympiade. In the dedication hereof, there was great pomp and sumptuous preparations: for all Musicians were brought thither to strive one with another, who was most excellent in their Art; and Champions that wrastled being naked and anointed with oyle: there was also a great many that fought with swords, and a great number of savage Beasts; and all things else that at such times were used, and in account, either at Rome or in other Countries. These sports were also consecrated unto Cæsar, and were to be renewed every fifth year. All this provision the King at his own cost and charges provided to be brought from any place whatsoever, to shew the greatnes of his magnificence. Julia, Cæsars wife also bestowed much of her own to the furnishing hereof, and sent many precious things out of Italy; so that the worth of them all amounted unto five hundred talents. And a great company being gathered together to behold these sports, he received all Embassadours sent unto him from other nations, to thank him for the benefits he had bestowed on them; and he lodged, feasted and sported them: and being all day long amongst the people to see those sports, at night he received them with banquets, and shewing them his magnificence; and gained great praise and commendations for a worthy King. For, he in all things so provided, that the last was more pleasing and grateful than the first, and caused him to be more admired. And it is reported that Cæsar himself and Agrippa often did say, that Herods magnanimity was greater than his present revenues could bear, and that he well deserved an Empire, as big as all Syria and Egypt. These sports being ended, he builded another Town in a Field, called Capharsaba, choosing for it a watery soile fit for plants: the City was compassed with a river; and he also planted round about it a wood full of most goodly Trees. This Town he called Antipatris, after his fathers name Antipater. After which he also builded a castle about Jericho, called after his mothers name, Cypros which was very strongly defenced, and adorned within with rare and sumptuous edifices. And not forgetting his brother, he dedicated unto him most goodly buildings: for first he built a tower as big as Pharo in the City, in remembrance of his dead brother, and called it by his name Phasælus, which also was the strongest hold and defence in all the City. After this, he builded a Town near unto the vally of Jericho, as one goes towards the North, whereby the fields that before almost lay desart, were now tilled and inhabited by the townsmen; so that of them it was named Phasælus-field.

held. It were hard to recount all his liberality in particular shewed, both unto the Cities of Syria and Grecia, and all other places wheresoever he came: for he helped many, either by building publick places; or if there were any new works begun, and not finished for want of money, by giving them money to finish them; the chiefest among all which were, that he builded at his own cost and charge the Temple of Apollo at Rhodes; and gave them many talents of silver to build their ships. He also builded the greatest part of the publike houses and places in the City by Actium, which Cæsar built for the Nicopolitanes there inhabiting, and that with his own proper cost and charges. He also for the Antiochians inhabiting the greatest City of Syria, builded Porches on each side of the greater street, that goeth quite thorow the midst of the City, and doth as it were part it into two; and the street it self that lay open, he paved with polished stone; which work was, as great a commodity to the inhabitants, as a beauty unto their City. He also helped to maintain the sports at Olympus with yearly revenews, that now for want of maintenance began to decay: so that by his means there were more solemn sacrifices, and all things more sumptuous to please them that came to behold them: for which his liberality he was declared perpetual Master and Maintainer of those sports. It is admirable to see in one man such diversity of minds: for on the one side, if we respect his liberality and beneficence towards all men, we must needs say, he was of a most free and bountiful nature; contrariwise, if we consider the injuries and cruelty he shewed against his subjects and dearest friends, we must confess him to have been a hard man, and intractable, and who passed all bounds of modesty; so that we would think him to have been of two contrary dispositions. But I am otherwise perswaded, and think that both these did proceed from one matter: for because he thirsted after glorie and honour, and wholly applyed himself thereunto, he became liberal wheresoever he was, in hope, either to reap present thanks for his labour, or a future remembrance. Wherefore spending above his revenewes for this matter, he was forced to be chargeable unto his subjects: for it was necessary that he, that so lavishly bestowed such huge sums of money upon others, should some where get it, though with evil means. Lastly, seeing himself for such like injuries hated of his subjects, he thought it a hard matter to get their good wills: which he could do no waies else, but by remitting the tribute they paid him. Wherefore he abused the hatred of his people for his own commodity: for if any one of them did not tolerate that slavery wherein they lived, or did endeavour to shake off the yoke of his dominion, against such he used a marvellous cruelty; and outraged them no less, than as if they had been his enemies, neither respecting friendship nor kindred; for that he desired alone to be honoured of all men. And how greedy of honour he was, we may guess by the honours he did unto Cæsar, Agrippa, and others of their friends: for he desired to be an example to his subjects, that as he himself honoured men better than himself: so they should all honour him likewise: thereby declaring what thing he did naturally most desire. But the Jews religion doth not permit them licence to honour Potentates, who of necessity ought to have greater care and respect of right and equity, than of such officiousness toward superiours: for it was disprofit enough unto the Jews, that they could not with Statues and Temples obtain the Kings favour, and with like flatteries satisfie the fond appetites of a vainglorious man. And this seemeth to me to be the reason that Herod was unjust, and hard towards his friends, and to those whom he made partakers of his counsels and enterprizes; and frank and bountiful towards strangers.

CHAP. X.

Of the Embassage of the Cyrenian and Asian Jews unto Cæsar.

THe Asian and Cyrenian Jews were greatly afflicted by the Citizens of those Countries, who having had the same priviledges granted unto them by the antient Kings that the Citizens had, were now greatly injured by the Greeks: as though they carried money out of the Countrey, and were prejudicial unto the rest of the inhabitants. And the Greeks making no end of these their injuries, they were constrained by Embassadours to complain of them unto Cæsar: who wrote unto every Province, that it was his pleasure that the Jews should enjoy like priviledges with the other inhabitants of the Countrey. The copy of which writing we have here set down, that it may the better appear how the Roman Emperours of antient times were affected unto our Nation.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10. The Jews of Asia and Cyrene being afflicted by the inhabitants there, send an Embassage to Cæsar, and obtain of him immunity.

The yea. of the world, 3957. before Christs Nativity, 7.

(Cæsar Augustus Pont. Max. Trib. potestatis, thus decreeth. For as much as the Nation of the Jews hath alwaies been trusty unto the Romans, not only at this day, but also in all former ages, and especially in the time of our father Cæsar the Emperour, under Hircanus their high Priest: I have ordained, that according to the common sentence of the Senate, they shall live after their Countrey-Laws, under which they lived in the time of Hircanus the high Priest of God: and that their Temple shall retain the right of a Sanctuary, and that it shall be lawful for them to send votive money unto Jerusalem by certain persons; and that they shall not be compelled to appear before any Judge upon their Sabbath dayes, or the day before their Sabbaths, after nine of the clock upon the preparation day. And if any one be known to steal the holy books, or holy money laid up in their places appointed for religion, he shall be guilty of sacrilege: and his goods shall be confiscate unto the treasury of the people of Rome. I also decree for the good will I bear unto all men, that their memorial or request offered unto me by C. Marcus Censorinus, shall together with this my edict be published in that famous place, which all Asia hath dedicated unto my name, to wit, Argyra. And if any shall be so hardy, as to do contrary to our decree, he shall be punished extraordinarily. This was engraven in a pillar in Cæsars Temple. Cæsar wisheth health unto Norbanus Flaccus. Let it be lawful for all Jews whersoever living, to carry their sacred money unto Jerusalem, according to their antient custome, and that no man should forbid them so to do: and this did Cæsar write in favour of the Jews.

Agrippa writes unto the Rulers of Ephesus, in the Jews behalf, and to Syllanus and the Magistrates of Cyrenia.

Agrippa also wrote in the Jews behalf, as followeth, Agrippa: wisheth health unto the Magistrates, Senate, and people of Ephesus: I will that the Jews living in Asia keep their sacred money, which according to the custome of their Countrey, they are wont to send unto Jerusalem: and if any one shall steal their holy money, that the same person, if he flie to a Sanctuary, shall be violently taken away from thence, as a sacrilegious person, and delivered unto the Jews to be punished. He also wrote unto Syllanus the Magistrate, that the Jews might not be constrained upon their Sabbaths to appear before a Judg. M. Agrippa wisheth health to the Cyrenian Magistrates and Senate. The Jews inhabiting amongst you, for whom Augustus hath already written unto Flavius the President of Libia, and unto other Magistrates of that province, are not to be hindred from sending their holy money to Jerusalem, as their custome is: and they have now complained unto me; that they are molested by the false accusations of some bad people, and forbidden to do it under pretence of a certain tribute, which nothwithstanding they are not to pay. Wherefore I command that they may be permitted to live after their custome, and free some all such matters: and if in any of your Cities any sacred money of theirs be intercepted, that by certain persons which you know to be fit for that purpose, ye make choice of them, to send it again unto the Jews. Item C. Norbanus Flaccus proconsul: Health unto the Magistrates of Sardinia: Cæsar hath written unto me, commanding that no man hinder the Jews, according to their custome, to send sacred money unto Jerusalem: wherefore I also write unto you of the same, that you may not be ignorant both of my will and Cæsars also. Moreover, Julius Antonius proconsul did also write to this effect: Health unto the Magistrates, Senate and people of Ephesus. The Jews of Asia in the Ides of February, I sitting in the judicial seat at Ephesus, signified unto me that Cæsar Augustus and Agrippa have permitted them to use their countrey-customes; and every one, according as he thinketh good, to contribute his first-fruits for religion sake, to be carried without let or hinderance unto the Temple of the most mighty God: and they desired me to ratifie by my consent, that which they had alredy granted them by the above named Emperours. Wherefore I would have you to know, that I also, according unto Cæsars and Agrippas decrees and ordinances, do permit and grant them also to do all things they please, according to their countrey-customes, forbidding any man to hinder them therein.

I have thought good to annex these decrees, for that I know, that these my writings will come unto the Grecians hands, that I may shew them, that in former ages we were so esteemed of the publike Magistrates, that none were permitted to hinder us from using our countrey-rites and ceremonies, and that by their consent we worshiped God in our own religion which I do inculcate the oftner, that I may move strange and forein nations, and take away their hatred conceived against us, which is without all reasonable cause. For no nation doth alwaies use the same customes, but almost whole Towns among them do sometimes alter and differ from the rest; yet is justice equally to be distributed unto all men; which is most profitable, as well to the Greeks, as to other barbarous nations, which is greatly observed in our laws; which if we follow and violate not, are able to make all nations love us. Wherefore we request all men, not to despise us, for that we differ from them in religion; but favour us in

A in that we follow virtue. For this is common to all nations; and without this, mans life cannot ſtand. But I will now return unto my hiſtory.

CHAP. XI.

How Herod, having need of money, opened Davids Sepulchre.

Herod ſpending laviſhly much and many ſums of money, both at home and abroad, hearing that Hircanus who reigned before him, opened Davids Sepulchre, & took out of it three thouſand talents of ſilver, and that there was left yet far more, able to defray any great charges whatſoever, he long time purpoſed to do the like. And at this time in the night ſeaſon accompanied only with his moſt truſty friends, being very wary that none of the people ſhould know of it, he entred into the ſepulchre; but he found no money there, as Hircanus did; but he took from thence a great company of precious attires and ornaments of Gold, whereby he was inticed to make a more diligent ſearch: and he ſent two of his company for the nonce into the inner part of the Sepulchre, where the bodies of Solomon and David were intombed; who were there loſt, and as it is reported, fire came out of thoſe ſecret places and conſumed them. Whereat Herod being terrified, departed out of it; and moved with religion to make ſatisfaction he builded a moſt ſumptuous monument of white marble, at the entrance into the Sepulchre: of which building Nicholaus alſo a writer of that time, maketh mention; but he ſpeaketh not how they went into the Sepulchre of David, thinking that therein he ſhould not keep decorum, if he ſhould make mention thereof. Wherein he followed this accuſtomed order: for his writings were to come to the ears of the King yet living, wherein he did only curry favour, mentioning only that, that might redound unto the Kings credit: ſo that many of his open and wickel pranks, he did either colour under ſome other pretence, or elſe all waies poſſible he endeavoureth to hide them. For he doth as it were tell a tale of Herods cruelty againſt Mariamme and his ſonnes; as though he did thereby deſerve credit and praiſe, accuſing her of adultery, and them as Traitors unto their Father: and this he doth clean through his works, too much extolling the Kings good deeds, and too diligently excuſing his bad deeds and iniquities. But as I have ſaid, we muſt pardon him, who did not ſo much write to leave a memory of things done unto after ages, as to gratifie and pleaſe his King. But I, who come of the linage of the Aſmonian Kings, and execute the office of a Prieſt, account it a ſhame to lie: and do intend truly to recount the hiſtory of all things that were acted and done; yet with a reverence of the poſterity of that King, who do alſo now bear ſway and rule; yet with their pardon and leave, having a greater care to the verity of our hiſtory, than to them.

The deſire of gold.

Herod loſt two of his men in Davids Sepulchre.

Nicholaus the hiſtoriographer reproved.

Joſeph came of the Prieſtly line of the Aſmonians.

After the Sepulchre was thus violated, Herods houſe began to decay, whether revenge lighting upon that part which was already ſcarce ſound, or whether by meer chance ſuch calamity at that time befel him, as might juſtly be thought the reward of impiety. For there was a diſcord in the Court not unlike to civil wars, every one ſtriving againſt other with hatred and forged accuſations: but eſpecially Antipaters politick practice againſt his brethren was to be noted, who intangled them by other mens forged accuſations, himſelf oftentimes ſeemed to take upon him their defence, that making a ſhew of good will unto them, he might ſecretly oppreſs them the ſooner; and he did ſo craftily circumvent his father, that his father deemed him to be his only Conſerver. Wherefore the King commended Ptolomeus his Procurator unto Antipater his Son, and did communicate all his ſecrets unto his mother, ſo that all things were done according as they pleaſed, and they made him diſpleaſed with thoſe, againſt whom they knew the Kings diſpleaſure might redound unto their profit.

Antipaters crafty plotting againſt his brethren.

But Mariammes Children did every day ſtomach the matter more and more, diſdaining to give place unto their inferiour: and for their nobility not enduring to be removed from their places, and not to keep their indignity alſo, their wives did the like, and Alexanders wife Glaphyra who was the Daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia, did greatly envy and diſdain Salome, and ſhe alſo her again, both for the love that ſhe bare unto her husband, and for that ſhe diſdained (as women are wont) that her Daughter married unto Ariſtobulus, ſhould be in equal honour with her. Pheroras alſo the Kings brother had a hand in this other contention about a private cauſe of ſuſpicion and hatred. For he fell ſo fat in love with one of his maids, that he refuſed the Kings Daughter offered unto him, rather making choice of his maid. Herod took this in very ill part, ſeeing his brother (who had received ſo many benefits at his hands, and was almoſt his fellow in his Kingdome by his means) not to ſhew the like like brotherly affection to him again as he then ought, and himself to be an unhappy brother. And seeing he could not dissuade him from that madness, he married his Daughter unto Phaselus his Son: and afterward thinking that now his brothers mind towards his maid was satisfied, he complaining of his injurious dealing, in repulsing his Daughter offered unto him to wife, he now offered him another of his Daughters named Cypros. Then Ptolomeus advised Pheroras not still to contemn his brothers offer, and persist in such folly; telling him it was meer folly therefore to incur the Kings displeasure and hatred, and loss of tranquillity. Pheroras understanding this counsel profitable for him, having been once before injuriously accused, and obtained pardon at the Kings hands; sent away his maid, by whom he now had a Son, and promised the King to marry this his other Daughter, and appointed the thirteenth day after to celebrate his marriage, making a solemn Oath unto the King, never after that time to use the company of that woman whom he had put away. The time appointed being expired, he fell so far in love with the former woman, that he would not stand to his promise, but again accompanied with his maid.

Then Herod not able any longer to contain himself, used many speeches, whereby he evidently shewed his mind to be alienated from his brother. And there were many who taking hereat opportunity; did by forged calumniations encrease his alienation: so that now there was no day nor hour past, wherein he did not still hear some new alterations and stirs amongst his dearest friends; whom nature willed to combine themselves to maintain concord and amity. For Salome being now offended at Mariammes Children, did not permit her Daughter married unto Aristobulus, one of the young men, to enjoy mutual love and comfort of her husband, enticing her to bewray her husbands secret talke; and if he heard any small occasions of offence (as often it falleth out) she should the more aggravate them with suspicions, whereby she also learned all their secrets, and made the young woman hate her husband. And she to please her mother, recounted how that often when her husband and Alexander were alone, that then they were wont to talke of Marriamme their mother, and use reproachful words against their father; and threatning, that if they ever did obtain the Kingdome, they would make the Sons of the King, whom he had by other wives, Notaries and Town clarks, and so they might reap profit of their learning which they now studied for: and whensoever they saw any of the Kings wives wear any of Mariammes apparel, that then they vowed instead of that attire, to cloath them with sackcloth and shut them up where they should never see Sun. Salome presently told all this to the King: who though he were much grieved hereat, yet he chose rather to seek to amend it, than to punish them: for he was greatly incited against them by suspicion, and every day waxing worse and worse, at last he believed all the reports of any whomsoever. But he then contented only, sharply to chide his sons, and pacified with their excuses and answers, he for that time was quiet.

Salome inticed her Daughter to bewray her husbands secrets.

But presently the mischief was again set on foot: for Pheroras the Kings brother, meeting Alexander, who (as we have said) was Glaphyra her husband, who was Daughter to Archelaus, he told him that he heard by Salome, that Herod was far in love with Glaphyra, so that he could not shake off this affection. The young man hearing this, became jealous, and was in a great rage; and now what honour soever or gifts Herod for the love of his Son gave her, Alexander did interpret it in the worst sense, being now made jealous by that which he had heard of Pheroras; and not able to put up such injuries as he thought; he went unto his father, & with tears recounted unto him what Pheroras had told him. But Herod was hereat the more enflamed, not enduring himself falsly to be accused of so shameful a fact, inveighing against the great malice of his friends, who for his great good turns he did them, so rewarded him. And presently sending for Pheroras, very sharply began to chide him, saying: O most impious that liveth amongst men! art thou become so ungrateful, either to speak or think such a matter of us? Thinkest thou that I do not perceive thy drift; that thou spakest not these words unto my Son to discredit me, but also to the intent by this means thou mightest work some treason against me, and cause me to be poisoned? For who but a good Son, as this is, would suffer his father, suspected for such a matter, to live, and not to be revenged of him for such offence? Whether dost thou think that thou didst put these speeches into his mind, or by them a sword into his hand to kill his father withal? or what was thy intent, seeing thou hatest both him and his brother; and only counterfeiting good will toward me, to bely me, and to report that of me, that without impiety could not be thought: get thee hence, thou wretched imp, seeing thou hast thus abused thy brother, who hath well deserved at thy hands; and do as thou wilt all thy life time, myself will endeavour to be better unto my Children, than I have been, and neither will I punish them as they deserve, but I

Herod greatly moved against Pheroras, for affirming that he was in love with Glaphyra.

A will honour them above their merits. The King having discharged his choler against his brother Pheroras, and he being taken in a manifest fault, answered, that that report was first devised by Salome, of whom he heard it: which she (being then present) hearing, began to exclaime, saying, it was not her device, and that they all laboured to make the King hate her, and put her to death, being one who did especially wish him well: and what in her lay, seeking his safety, and that now he was in danger of more treason, than ever before: for (said she) I was the only cause that you did put away the woman, whom you so doted after, perswading you to marry the Kings Daughter: and this is the cause that you hate me. With these speeches tearing her hair, and striking her brest, she made a shew of innocency, but this her gesture was a colour to hide her bad intent. So Pheroras was left in

B great perplexity, not knowing what to say, or do; and finding no pretence to excuse his fact: for on the one side he confessed, that he told it unto Alexander, and on the other, he could not make Herod believe, that he heard it of Salome. This contention endured a good while: at last the King being wearied, sent away his Brother and his Sister: and greatly commending his Sons moderate mind, and that he had given him intelligence of those speeches, very late in the night, he went to supper.

The year of the world, 3957. before Christs Nativity, 7.

Salome excuseth herself.

The effect of calumniation.

After this contention, Salome was hardly thought of, because she was judged to be the author of this ill report, and the Kings wives wished evil unto her, because they knew her to be of strange qualities and hard to please, and so variable, that according to the time, one while she would profess friendship, and presently after hatred. Wherefore they still had

C something to inform Herod of against her, taking occasion hapning by chance, which was this: There was a King of the Arabians, named Obodas, a slothful man, and one given to idleness: and there was one Syllæus that did govern all his affairs; this man was a crafty fellow, and in the prime of his youth, and very beautiful. This Syllæus coming unto Herod about some business, and viewing Salome, who then sate at supper with him, began to set his mind upon her: and finding she was a widow, he entred into talk with her: and she finding her brother now not so friendly unto her, as before he had been, and also intangled with the beauty of this young man, did not greatly deny to marry him; and many Feasts being made at that time, they shewed evident signs of their mutual consent, and love one unto another. The Kings wives told the King of this in scoffing sort. Herod herewith not con-

D tented, demanded of Pheroras how the matter stood, and willed him at supper time to note if he could espy any tokens of familiarity betwixt them: and Pheroras told him that by signs and mutual viewing one another, they sufficiently shewed their intents. After this the Arabian being suspected, departed into his own Countrey. But two or three moneths after he came again into Judæa only for this purpose, and talked with Herod touching this matter, requesting him to let Salome be his wife: affirming that that affinity would be profitable unto him for the traffick between his people and the Arabians, whose Prince he was to be, and did already enjoy a great part of the Dominion. Herod told all this unto his Sister, and asked her, if she would marry him; and she answered, she would. Then they requested that Syllæus should become a Jew in religion, or else it was not lawful for him to marry her. He

E would not condescend hereunto, affirming that he should be stoned to death by his people, if he did it; and so he departed without obtaining his purpose. From that time forth, Pheroras, and especially the Kings wives accused Salome of intemperancy, affirming that she had had the company of the Arabian. Now Herod determined to marry his Daughter unto Salomes Son, whom Pheroras refused for the love of his maid, which Son of Salomes was her eldest that he had by Costabarus; and that to shew his good will toward Salome his Sister. But he was disswaded by Pheroras, who told him that the young man would never love such a father in law, because of his fathers death; perswading him rather to marry her to his eldest Son, who was to succeed him in his Tetrarchy, which he easily perswaded the King unto, and so obtained pardon for his former offence. Wherefore the spousals being changed, the maid

F was married unto the young man, who had a hundred talents in dowry with her, more than otherwise should have been given with her.

Syllæus the Arabian desiring Salome to wife, was denied.

Herod married his Daughter to Pheroras Son.

But all this while this dissension of Herods house did not cease, but rather increased, he having a shameful beginning, and coming to a sorrowful end. Herod had three Eunuches, whom he greatly esteemed for their beauty: one of them was his butler; the other his cook; and the third his chamberlain: whom also he was wont to employ in serious affairs of his Kingdom. Some one or other informed the King, that these three Eunuches were corrupted by his Son Alexander with great sums of money, and being upon tortures examined, if they had accompanied with him, they confessed all: yet they affirmed that they knew no practise of his attempted against his father. But their torments being increased by Antipaters favourites, they were forced to confess that Alexander secretly hated his Father, and he exhorted them to forsake H*rod*, who was now good for nothing; who dissembled his age by painting his face to make himself seem younger than he was, and colouring his head and beard black, which were already grown very white through age: but rather set their minds upon him, who would in despight of his father enjoy his Kingdom due unto him; and that then he would advance them to the highest honours of the Kingdom: for he had not only tittle unto it by his birth, but also was now prepared likewise to invade it; and that he had many of the Captains, of the souldiers, and many of the Kings friends on his side, who were prepared to do or endure any thing for his sake.

Herod hearing this, fear and anger did invade him, by reason that his sons words seemed both contumelious and threatning: and being for both these causes in a rage, he feared some greater matter to be put in practice against him, which he could not suddenly, and having so little warning, avoid; and not daring to make open inquiry, he set secret spies awork, to tell him how all matters stood, himself now mistrusting all men, and accounting it his security to mistrust all, even them that deserved it not: and not moderating his suspicious mind, now whosoever was the neerest unto him, was the most suspected, as of most power to injure him. As for others, that were but only named by his spies, he presently esteemed it his safety to put them to death. Then they of his household, every one being careful to save himself, were one turned against another, every one deeming it his own safety to prevent others, by accusing them unto Herod: which done, presently they incited other mens envy against him, and every one of them to desire such measure as they had measured unto others: and thus they also revenged their private Quarels; and presently after, they themselves were taken, and did by other mens means suffer the like, being entrapped in the same trap they set for their enemies. For, the King did quickly repent himself, because he had put very many to death, who were not convicted: yet for all that, he was not hereby admonished to beware of the like hereafter; but on his repentance for their death, raged so far, as to cause him to inflict the same punishment upon the accusers, which he had done upon them. So great trouble and fear then fell upon all the whole Court. He then commanded many of his dearest friends, and them especially whose fidelity he had beforetimes experienced, not to come in his sight, nor within his court-gates. For he did now shake off the friendship between Andromachus and Gemellus and himself, who were his antient friends; and oftentimes had gone Embassadours for him, and alwaies been of his counsel, and had been tutors unto his Children, in whom he had alwaies reposed more trust than in any others: the one of them, for that his Son Demetrius was familiar with Alexander; and Gemellus, for that he knew him to wish well unto Alexander: for he was one of them who had brought him up, and had aboad with him at his being at Rome. And no doubt but he had censured them with some more heavy sentence, had it not been that they were so eminent persons. Wherefore at that time he was contented to have banished them, and deprived them of all their authority, to the end, that having disgraced these good men, he might, the more freely play the Tyran. Antipater was the cause of all this mischief, who from the first time that he perceived his father to be fearful and suspicious, still after that joined with him as counseller, and as it were increased his rage and cruelty; and then he gallantly played his part, endeavouring, that whosoever would resist him, should be made away. Wherefore Andromachus and the rest of his friends being now banished the Court; the King presently tortured all that the imagined any way to favour Alexander, to see if they were guilty, or if they knew of any treason to be practised against him: but they knowing nothing to inform him of, died amidst their torments. Where he so much the more tortured others, for that contrary to his opinion, he found not so much as an evil thought against him; Antipater craftily interpreting it, that they had rather in torments conceal the truth, than to shew themselves not trusty to their masters and friends: wherefore many being taken, he caused them to be tortured to get something out of some of them. At last one amongst the rest, not able to endure those torments imposed upon him, said; that he had often heard Alexander say, so often as any one commended his goodly stature, or skilful shooting, and the rest of his virtues, that these qualities nature bestowed upon him, rather than other benefits; for his Father for envy hereat was offended: so that when he talked with him, he did upon purpose draw his body together, lest his father should perceive the tallness of his stature; and that when he went a hunting with him, he upon purpose did miss the mark, he could have hit, because he knew his father could not endure that he should be commended. And whilest these words were considered, and pondred, and his torments intermitted, he again accused Alexander to have conspired with his brother Aristobulus, to kill his Father when he was hunting, and then to flie with speed unto Rome,

Many were tortured and examined for Alexanders cause.

A Rome, and begge the Kingdom of Cæsar. There were also found some of this young mans letters written unto his brother, complaining of the injurious dealing of his father, who had given certain Grounds unto Antipater, the yearly revenues whereof amounted unto two hundred talents. Then Herod thinking himself to have probability enough, his former suspicion was now confirmed, and so he took Alexander and cast him in prison: and again he began to rage; nothwithstanding that himself did scarcely believe the informations against him: neither could he himself devise any cause wherefore they should seek to work treason against him. And those complaints seemed childish: neither was it probable that having openly killed his father, he would afterwards have gone to Rome. Wherefore endeavouring to find some stronger argument of his Sons impiety, and because he would not be thought B rashly to have committed his Son to prison, he caused the most noble and eminent of all Alexanders well-willers to be tortured, and they confessing no such matter as he expected, he put them to death.

Alexander being in prison, his freinds were tortured. One accused Alexander to have sent letters to Rome against his Father.

Whilest thus all the Court did resound with fear, torments, and contentions, a certain man accused Alexander to have sent letters to his friends at Rome, to intreat them to cause him to be sent for by Cæsar thither, that he might accuse his father of certain conspiracies against Cæsar, and how he more esteemed the friendship of Mithridates King of the Parthians, than the friendship of the Romans; affirming also, that he had poyson ready prepared at Ascalon. Herod hearing this, was comforted by the Parasites about him, as having not done any thing rashly; and so he gave now full credit unto all: yet the poyson was diligently C sought for, but could no be found. Alexander being now oppressed with this calamity, he yet took courage, and because he would more incite his fathers displeasure against him, he did not deny it: perhaps meaning to make his Father ashamed of himself, forgiving credit so easily unto forged tales; or at least, if he could not effect that, entangle all the Court and him too in calamity and misery: Which that he might the better do, he writ four little books, and sent them unto his father, telling him that it was needless to use any more torments, for indeed, treason was intended against him, and that Pheroras and his most trusty friends were herein conspirators: And that in the night time Salome came secretly unto him, and as it were forced him to lie with her; and that all of them aimed at this mark, to have him made away, that so they might enjoy their wished liberty. He also accused Ptolomeus D and Sapinnius of this conspiracie, who were more faithful unto their King, than all others: so that now these men, who before were most friendly one to another, began like mad men to rage one against another: and punishment so hastily pursued every one, that they had no leisure given them to speak in their own defence: neither was their punishment deferred till their cause was tried, and the truth known, that some were bound & imprisoned, other some presently put to death, other laughed in their sleeves to see that day, yet discontented for that any delay was used for their punishment: so that the Kings Court was now greatly defaced with sorrow and heavinesse, wherewith the wonted felicity thereof was destroyed. Herod himself amidst these calamities, could not but be weary of his life, who not daring to trust himself in any bodies hand, he was tormented with a daily and hourly fear of some E untimely death, that would befall him: and many times perswaded himself, that he did see his sons before him with a drawn sword ready to kill him; and this was his cogitation night and day, so that herewith he almost ran mad.

WHilest Herod was thus troubled in his mind, Archelaus King of Cappado- Hedio & Rufcia careful for his Daughter, and the young man his son in law, and pitying his F friend Herod entangled in such calamities; he thought it his duty to make a journey unto him. And finding him so affected as it was reported unto him before his comming, he thought it an unfit way to argue him of too much credulity and rashnes; perceiving that thereby he would be rather exasperated, so much the more labouring to excuse himself. Wherefore Archelaus devised another way to appease these troubles. Wherefore he counterfeited indignation against the young man, approving all the Kings actions for good; affirming that he would break the band of wedlock between his Daughter and Alexander, and that if the knew of the conspiracy, and did not inform the King thereof, himself would punish her. Then Herod, contrary to his expectation, seeing Archelaus so angry for the offence committed against him, began to remit his anger: and now with just con-consideration weighing what he had done, by little and little, he began to have a fatherly affection, and to be hereby moved to compassion; yet so oft as any one sought to excuse the young man, he grew to be very angry thereat: but when Archelaus also began to accuse him, then Herods heart relented, and he with tears besought Archelaus not to yeeld too much to anger, nor for the young mans offence break off the marriage. Then Archelaus perceiving him to relent, began to turn the matter against Herods friends, as the causes of all this mischief, who had corrupted the young man, who of himself was void of malice; and especially he aggravated the matter against Pheroras the Kings brother. Pheroras having now incurred the Kings displeasure, perceived that none could so soon reconcile him unto the King, as Archelaus; wherefore clothed in black, and making other signs, as though he despaired of his life, he went unto him; who did not deny to help him what he could: yet he told him that it was no easy matter for him to pacify the King so highly offended, perswading him rather himself to go unto the King his brother, and crave pardon of him; confessing himself to have been cause of all this mischief; by which confession of his the Kings wrath would be greatly appeased, and so he also should have better occasion to entreat for him. Pheroras followed his counsel, which fell out happily for them both: for the young man, contrary to any ones expectation, was freed from all his troubles, and Archelaus made Pheroras and Herod friends; and he himself having now gotten great friendship of the King in those his adverse and troublous times of his, he returned joyfully into Cappadocia, being rewarded with rich gifts, and being accounted of, as Herods chiefest friend. They also agreed amongst themselves, that Herod should go to Rome, because he had already written unto Cæsar, concerning this matter: and they both went together unto Antiochia, and there Herod reconciled Titus the President of Syria unto Archelaus and so he returned into Judæa.

How the Trachonites revolted.

The year of the world, 3956. before Christs Nativitie, 8.

WHilest Herod going to Rome was absent from his kingdome, the Arabian Wars began, hereby taking an occasion: The inhabitants of Trachon, whose Countrey Cæsar taking from Zenodorus gave it unto Herod, being forbidden and hindred from stealing, were now forced to frame themselves to live like husband-men in more civility, than before: but this kind of life pleased them not; neither did their Country yeeld fruits worth their labours; yet at first Herod compelling them thereunto, they abstained from injuring the inhabitants bordering upon them, which did greatly redound unto Herods credit, by whose diligence they were brought unto it. But when Herod was sailed into Italy to accuse Alexander, and to commend Antipater unto Cæsar, the Trachonites hearing a bruit of his death, revolted and turned to their accustomed robberies: Yet were they at that time again subdued in the Kings absence by the Captains that he left at home; and fourty of the chiefest of the theeves amongst them being taken, the rest terrified by their example left their own Counrrey, and fled into Arabia, where Syllæus received them, in revenge that he could not obtain Salome for his wife, and receiving of him a strong hold to dwell in, they did not only make incursions, and rob and spoil the borders of Judæa, but also of Cœlosyria, and drave away the preys they got, into the place allotted them, Syllæus protecting them and their villanies. Herod returning from Rome, found that his people were greatly endamaged by these theeves: and seeing he could not subdue them, by reason the Arabians did protect them, not enduring that injury, and entering into Trachon, he killed all their families: whereby they were so much the more enraged against his Countrey, for they had a law amongst them, whereby they were commanded to revenge the death of their families, and so contemning all dangers, they came and wasted all Herods countrey with continual incursions. Then the King complained hereof unto Saturninus and Volumnius then Presidents sent thither by Cæsar; requesting that he might have the theeves to punish them. They hearing this news, with as much speed as they might, gathered their forces together, and making themselves stronger, than they were before, with sudden incursions wasted all where they came, destroying both the fields and villages, and killing all they could find; so that now this resembled a War, rather than a robbery: for now they were a thousand in number. Wherefore Herod required these theeves and robbers to be delivered unto him, and required the debt that Obodas ought him, for Herod had lent Obodas threescore talents, and sent them unto him by Syllæus, and now the time was expired wherein the money was to be repayed. But Syllæus, who had taken all the rule from Obodas, & himself now governed all, denied that those theeves were in Arabia, and deferred the payment of the money: so

How Herod went into Arabia with an army.

B WHen the day was come that was appointed, Syllæus not minded to stand unto the agreement made, went in the mean time to Rome; But Herod exacted his money, and the theeves to be restored unto him, Saturninus and Volumnius permitting him with force of Arms to persecute those obstinate people; so he levying an army, went into Arabia, in three dayes space going as far as ordinarily men are wont to march in seven, and coming unto the Castle wherein the theeves kept, at the first on-set he took it and destroyed it, being called Repta, and did no other harme unto the inhabitants. And a Captain of the Arabians, named Nacebus, came to succour the theeves, and so fought with Herods army, in which battel a few of Herods men were slain, but of the Arabians were slain five and twenty, with their General, and the rest were put to flight. Being thus re-
C venged upon the theeves, he led three thousand Idumæans into Trachon to keep the inhabitants from robbing, and sent letters unto the Romane Governours, who abode in Phœnicia, that he had only used the authority which they gave him against the rebellious Arabians that resisted him, and nothing else: which afterward also, they making enquiry, they found true.

How Syllæus accused Herod unto Cæsar.

D BUt then were messengers hastily sent unto Syllæus at Rome, and informed him otherwise, aggravating every thing according to their fashion. Syllæus being new before insinuated into Cæsars acquaintance, by chance was then also about the Palace; and hearing these news, he presently changed his apparel, and clothing himself in black, he went in this manner unto Cæsar, informing him how Arabia was afflicted with wars, and that the whole Kingdome was wasted by Herod, who had entred into the Countrey with an army, and with Tears complained that 2000. and 500 of the Arabian nobility were slain, and amongst them his friend and kinsman Nacebus, and great riches were taken away, which were laid up at Repta, and that all this was done in contempt of Obodes who had no army ready, nor a fit Captain for his forces, he being not there, Syllæus having thus spoken, adding moreover, that he would not have come to Rome, but that he was per-
E swaded that Cæsar would have had a care of the common peace, and tranquillity of his subjects, and that had he been at home, Herod to his cost should have violated that peace: Cæsar hereat was greatly moved, and enquired of some of Herods friends, who were then present, and of certain men that were lately come out of Syria also, whether Herod had led an army out of the limits of his own Kingdome. Which they not denying, and Cæsar not vouchsafing to hear the cause why, his displeasure against Herod was greatly increased, so that he writ threatning letters unto him; telling him that hitherto he had used him as a friend, but hereafter he would use him as a subject; which also Syllæus signified unto the Arabians. By which letters of his they were made proud, and would neither render unto him the theeves that were escaped, nor restore the money he lent their King; nor pay him rent for the pa-
F sture ground that they hired of him; boulstering themselves herewith, that the King had offended Cæsar. Moveover, the Trachonites hearing this, rebelled against the garrison of the Idumæans; and joyning with the Arabian theeves, who wasted their Countrey, not so much respecting their own gain as their revenge and particular profit, they did many mischiefs, and exercised great cruelty against them. Herod did put up all injuries, and durst not once mutter, Cæsar being offended at him; for the which cause he was not so couragious nor valiant as before. For first of all, Cæsar would not admit his Embassadours, whom he sent to plead his cause before Cæsar, and Herod again sending other Embassadours, Cæsar sent them back again, their business undone.

did easily perswade Cæsar any thing; for that Cæsar was now very credulous; and Syllæus aimed at some greater matter. For Obodas dying, Eneas succeeded him in the Kingdom of Arabia, changing his name, called himself Aretas: whom Syllæus by forged calumniations did seek to depose from the Crown, and usurp the Kingdome unto himself, giving great sums of money unto the Courtiers, and promising great sums unto Cæsar; whom he now perceived to be angry against Aretas, for that without his consent he presumed to take upon him the government of the Kingdom. But at last he also sent letters and gifts unto Cæsar, and amongst the rest a Crown of Gold worth many talents, and in those letters he accused Syllæus, who as an impious and disloyal servant had poisoned his King Obodas; in whose life-time he had also invaded the Government of the Kingdom, committing adultery with the Arabians wives, getting together other mens money, thereby to obtain the Kingdom. Cæsar would not permit these Embassadors to have audience; but refusing their gifts, suffered them to depart without obtaining that they came for. In the mean time the affairs of Judæa and Arabia every day became worse and worse, every one seeking to trouble the estate of both Kingdomes, and no man endeavouring to quiet them. For the King of Arabia was not yet established in his Kingdom, and therefore could not controul his subjects. And Herod feared that if he did defend himself, he should so much the more incite Cæsar against him; and so was forced to put up all injuries that were done unto him: and finding no end of his miseries, he finally determined to send again to Rome Embassadours, to see if by the help of his friends, Cæsar might be perswaded to think better of him, and so committed that Embassage unto Nicholaus of Damasco, and sent him to Rome.

CHAP. XVI.

Hegesip. & Ruffinus, chap. 11. al. 17.

AT this time the dissention of Herods house was much increased; and although at all other times his Court was never void of suspicion, which is a pernitious evil to Kings and Princes, yet at that time especially this mischief was in his principal vigor and force. For one Eurycles a Lacedemonian and a noble man of his Countrey, but having a turbulent wit given over to flattery and pleasure, yet cunningly dissembling both vices, coming unto Herod and giving him gifts, and receiving greater gifts at his hands, was by him courteously entertained; and familiarly conversing with him, brought it so to pass that he was received amongst his especial friends. This Eurycles lodged at Antipaters house; being also familiar with Alexander for their often meeting one another: for he said that Archelaus King of Cappadocia and himself was great friends, and therefore he counterfeited himself to reverence Glaphyra very much; and all men judging him indifferent unto all parties, he diligently noted whatsoever past, and every word that was spoken, seeking by all means he could, matter to gratifie others carrying of tales, and with such flattering fair speeches he insinuated himself into every mans friendship, that he seemed as Alexanders sole trusty friend, and to use other men as it behoved a friend. And by this his deceit, he so insinuated himself into Alexanders favour, that the young man thought him to be his only friend, unto whom he might impart his secrets; so that Alexander opened unto him his grief, for that his father was something alienated from him, and recounted unto him his mothers misfortune, and that Antipater had now gotten all authority and dignity from him and his brother, and was the only man that could do all; and that these injuries were no longer tolerable, their father being now incited against them, that now he would neither admit them unto his counsels, nor banquets. And he committed his griefs (as he then thought) into his friends bosom. But Eurycles told Antipater all, affirming that though it nothing concerned him, yet he could not but speak of it for the greatness of the danger then imminent, willing him to beware of Alexander, who did not stick openly to shew what mind he bare, but did as it were manifestly shew that he desired to make away his father. Which done, he received of Antipater most rich gifts, and pledges of his good will towards him; and finally he was by him perswaded to relate his news himself unto Herod. The King lent a greedy ear whilest he recounted Alexanders malice; and was so moved with the circumstances of speeches, that he conceived a deadly hatred against his Son, which also without further delay he did make manifest: for he rewarded Eurycles for his pains with fifty talents. Which he having received, went unto Archelaus, and talking and speaking well of Alexander, recounted unto him in what stead he had stood him in reconciling him unto his Father: and receiving of him also a sum of money, he departed before his malice was discovered, and returned into his Countrey, and using the like shifts

there

A there also, he was finally by his Countrey-men banished from Lacedemonia. Furthermore, Herod not content now, as before he was, to hear only that which was told him of Alexander and Aristobulus, did now himself also conceive a proper hatred against them, himself observing all things, and making diligent enquiry though no man accused them, and permitting all men to speak what they list against them. And amongst the rest, Evaratus of Cous had conspired with Alexander, and he seemed now to hear no talk more willingly, than this, and such like. But then greater misfortunes, than all the rest befell the young men; false accusations never ceasing to be forged against them, and every one as it were, striving to accuse them of some crime or other unto the King, pretending the care they bare of his safety. Herod had two Champions, Jucundus and Tyrannus; both acceptable and grateful unto him,
B for their strength and tall stature and bigness of body: these two for some offence were banished the Court, and received into Alexanders service, and placed amongst his stipendary horsemen, and for that they were very active, he bestowed many gifts and much Money upon them. Whereat the King presently conceiving suspicion, began to torture them, and after many torments they confessed that Alexander had hired them to kill Herod, as he was a hunting wilde beasts: for so it might easily be bruited abroad, that he falling off his horse, fell upon his own lance, and so was slain: which once before had almost happened unto him. They also declared unto him, that certain gold was hiddden and buried in the stable: and they also accused Herods chief Huntsman, that at Alexanders command he had given Alexandes servants the Kings Lances and his Armour. After them the Prefect of the castle of
C Alexandrium, was taken and examined upon tortures, and it was objected against him, that he promised to receive them into the Castle, and to deliver unto them the Kings Treasure there. But he denying it, his own Sonne affirmed all to be true, and brought forth letters to testifie the same, resembling Alexanders hand written to this effect: So soon as by Gods assistance we have done that which we intend to do, we will presently come unto you: be careful therefore, that according to your promise you do receive us into your Castle. Herod having had a view of these Letters, did now without any hesitation believe, that indeed some treacherous practice was plotted against him by his Sonnes. But Alexander affirmed, that Diophantus the Scribe had counterfeited his hand, and that the Letter was Antipaters device. For Diophantus was accounted cunning in such matters, and afterward being taken
D with the like, he was therefore put to death. And the King produced them that had been tortured at Jericho before the people to accuse his sonnes, where they were stoned to death, and the people hereat moved, would also have killed Alexander and Aristobulus, with the same death. But Herod, by the means of Ptolemeus and Pheroras did restrain them, and commanded the young men to be cast into prison, and there to be kept so streight that no man was admitted unto them; but many spies were set, who should narrowly mark all their actions and words; and now they were accounted as condemned men, both by other mens opinions, and also by their own. One of them; to wit, Aristobulus, for grief inviting his Aunt, and Mother in law to compassionate his present calamity, and to hate him that was the author hereof, affirmed that she also was in great danger, being accused, in hope to marry with Syllæus, to E have signified unto him by Letters all that past in Herods Court. Which words the woman presently came and recounted unto her brother Herod. The King no longer able to bridle his fury, commanded them both to be bound and kept in several places, one from another and each of them to write what they had plotted against their father: and being thus commanded, they wrote that they neither prepared treason, nor yet thought of any treason against him, only they purposed to flie, because they perceived that they could no longer live here, because they were so suspected and in continual care. At that time a Prince of Cappadocia came Embassadour from Archelaus, named Mela, who was one of the greatest Lords of the Countrey: and Herod willing to shew his Sonnes malice, he sent for Alexander out of prison, commanding him to recount how and after what order, or whither they meant
F to flie: he answered unto Archelaus who had also promised them to send them to Rome; but that they had no further intent or purpose to effect any unlawfull practice against their Father, and that all other accusations were false. And that he requested that Tyrannus and the rest might have been better examined; but Antipater prevented that, who by his own forged rumours spred amongst the people, did cause them to hasten their deaths. Which being said, Herod commanded both him and Mela to be led unto Glaphyra, that she might be asked, whether she were any way privy to the conspiracy against Herod: and coming unto her, the woman seeing her husband bound, presently tore her hair, and being amazed, with great compassion, cried out amain. The young mans cheeks were also bedewed with tears; so that a long time after, those that were present amazed and moved to compassion at this miserable miserable sight, could neither speak nor do the Kings command. At last Ptolomeus, to whose charge Alexander was committed, willing him to speak, whether his wife was privy to his intent: he answered, How could it be otherwise, who is dearer unto me, than mine own life, being mother of her and my children? then she answered, crying out aloud, that she was privy to nothing that was any harm; yet (quoth she) if it will avail you any thing, or help to save your life, I am ready to tell any lie whatsoever, seeing I must die, and will deny nothing, you would have me to say. Alexander answered, Neither did I purpose any impiety against my father as some suppose, who ought not to think so: neither dost thou know of any one: this thou knowest, that thou and I purposed to flie unto Archelaus thy father, and that he promised to conveigh us to Rome; which she also affirmed.

Archelaus excuseth himself to Herod.

Herod now thinking that Archelaus was convicted of evill will towards him, delivered letters unto Olympus and Volumnius, commanding them in the way as they went, to pass by Eleusa a Town of Cilicia, and deliver certain letters unto Archelaus himself to the same effect; and that from thence they should go to Rome; and if so be when they came there, they found that Cæsar had been reconciled unto him by Nicholaus his means, that then they should also deliver certain letters unto him, declaring all that was past between him and his sonnes, and the proofs alledged to convince the young men. Archelaus writ again unto Herod, that indeed he would have entertained the young men, for fear that any greater mischance should befal them or their father, by reason of the suspicion against them; yet was he not minded to send them to Cæsar, nor to have confirmed them in any malicious course. The messengers coming to Rome, found Cæsar reconciled to Herod, and delivered the letters unto him. For Nicolaus his embassage was to this effect: So soon as he came unto Rome and had entred the Palace, beside the charge he had given him, he did also undertake to accuse Syllæus. For he perceived the Arabians at variance amongst themselves, and that some of them had declared all Syllæus his bad practices, and that by his means and procurement many of Obodas kinsmen were murthered, as his adversaries manifestly proved, by certain of his letters which they intercepted.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 12. al. 18.

Nicholaus accuseth Syllæus, and excuseth Herod.

Now Nicholaus desirous to reconcile Herod unto Cæsar, omitted not this occasion by chance offered him; for he well knew that if he began with the Kings defence, he should then find a hard and heavy Judge against him; but if he began to accuse Syllæus, he should find also fit occasion to plead his Kings cause. Wherefore Nicholaus taking upon him to prove the accusation against him at the day appointed, he accompanied with the King Aretas Embassadours, accused Syllæus as a murtherer of his Lord and King, and many other Arabians, and that he had borrowed much money to trouble the peace of the Common-wealth; and that he had corrupted many women, and honest matrons, both at Rome and in Arabia. He added hereunto a most grievous crime, to wit, that he by his lies and false reports had deceived Cæsar, whom in all things he had misinformed concerning that which Herod had done. Which when he once mentioned, Cæsar commanded him to omit the rest; and only to recount the matter concerning Herod, whether Herod did not enter into Arabia with an army, and did slay two thousand and five hundred men, and carry away captives and robbe and spoil the Countrey? Nicholaus answered, that to these demands himself was able to answer, that Herod did none of these, or at least very little hereof; which he did recount; and that he did not deserve any displeasure. Cæsar, contrary to his expectation, hearing this, began to give diligent ear to what Nicholaus said: and hereupon Nicholaus recounted unto Cæsar, how Herod had lent five hundred talents, and that he had a writing in pawn, wherein he was permitted after the day appointed, if then it were not repayed him again, to prey upon all the whole Countrey, and satisfie himself, and that this was no hostile invasion, but according to law and equity, a requiring of his right and debt due unto him. And that this was not rashly done, though by the writing he was so permitted to do, but by the consent of Saturninus and Volumnius Presidents of Syria, in whose presence Syllæus swore by Cæsars good fortune at Berytum, that within thirthy daies after, both the debt and also certain fugitives from the King, should be restored unto him, and that Syllæus performed none of these: and so Herod went again unto the Presidents, and they permitted them to go and take pledges for his money; and that so by their permission he went into Arabia. And this (quoth he) is the War that his adversaries have so tragically exaggerated, and yet (quoth he) how can it be called a War? seeing that it was done by the consent of the Presidents, and that by covenant after perjury; wherewith both other gods and also Cæsars name was violated. It now (quoth he) remaineth that I speak something concerning the captives. There were fourty theeves of Trachon; and afterward more that fled from Herod for fear of punishment, and fled unto Arabia, whom Syllæus protected and succoured to the injury of all men, and and gave them ground to inhabit; and was partaker of their preys; not withstanding that by his foresaid oath, he was bound to restore them, together with the borrowed money; neither can he name any man beside them taken in Arabia, and carried away captive, and some of them also escaped. This his forged tale concerning the captives being thus refuted, hear, O Sovereign Cæsar, the lying invention, which to provoke thee to wrath, himself devised. For I am well able to affirm this, that when the Arabian army assaulted us, and one or two of our men were slain, then at last Herod forced to make resistance, he slew Nacebus, and with him five and twenty, and no more: for every one of which Syllæus falsly recounted unto Cæsar a hundred, and so told him that two thousand and five hundred were slain. Cæsar hereat greatly moved with an angry countenance looking upon Syllæus, he asked him how many Arabians were slain in the fight? He amazed and knowing not what to reply, answered, that he erred in the number. Presently Cæsar commanded the writings to be read, containing the conditions between them, and the writings of the Presidents, and the letters of the Cities containing the complaints of the robberies. And so the matter was brought to pass, that Cæsar was reconciled unto Herod, and condemned Syllæus to die; and repenting himself to have written so threatning letters unto Herod, he objected that also unto Syllæus, affirming, that by his false informations he had caused him to pass the limits of friendship, in using his friend so hardly. And so he sent Syllæus into his Countrey, that after he had satisfied his creditors, he might be punished according to the sentence. But he still continued angry with Aretas for that without his authority he had usurped the Crown and Kingdom, and he was minded also to bestow Arabia upon Herod: but the letters which Herod sent him changed his mind. For Olympus and Volumnius, so soon as they understood that Cæsars wrath towards Herod was pacified, presently they delivered unto him the letters as they were commanded: wherein were contained the arguments whereby his Sonnes were convicted of treason against him. Which Cæsar having read, he thought it not convenient to trouble the old man (unfortunate with his Sonnes) with another Kingdome, and so he admitted Aretas Ambassadours: and chiding them that their King had rashly usurped the Kingdom without his authority and knowledge, not expecting his pleasure, he received their gifts, and confirmed him in the kingdome by his authority. This done, being now reconciled unto Herod, he writ unto him that he was sorrowful for him, that had such Children; and that he should, if they had attempted any treason against him, punish them as men that sought to murther their father: for he gave him free and full authority, but if they only attempted to flie, he should also be sufficed with a less punishment. Wherefore he counselled him to call a Consistory at Berytum; and together with the Romane Presidents, and Archelaus King of Cappadocia, and the rest of his friends, and the nobility thereabout, according as they should advise him, so to do. And this was the effect of Cæsars letters.

Herod receiving this letter, rejoyced above measure, both for that he had again obtained Cæsars favour; and also for that Cæsar had given him full authority to do what he pleased unto his Sonnes. And yet I know not how it came to passe, that he who in his prosperity was a hard father, yet did shew himself not rash in putting his sonnes to death: and now his estate being better than it was, and he recovering his wonted assurance, he now began a new hatred. Wherefore by letters he called together all those whom Cæsar appointed, only Archelaus excepted, either for that he hated the man, or else for that he feared he would have withstood that his purpose: and when they were all come together, as well the Presidents as the rest who were called out of divers cities, he would not bring his Sonnes into the councel, but kept them in a village of the Sidonians, named Platan, not far distant from the City, to the intent, that if they were called for, he might bring them forth. Then Herod himself alone entring into the councel before an hundred an fifty men there assembled for that purpose, began to accuse his Sonnes before them, and useth a speech not only pitiful for his own calamities, but also little becoming a father. For he was very vehement and unheedy in inveighing against their offence; neither did he sufficiently express his mind, shewing many signes of fury, and anger; neither did he deliver in writing any proofs of the accusations unto the Judges: but undecently himself alleadged there, the Father against the Sonne, himself also reading before them certain letters written by them, wherein was contained no impiety nor treason, but only a consultation to flie away, and certain hard speeches whereby they shewed themselves offended.

Herod assembleth all that Cæsar willed, except Archelaus.

Herod accused his Sonnes.

The year of the world, 3961. before Christs Nativity. 3.

Which when he came unto, he exclaimed as though hereby they confessed their treacherous practices, greatly exaggerating the matter, and protesting that he had rather die, than hear such speeches. Lastly, affirming that both nature and Cæsar permitted him authority against them; and his countrey-laws so commanded, that if any one being accused, his father or "mother should lay their hands upon his head, & the standers-by must presently stone him to "death: which though he might easily do in his own countrey and kingdom; yet he thought "good also to expect their censures. Yet he came unto them, not for that they were to judge "his Sonnes, who were taken in a manifest crime, but that by this occasion they might adde "their suffrages to the just indignation of a father offended, and that they might leave an ex- "ample unto all posterity, that such treasons ought not to be left unpunished. The King ha- "ving thus spoken, and not permitting the young men to be brought unto their answer, all "seeing what the King intended, and that there was now no hope to reconcile the young men unto their father, or save their lives, they all confirmed his authority. And first of all Saturninus, one that had been Consul, and had been graced with many honours, pronounced an indifferent sentence, limited with circumstances, to wit, that he condemned Herods Sonnes, yet not to die: for (quoth he) my self have Sonnes, and I would not adde this calamity to Herods misfortune past. After him also his three Sonnes, who were their fathers Legates, pronounced the same sentence. But Volumnius pronounced that they had deserved death, who were so impious towards their father; whose sentence after him the most part followed: so that it seemed that they were now ordeined to be put to death. Presently Herod carried them with him to Tyre, where he met Nicholaus, who was now there arrived, returning from Rome: unto whom the King first recounting what was done at Berytum, he asked of him, what his friends at Rome thought of his Sonnes? He answered that they judged the young mens intents impious, and that they also judged that they ought to be bound and imprisoned, and then after due consideration, if it were so thought expedient, to be put to death, lest the King might be thought rather to have given place unto his choler, than unto reason, yet if it might so please him, they thought it best to acquit them, lest otherwise he do that which hereafter he may repent when it is too late. And this was the opinion of most of his friends at Rome. Then the King along time pondred these his words, and made no reply, but commanded him to sail a long in his company. At his arrival in Cæsarea all men were careful what should become of his Sonnes, expecting an end of that tragedy, for they greatly feared that by reason of the old discord he would now cut them off; yet notwithstanding they were sorrowful for them: yet it was dangerous either to speak rashly, or to hear any thing spoken freely concerning them, but in their hearts compassionating them, they concealed their griefs. Only one amongst all the rest, an ancient Souldier of the Kings named Tyro, others dissembling their grief, spake freely what he thought: this Tyro had a Sonne of Alexanders age, and beloved of him, whom Alexander much accounted of. This fellow many times amidst the multitudes exclaimed, that trut hand equity were now banished from out of the world, and that in their stead, malice and untruth reigned: whereby there was such a mist and a fog caused over the whole world, that no man could see his own errors. This his free speech, though it was not without danger, yet all men hereat were moved; for that he had some reason to shew his fortitude in so dangerous a time, and every one was willing to hear his speech: and though themselves for fear were silent, yet did they not reprehend him for speaking freely. For the expectation of the event of so great mischief was able to have wrested from every one of them words of commiseration. Tyro with great audacity also came unto the King, and besought him that he might talk with him alone: which the King granting, he used these words with great lamentation: I can no longer, O my King, suppress this my grief, which causeth me so boldly to speak, though with my own peril; yet if it please thee, my King, that which I intend to speak shall be for thine advantage.

Saturninus doth pronounce an indifferent sentence

Volumnius and other of Herods friends pronounce Herods Sonnes to be beheaded Herod asked of Nicholaus what his friends at Rome thought of his sonnes.

Tyro speaketh to Herod, and not observing modesty, he and the Captains were imprisoned.

Where now, my Lord, are thy wits? where is that they couragious mind ever hitherto able to match all difficult businesses whatsoever? how hapneth it that thou hast so few friends and kindred? for I account not them kinsmen or friends, that permit such wickedness and hatred in thy Court, which erst was most happy and fortunate. And what art thou unto thy self? wilt thou not look and see what is done? wilt thou put to death the two young men born unto thee by the Queen thy wife, who abound in all vertue, and commit thy self now in thy old age unto one only Sonne, who nourisheth impious hopes and designes? and to thy kindred who by thy own censure have often deserved death? Doest thou not perceive that the people keeping themselves quiet and still; do both condemne the errour of thy friends, and also pity and compassionate the two young men? Moreover, all thy souldiers and the Captains themselves have compassion on them, and curse the authors of this unfortunate calamity.

The

A the King at first took these words of Tyro in good part, as being admonished of the perfidious dealing of them about him, and his own calamity. But Tyro immodestly & souldier-like urging the King, and for his own simplicity not able to discern what fitted that time, the King at last thought this, rather a turbulent upbraiding him, than a friendly admonition: and asking who those Captains and Souldiers were, he commanded them all, and Tyro also to be bound and kept in prison. Then one Tripho the Kings Barber, taking hereat occasion, told the King, that Tyro had often sollicited him, as he shav'd the King to cut his throat with his razor, promising him for recompence great rewards, and that he should be one of Alexanders chief friends. Having spoken these words, the King commanded him to be apprehended, and the Barber, and Tyro and his Son to be tortured. Tyro his son seeing his Father in most miserable
B torments; and that he still persisted in them (and by the Kings displeasure, conjecturing that there was no hope of life) told them that tortured his father, that he would confess all the truth, conditionally that his father and himself might be no more tormented: and having his request granted, he told them that it was agreed, that Tyro with his own hand should have killed the King: for he could get opportunity to come unto the King when no man else was with him, and so he would kill him, and for Alexanders sake endure any torments whatsoever. This spoken, he delivered himself and his father from further tortures: but it is uncertain whether the tale he told was true; or whether he devised it to free them both from torments. Then Herod now laying all doubt aside (if before he were in any) thought what death his sons should die, and leaving no place to repentance and mercy, he hastned to exe-
C cute his purpose: and producing 300 Captains, and Tyro and his son, and the Barber his accuser; he accused them all before the people, and the people throwing any thing that came to their hands at them, they slew them every one. And Alexander and Aristobulus was carried unto Sebaste, and there by their Fathers command were strangled: and their bodies carried by night into the Castle Alexandrium, where their Grandfather by their Mothers side, and many of their Progenitors lay buried. But perhaps some will nothing marvel, that a hatred so long a breeding should in the end so prevail, that it overcame natural Affection. But one may justly doubt whether the fault were in the yong men, who exasperated by a hard father so long time, fell into such a hatred of him, or whether it is to be imputed unto his unkindness and immoderate desire of honour and rule, who could not abide any to be his equal, but ra-
D ther chusing to do all at his own pleasure: Or rather unto fortune, whose power the wisest living is not able to resist. Wherefore I am perswaded, Fortune hath predestinated all humane actions so, that they must have a necessary event. And this inevitable force we call Fate, or fatal Destiny, for that there is nothing which it effecteth not. But it sufficeth briefly to have touched this high matter, which of it self is very difficult, which attributeth something unto our actions, and examineth the causes of the variety of our actions, which speculation is already comprized in the two Volums of our Law. Furthermore, touching the yong mens fault, we may accuse their youthful arrogancie, and their free King-like pride, who did give too great ear to their Fathers accusers, and for that they were unjust searchers into his life and actions, and that they maliciously suspected him, and could not rule their tongues: but
E hereby gave double occasion unto their Adversaries, and matters unto those tale-bearers that sought to get the Kings favour. But their Fathers shameful fault cannot be excused, who suffered himself so to be over-ruled with passion, that he put them to death that were begotten of his own body, without any proof or argument of the crimes laid unto their charge: yea, two young men of excellent feature of body, not only beloved of their own Nation, but also of strangers; not slothful in hunting, and commendable in Military affairs, and eloquent in civil Discourses. For, in all these things they were excellent, and especially Alexander the eldest of them. It had been enough for him, suppose he had condemned them, either to have kept them in perpetual prison, or banished them into some far Country; seeing that he was assured of the Roman power, under whose protection he neither needed to have feared invasion, nor secret Treason against him. For, so soon to put them to death, only to satisfie his
F own furious will, what else doth it betoken, but only an impious liberty casting off all fatherly humanity and kindness? especially seeing that he was aged, whose years could neither plead ignorance, nor that he was deceived. For neither was he the more excused by the delay he used: nay, it had been less offence, if amazed with some sudden news, he had been incited to so hainous an offence; but after so long delay and deliberation, at last to effect such a matter, betokens a bloody mind, and obdurate in wickedness, as he well shewed himself afterward to have, not sparing the rest, whom before he held most dear: who though they were less to be pitied, in that they justly suffered, yet was it an argument of his like cruelty, in that he abstained not from their deaths also: but we will speak hereof hereafter.

CHAP. I.

Of Antipaters malice, who was Herods Sonne.

The year of the world, 3961. before Christs Nativity, 3.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 1.

Antipater, after he had made away his Brothers, grew hateful both to the Souldiers and the people.

Antipater governed the Kingdom with his Father.

After that Antipater had made away his Brothers through the extreme impiety and unbridled fury, wherewith Herod their father was incensed and whetted against them; yet incontinently obtained he not, that which undoubtedly he hoped for. For being delivered and discharged of that fear he conceived, lest his Brethren should be partakers with him in the Kingdom, he found a difficult and dangerous matter for himself to find the means how he might obtain the Kingdom: so strange and hainous a hatred had all the Nation conceived against him. On the other side, in shewing himself proud and lofty, he more and more whetted and increased that hatred which the Souldiers had fore-conceived against him, in whom notwithstanding, the securiry of the Kingdom consisted, if it should fortune so to fall out that the people should attempt any alteration. All which mischiefs were begotten by his own sins, and the unnatural murther of his Brothers. Nevertheless, he governed the Kingdom with his Father, living in less Authority than himself: Herod also reposed more confidence in him, even in those things, for which he was worthy to lose his head. For the King conceived that in confirmation of his good affection towards him, Antipater had accused his Brethren, as under resolution to continue his Father in security, and not for any hatred he bore as well unto them, as to his Father; though indeed he hated them for his Fathers sake, being transported with fury. But all these were but as so many subtle stratagems to insinuate himself into Herods counsels and favours: and these did he craftily make use of, to cut off the occasion lest any should prevent or accuse him of that which he pretended to do, and that Herod might be deprived of all means and manner of relief, if so be that Antipater should bend his Forces against him.

Antipater wisheth his Fathers death.

For the Treason he complotted against his Brothers, proceeded from the hatred he bare unto his Father: but at that time he was the more egged on to prosecute his intended purposes, without any delay or procrastination For if Herod should happen to die, it was a matter most assured that the Kingdom should be his; and should his life continue any longer time, and the

A the practice Antipater went about ſhould be diſcovered, ſeeing himſelf invironed with theſe dangers, he ſhould be inforced to make his father his Enemy. For which cauſe he uſed very great bounty and liberality to all thoſe that were about his father: and through the greateſt largeſs he beſtowed upon them, he ſtrangled and extinguiſhed that hatred which all of them bare unto him: and above all things he continued himſelf in credit with thoſe friends which Herod had at Rome, by ſending them divers preſents, and namely to Saturninus, who was Governor of Syria. He hoped alſo by bribes & rewards to draw his Fathers Brother into his faction, and to corrupt the Kings ſiſter alſo, who was married to one of the Kings moſt eſteemed friends in Court. Furthermore, he was a ſubtil and politike man in entertaining thoſe men with colourable and cloaking ſhew of friendſhip, with whom he converſed, and
B to draw himſelf into credit with them: contrariwiſe, he was ſufficiently practiſed to diſſemble his malice and diſcontents, which he had conceived againſt any man. Notwithſtanding all this, he could not deceive Salome his Aunt, who of long time before had ſounded his inclination, and who was not ſo ſimple as to ſuffer her ſelf to be deceived; but had already, by all cunning means that might be, prevented his malice, although ſhe had a daughter married unto his Uncle, by the Mothers ſide. This Daughter was firſt of all wedded to Ariſtobulus, and afterwards by Antipaters means eſpouſed to his Uncle. For Callæas her Husbands Son had married the other. But neither could this affinity colour the matter ſo much, but that his malice was diſcovered; neither could that former conſanguinity extinguiſh the deſerved hatred conceived againſt him. Herod conſtrained Salome (who through amorous paſſion had
C thought to have married her ſelf to Syllæus the Arabian) to marry with Alexas, and that by the mediation and perſwaſion of Julia Cæſars wife, who adviſed Salome not to refuſe that Marriage, for fear leſt he ſhould prove her utter enemy; for that Herod had made an oath, that if Salome condeſcended not to marry Alexas, he would never make account of her: For which cauſe ſhe followed Julias advice, who was Cæſars wife; and counſelled her alſo to her profit and preferment.

Antipater ſpared no coſt to win his fathers friends.

Antipater could not deceive his Aunt.

Herod compelleth Salome to marry Alexas.

At the ſame time Herod ſent his Daughter to King Archelaus, who had been married to Alexander, preſenting him a dowry out of his own Treaſury, leſt there ſhould any difference ariſe between them, and he himſelf moſt carefully brought up his Sons Children. For Alexander had two Sons by Glaphyra, and Ariſtobulus begat on Bernice, Salomes Daughter, three D Sons and two Daughters. Theſe ſometimes would be preſent and commend unto his Friends, and bewailing the misfortune of his Sons, would beſeech God that no ſuch ill fortune might befall their Children, but rather that they might increaſe in virtue, and acknowledg their education and bringing up, with all dutiful reſpects unto their Parents. He provided them alſo each of them with a wife, at ſuch time as they were ready for Marriage, namely, the Daughter of Pheroras for the eldeſt of Alexanders Sons; and the Daughter of Antipater for Ariſtobulus eldeſt Son: and one of Ariſtobulus Daughters was married to Antipaters Son; and the other he eſpouſed to Herod his own Son, whom he had begotten of the Daughter of the High Prieſt. For it is lawful in our Countrey, and according to our Cuſtome, to have divers wives at one time. The King procured theſe Marriages through the
E compaſſion he had of thoſe Orphelins, thinking by theſe mutual Alliance to cauſe Antipater to be their friend. But Antipater conceived no leſs hatred toward the Children, than he had done malice towards their father: for the care that Herod had of them, increaſed his hatred, in that he pretended to be the greateſt among the Brethren; and he eſpecially feared leſt when they ſhould grow to mans eſtate, they would reſiſt his power, being aſſiſted by King Archelaus, as his Sons in Law; and Pheroras who was a Tetrach ſhould do the like, for that he had married his Son to Alexanders Daughter. And ſo much the more was he incited, becauſe all the people had compaſſion of theſe Orphans, and had conceived a hatred againſt him, who never ceaſed to expreſs his malice againſt his brethren. He therefore deviſed all the means that were poſſible to diſanul the decrees which his Father had reſolved upon to F this effect, being very loath that they ſhould ever live to be partners with him in the Kingdom. So that at laſt Herod condeſcendeth to Antipaters demand, which was, that he might marry Ariſtobulus Daughter, and his Son be eſpouſed to Pheroras Daughter: and thus were the promiſed, and forementioned Marriages wholly cut off; yea, even againſt Herods former decree. At that time Herod had nine wives, namely, Antipaters Mother, the High Prieſts Daughter, by whom he had a Son that bare his name, and a Daughter of his Brothers, and a Cozen of his own, by whom he had no children. He had another wife alſo, that by Nation was a Samaritane, by whom he had two Sons, Antipas, and Archelaus, and a Daughter called Olympias, who was afterwards married to Joſeph the Kings Cozen. As for Archelaus and Antipas, they were brought up at Rome, with a certain private friend of his. Moreover, he eſpouſed

CHAP. II.

Of Zamaris the Babylonian Jew.

Herod buildeth a Castle in the Region of the Trachonites, and maketh Zamaris the Jew that came from Babylon Governour therein.

After this, intending to assure his Estate in the Countrey of Trachonite, he resolved to build a Borough of the bigness of a City in the midst of the Countrey, as well to warrantize his Countrey, as to be in better readiness to repulse his Enemies, and to repulse them with more expedition. And having intelligence that a certain Jew was come from Babylon with five hundred Archers on Horsback, and about one hundred of his Kinsmen, and had adventured to pass Euphrates, and was in the Countrey adjoyning to Antioch near unto Daphne in Syria, where Saturnine General of the Roman Army had given him a Castle, called Valatha, to inhabit, he sent for him and his followers, promising to give him both Lands and Lordships in the Signiory of Batanea, which confineth on Trachonite, intending that he should make head against those that would assail him, and promising him that both his Land and his Souldiers should be exempt from all Tributes, and payments of Customs. This Babylonian Jew was induced by these offers of his to come, and take possession of the place, wherere he builded a Borough, called Bathyra. This man opposing himself against the Trachonites, defended them of the Countrey, and those Jews that came from Babylon to Jerusalem to offer Sacrifice, from all Incursions and Robberies of the Trachonites: and divers that observed the Religion of the Jews, resorted unto him from all places, so that this Countrey was very well peopled, by reason of the enfranchisement of the Tribute, which continued during Herods life-time.

But Philip who succeeded him, exacted afterward some small Tribute of them, and that but for a little while. But Agrippa the Great, and his Son of the same name, vexed them very grievously with Taxations; yet permitted them to enjoy their Liberty, whose Successours the Romans imposed many grievous Tributes upon them, yet continued their freedom; of whom hereafter we will more particularly and largely discourse in due place, and in proces of my History. Now this Jew Zamaris, to whom Herod had given the possession of his Countrey, died, after he had lived virtuously, and left a virtuous off-spring behind him, amongst whom was Jacim renowned for his dexterity on Horsback, who with his Troop of Horse was of the King of Babylons Guard. This Jacim died when he was very old, and left his son Philip to succeed him, a man valiant in Arms, and addicted to all sorts of virtue, as much as any one that hath been renowned in writing: for which cause King Agrippa loved him, and put his trust in him, and committed the trust and training of his Souldiers unto him, who led them also forth if occasion of service was proffered.

CHAP. III.

Antipater conspireth against Herod.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 3.

Whilst the estate and Affairs of Herod were thus disposed, all mens eyes were fixed upon Antipater, after that Herod had permitted him to intend his particular profit. This permission was granted him under the hope that his Father had, that he would behave himself faithfully, and affectionately towards him: but he abused his Authority more audaciously than could be expected; for he traiterously coloured his conceived malice, and easily drew his Father to believe him in whatsoever he said. He was feared by all men, not only for his force and authority, but for his subtilties and policies. But above all the rest, Pheroras respected him most, and was in like manner as greatly esteemed by him. For Antipater had circumvented him by the means of certain women, who favoured his faction: for Pheroras was commanded by his wife, his Mother, and Sister-in-law, notwithstanding that he hated them, by reason of the outrage they had offered to his Daughters who were Virgins; nevertheless he was enforced to dissemble all things, because he could do nothing but that they were always round about him, and had such mastery of his affairs, that they wrought him to perform whatsoever they pleased. To these likewise was Antipater nearly tied, tied, both of himself and by his Mother: for these four women were of one mind and affection in all things, and spake as it were by one mouth: yet was Pheroras at odds with Antipater upon some slight mislikes, and she that wrought this debate betwixt them, was the Kings sister, who had of long time spied all their drifts, knowing well, that their mutual friendship tended to the overthrow of Herod; neither refused she to express what her opinion was therein. And they knowing well that the King disliked this their inward familiarity, and that he was privy to that which they pretended, which was his utter ruine, resolved between themselves to refrain their publick familiarity, and to make a shew that they were at odds one with another: to which intent they reproached one another, especially at such time as they were either in Herods presence, or there was any one with them, (who as they thought) would certifie him thereof. But in secret they intermitted not their accustomed friendship, and continued their intercourses with more privy affability; and such was their ordinary demeanour and behaviour: yet was not Salome ignorant hereof, neither when they first devised this drift, neither afterwards when they put it in execution: for she diligently noted all things, and aggravated the same in their reports to her brother, whom she informed of their secret assemblies and banquetting, urging their secret consultations, which (as we said) had no other issue but his ruine, except upon their discovery he sought to repress them in time. Further, that for the present they behaved themselves like enemies in outward shew, and all their speeches tended to disgrace one another; but that in secret they were friends, and that in private they entertained their amity, and promised each other their mutual assistance to strengthen themselves against those to whom they were loath their friendship should be discovered. These things observed, she with all diligence signified the same unto her Brother, who of himself already had many probabilities thereof. But he durst not make shew thereof, because he knew that his sister was a woman too much addicted to reproachful accusation. There was among the Jews a Sect of people that were called Pharisees, who were too much addicted to self opinion, and boasted themselves to be the exactest observers of the Law in all the Country, to whom these women were very much addicted, as to those who were much beloved of God, as in outward appearance they made shew for. These were such as durst oppose themselves against Kings, full of fraud, arrogancy, and rebellion, presuming to raise War upon their motions, and to rebel and offend their Princes at their pleasures: whereas therefore all the Nation of the Jews had sworn to be faithful to Cæsar, and to the estate of the King; these only refused to take oath, and of this Sect there were to the number of 6000. For which cause the King having imposed an amercement upon them, Pheroras wife paid it for them; for which cause they pretending to gratifie her, and being esteemed for such as were skilful in foretelling such things as were to come, by reason of their often communication with God, foretold her, that God had decreed to bring the Kingdom of Herod and his Posterity to an end, and would bring to pass, that the Crown should descend to Pheroras and his Sons. Salome had got an inkling hereof, and had told Herod no less: and and how they likewise corrupted every one of his Courtiers; for which cause he put those to death amongst the Pharisees, who were the principal Authors of this Advice, and with them also the Eunuch Bagoas, and Carus who was his darling, and one of the goodliest men of that time. He afterwards cut off all those amongst his household servants, who were of the Pharisees faction: for Bagoas was bewitched with that hope by them, that he suffered himself to be called the Father and Benefactor of the King, who should be established according to their prediction, and have the Government of all things, and should be strengthned by Marriages, and descent of his lawful and natural Children.

But after that Herod had punished those amonst the Pharisees, who were convicted to have been of the Conspiracy, he assembled a Councel of his friends, before whom he accused Pheroras wife, and ripped up the outrages that were done unto his Daughters, as it hath been declared, ascribing the same to the pride of this woman, objecting it for a crime against her, for thereby she had injured his Honour. Besides this, he accused her that she had of set purpose stirr'd up Mutinies, and by all means possible both in words and effect, contrary to all law of Nature, stirred up debate betwixt him and his Brother; and that the Fine, that he had imposed upon his Adversaries, was satisfied at her charge: so that no jot of that Conspiracy was contrived without her privity and consent. For which causes (said he) Brother Pheroras, it shall not be amiss for you of your own accord to drive such a wretched woman from you, before you be requested, and the Sentence be pronounced against her, otherwise she will be the cause to kindle a War betwixt you and me. For if at this present you will continue the friendship and Brotherhood betwixt you and me, separate your self from her: in so doing I will account you for my Brother, and you shall lose nothing by the affection which I bear unto you. For the bond of Brotherly love cannot continue safe and inviolable, unless you put her away. Now although Pheroras was moved with the importance and weight of this discourse; yet said he, that for the love he bare unto his wife, he would forget nothing of that duty which consanguinity required at his hands in regard of his Brother: but that he had rather die, than live without her company, whom he loved more dearly than his life. Herod, although he took this answer of his Brothers for a most grievous injury, yet forbare he to discover his displeasure towards him: he only forbade Antipater and his Mother, and in like manner Pheroras, to frequent the one with the other any more. He commanded the women likewise that they should give over their familiar entertainments the one with the other, which all of them promised to perform. Yet this notwithstanding upon fit opportunities and occasions, they visited one another, and Antipater and Pheroras feasted one another by night. The report also went that Antipater had the company of Pheroras wife, and that his Mother was the means and minister of their privy meetings.

CHAP. IV.

Herod sendeth Antipater unto Cæsar.

Herod sendeth Antipater to Cæsar.

Antipater suspecting his Fathers dislikes, and fearing lest his hatred should by increase bring him into hazard, he wrote unto his friends in Rome, requiring them to write their Letters unto Herod, requesting him to send Antipater unto Cæsar, with all expedition as was possible. Which being brought to pass, Herod sent him thither with divers Royal presents, and gave him his Testament and Will with him; wherein he had bequeathed the Kingdom to Antipater. And if it should happen that Antipater should die before him, then bequeathed he the same to his Son Herod, whom he had by the High Priests Daughter. About the same time Syllæus the Arabian repaired to Rome, notwithstanding he had neglected those things that Cæsar had given him in charge. Him did Antipater accuse before Cæsar, for the same defaults wherewith he was charged by Nicholaus. Syllæus also was accused by Aretas, for murthering divers of the best account in the City of Petra, contrary to his mind: amongst the which was Sohemus (a man of much virtue and honour) and Phabatus, Cæsars Servant; of which Crimes Syllæus was accused upon that occasion which ensueth: There was a certain man of Corinthus, who was one of the Kings Guard, and such an one as he put very great trust in: him did Lyllæus perswade by store of money and bribes, to kill Herod; which he promised to perform. Phabatus made privy to Lyllæus mind, he presently told it to the King, who caused him to be apprehended and tortured; who confessed the whole matter, he laid hands also on two Arabians, perswaded by this Corinthians confession; one of which was a man of Command in his Country, & the other was Syllæus chiefest friend. They being examined, confessed that they came thither to sollicite and egg forward with many exhortations the Corinthian to execute the murther, and to assist him if he stood in need of them. Which being fully approved by Herod before Saturnine, he sent them to Rome, there more amply to be proceeded against, and so to be punished.

CHAP. V.

Pheroras death.

Herod perceiving that his Brother Pheroras did constantly continue his affection towards his wife, he commanded him to retire himself into his own Dominion: whereupon he willingly departed to his Tetrarchy, protesting by many solemn Oaths, that he would never more return into the City, unless he were assured that Herod was dead. Not long after it hapned, that the King falling sick, he was sent for to receive certain secret instructions, as from the mouth of a dying man; but Pheroras would not obey him in regard of his Oath. This notwithstanding Herod dealt more kindly with him, and continued his love and affection towards him: for he came unto Pheroras as soon as he heard of his first sickness, and being unsent for also; and after he was deceased, he sent his body to Jerusalem, and honourably intombed him in that place, and grievously lamented his death. This was the beginning of Antipaters mis-haps, who at that time was departed to Rome. For it was God's pleasure that at last he should be punished for the murther of his Brethren. This matter will I discourse of at large, that it may serve for an example unto many Kings, how they ought to practice and follow virtue in all their actions.

An Oath solemnly observed.

CHAP. VI.

The year of the world, 3961. before Christs Nativity, 3.

Pherora's Wife is accused, and Herod is advertised of Antipaters conspiracies.

AFter Pheroras death, two of his Freemen, who were Taphnites by birth, and such as Pheroras in his life time, both only trusted, and dearly loved, came unto Herod, requiring him not to suffer his Brothers death to pass unpunished, but to make diligent enquiry of that unfortunate unexpected misadventure. Herod lent a willing ear to their suit, perceiving that the matters they importuned him in, were likely and very credible. Whereupon they told him, that Pheroras, the day before his unexpected sickness, had supt with his Wife, and that having received an unaccustomed Poyson with his meat, he was dead. That this Poyson had been brought thither by a woman of Arabia, who in her speech protested that it was some Potion to increase Love, but in effect it was to bring Pheroras to his end. For the women of Arabia amongst all others are skilful in Poysons, and are great sorcerers, and she that was charged with this fact, was esteemed a great friend and favourer of Syllæus best beloved. That Pheroras Mother and his Wives Sister went into those Quarters upon purpose to buy that Poyson, and returned back, and brought this woman with them the day before the supper. The King moved by these words of theirs, tortured both those Maid-servants of theirs, who were their Bond-women; as also certain other of their free servants. Now when the fact could not be extorted, by reason that none of them confessed the same; at length, she that was last of all put to her trial, overcome by the pains she endured, said nought else, but that she prayed God that Antipaters Mother might feel the like torments, sith she was the cause of all these mischiefs which they endured.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 5. Pheroras Freemen accuse his Wife for poysoning him.

Herod tortureth the Ladies Bond-women, and soundeth out Antipaters and their secrets.

These words of hers made Herod the more eager and inquisitive, so that by force of tortures he wrought out all the secrets of these women, their Banquets, their secret Assemblies, and those very words that Herod had spoken apart betwixt his Son and himself, which had been reported unto the women, that Pheroras entertained: namely, that he would give him one hundred talents, provided he would use no conference with Pheroras. Moreover, they reckoned up the hatred that Antipater bare unto his Father, the complaints that he made unto his Mother, of the too long life and continuance of his Farher: for that in regard of himself he was already waxen old; so that although the Kingdom should fall into his hands presently, yet could he receive but very little contentment thereby. Moreover, he alledged, that divers Brothers, and Brothers Children were brought up together with him, so that he might not securely hope for any thing, for that already if he should fortune to die, the Kingdom was to descend not to his Son, but to his Brother: besides this, he was accustomed to accuse the King of divers cruelties committed by him, and of that murther which he executed upon the persons of his Children. That for fear lest he should practise his tyranny against those that remained, Antipater had found out the device to be summoned to Rome, and Pheroras withdrew himself into his Tetrachy.

These words, which as he knew had reference to that which his sister had often informed him of, were not by him held incredible; so that being pressed with the malice of Antipater, he sequestred Doris his Mother from his presence, spoyling her before her departure of all her Jewels which were valued at many talents: and from that time forward he shewed himself more favorable towards those women of Pheroras household. But nothing did more whet Herods displeasure against Antipater, than did a certain Samaritan, who was also called Antipater, who had the ordering of the Affairs of Antipater the Kings Son. For he being brought in question, and tortured, declared among other things, that Antipater had mixed a mortal Poyson, and delivered the same to Pheroras his Unkle, commanding him to practice the Kings death in his absence, and by that means least suspected. That this poyson was brought out of Egypt by one called Antiphilus, Antipaters friend. That it was sent to Pheroras by one called Theudion, Antipaters Mothers Brother. That this Poyson was kept by Pheroras wife, and was committed by her Husband to her custody. She being examined by the King hereupon, confessed no less, and hastning forth, as if she intended to fetch the same, she cast her self down headlong from the top of the house: yet did she not murther her self, because she fell upon her feet. Now after she was recovered out of her swoun, and the King had promised all security both to her self and her Family, if so be she would discover the truth; and contrariwise threatned her with extreme torments, if she obstinately continued in concealing these Treasons; she sware she would discover all things according as they were acted, and and as many men thought at that time, ſhe told nothing but the truth. That Poyſon (ſaid ſhe) was brought by Antiphilus out of Egypt; and bought there by the means of a Brother of his, who was a Phyſician. After this, Theudion brought it to our houſe: and I having received it from Pheroras hands, kept the ſame, but bought by your Son Antipater, to poyſon you that are his Father. Now therefore, after that my Husband fell ſick, and you in kindneſs came to viſit and comfort him, he being moved with compaſſion, and conquered by your brotherly kindneſs, and by your good affection and loving care in giving order for his health, called me unto him, and ſaid: O wife, Antipater hath circumvented me, whilſt by his peſtilent counſels, and poyſoning practices he deſireth to cut off his Father, and deprive me of a kind brother. Now therefore, ſith as I perceive there is no part of my Brothers loving and natural affection diminiſhed towards me, wherewith he was wont to entertain me, and that my lateſt hour of life approacheth, God forbid, that being ready to ſleep with my Forefathers, I ſhould preſent them with a ghoſt ſoild and ſweltered in my Brothers blood: Diſpatch therefore, and burn this Poyſon before mine eyes. Hereupon ſaid ſhe, I preſently brought it forth according as my husband commanded me, and burnt the greateſt part of the Poyſon, and the reſt I have reſerved, that if after my Husbands death your Grace ſhould uſe me unkindly, it might ſerve me to eſcape thoſe extremities that would betide me.

After ſhe had ſpoken thus, ſhe brought forth before them the Poyſon, and the box wherein it was kept. After her, another of Antipholus brothers, and the mother to them both, confeſſed no leſs, being conſtrained thereunto by force and violence of torture, and acknowledged the Box. The Kings Wife alſo, who was the daughter of the High Prieſt, was accuſed of confederacie and concealment of all theſe treaſons. For which cauſe Herod put her away from him, and razed his Sons name out of his Teſtament, wherein he had bequeathed him the Kingdom after his deceaſe. He diſplaced alſo his Father-in-law Simon the Son of Boethus from the Prieſthood, and placed Matthias the Son of Theophilus, who was born in Jeruſalem, in his ſtead. In the mean ſpace Bathillus, Antipaters freeman returned from Rome; who being tortured, confeſſed that he brought a Poyſon with him to deliver it to Antipaters Mother, and Pheroras, to the end that if the firſt Poyſon were not effectual enough to diſpatch the King, they might make uſe of this other, to cut him off ſpeedily. There came letters alſo to Herods hands from his friends in Rome, written and deviſed by Antipaters means, to accuſe Archelaus and Philip, for very often they had refreſhed the memory of Alexander and Ariſtobolus death, contrived by their Father; and for that they lamented the miſerable fate of them, who were innocently betrayed, and that now alſo they themſelves were called back into their Country, for no other cauſe, but upon their arrival to be made partakers of their Brothers miſerable deſtiny. Theſe things did Antipaters friends certifie Herod of, in that by many and mighty Preſents he wrought them thereunto. He himſelf alſo wrote unto his Father colourably, after a manner excuſing the young men, and imputing their words unto their indiſcretion and young years. Mean while, he buſied himſelf in accuſing Syllæus, and courted the chiefeſt Romans, buying divers Ornaments and Jewels to preſent them with, to the value of two hundred talents. And it is to be wondred at, that ſo great matters being brought on foot againſt him, ſeven moneths at leaſt before his return into the Countrey of Judæa, that no inkling thereof came unto his ears. But the cauſe partly was, the diligent ſearch and watch that was kept upon the High-ways, and partly the hatred that all men had conceived againſt Antipater. For there was not any that would put themſelves in hazard to procure his ſecurity.

Antipater is condemned and caſt into Priſon.

Herod concealing his diſpleaſure, anſwered Antipater his Sons letters (wherein he gave him to underſtand, that as ſoon as he had diſpatched his Affairs as it behoved him, he ſhould return) charging him to haſten homeward, for fear leaſt during his abſence, ſome unexpected inconvenience might betide him. He likewiſe after a temperate manner, complained unto him of his Mother, promiſing notwithſtanding to remit the fault upon his return, and by all means he made ſhew unto him of much kindneſs, fearing leſt he, apprehending any ſuſpicion, ſhould defer to haſten his return homeword, and lingring too long at Rome, ſhould contrive ſome trayterous ſtrategeme, to the prejudice of himſelf, and the overthrow of his Kingdem. Theſe Letters did Antipater receive in Cilicia, and already had he received others at Tarentum, by whom he underſtood of Pheroras his uncles

As ſoon as he came to Celenderis a City of Cilicia, he grew doubtfull whether he ſhould return or no, and grievouſly was he diſtracted by his mothers diſgraces, who was baniſhed from the Court. Sundry alſo were the opinions of his friends in his behalfe: for ſome of them counſelled him to ſtay and expect the event of theſe troubles in ſome place: otherſome, on the other ſide, adviſed him to delay no longer his return into his Countrey, for that upon his arrival he might eaſily ſatisfie all thoſe objections and accuſations that were inforced againſt him, becauſe his accuſers had nought elſe to ſtrengthen their cauſe with, but his abſence. This latter advice liked him beſt; ſo that he betook himſelf to ſea, and at laſt arrived in the Port of

And now already it manifeſtly appeared that Antipater was upon his downfal: For no man came out to ſalute him, no man entertained him, as they did upon his departure, when as all of them accompanied him with prayers and happy acclamations: but contrariwiſe they boldly and openly ſpake againſt him and bitterly curſed him, telling him that he was juſtly puniſhed for the wickedneſs he had committed againſt his brothers.

Antipater upon his return is ſaluted by no man.

About the ſame time Quintilius Varus, who was ſent to ſucceed Saturnine in the government of Syria, was at Jeruſalem, and drew thither at that inſtant upon Herods requeſt, to aſſiſt him with his counſels in his preſent and weighty occaſions: now whileſt theſe two ſate and conſulted together, Antipater came in before any man expected him, and in that purple
C garment and royalty that he was accuſtomed to uſe, entered the Palace. The guard of the gates ſuffered him to enter in, but they excluded all thoſe that were with him. This firſt of all affrighted and appaled his ſpirits, in that he already perceived into what calamity he was fallen; and now alſo when he drew near his father, he thruſt him from him, accuſing him of the murther of his brethren, and reproaching him with that intent he had to poyſon him, telling him that the next day Varus ſhould both hear and judge all his miſdemeanours.

He altogether amated at the greatneſs of that unexpected miſchief, which he both heard and ſaw, departed preſently from them wholly amazed, and in the way met with his mother and his wife (which was Antigonus daughter, who had been King of the Jews before Herod) by whom he was adverti ſed of all that which had hapned, and for that cauſe more di-D ligently prepared himſelf for his tryal. The next day Varus and Herod ſate in judgment, accompanied by their friends on both ſides; thither alſo were cited the Kings kindred and his ſiſter Salome; and certain others, who could diſcover his ſecret practices; ſome of which had been tortured; and namely Antipaters mothers ſervants, who a little before his arrival had „ been apprehended with a letter to this effect: That he ſhould take heed that he returned „ not into the countrey, becauſe his father was made privy to all his practices, and that for the „ preſent he had no other refuge but only to Cæſar, and to take care likewiſe leſt he ſhould fall „ into his fathers hands. „

Hereupon Antipater humbling himſelf on his knees before the King his father, beſought „ him not to condemn him before his cauſe were heard, but to ſuſpend his judgment untill „
E ſuch time as he had heart his juſtifications. But Herod after he had commanded him to „ withdraw himſelf into the midſt of the Court and aſſembly, deplored his infelicity in be- „ getting ſuch Children and bewailed his miſhap, that in his old age he was reſerved for an „ Antipater. After this he reckoned up the cares he had ſpent in their education and inſtitution, „ and how bountifully he had beſtowed upon him as much riches as he required: he fur- „ thermore alleadged, that none of all theſe favours could preſerve him from falling into the „ lapſe of the loſs of his life by their policy, to the intent that they might injurioully poſſeſs „ the Kingdom, before either the law of nature, or the will of their father, or their own rights „ could challenge the ſame. But above all the reſt, he wondred at Antipater, with what hope „ he could poſſibly be puffed up to attempt ſo audicious and wickel an enterprize. For by his „
F Teſtament he had made him the heir of his Kingdom, and in his life-time alſo had made „ him equal partaker of his dignity, glory and power: that he received annually fifty talents „ of revenue, and to furniſh his voyage for Rome had three hundred talents given him. More- „ over, he accuſed him for his ſlanderous accuſations againſt his murthered and ſlaughtered „ brothers: who if they had been wicked, why did he imitate them? but if they were innocent „ why without cauſe produced he his ſlanderous accuſations againſt thoſe, who were his natu- „ rall brethren? For in his own reſpect he had never found any thing againſt them, but by his „ report: neither had he given ſentence againſt them, but by Antipaters advice, who for the „ preſent were abſolved by him, becauſe he was become the heir of their parricide. tering these words he began to weep, being unable to urge his griefs any further; for which G cause he besought Nicholaus Damascene, who was his dear friend, and conversed ordinarily
The year of the world, 3982. before Christs Nativity, 2. with him, and was privy to all that which had passed, to prosecute the rest that appertained to the inquest and approbation of his crime.

Antipaters answer to his fathers objection.

But Antipater turning himself towards his father, began to justifie himself, urging the same testimonies, and favours that his father had shewed unto him, and the honours he had received at his hands, which he would never have shewed him, if he had been unworthy of the "same, and had not by his virtue deserved these favours. He alleadged also, that by his vir"tue he had prevented all that which might have hapned, and that where the cause required
"his labour or diligence, he dispatched all things with his own industry, that it was unlikely "that he, who had delivered his father from those treasons which were intended against him H
"by other men, should himself attempt the like: and as far from probability that he should "go about to extinguish that virtue (whereof even until that day he had given testimony)
"to the end that alwaies hereafter he might be defamed for such an indignity. For long be"fore this time he was named and intituled to succeed him, and to enjoy those very honours
"whereof already he partook no small part: whereby he protested that it was unlikely, that "he, who might enjoy the halfe of all that his father had, in all security, vertue and honour, "should desire the whole with infamy and danger; yea and with incertitude to obtain the "same; considering in especial, that the punishment which had befallen his brothers (whom "he had disclosed and accused at such time as they were hidden) was procured by him,
"who, if he had listed, might have concealed them in secret, and whose wickedness toward I
"their father (after it was approved) he himself had revenged upon them: neither (as he said)
"repented he himself of that which he had done: for that action of his might be an argument "to approve how incorruptly he loved his father. And as touching that which he had dealt in
"at Rome, Cæsar himself was witness thereof, who could be no more deceived, than God him"self: whereof those letters bore record, which were written by him; which in equity should "be of no less force than the slanders of those who sought to set them at odds: the most part "of which objections and reproaches had been complotted and devised by his enemies, who "have had the leisure to pursue the same during his absence, which they could not have per"formed in his presence. Finally, he avowed, that all those confessions were false which were "extorted by torture, in that it ordinarily falleth out, that such as are put to the tryal, confess K
"many things by force of torment that are untrue, to satisfie them that put them thereto:
"briefly without al favour, he offered himself to the rack in justification of his innocency. Up"on these his protestations, all the councel & assistants were confounded. For all of them had "great compassion of Antipater, who was wholly drowned in his tears; so that his very ene"mies began to pity him. And Herod himself made it appear, that he seemed in some sort to "be altered in his opinion: notwithstanding he endeavoured to conceal the same.

Nicholaus Damascene proseciuteth the Kings accusation.

But Nicholaus, according as he was requested, prosecuted that accusation which the King had begun, urging all things to the uttermost, and producing all the witnesses, and those manifest proofs, that were gathered from their examinations that were tortured. In especial, he amply discoursed of the Kings virtue, which he had fatherly expressed in the education and L
"instruction of his Children; for which he had been so unkindly and unnaturally required.
"Moreover, that his first childrens foolish rashness was not so much to be wondred at, for that "being young, they had been corrupted by the malice of their counsellers, and had blotted
"out of their hearts all the laws of nature, rather through ambition of rule, than desire of "riches. But that Antipaters boldness was both wonderful and wicked, who more cruel than "the cruellest beasts (who towards their benefactors acknowledge each good turn) was no"thing mollified by his fathers so great indulgence; not terrified by his brothers calamity,
"but must needs emulate them in their cruelty. And thou thy self (said he) O Antipater, wert
"the Judge of their attempted treasons, by thy inquisition they were indicted, thou didst ex"ecute the justice against them being convicted. Neither do we disallow that thou didst M "prosecute them with just indignation but rather admire thee for that thou imitatest their in"temperance: and we easily gather that those acts of thine were not attempted for thy fathers
"security, but intended for thy brothers overthrow, that by detesting their malice, thou
"mightest insinuate thy self into the allowance and good liking of their father and thine, that "afterwards thou mightest more cunningly and securely bring him to his end, which at length
"thou hast attempted to perform. For whilest thou adjudgest thy guilty brothers to death, "and sparest their confederates, thou makest it manifest in all mens eies, that thou art in good "liking with them, whose assistance thou mightest hereafter use in oppressing thy father.

Thou

A "Thou haſt therefore taken a double pleaſure worthy thy manners; the one openly as if re-
"joycing and glorying, that by thy Brothers death thou haſt atchieved a matter of honour:
"the other ſecretly, with endeavouring by greater wickedneſs, but more ſecret fraud to "make an end of thy father; the revenger of whoſe injuries thou pretendeſt to be. For if "thou hadſt truly deteſted their malice, thou hadſt never eſteemed the ſame to be worthy of "thy imitation: for thou hadſt not cut them off for committing ſuch capital offences, as "were anſwerable unto thine, but for that they had a more juſt and rightful title to ſucceed in "the Kingdom than thou haſt. And thou haſt thought good to mix the murther of thy father "with the ſlaughtered bodies of thy Brothers, for fear leſt thou ſhouldeſt be ſuddenly con"vinced in thy conſpiracies againſt them, and to the end that the puniſhment that thou well
"deſerveſt to ſuffer, ſhould light upon thy infortunate father, projecting with your ſelf ſuch a "paricide, and ſo rare and hainous a murther, that to this day the like thereof hath not been B "heard of amongſt men. For thou being his Son haſt practiſed theſe treaſons, not only a-"gainſt thy father, but againſt him that loved thee above meaſure, and did thee good beyond
"hope, with whom thou haſt actual participation of the Government of the Kingdom, and "who had appointed thee his heir in the ſame, being no ways hindred, either for the preſent
"or in times paſt, to participate the pleaſure of Sovereignty, and being aſſured of the hope of "Succeſſion both by the will and writing of thy father. But you have meaſured the courſe of "your affairs, not according to Herods vertue, but according to your own appetite and malice,
"intending to deprive ſuch a father of his part, who granted you the whole; & ſeeking in ef"fect to murther him, whom in words you pretended heretofore to protect from injury. And C "not content your ſelf to practiſe theſe treacheries, you have poyſoned your Mother alſo
"with no leſs corruption, and in ſtead of love that ſhould have been amongſt brethren, you "have filled your family with mutinies and hatreds: And after and beſides all theſe things,
"thou haſt been ſo audacious, as to call thy father beaſt, being of thy ſelf more malignant
"than thoſe beaſts which are moſt venemous, uſing thine own venom againſt thy deareſt
"friends, and ſuch as have beſt deſerved at thy hands, ſtrengthning thy ſelf with his Guard, &
"divers treacheries both of men and women againſt one old man, as if thy curſed mind alone "were not ſufficient to ſatisfie thy hatred. And now after ſo many men and women, ſlaves &
"freemen tortured for thy cauſe, after the open and manifeſt teſtimonies of thy parties in the "conſpiracie, thou art ſo impudent as yet to contradict the truth: and thou that lately hopedſt
D "to deprive thy father of his life, doeſt now as much as in thee lieth, endeavour to aboliſh
"that law that was inſtituted againſt malefactors in thy kind, herewithal Varus equity, and all "whatſoever is juſtice in the world. Doeſt thou therefore accuſe them of falſhood, who were "examined in torments, to the end thou mighteſt endanger their credit, who were the pre"ſervers of thy fathers life? Shall we believe thee more than them in their torments? wilt "thou not (O Varus) deliver the King from the injury of thoſe, who are his own fleſh and "blood? wilt thou not put this wicked beaſt to death, who hath murthered his brothers, to pre"tend a love towards his father, and who hath at laſt been diſcovered to be the moſt mortal
"enemy of them all, to the intent that at one inſtant he might eſtabliſh the Kingdom in "himſelf? Thou knoweſt that Patricide is no private crime, but a publike injury to life and E "nature, which is no leſs loathſom in the thought, than it is in the act: which whoſo puniſh-
"eth not, is of himſelf guilty of an injury offered to our common mother nature.

Patricide that publike injury of life and nature.

After theſe ſpeeches, he annexed certain points as touching Antipaters Mother, which through feminine frailty had been blabbed out by her, to wit, that ſhe had asked counſel of ſoothſayers and diviners, to whom the Kingdom ſhould befal: and that ſhe had offered ſacrifices, and made prayers for the death of the King. And moreover, he declared what laſcivious pranks Antipater had played with Pheroras women, in banquetting and amorous and wanton dalliances. The informations likewiſe that were preſented by ſuch as were tortured, with ſundry teſtimonies of divers men; ſome ſuborned, the other found out to be incontinently produced and confirmed. For each man ſeeing that Antipater was expoſed to the F accuſations of thoſe men, who had the Government in their hands, and that the good fortune that had long time accompanied him, had openly delivered him into the hands of his enemies, they immediately diſcovered the inſatiable hatred which they had conceived againſt him, whereas before time the fear that they had of him inforced them to be ſilent: yet was he not ſo much burdened with other mens hatreds, as with his own wickedneſs; namely, his deadly hatred againſt his father, his breach of amity amongſt his brethren, whereby he filled the Kings houſhold with ſeditions and murthers, of ſome complotted, and acted by other ſome; neither giving place to hatred according to juſtice, nor to amity according to good affection, but according as it might ſtand with his profit. Which for that divers men perceived long before that time, they judged of events according as they had reaſon, and the rather becauſe that being void of hatred, they ſpake but their opinions. And whereas heretofore they had cried with a loud voice againſt him, at ſuch time as they were ſhut up; at this time when they were deprived of their fear, they declared all things, that they knew. And whereas there were divers produced of the miſchiefs committed by him, yet ſeemed there nothing to be feigned, for that the accuſers neither ſpake in favour of the King, neither concealed any thing for fear of peril, but condemned all Antipaters wicked actions, and judged him worthy of death and puniſhment, not ſo much for his fathers ſecurity, as of his own demerit. Neither did they only accuſe him, who were by juſtice tied thereunto, but divers voluntary witneſſes alſo brought in their evidence; ſo that although he was a very cunning diſſembler, and colourer of his lies, and moſt impudent in their aſſertions, yet durſt he not once open his mouth or mutter againſt the ſame.

Antipater accuſed by all men.

As ſoon as Nicholas had finiſhed his diſcourſe and accuſations, Varus commanded Antipater to anſwer to thoſe crimes that were objected againſt him, if he had any thing to alleadg, that he was not guilty of thoſe forfeits or hainous crimes that were laid unto his charge. For of himſelf he deſired nothing more, and knew well that Herod his Father deſired no leſs, than that he ſhould juſtifie himſelf, and maintain his innocencie. But he humbling himſelf upon his face, and lowly bending his body to the ground, beſought God, who was the ſearcher of all hearts, to approve his innocencie by ſome eminent ſign, how he had never attempted any thing to his fathers prejudice. For this is the cuſtom of all wicked men, that as often as they attempt any hainous act, they ingage themſelves in all wickedneſs, without any reſpect of Gods juſtice; and when as by their miſdeeds they are fallen into peril, then call they God to their minds, by whoſe invocation and teſtimony they deſire to be delivered, making a ſhew that they commit all things to his determination. The like whereof in this time hapned in Antipater; who, whereas before time he diſpoſed all his actions in ſuch ſort, as if there had been no God that had the overſway of humane affairs; at ſuch time as juſtice overtook him, and he was diſfurniſht of the benefit of the Law, had his recourſe to Gods power, alleadging that he was reſerved by God to this end, that he might diligently intend his fathers ſafety. Hereupon Varus, when as by often queſtionings he could wreſt nothing from him, but that he only cried upon God, ſeeing that otherwiſe there would be no end of theſe debates, he commanded the poyſon to be brought forth before them all, that he might make experience of what force it was: which being preſently brought unto him, and miniſtred to one that was condemned to die, it preſently killed the man. Which done, he aroſe and departed out of the Councel, and the next day went unto Antioch, where for the moſt part he was wont to have his reſidence, for that it was the chief City of the Aſſyrians. But Herod preſently commanded his Son to be put in bonds, no man knowing what talk had been between him and Varus upon his departure, but all mens opinion was that the King did nothing in impriſoning him, but by his counſel. When as therefore he had faſt bound him, he ſent unto Cæſar, and wrote his Letters unto him, as touching Antipater, ſending certain appointed Meſſengers, who by word of mouth might certifie him of his curſed treaſons.

Varus giveth Antipater licence to juſtifie himſelf.

Antipater ſtriveth by his proteſtationss and invocation of God, to juſtifie himſelf.

The poyſon is miniſtred to a condemned man, and it killeth him. Hedio & Ruffinus, c. 7.

Herod impriſoned his Son, and ſent Embaſſadours to Cæſar to certifie his abuſes.

At the very ſame time there was a Letter intercepted, ſent by Antiphilus to Antipater, which Antiphilus remained in Egypt: which Letter being opened by the King, was written to this effect: I have ſent you Acmes letter, hazarding thereby my own life: for you know that I am in danger of the diſpleaſure of two mighty families, if I ſhould be diſcovered. As for your ſelf, bethink you well of your affairs in this reſpect. Such were the contents of this Letter. The King made diligent ſearch for others alſo, but he could find none: for Antiphilus ſervant, who had brought that which was read, denied that he had any other. But while the King was in this doubt, one of his ſervants and friends perceived that the inſide of the Meſſengers under-coat was newly ſewed: for he had two garments the one upon the other: and conjecturing that the letters might be hid in the foulds thereof, as indeed they were, he ripped the ſame, and found them. The tenour whereof was this: Acme to Antipater, Health: I have written the Letters to your father, according as you gave me inſtructions, and I have counterfeited the copy of my Letter, as if it had been ſent by Salome my Miſtreſs. I aſſure my ſelf, that when he hath read the ſame, he will puniſh Salome as one that hath practiſed treaſon againſt him. But that letter that was ſuppoſed to have been written by Salome to Acme, was of Antipaters invention, and written in Salomes name, according to his invention, and in Acmes ſtyle. The contents were theſe: Acme to King Herod, Health: whereas I have an eſpecial care, that nothing be concealed from thee that concerneth thy ſecurity, having found a Letter of Salomes written againſt thee unto my Lady, I have not without danger taken the copy thereof, and ſent it unto you, in which ſhe required that ſhe might have licence to marry Syllæus. Tear this copy, leſt through the knowledg of the ſame, I grow in danger of my life. Now in that which ſhe had written to Antipater, ſhe diſcovered that ſhe had written theſe words to Herod, according to that commandment he had given her, as if Salome had conſpired to work ſome treaſon againſt him. She ſent alſo the copy of thoſe counterfeit Letters in the name of Salome, and ſent them unto her Miſtreſs to work treaſon.

Acmes Letters to Herod.

This Acme was a Jew born, and chambermaid to Julia, Cæſars wife, and did that which is above written, for the love which ſhe bare to Antipater, whom he had hired by great ſums of money, to the end, that ſhe ſhould aſſiſt him to execute the miſchief, which he practiſed againſt his father and againſt his Aunt. Herod made almoſt deſperate by the great miſchiefs of Antipater, was ſtirred up on the ſudden to ſhorten his days, for that he was the only means that ſtirred up theſe great tempeſts of ſedition in his Kingdom, and who not only practiſed againſt his father and his Aunt, but againſt his Siſter alſo; and had in like ſort corrupted Cæſars family. Salome alſo incenſed him the more, beating her breaſts and offering her ſelf to all deaths, if any ſuch like matter might be duly proved againſt her. For which cauſe Herod ſent for Antipater, commanding him to ſpeak freely all that which he had to ſay without fear. But he having not one word to anſwer for his defence, Herod ſaid unto him: Since that on all ſides thou art convicted, and ſurprized in thy wickedneſs, delay not, but diſcover thoſe that are of thy confederacie. Whereupon he laid all the fault upon Antiphilus, and named none other. At that time Herod being wounded by extreme grief, would have ſent Antipater to Rome unto Cæſar, that he might receive his judgment from him, but afterwards he feared leſt by the intereſt of his friends he ſhould eſcape the danger, for which cauſe he kept him bound and fettered in priſon, as he had done before: And in the mean while he ſent certain Meſſengers with letters to Cæſar, to accuſe his Son, and to declare wherein Acme had been his confederate, producing the copy of the Letters. Theſe Embaſſadors therefore reſorted to Rome, inſtructed in thoſe things they were to anſwer to thoſe interrogatories that ſhould be offered them, and with them he ſent theſe Letters.

CHAP. VIII.

Herods Sickneſs, and the Sedition amongſt the Jews.

MEan while Herod fell ſick, and made his Will, and appointed his youngeſt Son to ſucceed him in the Kingdom, for that through Antipaters inſtigations he had conceived a hate againſt Archelaus and Philip. He ſent alſo a thouſand Talents unto Cæſar, and five hundred to his wife, and to his children, friends, and free-men. He beſtowed alſo Money, rents, and lands upon his own children: he gave his Siſter Salome an ample poſſeſſion, for that ſhe had always perſevered in loving him, and had never offended him. And having loſt all hope of recovery, for that he was about 70 years old, he became very tutchy and froward in whatſoever his affairs. The cauſe hereof was, that opinion he had conceived, that he waxed contemptible, and that the whole Nation took pleaſure in thoſe miſ-haps which befortuned him: which ſome of thoſe who were favoured by the people, made him the rather believe upon this occaſion which enſueth: Amongſt thoſe that were moſt learned among the Jews, Judas the Son of Sariphæus, & Matthias the Son of Margalothus, the moſt excellent Interpreters of the Laws and ordinances of the Country (and for this cauſe were in greateſt eſtimation amongſt the people, by reaſon that they inſtructed and trained up the youth; for all thoſe that deſired to obtain vertue, ſpent all their time with them) underſtanding that the Kings ſickneſs was dangerous, they incenſed the younger ſort, counſelling them to overthrow all thoſe works that the King had cauſed to be made, contrary to the law and cuſtome of the Country; to the end, that they fighting for piety, might obtain the reward that attendeth the ſame. For in that the King had enterprized and done many things contrary to the Law, divers unaccuſtomed miſeries had befallen him, and namely that ſickneſs wherewith he was detained. For Herod had done divers things contrary to the ancient law; againſt which Judas and Matthias exclaimed openly. For he had erected over the Portal of the great Temple, an Eagle of gold of great value. Now the Law prohibiteth that they, who pretend to live according to the ſame, ſhould in any ſort erect any Image, or repreſent any figures of living creatures whatſoever. For this cauſe theſe Doctors counſelled them to pull down that Eagle: telling them, that although the matter ſeemed to want no peril, yet ought they rather to prefer an honeſt death before a pleaſant life, if ſo be it be imployed for the defence of their Countrey-laws and Religion. For in ſo doing, they ſhould obtain immortal praiſe for the preſent, and a memorable and eternal glory in time to come; neither that they ſhould protract the execution thereof for fear of danger, ſince death was a thing that might not be avoided; ſo that ſince by the general courſe of nature, they muſt needs die, it ſhould become them bravely to forſake their lives with praiſe and honour in imbracing vertue. For to die in the execution of ſome noble exploit (which cannot be atchieved without hazard of danger) their children ſhould be richly rewarded with the fruits thereof, and their other parents that ſhould outlive them (of what ſex ſoever) ſhould reap the fruits of that glory which was honourably atchieved by them. In theſe or ſuch like words incouraged they the young men.

Contempt of death.

About that time there was a rumour ſpred, that the King was dead, which gave very great furtherance to the Doctors reſolution. For at high noon they went up into the Temple, they pulled and hewed down the Eagle with their axes, in the ſight and aſſembly of a great number of people that were in the Temple. Now when the tidings hereof came unto the ears of the Kings Captain, he fearing leſt ſome further and more fatal tumult might be raiſed, drew out a ſtrong company of Souldiers with him, to repulſe thoſe that were aſſembled to hew down the Eagle: and charging the rude and diſarmed multitude, who were gathered together, he eaſily ſlew and diſperſed the moſt; as for thoſe fourty young men that valiantly addreſſed themſelves to reſiſt, he apprehended them, and with them the Authors of ſedition, Judas and Matthias, who thought ſcorn to ſubmit themſelves, and led them to the King, who demanding of them how they durſt deface the ſacred Image? they anſwered, that long before that time they had reſolved it, and that now according as they had reſolved, they had like valiant men performed the ſame. For we (ſaid they) maintain the honour of God and the doctrine of our Law, whereof we are Diſciples: neither ought you to admire that with contempt of your ordinances we have preferred the Laws of our forefathers, which Moſes hath left us in writing, according as he was ſuggeſted and taught them by God: neither do we refuſe any death or puniſhment which thou ſhalt inflict upon us, being aſſured in our conſciences, that we ſuffer not for our impiety, but piety ſake. Thus ſpake they all of them, continuing the like conſtant boldneſs in their anſwers, as they had ſhewed in their actions, being alſo ready, conſtantly to endure any puniſhment for that which they had attempted. Hereupon the King commanded them to be bound, and ſent them to Jericho: then calling before him thoſe principal Jews, who had the Government under him; and being brought into their aſſembly upon his pallat, by reaſon of his weakneſs, he recited unto them the numberleſs travels he had endured for their ſakes: in like manner, how upon his great charges he had repaired and re-edified the Temple: whereas the Aſmoneans for the ſpace of 125 years, wherein they reigned, could not perform ſuch a building in the honour of God. Moreover, he ſignified unto them, how he had adorned the ſame with precious gifts, for which he hoped that after his death his memory and glory ſhould ſurvive. After this, he expoſtulated with them for what cauſe they obſtained not from offering him that outrage during his lifetime? And why at noon days and in the ſight of all the people, they had laid hands on thoſe preſents which he had dedicated unto God, and had taken thoſe things away violently which though in words they appertained to him, yet in the effect if the act were well examined, they had taken from God. The Governours ſuſpecting his cruelty, and fearing leſt his unbridled paſſion ſhould urge him further, by which means they might be aſſured of ſome ſevere puniſhment, anſwered him: that thoſe things were not done by their conſents, and that in their opinion the injury ought not to be let ſlip without puniſhment. At that time Herod ſhewed himſelf more favourable towards the reſt, but he cauſed Matthias to be deprived of the Prieſthood, as one in part who had been the cauſe of that which had hapned; and in his place ſubſtituted Jozar one of his wives Brethren. During the Prieſthood of this Matthias it hapned alſo, that another High Prieſt was elected that very day wherein the Jews did uſually celebrate their Faſt. For Matthias the night before the day of the Faſt, ſeemed in his dream to have the company of his wife; and whereas for this cauſe he was unfit to offer the divine Sacrifice, he had Joſeph the Son of Ellemus, appointed him to be his aſſiſter and ſubſtitute, by reaſon of his alliance. Herod therefore depoſed Matthias: and as touching the other Matthias, who had moved this trouble, both he and his companions were by his commandment conſumed with fire.

The young men pulling down the golden Eagle hew it in pieces with their axes.

Judas and Matthias with forty other young men being brought to the Kings preſence juſtifie their actions with joy, and the King ſendeth them bound to Jericho.

Herod aſſembleth the Governours of the Jews, and expoſtulateth with them about this commotion.

Matthias deprived of the High Prieſthood, and Jozaris aſſigned his place.

Joſeph Ellemi for one day High Prieſt.

Matthias and Judas burned.

This very night the Moon was eclipſed, and Herods ſickneſs grew more vehement. For God puniſhed thoſe ſins which he had committed. For he was inflamed with a lent or ſlow fire, which to the outward ſenſe ſeemed not ſo vehement, but inwardly ſearched and afflicted all

The Eclipſe.

A all his entrails: he had also a ravenous and unnatural appetite to his meat, which might no ways be satisfied. Besides that, he had an ulcer in his bowels, with a strange and furious collick. His feet were swoln with moist and shining flegm, and his stomack was no less affected also. His Members rotted, and were full of crawling worms, with a filthy, and no less troublesome Priapism, accompanied with an intollerable stench: besides all this, he had a strong convulsion of his nerves, and shortness of breath. For which cause it was a general opinion amongst holy men, & such as had the knowledg of Prophecie, that the King was thus punished for his infinites impieties and sins committed against the Majesty of God. And although he was tormented with an unsupportable sickness, yet had he hope to escape: and for that cause he sent for Physicians from all places, and refused none of those remedies which

B they thought behoveful for him. He therefore past over Jordan and went into the hot baths of Calliroes, the waters whereof are potable, besides other vertues they have against all other kind of sickness: this water dischargeth it self into the lake called Asphaltites. Being there, it was thought good by his Physicians, that he should refresh himself in those waters: There being set by them into a bathing tub filled with oyl, he waxed so sick, that they held him for dead. Whereupon all his household servants wept, and grievously lamented; and all his familiar friends cried out and bewailing him, with their great noise caused him to come to himself: and seeing himself wholly out of hope to escape, he gave order that there should a distribution be made to every Souldier the sum of fifty drachmes, and he offered great presents to their Captains and his friends. Afterwards he returned to Jericho,

C where a melancholy humor possessed him, which made him unsociable, and displeased against all men; so that seeing that he must needs die, he bethought him of this facinorous action that followeth. For the Noblest men amongst the Nation of the Jews, resorting unto him from all parts (upon his commandment under the express penalty of loss of life, to whosoever should neglect the same) the King shewed himself to be displeased, as well against those whom he thought guilty, as against them who had given him no occasion of discontent. For he caused them to be shut up in a place called the Hippodrome, which was the tilt-yard to run Horses in, and sent for his Sister Salome, and Alexas her husband, telling them that his end was at hand, for that his griefs did incessantly torment him: which as he said, he ought to bear patiently, because it was an end that should happen to all men. But that which most grieved him was, that he saw himself deprived of those mournings and lamen-

D tations, which a King deserved. For he was not to seek of the Jews affections, neither how his death was desired and longed for by them, since that in his life time they presumed so far as to revolt, and dishonour and deface those gifts, which he had bestowed upon the Commonweal. It therefore behoved them to afford him some solace in that his bitter anguish, for that if they refused not to perform that which he had contrived in his mind, the lamentation of his death should be magnificent, & as great as ever any King ever had: & the pleasure and laughter that might accompany his death, should be abated by their sorrow, who should unfeignedly lament for the whole Nation. He therefore willed them, that at such time as he should give up the ghost, they should cause the Hippodrome to be invironed by

E his Souldiers, as yet unadvertised of his death (which he would not have published before this execution were ended) and to command them to shoot their arrows at those that were shut up therein. And that when they had slain them all after this manner, they should make him triumph and rejoyce in a double joy; first, for that in his death his commandment should be ratified by effect: secondly, for that he should be honoured by a memorable lamentation. Thus weeping, he besought his Kinsfolk for the love they bare unto him, and for the faith they bare unto God, that they should not suffer him to die frustrate of his last honour: and they protested that they would not transgress any point of this his commandment. Hereby a man may conjecture what his nature was, who took pleasure in these above-named impieties, and who through the desire he had of long life, hath after this sort dealt with those of his blood: and it may be conjectured by these his last commandments, that he had nothing

F in him that savoured any humanity: for that departing out of the world, he had such a mind, that all the Nation, and all such as were most affectionate towards him, should be driven to sorrow and desolation; commanding that in every house one should be slain, yea, such as had not in any sort offended him, and were not accused of any misdeed committed against any other: whereas they that have any vertue, finding themselves at that state, have been accustomed to lay aside the hatred which they have before-time born unto their enemies.

Antipaters death.

The year of the World, 3963. after Christs Nativity, 1.

Letters are sent from Rome, that Acme was executed by Cæsars command, and that he had authority to use Antipater at his pleasure.

WHileſt he delivered theſe inſtructions to his kindred, he received Letters from thoſe Embaſſadors which he had ſent to Rome unto Cæſar: the effect whereof was, that Acme was put to death by Cæſars command, who was diſpleaſed with her for that ſhe had been of Antipaters conſpiracie, who was remitted to Herods pleaſure like a King and father to uſe him, as beſt pleaſed him; either to exile and baniſh him; or if it ſo pleaſed him, to put him to death. Herod receiving theſe news, recovered his ſpirits a little through the pleaſure he received in the contents of thoſe Letters, both of Acmes death, as of the power that was granted him to puniſh his Son. But being aſſailed afreſh with grievous dolours, and urged with a deſire to eat, he called for an apple and a knife: for before-time he was accuſtomed to pare his apples himſelf, and to cut a little; and afterwards to eat it: when as therefore he had gotten hold of the knife, he looked round about him, determining to give himſelf a mortal wound therewith, and had ſurely done it, had not Achiabus his nephew haſtily ſtept within him, and ſtaid his hand, and called for aſſiſtance. At that time the ſorrow and lamentation was renewed in all the Palace, as if the King had been already dead: and Antipater certainly believing that his father was departed, began to hope (and confirmed no leſs in his words) that being delivered out of priſon, he ſhould obtain the poſſeſſion of the Kingdom without any difficulty: and deviſed with the Jaylor as touching his deliverance, offering him great preſents both in hand and hereafter, as if there had been no other queſtion but of that. But ſo far was the Jaylor from obeying that which Antipater demanded, that he went and certified the King what his intent was, and what offers he made him. Herod, who had already conceived a ſiniſter opinion of his Son, hearing what the Jaylor had ſaid, began to exclaim, and to beat his head, although he was at the uttermoſt gaſp: and lifting himſelf up upon his elbows, he commanded that one of his Guard ſhould preſently haſte and kill him; and that done, he ſhould be buried in the Caſtle of Hircanion, without any honour.

Herods will, Death and Burial.

Hedio & Ruffinus, c 10.

Herods will is changed.

AFter this, having changed his mind, he made a new Teſtament. For he appointed Antipas Tetrach of Galilee and of Peræa, whereas before that he had inſtituted him for his Succeſſour in the Kingdom. He created Archelaus King; he gave the Provinces of Gaulonites, Trachonites, Batanea, and Paneade to Philip his Son, and Archelaus Brother by the Mothers ſide, to be Tetrach over thoſe places. He gave his Siſter Salome, Jamnia, Azot, and Phaſælis, with fifty thouſand crowns of gold. He provided alſo for his other Kinſmen, all whom he left rich in Money, which he gave them, and revenews which he aſſigned them. He gave Cæſar ten millions of drachmes in ſilver, amounting to the ſum of eleven hundred thouſand Franks, beſides a great quantity of gold and ſilver plate, and of precious moveables. To Julia, Cæſars wife, and to certain others, he bequeathed five millions of drachmes, amounting to five hundred and fifty thouſand Francks, or thereabout. After he had in this manner diſpoſed all things, ſome five days after he had cauſed Antipater to be executed, he departed this life: having reigned after Antigonus death, for the ſpace of thirty & four years, and thirty and ſeven years after he was elected and approved King by the Romans: a man without reſpect cruel, and ſevere towards all men; ſlave to his wrath; Lord of the Laws: yet ſo favoured by fortune, as no man more, for from a private man he became a King, and being invironed with many perils, he always happily eſcaped, and he lived alſo a very long time. And as touching his family and children, in this alſo in his own opinion was he happy, in that he overcame his enemies and adverſaries: but in my opinion, he was moſt unfortunate.

Herods death.

Herods mutable and ſtrange fortune.

But before the Kings death was thorowly known, Salome and Alexas diſcharged thoſe that were locked up in the Hippodrome, and ſent every one of them home unto his own houſe, telling them that the King commanded them to depart and follow their houſhold affairs, and till their land: wherein they performed a moſt noble action, and benefited the whole Nation with an eſpecial good turn. After the Kings death was bruted abroad, Salome and Alexas cauſed all the men of War to be aſſembled in the Amphitheater in Jericho, and firſt Salome and Alexas after the Kings death, diſmiſs the Jews that were ſhut up in the Hippodrome.

A first of all they caused Herods Letters to be read, which were addressed to the Souldiers, in which he gave them thanks for the fidelity and good will which they had expressed towards him, praying them to continue the same to Archelaus his Son, whom he had appointed to be their King after him. That done, Ptolomey, to whom the King had committed the custody of his seal, recited his Testament, which was to take no effect, except that Cæsar approved the same. Thereupon all of them began to applaud and honour Archelaus for their King. The men of War flocked about him in Troops, accompanied with their Captains, promising him to serve him with no less will and affection, than they had done his Father, praying God to yeeld him his assistance.

At that time also the Kings Hearse was prepared, and Archelaus gave order that his obsequies should be most royally performed, and bestowed all the furniture that was requisite for that funeral and Princely interment. He was carried out in a gilded litter, distinguished B with divers precious stones, the cover thereof was of azure colour. The dead body was apparelled in a purpel raiment, having a Diadem upon his head, over which there was set a Crown of gold, and a Scepter was couched in his right hand. About this litter marched a great number of his Children and Kinsfolk; and after them followed the men of War, disposed in bands and Troops, according to the manners of every Nation. The first of these were the Archers of his Guard: after them went the Thracians: and lastly, marched the Germans, and Galatians; all of them in their warlike abiliments and discipline. After them followed all the Army, marching in order in like manner as when they were addressed to Battel, each one under his Corporal and Captain. Next these followed five hundred of his house- C hold servants, bearing perfumes, and all these in this equipage marched to the Castle of Herodion, distant some eight stades or furlongs off. For there was he intombed, according to the tenour of his Testament. Thus died Herod. Archelaus continued his mourning for seven days space in honour of his father. (For the Law of the Countrey ordaineth no less.) And after he had feasted the people, and laid aside his mourning apparel, he ascended up into the Temple. All the way as he went, all the people with shouts and acclamations, cried, God save the King; and with prayers and praises honoured him to their uttermost, and he being conducted up to a high station and state, which was made for their purpose, and placed in a Throne that was embellished with gold, entertained the people very graciously, taking pleasure in their acclamations and congratulations that they bestowed upon him. He gave them D thanks also, "For that they had blotted out of their remembrance the injuries that his Fa- "ther had done unto them; protesting in his own behalf, that he would inforce himself to "requite their kindness, with an intire affection. He likewise told them, that for the present "he accepted not the stile of King, because the honour was bequeathed him with this condi- "tion, that Cæsar should ratifie his Fathers Testament. For this cause, although the Souldiers that were in Jericho inforced themselves to set the Diadem upon his head, yet would he not accept that uncertain honour, because it was not resolved whether Cæsar, who was the principal party in the gift, would grant him the Government or no.

Archelaus banquetteth the people.

He alleadged likewise, that if his affairs succeeded according to his desire, he would not, according as his honour commanded him, forget their love, or leave their good affection E unrequited. And that in the mean while, he would enforce himself by all means to further those things that concerned them, and entertain them with more kindness, than his Father had done. But they, according as it is the custom of the common people, thinking that those that enter into such Dignities, declare and open their minds at the first day, the more Archelaus spake kindly and courteously unto them, the more they applauded him, and presented him with divers petitions, for certain grants and donations from him. Some of them cried out unto him, that he should cut off some part of their taxes and tallages, which they payed annually. Othersome cried upon him, to deliver those prisoners that were committed by Herod, of whom divers had pined a long time in prison: Others instantly urged him to cut off those tributes which had been imposed by him upon bargains and sales, which was to pay F the half of the bargain. Whereunto Archelaus did not in any sort contradict, striving to the uttermost of his power to please the people, for that he knew full well that their good affection would be no small advantage toward him in the confirmation of his Kingdom. That done, he sacrificed unto God, and afterward fell to banquetting and entertainment of his friends.

Archelaus promises that with Cæsars approbation, he will carefully intend the desires and profits of the people.

CHAP. XI.

The people mutiny againſt Archelaus.

The year of the world, 3963. after Chriſts Nativity, 1.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 12. al. 13.

The ſeditious people bewail Matthias, and thoſe that were executed with them.

MEan while, certain men among the Jews that were deſirous of innovation, in their private conventicles bewailed Matthias and his Confederates, whom Herod had put to death, and condemned for razing and defacing the Golden Eagle: for that incontinently after their deceaſe, they had neither been publikely honored, nor lamented for, by reaſon of the fear that the people had conceived of Herod. For which cauſe at that time they required with lamentations and great cries, that their obſequies might be ſolemnized; and as if the dead bodies had received ſome contentation by their tears and tempeſts of exclaims, they uttered many hainous and diſgraceful ſpeeches againſt Herod; and aſſembling themſelves together, they requeſted Archelaus to do them juſtice againſt thoſe, that during Herods life were in Authority; and eſpecially they demanded, that the High Prieſt, who was advanced by his Father, ſhould be depoſed, and that another more lawful and upright might be placed in his ſtead, to offer and exerciſe the High Prieſts place. Now, though Archelaus was ſore diſpleaſed at theſe their violent proceedings, yet notwithſtanding, he conformed himſelf to their good likings, in that he was with all expedition to repair unto Rome, to underſtand and attend Cæſars pleaſure. He therefore called for the General of his army, willing him to perſwade them not to ſeek a revenge for thoſe men, who were dead, notwithſtanding they were their friends; becauſe whatſoever was done, was done according to Law; and that no inquiry might be made thereof, except to the great prejudice of his reputation, and hazard of his ſtate, in regard of the uncertainty of the time: that it was more expedient for him to ſtudy for the maintenance of peace, until ſuch time as being eſtabliſhed in the Kingdom by Cæſars conſent, he ſhould return back again unto them, and that then he would conſult with them for the common profit, according to their juſt demands, wiſhing them for the preſent to contain themſelves, and to take heed leſt they ſtirred up ſedition.

They would be revenged on Herods friends, and would depoſe the High Prieſt.

The year of the world, 3964. after Chriſts Nativity, 2.

When he had thus inſtructed his General, he ſent him unto them. But they cried out with a loud voice, and would not ſuffer him to ſpeak: but for fear of danger and death, they put him to ſilence. And if any other were ſo forwards as to ſpeak unto them, and perſwade them to ſome moderation, and to alter their ſiniſter reſolutions, he was alſo in danger: for that they had this perſwaſion, that all things ought rather to be ordred according to their pleaſures, than by the authority of their Superiours: ſuppoſing that although during Herods lifetime they had been deprived of their deareſt friends, it ſhould be now a matter unworthy their courages, after his death to be cut off from their priviledge to demand their revenge. For they were tranſported with their own opinions, and held all that for lawful and upright, which was in any ſort conformable to their pleaſures, without foreſeeing the danger that might happen thereby: ſo much were they pleaſed to be revenged on thoſe, whom they reputed to be their enemies. Now, whereas divers were ſent by Archelaus to conſult with them, and divers came unto them, not as meſſengers for him, but as friends and lovers of peace, of their own motion, with an intent to pacifie them, they would not permit any of them to ſpeak; and through their rage there aroſe a great tumult, which had grown to a further extremity, if a greater number of people had joyned themſelves with them.

Sedition at the Feaſt of the Paſſeover.

At that time fell the Feaſt of unleavened bread, which is called Paſcha, which is a memorial of their deliverance out of Egypt, at which time all men do moſt willingly preſent their ſacrifices, and a greater number of beaſts are ſlain at that Feaſt, than at any other time. To this ſolemnity alſo an infinite number of people aſſembled from all parts to honour God: whereby the ſeditious (ſuppoſing that they had gotten fit opportunity) lamented Judas and Matthias, who were the Expoſitors of the Law, and kept themſelves within the Temple, whither they had gathered good ſtore of victuals, which they were not aſhamed impudently to beg for. But Archelaus, fearing leſt their rage ſhould produce ſome more grievous effect of miſchief, ſent out a band of armed men, with a Captain, and a Regiment of a thouſand men, to repreſs their head-long fury, before the reſt of the people were infected with their follies; and to bring them likewiſe unto him, whom they found to be the forwardeſt in that commotion. Againſt thoſe the ſeditious cried out with great clamours, and incenſed the people againſt them, ſo that all of them ruſhed in upon the men of War, and ſlew divers of them. The reſt of them eſcaped with their Captain, yet not without divers wounds. That done, they which were within the Temple, returned again to their Divine ſervice.

Now

A Now Archelaus ſuppoſing that his whole fortune was endangered, except he repreſſed the rage of the multitude, he ſent out all his footmen with a certain number of Horſmen, to prevent leſt they that were without ſhould yeeld aſſiſtance to thoſe; who had taken up their lodging in the Temple, and to put thoſe to the ſword, who having eſcaped the violence of the footmen, ſuppoſed themſelves to be in ſecurity. Theſe Horſmen ſlew about three thouſand men, the reſt retired themſelves into the mountains that were neer adjoyning. Hereupon Archelaus made proclamation, that each one ſhould repair unto his own houſe. For which cauſe they departed and abondoned the Feaſt, for fear of greater miſchief; notwithſtanding they had ſpleen enough, as it is the ordinary ſcuſtome of the ignorant multitude.

Three thouſand Jews ſlain.

After this, Archelaus accompanied with his Mother, betook himſelf to Sea, and led with him Nicholas and Ptolomey, with divers other his friends, committing the Government of all B his houſhold and Kingdom to his Brother Philip: with him alſo departed Salome, Herods Siſter, leading with her, her children. There went alſo divers other of his Kindred, who ſaid that they would all of them labour for Archelaus, that he might obtain the Kingdom, but in effect it was to contradict him with all his power: and in eſpecial, to urge that againſt him with great vehemencie, that was done in the Temple. Sabinus, Cæſars Viceroy in Syria, poſting into Jewry to take charge of Herods money, met with Archelaus in Cæſarea. But Varus arriving in the mean while, detained him from finiſhing that voyage; for Archelaus had ſent for him to come thither by Ptolomey, and Sabinus willing to do Varus a pleaſure, would not ſeize the fortreſs of Jewry; neither ſealed up Herods Treaſures, but left them in Archelaus C poſſeſſion, until ſuch time as Cæſar had given order for the eſtate; and after he had made this promiſe, he ſtayed in Cæſarea.

Archelaus repairs to Rome, and many of his faction follow him.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 13. al. 14.

After Archelaus had ſet ſail towards Rome, and Varus was departed for Antioch, Sabinus went to Jeruſalem, where he ſeized the Kings Palace: and calling before him the Kings Agents, and the Captains of his Garriſons, he required them to deliver up their Caſtles into his hands. But they, according as Archelaus had commanded them, continued the poſſeſſion in their accuſtomed manner, according to the Kings direction, pretending to keep the ſame in Cæſars behalf. At the ſame time Antipas Herods Son travelled to Rome likewiſe, under the hope to be elected King, in regard of Salomes promiſes; and for that he better deſerved the ſame than Archelaus, conſidering that in the firſt Teſtament, which ſhould be of more D force than the later, he had been appointed King. He led his Mother alſo with him, and Ptolomey the Brother of Nicholaus, who had been one of Herods moſt eſteemed friends, and was well-affected to further and ſet forward his title. But eſpecially he was ſtirred up to ſeek the Kingdom by Irenæus, a man very eloquent, and to whoſe charge in regard of his ſufficiency, the affairs of the Kingdom had been committed. For which cauſe, although he were perſwaded to give over the Kingdom unto his elder Brother, who was confirmed in the Kingdom by his Fathers Teſtament, yet would he not give ear thereunto. But Antipas no ſooner arrived in Rome, but all his Kinſfolk revolted from Archelaus unto him, not ſo much for the love they bare him, as for the hatred they conceived againſt Archelaus: and above all, for the deſire they had to recover their liberty, and to draw themſelves under a Roman Gover- E nour. For they thought that if there were any contradiction, that Antipas, for whom they endeavoured to procure the Royalty, ſhould be more profitable unto them than Archelaus: Sabinus alſo by his Letters accuſed Archelaus to Cæſar: but Archelaus by Ptolomey exhibited unto Cæſar a ſupplication containing his right and Title unto the Kingdom, his Fathers Teſtaments, and the account of the money which Herod his Father had ſealed up, together with his ring, and expected the iſſue.

Sabinus repaireth to Jeruſalem, with an intent to ſeize Herods treaſures and Caſtles.

Antipas under hope to recover the Kingdom, ſaileth to Rome.

But when he had read theſe Letters, and thoſe which Varus and Sabinus had ſent him, and underſtood what ſums of money he had left, and what the annual revenew was, and how Antipas challenged the Kingdom, and appropriated it to himſelf, according as his Letters made mention: he aſſembled all his friends to have their advice thereupon. Amongſt them F was Caius the Son of Agrippa and his daughter Julia, adopted by him, whom he cauſed to ſit in the chiefeſt place: which done, he commanded the aſſiſtants to ſpeak what they would touching this matter. At that Antipater, Salomes Son, a man very eloquent, and a great adverſary to Archelaus, ſpake firſt, ſaying, That it was a mockery for him at that time to ſpeak of the Kingdom, conſidering that before Cæſar had granted it him, he had already ſeized the forces of the State, when as upon a Feſtival day he had ſlain ſo many; who although they had deſerved that puniſhment, yet ought the juſtice thereof to have been reſerved to a lawful power, and not to have been uſurped by him, either being King with Cæſars prejudice, whoſe authority he had contemned; or by being a private man, which was a great overſight, ſight. For which cauſe he undeſervedly at this time hoped for his approbation, whom already, as much as in him lay, he had deprived of the title and authority of his allowance. Moreover, he objected againſt him, that of his own authority he had changed certain Chieftains of the Army, and that he had ſeated himſelf in the Royal Throne, and like a King had determined certain cauſes, and had granted certain demands of the people: finally, "That he had "left nothing undone, which he might have performed, had Cæſar confirmed his Title. He al- "leadged alſo, that they who were incloſed in the Hippodrome, were diſmiſſed by him, and "divers other acts, partly true, partly probable in regard of the ambition of young men, who "deſirous to govern, do ordinarily commit ſuch things: beſides this, his neglect in mourn- "ing for his father, and withal, his rare Banquets all night long at that very time his father "died; whereat the people began to mutiny, ſeeing the ſmall regard he had of his fathers "death, from whom he had received ſo great goods & honors. How all the day long he made "a ſhew of his ſorrow & tears in his pavillion, but all the night he took pleaſure like a King; "and being ſuch, if Cæſar ſhould grant him the Kingdom, he would behave himſelf no leſs "unkindly towards him, than he had don etowards his moſt kind father. That it was no leſs "than an hainous crime in him, to delight himſelf with ſongs and dances at his fathers death, "as if he had been his enemy: That he now came to Cæſars preſence, to the intent to obtain "the Kingdom by his conſent, whereas already he had behaved himſelf no otherwiſe then if "he had already been eſtabliſhed King by his authority. But moſt of all he exaggerated the "ſlaughter he had committed in the Temple, and the impiety perpetrated ſo near to the feaſt "of Eaſter, at which time, divers both ſtrangers and Citizens had been ſlaughtered after the "manner of ſacrifices, and the Temple filled with carcaſſes, not by a ſtranger, but by him, who "under the colour of Religion deſireth the Government of the Kingdom, to the end he might "ſatisfie the unjuſtice of his nature, in exerciſing each way his tyranny towards all men: for "which cauſe his father never thought, nor ever dreamt to ſubſtitute him King in his place. "For he knew both his life and diſpoſition, and by his former Teſtament (and that of great- "eſt force) had ordained his adverſary Antipater to be King. For he had been allotted the "Kingdom by his father, not when his mind was dead before his body, but when both his "judgment was ſound, and his body in health. Yea, although at that time Archelaus father "had ſuch a conceit of him, as in his later Teſtament and bequeſt he pretendeth; yet that he "had already declared what kind of King he was like to be, who contemned Cæſars autho- "rity in confirming the Kingdom, and being as yet a private man, doubted not to murther "the Citizens in the Temple. This ſaid, Antipater (to give greater credit to his words, "bringing divers of his Kindred as witneſſes of that he had ſaid) ended his Oration.

Nicholas excuſeth Archelaus.

Whereupon Nicholas aroſe, and alleadged in Archelaus behalf as touching the ſlaughter, that it was to be imputed to their impiety, who could not be reſtrained from their tumults and uproars, before Archelaus was enforced to appeaſe them by force; alledging, "That they "were ſo much the more guilty, for that they had not only exerciſed their malice, but alſo "had enforced others to attempt ſo heinous a revenge againſt them: for their inſolencie ſee- "med in appearance to concern Archelaus, yet in a ſort their contumacie pertained to Cæſars "ruine. For thoſe that had been ſent by him to appeaſe and redreſs their ſedition, were a- "gainſt all law and right charged and ſlain by them, without reſpect of God, or regard of the "ſolemn Feaſt: whoſe defence Antipater was not aſhamed of, without reſpect of equity, ſo "that he might ſatisfie that hatred which he bare unto Archelaus. That therefore it was "their fault, who firſt of all abſtained not from injury, but whetted thoſe ſwords, which "were drawn in maintenance of the peace, againſt their own boſoms. He enforced all other "things alſo, whereof they had accuſed Archelaus, againſt themſelves, ſaying, that none of "theſe things were done without their conſents: and that the offence was not ſo grievous, as "they intended it ſhould be eſteemed, to the end they might diſcredit Archelaus. So great a "deſire was in them to hurt their Kinſman, a man both well reſpected, and affected by his "father, as alſo kind and officious towards them in all things that concerned them. As for the "Teſtament, that it was made by the King when he was in perfect eſtate of mind and body, "and of greater force than the former, becauſe the authority and confirmation thereof was "aſcribed to Cæſar the Sovereign of the world.

"Further, that Cæſar would not imitate them in that wrong they did unto Herod, who (being "during his life-time bountifully graced by him, by many benefits) do now after his death, go "about to violate his laſt & trueſt teſtament, but that rather like a friend and confederate, he "would confirm his will, who like his faithful and ſworn welwiller had committed all things "to his truſt. For that there muſt needs be a great difference between their malice & Cæſars "vertue and faith, which was renowned thorow the whole world. For which cauſe he would not

A not judg his decree to be inconsiderately past, who left his Succession to his well-deserving Son, and referred all things to his trust. For that it was unlikely that he should err in the choice of his Successor, who had so discreetly submitted all things to Cæsars judgment. After this manner Nicholas also finished his discourse. Hereupon Cæsar courteously raised Archelaus, who lay prostrate and humbled before his feet, telling him that he was most worthy to be King, by giving an apparent testimony, that he was constant in his resolutions; pretending that he would do nothing but that which should be answerable to Herods Testament, and Archelaus profit; and seeing the young man was confirmed in some good hope with this his promise, he determined nothing more for that time: but dismissing the Councel, he debated with himself, whether he should ratifie the Kingdom to Archelaus only, or divide it amongst B Herods kindred, especially since all men had need of his assistance.

BUt before Cæsar had determined any thing certainly in this behalf, Marthalce, Archelaus Mother died of a Sickness, and Varus the President of the Jews in Syria, had sent Letters, which certified the Emperour of the Rebellion of the Jews. For after Archelaus departure, all the Nation were in an uproar. To pacifie which, Varus resorted thither, and punished the authors of the same: and after he had in this sort appeased all things, he returned to Antioch, leaving a Regiment of Souldiers in Jerusalem to re-
C strain the factious innovations amongst the Jews: yet prevailed he nothing by this his policie. For as soon as Varus was departed, Sabinus, who intended Cæsars affairs, remaining in that place, grievously burthened the Jews, trusting to that power that was left him, and supposing that he was already enabled to withstand the multitude. For he armed divers Souldiers, and made use of them to oppress the Jews, and to provoke them to sedition. For he inforced himself to surprize their fortresses, and forceable to make search after the Kings treasures, for his private lucre and covetousness sake. When as therefore the Feast of Whitsontide was come (which is one of our festivals) divers thousands from all parts repaired to Jerusalem,
D not only for Religion sake, but also for despite and hatred they had conceived against those violencies and injuries, which Sabinus had offered them. And not only were those of Judæa grievously offended (but divers also resorted out of Galilee and Idumæa, from Jericho and the Cities situate on the other side of Jordan, desiring all of them to be revenged on Sabinus. And dividing their camp into three bands after this manner, and one part of them took up the Hippodrome, and of the other two, the one seized the southern quarter of the Temple, and the other the Eastern, and the third which was in the Hippodrome, were planted to the westward, where the Kings Palace stood; and thus prepared they all things that were necessary to set upon the Romans whom they had besieged on all sides. At that time Sabinus fearing their number, and resolution, who were resolved either to die or overcome, sent present Letters unto Varus, requiring him with all expedition to send him a supply, because the Re-
E giment that was left by him, was in great danger; and must needs utterly perish without his speedy rescue: as for himself he withdrew into the tower and dungeon of the Castle Phasælus, which was a Fortress, which was builded and so called in honour of Herods brother, who was slain by the Parthians; and from the top thereof made a sign to the Romans, that they should sally out upon the Jews; being afraid to trust himself to his own friends, and supposing that the rest ought to expose their lives to danger in maintenance of his safety. The Romans having made this sally, there arose a desperate skirmish, wherein the Romans divers ways had the upper-hand; yet were not the Jews any ways discomforted, notwithstanding they had lost many men; but wheeled about so long, till at last they seized the outward Galleries,
F and those that incompassed the Temple, and in that place there was a hot assault: for they flung down stones with their hands and slings, and there were certain archers mixed amongst them; who in that they had recovered a place of advantage, grievously gauled the Romans which were below, in that they had no means to avoid their shot, but were in such sort exposed thereunto, as their enemies had the better. And with this disadvantage fought the Romans a long time, till at length sore aggrieved at this their present indignity, they secretly fired the Galleries and porches, without any discovery of those that were therein, which fire brought thither by many, and fed with such matter, as would speedily flame, incontinently took hold of the roof, because the roof was covered with pitch and wax, and gilded upon the wax; so that these great and excellent buildings were burnt down to nothing in a moment, and they that were resorted thither, were all of them consumed before they were aware. some of them fell with the roof of the Galleries; othersome shot at and slain by those that stood round about; othersome despairing of their lives, and amazed at the mischief, either cast themselves into the fire, or slew themselves with their own swords; and all those that retired under hope to save themselves by that way they ascended, were encountred by the Romans, who slew them all in that they were discouraged and disarmed, though furiously desperate: so that not one of them that ascended the porches escaped with life. Afterward, the Romans thrusting forward one another by those ways where the fire was slaked, entred the treasure-house where the sacred money was kept, by which means a great part thereof was stoln away by the Souldiers, and Sabinus to all mens knowledg carried away four hundred talents. But the Jews being afflicted with a double calamity, first of all with the loss of their friends in that fight: and lastly, with the spoil of the treasury; yet assembled they a Troop of the most valiantest Souldiers, and besieged the Palace, threatning to burn the same, with Sabinus and all other the Romans that were therein, except they speedily departed; and in so doing, they promised both them and Sabinus all assurance and security: whereby it came to pass, that divers of them that were in the Palace, issued out and submitted themselves unto them. But Rufus and Gratus having three thousand of those valiant Souldiers under their charge, who had served Herod, joyned themselves with the Romans. The like did those Horsmen which followed Rufus, who in like manner submitted themselves to their direction: yet for all this, the Jews continued and intended their siege, undermining their walls, and exhorting their adversaries to depart, and not to exempt them of their liberty, which they had long time enjoyed under their Predecessors. Sabinus was willing to depart from thence with his Souldiers; yet durst he not trust them in regard of their former attempt, and he suspected overmuch the over-liberal offer his enemies had made him: but neglected the same, because he expected Varus.

Hegio & Rufinus, chap. 15.

At the same time infinite other troubles were raised in divers other places of Judæa, according as each man either was incensed with a desire of gain, or a will to revenge. For 2000 men of War (who had sometime served under Herod, and being at that time cathier'd, lived at home) assembling themselves together, assailed those of the Kings faction, who made head against them, under the conduct of Herods Nephew Aciabus: who never daring to encounter them in a place of equal advantage, in that they were old Souldiers, and well exercised in war, defended himself, in that he held and kept himself as near as he could in the mountains and places of advantage. Moreover, Judas the Son of Ezechias the Arch-thief, whom Herod overcame with so much difficulty at Sephoris a City in Galilee, gathering unto him a band of desperate men, made incursions upon the Kings dominions. And having taken all those arms and weapons, which he might recover in that place, he armed from the first to the last all those Souldiers that were with him: he took away all that money which was reserved for the King, in that place: and affrighting the Inhabitants round about him, he spoiled all those with whomsoever he met; aspiring to the Kingdom, and affecting the same, not by lawful means, of which he was unskilful, but by a liberty to do injury.

Judas, Ezechias Son the Arch-thief.

Whilest these troubles ranged in every place, Simon also, who had been one of Herods servants, and both for his shape, stature and strength, was esteemed amongst all men, undertook the Kingdom: and being attended by a mighty Army, and proclaimed King by them, who were a wicked and unbridled multitude, and perswading himself that he was worthy to be King above any other, he first of all set fire on the Palace in Jericho, and spoiled all that which was therein. He burnt also divers other Royal Palaces, belonging to the King, which were in divers places of the Countrey, giving them free licence, who were his followers in the action, to bear away the prey that remained: and far more licentious pranks had he played, had not his practises been speedily and wisely prevented. For Gratus, who with the Kings Souldiers had coupled himself with the Romans, and gathered all the Forces that he had, went out against this Simon. And after a fierce Battel, they on the other side of Jordan, were put to flight, and fighting rather under courage than military Discipline, they were overcome. And whilest Simon in traversing a valley sought to save himself by flight, Gratus met with him, and cut off his head.

About the same time also, the Royal Palace of Amatha, that was fast by Jordan, was burnt by men of as bad disposition as Simon was. And thus thorow the whole Nation reigned this raging rebellion, for that the Countrey had no King, who by his vertue might govern and moderate the people, for that the strangers, who were sent to repress these mutinies, did rather incense them through their violence and avarice. For a certain obscure and base man (neither esteemed for vertue, nor worthy regard for his riches, but being a shepherd utterly unknown before time, and only famous for his huge stature and strength) called Athronges, was

The Jews almost enraged in rebellion.

Athronges strong in body and goodly in stature, attempteth the Royal Dignity.

A was so audacious to aspire to Royal Dignity, and took pleasure to offer violence, setting light by his life, and exposing himself to all hazards for the only unbridled affection he bare to Sovereignty. He had four Brothers of as goodly stature as himself, who were esteemed for men of valour and execution, whereby they imagined they had the means offered them to occupy the Kingdom. Each one of these had the command over a company. For a great company of people resorted daily unto them; the charge of whom was committed unto his Brethren, at such time as any occasion of war was offered, and he in the mean while wearing the Diadem on his head, ordered, counselled, and commanded all things. The power of this Gallant endured a long time, who was not called King for nought: for he disposed all things according to his own pleasure, and both he and his Brethren were flesht with the slaughter of the Romans, and those of the Kings side, whom he hated alike; these, by reason of the insolence they had used during Herods life-time: the other, in regard of those injuries, which lately they supposed themselves to have received by them. This hatred of theirs daily increased more and more, and there was no man that could escape their hands, both in respect of the gain they sought, as for the custome they had to shed blood. They therefore at that time set upon the Romans, and surprized them on the sudden neer to Emmaus, at such time as they carried victuals and munition unto their Camp, and having enclosed their Centurion Arius with forty of their most valiant Footmen, they shot him thorow with their darts. The rest that expected nothing less than death, were saved by Gratus, who came in upon them with the Kings Souldiers: whereupon leaving the dead bodies, they retired. Continuing their War after this manner a long time, according as C occasion was offered, they had done much mischief to the Romans, and far more injury to the Nation of the Jews. Finally, they were surprized; the one in an encounter betwixt them and Gratus, the other in fighting against Ptolomey. The eldest was taken by Archelaus, and the last being dismayed with the accidents, and seeing no means to escape (for besides his other mishaps, his Souldiers were afflicted with sickness) he with the rest upon Archelaus faith and oath submitted himself unto him. But this was done some little while after.

The year of the world, 3965. after Christs Nativity, 33.

Athronges and his Brethrue taken.

At this time was all Judæa full of robberies, and as many seditious assemblies as drew together, so many Kings were there elected, who were raised to the utter ruine of the Commonweal. Amongst the rest, the Romans were they that smarted least, but the murthers were executed against those that were out of the Countrey. But Varus understanding by Sabinus Letters, in what dangers they were, and fearing the uttter overthrow of his third Legion, he took with him the two other (for to the uttermost in Syria there were but three) and with the assistance of the Kings and Tetrarchs, he hasted into Jewry, to relieve those that were besieged, commanding those that were sent out before he dislodged, to meet him at Ptolemais, and passing by the City of the Berythians, he received a thousand and five hundred Souldiers at their hands, to attend him in his War. Aretas also, who was Lord of Petra, drawing himself into confederacie with the Romans in regard of that hatred he bare toward Herod, sent him Horsmen and Footmen. When all these forces were assembled at Ptolemais, he E delivered a part thereof to his Son, and one of his friends; commanding them to make War upon the Galileans, who bordered upon that City; who entring that Region, and putting all those to flight, whosoever durst make head against him, he took Sephoris, and selling the Inhabitants under the spear, he consumed the City with fire. Varus himself marching towards Samaria with his Army, violenced not the City, in that he knew it was free from the contagion of the seditious, but he pitched his Camp in a certain village, which was Ptolomies possession called Arus. The same did the Arabians burn, revenging themselves on Herods friend for his sake, and marching onward, the Arabians spoiled also another village called Sampho, and for that it was strongly fortified burned the same. Besides, in that journey nothing escaped their hands, but they put all to fire and sword. For both Emmaus was burned by Varus command, and in revenge of his Souldiers that were slain in that place, it was left F desolate and void of Inhabitants. From thence drawing neer to Jerusalem, those Jews that besieged the Legion of that side, upon the sudden view and approach of the Army of the Romans, fearfully fled, giving over that siege which they intended. But those Jews of Jerusalem, being grievously reproved by Varus, alleadged in their excuse, that the people in regard of the Feast were assembled in that place, and that the War was not begun by their consent, but undertaken by their boldness who resorted thither from divers places, and that they were so far off from assailing the Romans, as they rather seemed to be besieged by them. And long before this, Joseph King Herods nephew, Gratus and Rufus, with their Souldiers were gone out to meet Varus, and those Romans that had sustained the siege, had done no less.

The insurrection of the Conspirators.

But as touching Sabinus, he would not appear in Varus presence, by stealing away privily out of the City, he fled unto the Sea-ward. Then Varus sending a part of his Army thorow the whole Region, sought out the authors of this sedition, and those that were noted men in the action; some of which who were most guilty, were punished: the rest were delivered. Now of those that were punished for this occasion, there were about two thousand crucified, and that done, seeing that this Army stood him in little stead, he dismissed them. For divers disorders and outrages, contrary to Varus express command, were acted by his Souldiers, who sought after nothing more than to increase their means by other mens miseries. And hearing that ten thousand Jews were assembled together, he hasted to apprehend them: but they not daring to hazard their fortune in a fight with him, by Achiabus advice submitted themselves. But Varus having pardoned the people for that their rebellion, sent all those that were the Ringleaders thereof to Cæsar, who discharged divers of them. But he chastised certain of Herods Allies, and such as bare arms with them: for that neither in regard of kindred, nor respect of justice, they had abstained from rebellious insurrection. After that Varus had in this sort appeased all the troubles in Jewry, and left the first Legion in Garrison in Jerusalem, he returned to Antioch.

The embassage of the Jews to Rome. Archelaus and the Embassadors of the Jews appear before Cæsar. Philip Herods Son.

But Archelaus was crossed in Rome by another occurrent that arose upon this occasion: Certain Embassadors of the Jews resorted thither by Varus permission, requiring that it might be lawful for them to live according to their own Laws: these presented themselves to the number of fifty, and were backt by eight thousand Jews that inhabited the City. And when as Cæsar had assembled the Councel of his friends, and chiefest Citizens in Apollo's temple, which he had builded to his mighty charge, thither resorted the Embassadors, who were followed by a Troop of Jews; and Archelaus also attended by his friends. But the Kings kindred neither stood by Archelaus in regard of the hate they bare him, and yet disdained they to assist the Embassadors, for that they were ashamed in Cæsars presence to oppose themselves against their neerest friend and kinsman. Philip also was present at that time, who by Varus perswasion resorted thither out of Syria, especially to the intent to plead for his Brother, to whom Varus wished all good fortune: besides that, hoping not a little, that if the Jews should obtain the liberty to live according to their Laws, it might come to pass that the Kingdom being divided amongst Herods children, he might also light on some part thereof. After therefore the Embassadors of the Jews had obtained licence to propose their demands, pretending with themselves wholly to extinguish the Royalty: they began to rip up Herods disgraces, alleadging how only in name he had been a King, whereas otherwise he had used all the tyrannous practices that the wickedest person could have invented toward the destruction of his Nation; and that not content with these, he had of his own head practised and invented new. Neither that it needed them to reckon up how many he had deprived of life, when as the estate of those that were alive was far more desperate; whom he not only affrighted with perpetual terror and severity, but also with injurious hands had not abstained from their goods. By which means it came to pass, that he not only builded, but beautified forein Cities inhabited by forein Nations, to the end he might the rather utterly spoil those by exaction, which were situated and seated in his own Countrey: and that he inforced his Nation to extreme poverty, which he received in most happy estate, whilest he spoiled those Nobles of their estates, who upon weak probabilities were condemned to die, or granting them life, deprived them of their possessions. Furthermore, whereas yearly tributes were imposed on every one, yet severally was the ravenous and covetous desires of his friends and Courtiers to be satisfied, yea, and of his servants also, who had the authority to exact these things, and by this means they might redeem their injurious vexations. As for the deflouring of Virgins, and the scornful betraying of a Matrons chastity, they covered them under silence, for that it is a great comfort to those that suffer such outrage, if their disgraces be but known to a few. In brief, that Herod had in no other sort governed, than as if the Government of them had been committed to a most savage Beast. For which cause, whereas in times past that Nation had been afflicted with many calamities and murthers, yet that there is no example extant amongst their Monuments of antiquity, that may be compared with their present calamity under Herod. For which cause upon just respects they had with one consent named Archelaus their King, supposing that whatsoever King might befal them, he would always demean himself more affably than Herod had done; and that to honour Archelaus they had mourned with him for his father, to gratifie him him in other things, to the intent they might tie his good affection unto them: But he without delay and all at once had made manifest to the whole Nation, what opinion they were to conceive of him, notwithstanding that as yet he was not confirmed King (for that it lay in Cæsars hands to bequeath it, yea or no) and as if he had been afraid leſt he ſhould aſſuredly be acknowledged for his fathers Son, he had ſhewed an example of his vertue, moderation and good Government, that he would uſe towards his Subject, by the firſt act which he hath committed, not only againſt God, but alſo againſt men. For in the Temple it ſelf he hath cauſed three thouſand of his own Countreymen to be ſlain. And how can he chuſe but be juſtly hated, who beſides his other cruelties, objecteth againſt us the crime of rebellion and mutiny? The effect of their requeſt therefore was this, that they might not any more be governed by a King, nor any ſuch like Government, but that they might be annexed unto Syria, and ſubmit themſelves unto their Governors that ſhould be ſent thither: That in ſo doing it ſhould truly appear whether they were ſeditious, and addicted to changes, or whether they would live in peace at ſuch time as they had favourable Governours. After the Jews had ſpoken to this effect, Nicholas diſcharged the Kings of thoſe accuſations that were objected againſt them, and namely Herod, who (as he ſaid) had never been accuſed all his life-time; and that it was no reaſon that they who juſtly accuſing him, might have cauſed him to be puniſhed during his life-time, ſhould now addreſs their accuſations againſt him after he was dead. And as touching thoſe things that were objected concerning Archelaus actions, it ought to be imputed to their inſolence, for that ingaging themſelves in matters contrary to Law, and having begun to murther thoſe who ſought to appeaſe the tumult, they accuſed ſuch as had kept them in obedience. Beſides this, he objected againſt them, that they were addicted to alterations, and took pleaſure to ſtir up Seditions, for that they knew not what thing it was to obey Juſtice and the Laws, and that there was no Nation in the world ſo head-ſtrong as that of the Jews; for that they would have the upper-hand over all. Thus ſpake Nicholas.

WHen Cæſar had heard theſe things, he diſmiſſed the Aſſembly. But ſome few days after, deſirous to make an end of this matter, declared Archelaus not King, but Lord of half that Government that appertained to Herod, promiſing him to beſtow a Royal Dignity upon him, if ſo be he behaved himſelf vertuouſly, according as it became him. As for the other moity, he divided it between two, giving a ſeveral part thereof to each of Herods Sons, Philip and Antipas, who debated with his Brother Archelaus for the whole Kingdom. The ſame Antipas alſo had the Countrey on the other ſide of Jordan, and Galilee, with two hundred talents of annual revenew. As for Philip, he had Bathanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and part of the Palace that was called by Zenodorus name, with one hundred talents. As for Archelaus, he had Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaria, which were diſcharged of the fourth part of the Tributes by Cæſar, for that they had joyned themſelves with the reſt of the people during the time of the Sedition. Beſides that, Archelaus had the Tower of Straton, Sebaſte, Joppe, and Jeruſalem. For Gaza, Gadara and Hippon were Cities of Greece, which Cæſar had diſmembred, and adjoyned to Syria. Archelaus had five hundred talents of yearly rent out of his Countrey. Thus was the Patrimony divided among Herods Sons. As for Salome, beſides that which her Brother had given her in his Will, which were the Cities of Jamnia, Azot, Phaſælis, and half a million of ſilver money, Cæſar granted her a Royal houſe in Aſcalon; ſo as ſhe received in the whole, ſixty talents of annual revenew, and had her houſe allotted her within the Dominion of Archelaus. All of Herods kindred received that which was bequeathed unto them by his Teſtament. Two of his daughters that were unmarried, were endowed by Cæſar with a quarter of a million of ſilver money which he gave them, beſide their fathers portion, and they were married to Pheroras Sons. Moreover, he gave Herods Sons, all which he had given him by the Teſtament, amounting to the ſum of one thouſand and five hundred talents, contenting himſelf only to receive ſome few movables, not ſo much for their value, as in remembrance of the King, who had given them.

The falſe Alexander.

AFter theſe things were in this ſort diſpoſed by Cæſar, a young man and a Jew born, brought up in the City of Sidon, by a certain Roman Libertine, intruded himſelf into Herods kindred, for that all thoſe that beheld him, reported he reſembled Alexander, Herods Son, who was ſlain by him; and by this means, he began to aſpire to the Kingdom: whereupon calling to him a Companion, who was his own Countreyman and a long beaten Courtier, and his Craftſmaſter, and fit to execute any dangerous or deſperate actions, he by his inſtructions feined himſelf to be that Alexander, Herods Son, who was delivered from death by the means of a certain friend, who had the charge to ſee him executed: who executing others in their ſteads, delivered both him and his Brother Ariſtobulus, and that they were both eſcaped in this manner. Being puffed up by theſe toys, he failed not to deceive other men; and as ſoon as he came to Creet, as many Jews ſoever as he fell in conference with, he perſwaded them no leſs, and getting much money at their hands, he ſailed into the Iſle of Melos, where he gathered a great ſum of money under pretext that he was of the Kings blood. And now hoping that he ſhould recover his Fathers Kingdom, and that he ſhould remunerate thoſe who were beneficial unto him, he haſted towards Rome, accompanied with his friends in great pomp. And being arrived at Puteol, he there alſo was entertained with no leſs favour by thoſe Jews whom he deceived by his colourable title; and divers others, who had been Herods friends and familiars came unto him, and entertained him as their King. The cauſe hereof was the natural diſpoſition of men, who take pleaſure in falſe reports, together with the report of his reſemblance. For they that had frequented very familiarly with Alexander, held it for a matter moſt aſſured, that he was the man and none other, and affirmed unto other upon their Oaths that it was he, ſo that this rumour at laſt came to Rome. And all the Jews that dwelt there came forth to meet him, ſaying, That it was Gods handy-work, that he was after that ſort preſerved beyond all mens expectation: and they greatly rejoyced in his Mother Mariammes behalf, from whom he was deſcended; and he was carried in a Litter thorow the ſtreets with all the apparel of a King, the charge whereof was defrayed by thoſe who were his friends. He was attended by a great multitude of men, and honoured with great applauſe, as it ordinarily falleth out at ſuch time as beyond all expectation any one is found to have been miraculouſly preſerved. When this news was brought to Cæſars ears, he gave ſmall credit thereunto, perſwading himſelf that it was a hard matter to deceive Herod in a cauſe of ſo great importance: notwithſtanding, conforming himſelf in ſome ſort to the opinions of men, he ſent a certain free-man of his called Celadus, who had very familiarly converſed with Alexander and Ariſtobulus during their infancie, giving him in charge to bring Alexander unto him, to the end he might ſee him; which he did, and was never the wiſer in diſcovering him. This notwithſtanding, Cæſar was not fully deceived. For, although he reſembled him ſomewhat, yet was he not ſo nearly like him, that he could deceive thoſe who narrowly obſerved him. For this counterfeit Alexander had hard hands, in that he had been accuſtomed to labour, which the true Alexander could not have in regard of his tender and delicate education: and contrariwiſe this man was of a rough skin and hard fleſh. Cæſar therefore diſcovering the treachery both of their counterfeit Scholar, and lying Maſter, and how they accorded in their confident juſtifications, he enquired of them what was become of Ariſtobulus who was ſecretly hidden with him, and for what cauſe he preſented not himſelf to enjoy the honour that appertained to thoſe, who were ſo Nobly deſcended? It was anſwered him, that he remained in the Iſle of Cyprus, for fear of dangers, to which they are expoſed who ſail by Sea, to the end that if any misfortune ſhould befall him, all Mariammes race ſhould not be extinguiſhed, but that at leaſtwiſe Ariſtobulus might be left alive. Whileſt he avowed theſe things, and the author of the Fable juſtified no leſs, Cæſar drawing the young man aſide, ſaid unto him: "My friend, if thou wilt not deceive me, thou ſhalt have this "recompence, that thou ſhalt not be puniſhed. Tell me therefore what thou art, and who "hath emboldned thee to practice this fraud: for this malice is ſo great that it ſurpaſſeth "thine age: Whereupon being unable to conceal the truth, he diſcovered the treachery to Cæſar, how and by whom it was contrived. Archelaus is accused a new, and afterwards banished, and sent into Vienna.

After that Archelaus had taken possession of that Sovereignty that was allotted him, he came into Judæa, where he deposed Joazar the Son of Boethus from the High Priesthood, accusing him to have favoured the Seditious, and established Eleazar his Brother in his place. After this he re-edified the Palace in Jericho, and sumptuously adorned it, drawing away the half of those waters which served the Borough of Neara: and conveying them thorow a field which he had planted with Palm trees; he builded a Borough in that place, which he named Archelais, and contrary to the Laws of his Countrey he married Glaphyra Archelaus Daughter, who had been his Brother Alexanders wife, by whom he also had divers children; notwithstanding, the Law of the Jews forbiddeth a man to marry his Brothers wife. Neither did Eleazar enjoy the Priesthood any long time: but during his lifetime, Jesus the Son of Sias was substituted in his place.

Which when Cæsar understood, he was sore displeased, and caused Archelaus Agent to be called before him, who was then at Rome, and sent for Archelaus also: and esteeming it too base an indignity for him to write unto him, Go (said he) unto him with all expedition, and bring him unto me without delay. He posting forward with all diligence, at length arrived in Judæa, where he found Archelaus banquetting with his friends, and having certified him of Cæsars pleasure, he incited him to hasten onward of his way. As soon as he came to Rome, after that Cæsar had heard certain news of his Accusers and his justification, he banished him, and confined him in the City of Vienna in France, and confiscated all his goods.

Archelaus banished and confined.

But before Archelaus was sent for to Rome, he reported unto his friends this dream which ensueth: Him thought that he saw ten ears full of wheat, and very ripe, which the oxen browzed upon, and as soon as he awoke, he conceived an opinion that his vision presaged some great matter. For which cause he sent for certain Sooth-sayers, who made it their profession to interpret Dreams. Now whilest they were debating one with another (for they differed for the most part in their exposition) a certain man called Simon, an Essean, having first of all obtained security and licence to speak, said that the vision pretended, that a great alteration should befal in Archelaus estate, to his utter disgrace. For the oxen signified afflictions, in respect that those kind of creatures do ordinarily travel; and as touching the change of estate, it was signified by this, in that the earth being laboured by the travel of the oxen, retained not the same estate: and as touching the ten ears of corn, they signified the like number of years. And therefore when as one Summer should be overpast, that then the time of Archelaus Sovereignty should be at an end. Thus interpreted he this Dream. And the fifth day after the vision thereof, Archelaus his Factor by Cæsars commandment came into Jewry to summon him to Rome. Some such like matter happened to Glaphyra his wife also, the daughter of King Archelaus: she (as we have said) married Alexander Herods Son, when she was a maid, and Brother to this Archelaus; who being slain by his Father, she was married the second time to Juba King of Mauritania: and he also being dead, she living with her Father in Cappadocia, was married to Archelaus, who put away Mariamme his wife for the love he bare unto Glaphyra. She living with Archelaus, was encountred with such a Dream: She thought that she saw Alexander fast by her, who cherishing and embracing her, checked her, saying, Glaphyra, Thou approvest the truth of that Proverb, which saith, Women have no loyalty. For having given me thy faith, and married with me at such time as thou wert a virgin, and born children by me, thou hast forgotten and neglected my love, thorow the desire thou hast had to be married the second time. Neither wast thou contented to have done me this wrong, but hast taken unto thee likewise a third Husband, lewdly and impudently intruding thy self into my family, and being married with Archelaus, thou art content to admit my Brother for thy Husband. This notwithstanding, I will not forget the love that I have born thee, but will deliver thee from him, who hath done thee this reproach, by retaining thee for mine own, as heretofore thou hast been. After that she had told this Vision to certain women that were her familiars, she died very shortly after. Which accident I have thought good to register in this place, in that I was to entreat of those Kings; and otherwise the matter seemeth to be a signal example, containing a most certain argument of the Immortality of Souls, and God's Providence. And if any one deem these things incredible, let him reserve his opinion to himself, and no ways contradict those, who by such events are incited to the study of vertue. Now when the Government of Archelaus was annexed to Syria, Cyrenius who had been Consul, was sent by Cæsar to tax Syria, and to dispose of Archelaus house.

Cyrenius is sent by Cæsar into Syria.

Hedio & Russinus, chap. 1. Cyrenius is sent by Cæsar into Syria to execute Justice in that place. Coponius Præfect of Judæa.

Cyrenius the Roman Senator having executed all degrees, offices, and dignities, until such time as he obtained the Consulship (a man of great reckoning and estimation) was sent into Syria by Cæsars direction, to do justice among the people, and to sess and tax each mans goods: with him was sent Coponius a Captain of a Company of Horsmen, who was appointed to have the Commandment of all Jewry. Cyrenius therefore came into Judæa, which was already annexed unto Syria, to tax the goods of the Inhabitants thereof, and to confiscate Archelaus substance. And although at the first the Jews thought but hard of this description, yet notwithstanding without contradiction they submitted themselves, being perswaded thereunto by the counsel of the High Priest Joazar the Son of Boethus, by whose advice they suffered themselves to be taxed without contradiction. But after this there arose a certain Jew called Judas the Gaulanite, born in the Town of Gamala, who having a certain man called Sadoc the Pharisee, confederate with him, laboured to stir up the people to rebellion: alleadging that the description was no other thing, but a confession of their servitude, exhorting all the Nation to maintain their liberty, and putting them in hope that they thereby should happily establish their estates, and enjoy their goods with security: and besides this, obtain both honour

A honour and glory in profecution of ſuch an enterprize. Moreover, that God would not afford them a more aſſured way to ſettle their fortunes, than by this means, namely if they would employ themſelves in the execution of their deſigns, and if having conceived in their minds haughty and noble attempts, they forbore not to finiſh the ſame, notwithſtanding the execution coſt them their lives. Theſe ſpeeches of theirs were entertained by the people with great pleaſure, and by the ſame they were the more confirmed and heartned to rebellion. So that there was no kind of evil which theſe men ſet not abroach; yea, the whole Nation was repleniſhed with ſuch miſeries, that it was impoſſible to recount them: for the Wars therein continued with ſuch fury, that it was impoſſible to reſtrain the violence thereof; ſo that they neither ſpared friends, nor reſpected enemies, but were wholly given over to the ſpoil. There reigned nothing but robberies and murthers of Noble perſonages, who entertained one another under pretence to eſtabliſh the eſtate of the Commonweal, but in B effect for their private profit ſake, whereby the Cities were repleniſhed with ſeditions and murthers, in which the Inhabitants ſlaughtered one another, after a ſtrange manner of fury, and deſire they had not to ſpare any that was of their contrary faction. They were afflicted with forein enemies and famine; yet none of theſe could pacifie their fury, but that they furiouſly razed Cities, ſhed innocent blood, till at length the horrible miſchief took ſuch a head, that they conſumed the Temple of God, and burned all the beautiful buildings. So dangerous a thing it is to change the cuſtoms and manners of a Countrey. For Judas and Sadoc having introduced and raiſed a fourth Sect, and tying the Sectaries to their command, filled the whole Common-weal for the preſent with many troubles, and produced the roots C of theſe miſchiefs, which afterwards branched abroad from this unaccuſtomed Sect. For which cauſe I think it not amiſs to diſcourſe briefly of theſe Sectaries opinions, whereby ſo many evils have fallen upon our Nation.

CHAP. II.

How many, and what Sects there were among the Jews.

D THere were three Sects among the Jews of long continuance and antiquity: that of the Eſſeans; that of the Sadduces; and that of thoſe who were called Phariſees. Of theſe have we ſpoken in our ſecond Book, of the Wars of the Jews; and yet now I think it not amiſs to ſpeak ſomewhat of them in this place alſo. The Phariſees uſe a very auſtere and ſtrict kind of life, and addict not themſelves to any delicacie, but diligently follow that which their reaſon induceth them unto. They honour their elders, neither dare they reply, or reproach them for their admonitions. They attribute all things unto fate, and yet they take not an aſſent of will from man; ſuppoſing that God tempereth all things in ſuch ſort, that by his ordinance and mans will all things are performed good or evil. They believe alſo that the Souls of men are immortal; and that under the earth they receive judgment of honour or diſgrace, according as they have addicted themſelves to vertue or vice in their life times: the one to live in perpetual priſon, the other to riſe a-E gain very ſhortly. For which cauſe they are in great eſtimation among the people; and all that which appertaineth to the ſervice of God, whether they be prayers or ſacrifices, all things are done according as they give direction. So ample a teſtimony yeeld the Cities of their wiſdom, temperance and honeſt life. But the Sadduces are of that opinion, that the Souls of men periſh with their bodies. They obſerve no other thing but that which is in the Law, and hold it a vertue to diſpute with their Maſters, as touching the decrees of their Sect. Their opinion is entertained by very few, yet ſuch, who for the moſt part are men of the beſt reckoning; yet intermeddle they not in any caſe with any affairs: and when they are advanced to any honours, either with their own good liking, or with conſtraint; they are enforced to allow of that which the Phariſees ſhall propoſe, otherwiſe the common people will F not endure them. The Eſſeans attribute unto God the Government and diſpoſition of all things. They ſay that the Souls of men are immortal, and all the uttermoſt of their indeavour and delight is to maintain juſtice and equity. They ſend their offerings unto the Temple, yet ſacrifice they not with other men, by reaſon they uſe more ſacred and different Ceremonies: for which cauſe they are ſecluded out of the common Temple, and ſacrifice apart. Otherwiſe, they are men of moſt reconciled behaviour, and ſuch as are wholly addicted to trimming and labouring their fields. They have one cuſtome which is worthy admiration, and ſuch a one as is not to be found amongſt any other, either Greeks or Barbarians, that make any reckoning of vertue, which they have not practiſed for a little while, but even from from all antiquity; which is, that they poſſeſs their goods in common: neither doth the richeſt amongſt them make more uſe of his poſſeſſions than he that hath leaſt of all. They are at leaſt four thouſand in number, who have neither wives nor ſlaves; ſuppoſing that women are the occaſion of injuſtice, and that ſlaves do ariſe by mutinies: and living apart by themſelves, they ſerve one another; and chuſe out certain upright men among the Prieſts to gather the fruits and revenews of the Lands, to the end they may be ſuſtained and nouriſhed thereby: In a word, they follow the ſame courſe of life that they do, who are called Pliſti among the Danes. The fourth Sect was founded by Judas of Galilee, which accordeth altogether and in all things with the Phariſees, but that they are extremely zealous of their liberty, acknowledging but one only God, Lord and Maſter of all things, and had rather both themſelves with their deareſt children and kinsfolk endure the moſt grievous and bitter torments that may be imagined, than call any mortal man their Lord. Of which conſtancie of theirs I forbear to diſcourſe any further at this time, for that it is ſufficiently known unto divers, who have been eye-witneſſes thereof: neither fear I leſt any one ſhould ſuppoſe thoſe things to be incredible, which I have ſaid of them; but contrariwiſe that I have ſpoken leſs than they themſelves make evident in contemning their grievous tortures and puniſhments; which courage and magnanimity of theirs increaſed very mightily amongſt our Nation, being kindled by the moſt hainous injuries which were offered us by Geſſius Florus our Governour, by which means at length it came to paſs that they revolted and rebelled againſt the people of Rome. The Tetrarchs Herod and Philip build Cities in honour of Cæſar.

After that Cyrenius had confiſcated Archelaus goods, and finiſhed the valuation of every mans eſtate (which happened 37 years after Antonies overthrow by Cæſar in the Actian Battel) he depoſed Joazar from the Prieſtly Dignity, by reaſon of that ſedition which the people ſtirred up againſt him, and eſtabliſhed Ananus the Son of Seth in his place. But Herod and Philip took each of them the poſſeſſion of their Tetrarchy, and diſpoſed of the affairs thereof. Herod incloſed Sephoris with a ſtrong wall, and made it the chiefeſt City and Ornament of Galilee: he fortified alſo another City called Bataramphtha, and named it Julias in honour of Julia the Emperour Cæſars wife. Philip repaired Paneada ſituated neer unto the ſourſe of Jordan, and called it Cæſarea: he repaired alſo the Borough of Bethſaida neer unto the Lake of Genazereth, and gave it the dignity of a City, both for the number of the Inhabitants, as for other pre-eminences, and called it Julia by Cæſars wives name. As for Coponius the Governour in Judæa, who (as we have ſaid) was ſent with Cyrenius, in his time there hapned that which followeth. At the Feaſt of unleavened bread, which we call Paſcha, the cuſtome was that the Prieſts opened the Temple gates about midnight: at which time certain Samaritans, who ſecretly entred into Jeruſalem, as ſoon as the Gates were open, ſpred mens bones amidſt the Porches, and over all the Temple: whereby it came to paſs, that the Prieſts began to keep a more diligent watch, than they had done before time.

Some little while after, Coponius returned to Rome, and Marcus Ambivius ſucceeded him in the Government. In his time Salome King Herods Siſter departing out of this life, bequeathed unto Julia the City of Jamnia and all the Lands and Countrey round about: ſhe gave her alſo Phaſælis ſituate in the Plain, and Archelais where there are divers Date trees, bearing moſt excellent fruit. After Ambivius, Annius Ruphus had the command, under whom died Cæſar the ſecond Roman Emperour, after he had reigned fifty ſeven years, ſix moneths and two days, and had Antonius his copartner in the Monarchy for the ſpace of fourteen years. He lived in the whole ſeventy ſeven years.

After Cæſar ſucceeded Tiberius Nero the Son of Julia his wife, who was the third Roman Emperour. He it was that ſent the fifth Governour inro Judæa, whoſe name was Valerius Gratus, who ſucceeded Annius Rufus. This Gratus depoſed Ananus, and appointed Iſmael the Son of Fabius High Prieſt: and after his deceaſe (for he lived but a little whiles after Eleazar the ſon of Ananus was made High Prieſt. A year after this, this Eleazar was alſo depoſed, and the Prieſthood was given to Simon the ſon of Camithus: who continuing in this dignity for a years ſpace and no longer, Joſeph called Caiphas who ſucceeded after him. After Gratus had behaved himſelf thus, he returned to Rome, after he had remained in Judæa for the ſpace of 11 years. After him came Pontius Pilate, and ſucceeded him in the Government.

But

A But Herod the Tetrarch being entertained into Tiberius friendship, builded a City in honour of his name, and called it Tiberias. He planted it in the fruitfullest part of Galilee, hard by the lake Genazareth, and neer unto the natural Baths in the Borough called Emmaus. This City was peopled by ſtrangers, who reſorted thither from all parts; and by divers, of the Countries of Galilee, ſome of which were conſtrained to inhabit the ſame. Some of thoſe likewiſe, who were in Authority repaired thither, and from all Countries there flocked many, who were not aſſuredly held for men of free condition; all which he enfranchiſed, and gave them great gifts, under that condition, that they ſhould not abandon the City. To ſome of them he gave houſes already builded, to otherſome Lands very apt to be tilled, knowing that the habitation of ſuch a place was contrary to the Laws and cuſtoms of his Countrey, and the Ordinances of the Jews; for that Tiberias was builded in a place full of Sepulchres: and our Law ſaith, he that converſeth in thoſe places, is held unclean and defiled for the ſpace of ſeven days.

Tiberias builded.

B At that very time died Phraates King of Parthia, being traiterouſly ſlain by his Son Phraataces, for this cauſe. After that Phraates had gotten many lawful children, he took unto him an Italian woman to be his Concubine, called Thermuſa, whom with other preſents Julius Ceſar had ſent unto him. After he had begotten on her his Son Phraataces, he was ſo much beſotted with her beauty, that he took her to his wife, and held her in high eſtimation. She that might perſwade him unto all that whatſoever ſhe liſted, enforced her ſelf to the uttermoſt to make her Son King of Parthia: and ſeeing that ſhe might not attain thereunto, except ſhe had firſt found out the means to deliver her ſelf of Phraates lawful children, ſhe perſwaded him to ſend them hoſtages to Rome. In a word, they were preſently ſent away, becauſe Phraates in no ſort had the power to contradict Thermuſas will, and only Phraataces was brought up in the affairs of eſtate; who thinking the time too tedious and long, if he ſhould expect the Kingdom whileſt his father was dead, conſpired againſt him by the inſtigation and furtherance of his Mother, with whom (as it was thought) he committed inceſt. In effect, being equally attainted of thoſe two hainous crimes, both for the murther of his father, as his inceſt committed with his Mother, he was generally hated by his Subjects, who rebelled againſt him before ſuch time as he was ſetled in his Kingdom. By this means was his fortune overthrown, and he died. The Noble men among the Parthians, perceiving that it was impoſſible for them to maintain their Policie without a King, and that their King ought lineally to deſcend of the race of the Arſacians (becauſe by cuſtome they might not chuſe any out of another ſtock) and ſuppoſing that their ordinances had too much already been broken, and that it would redound to their great diſhonour if the Kingdom ſhould be continued in the hands of ſuch a man, who was deſcended from an Italian Concubine, they ſent Embaſſadours to require Herod to come and be their King, who otherwiſe was in hatred with all the people, and accuſed of extreme cruelty. In a word, he was an unſociable man, and extremely cholerick, notwithſtanding he were of the blood of the Arſacides: they therefore flocked about him, and killed him at a banquet made at a certain Sacrifice (for the cuſtome of the Parthians was, that every one bare his weapon) or as the common report was, that he was ſlain at ſuch time as he was a hunting. For this cauſe, they ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, requiring that one of thoſe that were Hoſtages there might be their King, and one Vonones was ſent unto them, who was preferred above all his Brethren. For he ſeemed to be capable of that high Degree of honour, as to command two of the greateſt Sovereignties that were under the Sun; the one of his own Nation, the other of a forein Dominion. But the Barbarians, who are by nature mutable, and moſt impatient of indignity, ſhortly after repented themſelves: for they diſdained to execute the command of a ſlave (for ſo called they a Pledg) ſaying, that the Parthians had not a King given them by right of War, but that which was the moſt outrage that might befal them, by injury offered them in the time of peace. For which cauſe they ſpeedily ſent for Artabanus King of Media, who was of the race of the Arſacides. To this requeſt of theirs he willingly condeſcended, and came unto them with his Army. And Vonones marched forward to make head againſt him. At the firſt encountry, although the common ſort among the Parthians favoured Artabanus; yet he was overcome and fled to the mountains of Media. But not long after, having aſſembled a greater Army, he once more ſet upon Vonones and diſcomfited him, at which time Vonones retired himſelf with ſome Horſmen of his into Seleucia. But Artabanus having made a great ſlaughter of thoſe that fled, and wholly abaſhed the minds of the Barbarians, he retired himſelf to the City of Cteſiphon, with thoſe people that accompanied him, and was afterwards made King of Parthia. Vonones arrived in Armenia, and at the firſt ſought to make himſelf King over that Nation, ſending to this effect certain Embaſſadors to Rome: but Tiberius repulſed his ſuit suit in respect of his cowardice, but the rather for that Artabanus by an expres Embassage had threatned him with War. For they of the greatest power among the Armenians (who are those that dwell about the flood Niphates) maintained Artabanus title; and Vonones, destitute of all hope to obtain the Kingdom, yeelded himself to Syllanus, who was Governor of Syria, and in regard that he had been brought up at Rome, he was kept in Syria: and Artabanus gave Armenia to Orodes one of his Sons. Antiochus King of the Comagenes died also at that time, and there fell a debate betwixt the Commons and the Nobility; so that both parties sent their Embassadors to Rome. The Nobles required that the form of their Government might be changed into divers Signories; and the people requested that they might be honoured by a King, as they had been accustomed. The Senate decreed that Germanicus should be sent to settle the affairs of the East, fortune thereby presenting him with the occasion of his ruine. For, at such time as he arrived in the East, and orderly disposed all things he was poysoned by Piso: whereof he died, as is declared in another place.

CHAP. IV.

The Rebellion of the Jews against Pontius Pilate.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 6. al. chap. 8.

Pilate Governour of Judæa led his Army from Cæsarea to Jerusalem, where he wintered them with an intent to bring in Cæsars Statues, and Standards into the City, in contempt of our Law, which forbiddeth us to make images. For which cause, those Governours that were before him, were wont to make their entries into the City without such Pictures or Paintings. Pilate was the first, who unawares and by night entred Jerusalem, bringing with him his Images. Which when the people understood, in great multitudes they resorted to Cæsarea, beseeching him for many dayes that he would transport those images into some other place. But when as Pilate denied them to perform their request, because the matter would redound to Cæsars dishonour, and the Jews also ceased not to sollicite him; some six days after commanding his Souldiers to lie in ambush in a readiness, he sate him down in the Tribunal within the Hippodrom, making use of the opportunity of the place, for that it was most fit for a stratagem. There being urged once more about the same business, he gave a sign to his Souldiers to beset them, threatning them with death except they would presently give over their suit, and repair every one of them with all speed to their own houses. But they prostrating themselves upon the earth, and offering their naked throats, told him that they rather desired to die, than to see their Laws violated, which were with so great judgment and reason proposed unto them. Pilate amazed at the confidence they shewed in the conservation of their Laws, suddenly caused Cæsars images to be transported out of Jerusalem into Cæsarea, and out of the sacred Treasury he made certain conduits of water, that had their fountain heads more than two hundred stades off. But the people took no pleasure in these conduits, and divers thousands of men assembled themselves exclaiming against Pilate, endeavouring thereby to make him give over his enterprize. Some of them also uttered divers injurious speeches against him, as it ordinarily falleth out amongst an unbridled multitude. But he caused them to be hemmed in by a great number of his Souldiers, attired in popular habit, as soon as they began to exclaim against him, gave a sign to his Souldiers: they, as it was before time commanded them, made use of their maces; and without distinction either of the persons or the offenders, fell on all those whom they had encompassed; and so unmercifully laid on them, who were naked and disarmed, that some of them were slain, othersome grievously hurt: and after this manner was the tumult and sedition appeased.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 7. Alias, cap. 10.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 6. al. chap. 9.

At that time was JESUS, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man. For he was the performer of divers admirable works, and the instructer of those who willingly entertain the truth: and he drew unto him divers Jews and Greeks to be his followers. This was CHRIST, who being accused by the Princes of our Nation before Pilate, and afterwards condemned to the Cross by him; yet did not those who followed him from the beginning, forbear to love him for the ignominy of his death. For he appeared alive to them the third day after, according as the divine Prophets had before testified the same, and divers other wonderful things of him: and from that time forward the race of the Christians, who have derived their name from him, hath never ceased.

At that time also there fell out another accident, which very sorely troubled the Jews, and in the Temple of Isis at Rome there were many shameful acts committed. But I will first of all recount the accident in the Temple of Isis: and then will I declare that which befell the Jews.

A Jews. There was in Rome a Lady called Paulina, renowned both for the Nobility of her houſe, as alſo through her ſtudie and exereiſe in vertue. Beſides this, ſhe was very rich, and with her riches beautiful, and in her flouriſhing years; and notwithſtanding a very mirrour of chaſtity. She was married to a certain Noble man called Saturnine, that equall'd her in all thoſe her excellent perfections. A certain young man called Decius Mundus, one of the Knights of greateſt account at that time, fell in love with her. But ſhe was of that diſpoſition, that it was impoſſible for him to corrupt her by preſents: and the more ſhe refuſed thoſe infinite preſents which he ſent unto her, the more was Mundus heart inflamed with ardent affection; ſo that to enjoy her but one only night, he offered her two hundred thouſand drachmes, amounting in our Engliſh money to ſome ſix thouſand pound; yet for all this he could not overcome her. For which cauſe being unable to indure this his unfortunate love, he thought beſt to pine himſelf away for want of ſuſtenance, thereby to deliver himſelf
B from the tyranny of that paſſion, wherewith he was afflicted: Finally, that he confidently reſolved, he conſtantly put in execution. Now there was a certain freewoman that belonged to Mundus father, whoſe name was Ida, expert in all ſort of ſubtilties, who being ſore agrieved to behold the yong mans reſolution, whom ſhe ſaw wholly addicted to a deſperate death, ſhe addreſſed her ſelf unto him, and encouraged him with hope, promiſing him to bring him to Paulinas ſpeech, by the means of a certain bribe which ſhe intended to offer. He rejoycing very much at her motion, demanded what ſum ſhould ſerve her: who requiring nothing more than fifty thouſand drachmes to obtain Paulina; he furniſhed her preſently. When as by this means ſhe had quickned the young mans ſpirit, and received all that which
C ſhe demanded, ſhe ſhaped not the ſame courſe which others had kept that had the ſollicitation of the matter before, ſeeing ſhe ſaw that money would not tempt her; but knowing that ſhe was deeply devoted to the ſervice of Iſis, ſhe practiſed this ſubtil and unexpected policie. She addreſſed her ſelf to certain Prieſts of the Temple, and upon great hopes, and offer of greater preſents, and paying them down upon the preſent, twenty and five thouſand drachmes, and promiſing them as much more upon the performance of the bargain, ſhe diſcloſed unto them the paſſionate love which the young man bare unto Paulina, exhorting them to work ſo wiſely that he might enjoy her. They bewitched with this huge preſent they had, and hoped to receive, promiſed her to work the feat. Whereupon, the eldeſt among them reſorted to Paulina, and having free acceſs unto her preſence, he required that he
D might have conference with her in ſecret: which when he had obtained, he told her that he was ſent unto her by god Anubis, in that the god was ſurprized with her love, and deſired that ſhe would come unto him. Paulina took great pleaſure in this his diſcourſe, and told her familiars how ſhe had been honoured with the amorous ſollicitation of a god, and certified her husband how Anubis would banquet and lie with her. Whereunto he conſented, knowing how great his wives chaſtity was. She therefore repaired to the Temple; and after ſhe had ſupt, and the time was come wherein ſhe was uſually accuſtomed to lay her down to reſt, and the Gates were lockt up by the Prieſts that were therein, and the lights likewiſe were taken away; Mundus, who lay hid within, failed not to accoſt her: who thinking that it was god Anubis ſatisfied his deſires all the night long; and in the morning betimes before the Prieſts,
E who were privy to this treachery, were ſtirring, he retired himſelf: Paulina alſo early in the morning repaired to her husband, and certified him how Anubis had appeared unto her, and boaſting her ſelf among her familiars what conference he had uſed with her. But ſome of them believed her not, in regard of the manner of their entertainment; the reſt were altogether amazed, ſuppoſing thoſe things to be no ways incredible, at ſuch time as they bethought themſelves of the Ladies chaſtity. Some three days after this act was committed, Mundus meeting with Paulina, ſaid unto her: You have ſaved me two hundred thouſand drachmes, wherewith you might have augmented your treaſure, and this notwithſtanding, you have not failed to ſatisfie my requeſt: neither am I grieved that you have contemned me under the name of Mundus, ſince that undertaking Anubis name, I have accompli-
F ſhed my deſire, and this ſaid, he departed. But ſhe preſently amazed with the mans audacious impudence, tore her garments, and having told her husband of all this ſubtil circumvention, ſhe requeſted earneſtly his aſſiſtance, and that he would not forſake her in the proſecution of her revenge: who preſently certified the Emperour of each particular thereof. Now when Tiberius had diligently underſtood how all things had happened, by the inquiſition and examination of the Prieſts, he condemned them and Ida, who had been the inventer and comploter of this treaſon againſt Paulina, to be hanged: he pulled down the Temple alſo, and caſt Anubis Statue into Tyber, and baniſhed Mundus; ſuppoſing that he ought ought not to be more grievously punished, considering that the fault which was committed G by him, proceeded from extreme love: Behold here the insolence committed in the Temple of Isis, by the Priest that appertained to that Temple. Now I intend to declare that which hapned to the Jews that were at that time in Rome, according as heretofore I both purposed and promised.

CHAP. V.

Of that which befel the Jews that were at Rome in Pilates time.

Fulvia Saturnine sendeth gold and purple to be sent to the Temple in Jerusalem, they convert it to their own uses, which when Tiberius knew, he commanded all the Jews to be thrust out of Rome.

THere was a certain Jew, that having been accused for the breach of the Laws of his H Countrey, and fearing to be punished for the same, fled from thence, being without respect, a man of a most mischievous behaviour. He dwelling at that time in Rome, professed himself to be an expounder of Moses Law, and drawing to him three other no less reprobates than himself, he followed his ordinary profession. Fulvia a Lady of much honour became their Scholar, and had embraced the Religion of the Jews, whom they had perswaded to send certain purple and gold to the Temple of Jerusalem: which after they had received at her hands, they converted it to their own use, as before that time they had determined to do. Tiberius, who was informed hereof by Saturnine his familiar friend, and Fulvias husband, who had discovered the same unto him, commanded all Jews whatsoever to depart out of Rome. Of these the Consuls chose out and entouled to the number of four thousand men, whom they sent into Sardinia: and punished divers of them that I refused to bear arms, for fear they should transgress the Ordinances of their Countrey. So that by reason of the loose behaviour of four wicked persons, all those of our Nation were driven out of the City of Rome.

Neither was the Nation of the Samaritans exempt from this trouble: for a certain subtil companion, who sought by all the means he might to incroach upon the peoples favour, perswaded them to withdraw themselves with him to the mount Garizim (which they supposed to be the holiest amongst all their mountains) in which place, he avowed he would shew them the sacred Vessels buried in a certain place, where Moses had laid them: and at that time they being gathered together in arms, by his perswasion encamped themselves in a Borough called Tirathaba, where they entertained those that repaired thither to adjoyn themselves with them, to the end they might ascend the Mountain with the greater company. K But Pilate prevented them, and got up before them with his Horsmen and Footmen: who charging those that were assembled in the Borough, put them to flight; and slaying some, and putting the rest to flight, led away a great number of them prisoners with him. Pilate executed the chiefest Ring-leaders amongst them, and those also of greatest force amongst the fugitives. The tumult of these Jews being published abroad, and their misfortune made known, the Senate of Samaria addressed themselves to Vitellius who had been Consul, and who at that time governed Syria, before whom they accused Pilate for the murther of those whom he had slain, saying, that they assembled not in Tirathaba to rebel against the Romans, but to warrantize themselves against Pilates tyranny. Whereupon Vitellius sent Mar- L cus his friend, to take charge of Judæa, commanding Pilate to return to Rome, and to satisfie the Emperour of those things whereof the people had accused him. Hereupon Pilate, after he had sojourned ten years in Jewry, repaired to Rome, having no means to contradict that commandment that Vitellius had given him. But before he arrived there, Tiberius was departed and dead.

The Samaritanes assemble at Tirathaba to ascend the Mountain Garizim. Pilate chargeth and overcometh them, and putteth them to flight.

Vitellius cometh to Jerusalem.

Vitellius cometh to Jerusalem, forgiveth the Jews their tribute, and committeth the charge of the High Priests Garments to them. The High Priest Vestments reserved in the Castle of Antonia.

AS soon as Vitellius came into Judæa, he went up to Jerusalem and celebrated there M the Feast of the Passeover, and after he had been magnificently entertained in that place, he forgave the Citizens all the tribute of those fruits which were sold. He delivered them also the Ornaments of the High Priests, with all the rest of the Priestly furniture within the Temple, committing the charge thereof unto the Priests, according as in times past they had the same. But at that time they were laid up in the Castle of Antonia for this cause which followeth: Hircanus the High Priest, the first of that name (for divers have been so called) having builded a tower neer unto the Temple, did for the most part make make his residence therein, and there kept his vestments that were committed to his charge, the rather for that he only had the authority to put them on, and return them into their place at such time as he came down into the City, and put upon him his accustomed raiment. His Son and his Sons Son entertained the same custome, till such time as Herod being exalted to the Kingdom, and seeing this Tower to be strongly sited, builded the same most magnificently, and called it Antonia, in honour of Antony his great friend. And having found these Vestments in the place, he retained them with him, assuring himself, the people would attempt nothing against him. Archelaus his Son and Successor in the Kingdom, kept the same course that Herod had done. But after that the Romans had obtained the Sovereignty thereof, they kept the High Priests Ornaments in their hands, and reserved them in a place builded for the purpose, under the Seal of the Priests: and the Prefect of those that kept the sacred treasure, lighted the Lamp every day in that place. This every seventh day before the Feast, doth the Prefect deliver it into the High Priests hands, and after it was purified, he put it on to do Divine service, and the next day after the Feast he returneth it again to the same place where it was kept before: which custome was observed thrice every year in the time of a Fast. But Vitellius returned those Ornaments into the hands of the Priests, according to the antient orders, leaving them to be used at such time as need required, commanding the Prefect to trouble himself no more about the place where they should be kept. After he had done this favour to the Nation of the Jews, he deposed the High Priest Joseph sirnamed Caiaphas, and advanced Jonathan the Son of Ananus to that Dignity, and afterwards returned to Antioch.

The Year of the world, 3999. after Christs Nativity, 37.

Vitellius advanced Jonathan the Son of Ananus to the Priesthood, and degradeth Joseph sirnamed Caiphas.

At that time he received Letters from Tiberius, by which he commanded him to capitulate and conclude a friendship with Artabanus the King of the Parthians (whose hatred he suspected and feared, lest being seized of Armenia, he should work further displeasure to the State of Rome) willing him to assure the League by Hostages, and namely with Artabanus Son. After Tiberius had written these Letters above mentioned unto Vitellius, he perswaded the Kings of Iberia and Alania by great store of money, that with all expedition they should make war against Artabanus. But the Iberians would not be drawn thereunto, yet suffered they the Alanes to march thorow their Countrey, and opened them their gates of the Mount Caspius, to give them passage to invade Artabanus. Thus once more was Armenia conquered, and the Countrey of the Parthians was filled with war, whereby the chiefest among them were slain, and all their estate was spoiled and disordered. The Kings Son also was slain in those conflicts, with divers thousand of his men of war. Moreover, Vitellius having sent money to a certain Kinsman and friend of Artabanus, pretended to corrupt him to make Artabanus away. But Artabanus perceiving the plot that was intended against him, and seeing that he could not escape, because it was attempted by a great number of the best accounted Nobles within his Court, ceased to pass any further: and seeing himself most apparantly invironed, and thinking that under colour of friendship he was fraudulently betrayed, he thought it better to retire himself into the Provinces of the higher Countrey, and there to save himself, rather than to put himself in hazard, and resort unto them who had already betrayed and forsaken him. Arriving in that place, he assembled a great number of Souldiers of the Countries of Danes, and Swethians: and having fought against them who opposed themselves against him, he recovered his estate. When Tiberius had tidings hereof, he wrought the means to draw Artabanus into friendship with him: which when Artabanus had notice of, he willingly admitted; so that Artabanus and Vitellius met together neer Euphrates, and by the means of a Bridge that was builded upon the River, they debated the matter together; being each of them attended by their Guards. After that they had concluded the peace, Herod the Tetrarch feasted them in a very magnificent Pavilion, erected in the middest of the flood, not without his great cost. And not long after, Vitellius sent Darius, Artabanus Son in hostage to Rome, with divers presents; amongst which there was a man seven cubits high, a Jew born, who was named Eleazar, who was called a Giant by reason of his greatness. That done, Vitellius returned to Antioch, and Artabanus to Babylon. But Herod desirous to be the first that should advertise Cæsar of the receit of these Hostages, sent expres Messengers with Letters, by which he fully satisfied him of all that which had happened, omitting nothing for the Consul to certifie: so that after Vitellius Letters were brought unto him, and that Cæsar had already certified him of the true information that Herod had given him, Vitellius was sore troubled: and suspecting lest he had received a greater injury than the matter made shew for; he conceived in his heart a secret despight, which continued until such time as Tiberius was dead, and Caius obtained the Empire.

At that time also died Philip, Herods Brother, in the twentieth year of Tiberius reign, after G he had reigned himself for the space of seven and thirty years, in Trachonitis, Gaulonitis, and Bathanæa. During all the time of his Government, he behaved himself very peaceably, and far from business. For he made his ordinary abode within his own Dominion. He walked being accompanied with a small number of his chosen servants, and had that seat carried after him wherein he was accustomed to sit and do justice: and therein sate he, to the end that if any one presented himself, and required his assistance, he might without delay do him right. For upon the first motion, the seat was placed in that part wherein the plaintiff met him; and being seated therein, he examined the cause, punishing those that were guilty, and absolving the innocent. He died in Juliade, and was buried in the Sepulchre which he himself had caused to be built, and his obsequies were performed with great so- H lemnity and majesty. And for that he left no heirs males behind him, Tiberius seized his estate, which he annexed to the Government of Syria, ordaining that the tributes that were gathered in his Tetrarchy, should be kept within the bounds of the same Region.

CHAP. VII.

The War of Herod the Tetrarch, against King Aretas, and his overthrow.

Herod the Tetrarch putteth away Aretas daughter, and marrieth Herodias his Brother Herods wife.

MEan while, Aretas King of Arabia Petræa, and Herod fell at strife, the one with the other, for this cause that ensueth: Herod the Tetrarch married Aretas Daughter, I with whom he had lived married a very long time. Afterwards taking his journey towards Rome, he lodged with Herod his half Brother by the Fathers side (for Herod was the Son of Simons Daughter, which Simon was the High Priest) and there being surprized with the love of Herodias his Brothers wife, which was the Daughter of Aristobulus their Brother, and sister to the Great Agrippa, he was so bold as to offer her some speech of marriage: which when she had accepted, the accords were made between them, that at such time as he should return from Rome, he should displace her, and lead her away with him, with conditions that he would banish Aretas Daughter far from him. After he had ratified those covenants, he made his voyage to Rome, from whence he no sooner returned and performed that for which he went, but his wife (who had some privy notice of the conventions which were made betwixt him and Herodias) before he suspected that she knew thereof, required him to send her to the Castle of Macheron, which was the frontier Town betwixt Herods and Aretas Countries, without certifying him any ways of her intent. Herod without suspect easily condescended unto her request, thinking she was ignorant of his drift: but she long before that time had taken order with the Governour of Macheron (which at that time was under her fathers Government) to prepare all things for her journey, where being arrived, she speedily posted into Arabia, under the Convoy of those Governours, who received and conducted her the one after the other. As soon as she arrived in her fathers Court, she incontinently certified him of Herods resolution, whence arose the beginning of this discord betwixt them. As soon therefore they had both of them assembled their Armies upon the confines of the Countrey of Gamalite, they fought together under the conduct of the two Generals, to whom they had committed their Armies. In this Battel Herods Army was wholly discomfited through the treason that was complotted against him by certain banished men of Philips Tetrarchy, which were in pay with Herod. Tiberius was certified of all this by those Letters which Herod had written unto him: and being sore displeased with Aretas for his proud attempt, he commanded Vitellius to make war against him, willing him that if he could take him alive, he should send him bound unto him; but if dead, he should send him his head. Such was the Commission that Tiberius sent to the Governour of Syria.

Herods Army discomfited by the Arabians.

Tiberius commandeth Vitellius to make war against Aretas.

Divers Jews were of the opinion, that Herods Army was overthrown by the just vengeance of God, who punished him most justly, because of the execution which he caused to be done on John sirnamed Baptist: For he had done this man to death, who was replenished with all vertue, and who exhorted the Jews to addict themselves thereto, and to execute justice towards men, and piety towards God: exhorting them to be baptized, and telling them that Baptism should at that time be agreeable unto God, if they should renounce not only their sins, but if to the purity of their bodies they should annex the cleanness of their Souls repurified by justice. And whereas it came to pass that divers flocked and followed him to hear his Doctrine, Herod feared lest his Subjects allured by his Doctrine and perswasions should Hedio & Russinus, cap. 10. a. l. 4.

A should be drawn to revolt. For it seemed that they would subscribe in all things to his advice; he therefore thought it better to prevent a mischief by putting him to death, than to expect some sudden commotion, which he might afterwards repent. Upon this suspicion Herod caused him to be bound, and sent to the Castle of Macheron, whereof we have spoken heretofore, and there was he put to death. The Jews were of opinion, that in revenge of this so grievous a sin, Herods Army, against whom God was displeased, had been subject to their utter ruine and overthrow. But Vitellius being addressed to make War against Aretas, gathered together two Legions, and all those Horse or Foot that he could assemble amongst those Kings, who were the Romans allies, and marching towards Petra he stayed at Ptolemais, because he pretended to pass by Judæa. Which when the principal Nobles amongst the Jews had notice of, they went out to meet him, beseeching him that he would not pass thorow their Countrey, because it was a custom amongst them not to see any Images born, such as he had of divers colours in his Army. Whereunto he condescended, and having changed his purpose, he caused his Army to march thorow the great Plain: as for himself he came to Jerusalem accompanied with Herod the Tetrarch and his friends, to offer sacrifie to God upon the next Festival day, where he was most magnificently received by all the people of the Jews. There sojourned he for the space of three days, during which time he deposed Jonathan from the High Priesthood, and invested Theophilus his Brother. The fourth day Letters came unto him that advertised him of Tiberius death, for which cause he commanded the Oath of fidelity should be ministred to the people, in the new Emperour Caius behalf. He called back his Army also, and sent them to their wintering garrison, B because it was not lawful for him to prosecute the War, by reason the Sovereign estate was fallen unto Caius. C

The year of the world, 4001. after Christs Nativity, 39.

Vitellius repaireth to Jerusalem, and displaceth Jonathan, and preferreth his Brother.

Caius Caligula succeedeth after Tiberius.

It is said, that Aretas hearing news of Vitellius expedition or voyage, and after he had taken counsel of the Augurs, said, that the Army should not find engines to pierce as far as Petra, because the Chieftain thereof, or he that had the command of the expedition, or he that obeyed his ordinance in conducting the same, or he against whom the Army was conducted should die. Vitellius therefore retired himself to Antioch. A year before the death of Tiberius, Agrippa, Aristobulus Son came to Rome, to entreat with the Emperour about certain affairs, according to the power which he should obtain at his hands. But before I speak any thing hereof, I will relate Herods progeny, both for that it is pertinent to this present narration, as also that the greatness of Gods providence may appear, to the end that a man may know, that neither the number of children, nor any other humane force whatsoever it be, can be available without the fear of God; considering that within the space of one hundred years, or somewhat less, it so fell out, that all Herods line, which was very populous and fruitful, was extinguished, a very few excepted. Whereby we are given to understand, what the misery of mankind is, and learn to moderate our own selves. It is also expedient to speak something of Agrippa, who amongst all other deserveth admiration, in that being a man wholly drowned in obscurity, and base in birth, he was exalted to such greatness, as no one of those that knew him would ever have thought his fortune should have such success and mightiness. And although heretofore I have spoken somewhat of this matter, yet it is requisite that I speak something more expressly thereof in this place. Herod the Great had two Daughters born by Mariamme, Hircanus daughter. The one of them which was called Salampso, was married by Herod to Phasælus the Son of Phasælus, who was Herods Brother. The other called Cypros was espoused to Antipater her Cozen, who was Salomes Son, who was Herods Sister. Phasælus had five children by Salampso: three Sons, Antipater, Herod, and Alexander; and two daughters, Alexandra and Cypros, whom Agrippa the Son of Aristobulus married; and Alexandra was married to Timæus of Cyprus, who was a man of great Dignity, and with whom she died without issue. Cypros had by Agrippa her husband two Sons, and three daughters: Bernice, Mariamme, and Drusilla: their two Sons were called Agrippa and Drusus. Drusus died very young: but Agrippa was brought up by his Grandfather amongst his other Brethren, Herod, Aristobulus, and Bernice. These were Herods children, Son unto him who was sirnamed the Great: Bernice was Costobarus Daughter, begotten on Salome, Herods Sister: Aristobulus died leaving his children under age, under his fathers charge with Alexander his Brother, as we have already recounted. These attaining their full age were in this sort married: Herod Brother to Agrippa was matched with Mariamme, Olympias daughter, who was Herod the Great his daughter, and of Joseph, Herods Brother: by her he had his Son Aristobulus: Aristobulus, Agrippas third Brother married Jotape the daughter of Sampsigeram King of the Emesenians. They had a daughter which in like sort was called Jotape, which was dear-

Herods Progeny.

These were the children begotten by Herods three Sons. But Herodias their sister married Herod, the Son of Herod the Great, whom he begot on Mariamme the Daughter of Simon the High Priest, by whom Salome was begotten. After her birth, Herodias in contempt of the Laws of the Countrey, married her self with Herod her Husbands Brother begotten of the same father, being separated from him during his life-time, who was Tetrarch of Galilee. His Daughter Salome was married to Philip the Tetrarch of Trachonitis Herods Son: who dying without children, Aristobulus married her, who was Herods Son and Agrippas Brother. They had three Sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus. See here the Posterity of Phaselus and Salampson. Antipater by Cypros had a daughter that in like sort was called Cypros, which was married to Alexas Selcius, the Son of Alexas, of whom he begat a Daughter called likewise Cypros. As for Herod and Alexander, who (as I said) were Antipaters Brothers, they died without issue. Alexander, Herods Son, who was slain by his father, begat Alexander and Tigranes on the Daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. Tigranes being King of Armenia died without issue, after he had been accused at Rome. Alexander had a Son called Tigranes, after his Brothers name, who was sent by Nero to reign in Armenia, who had a Son called Alexander, who married Jotape the Daughter of Antiochus King of Comagena. This Alexander by Vespasian was elected King in Lesis a City of Cilicia. As soon as Alexanders Posterity began to multiply, they fell from their Countrey Religion, to follow the Customs of the Greeks. All the rest of King Herods Daughters died without issue. Having after this manner reckoned up Herods Posterity, which continued until such time as Agrippa the Great began to reign; it remaineth at this time to declare what adventures befel this Agrippa, and how he escaping his dangers, obtained at last so great power and dignity.

CHAP. VIII.

Agrippas voyage to Tiberius, where he is accused and shut in prison, and is delivered after Tiberius death, by Caius his Successour.

Agrippa living at Rome, through his lavish liberality groweth into necessity.

SOme little time before the death of King Herod, Agrippa conversing at Rome, grew into great familiarity and acquaintance with Drusus, Tiberius the Emperors Son, and was beloved by Antonia the wife of Drusus the elder, by the means of his Mother Bernice, whom Antonia held in great estimation, and to whom she had recommended her Son. And whereas by nature he was of a liberal and high spirit, as long as his Mother lived, he would not discover his intent, lest he should provoke her displeasure against him. But incontinently after Bernice was dead; and he became Lord of himself, partly by his daily and bountiful entertainment and living, partly by his immoderate liberalities, but especially by his lavish prodigality towards Cæsars freemen, whose favour he hunted after; he was brought into extream poverty; and could no more live at Rome; the rather for that Tiberius having lost his Son, forbad his friends to come into his sight, for fear lest their presence should refresh and increase the sorrow he conceived for the loss of his Son. For these causes he returned back into Judæa, having but badly ordered his estate, spent his money; and left himself no means to satisfie his importunate and many Creditors. For which cause incertain how to dispose himself, and ashamed of his present estate, he withdrew himself into a Castle called Malatha in Idumæa, bethinking himself after some sort to cut off his miserable days. Which purpose of his, when Cypros his wife perceived, she endeavoured by all means to prevent his resolution: she wrote also to his Sister Herodias, who was married to Herod the Tetrarch, certifying her both what Agrippa had decreed, as also by what necessity he was enforced thereunto: and she exhorted her, that in regard of affinity she would assist him, and imitate her in this, who, as much as in her lay, relieved his misery; although her fortunes were far weaker than hers. Being therefore sent for by his Sister and wife, he was commanded to dwell in Tiberias, and had a certain sum of money assigned him for his maintenance, and for his greater honour was appointed Magistrate of that City. Yet did not Herod continue long time in that mind, although by the means he had given him, he had not satisfied his Kinsmans necessities. For being in the City of Tyre in a certain company, where he drank immoderately, Agrippa esteemed it for an extreme injury; that Herod had upbraided him with his poverty, and hit him in the teeth, that he maintained him at his charge. For which cause he withdrew himself to Flaccus, who had been sometimes Consul at Rome, and for the present was President of Syria, with

A with whom at Rome he had fallen into familiarity, who entertained by him, lived with him, who long before that time had entertained Aristobulus; who though Agrippas Brother, yet was he his enemy; yet notwithstanding this dissention between them, Flaccus entertained them both with equal favour. But Aristobulus remitted nothing of his hatred he bare his Brother, neither ever rested he before he had drawn Flaccus into dislike with his Brother, upon this occasion: The Inhabitants of Damasco, contending with the Sidonians about their demains, and being to debate their cause before Flaccus; knowing what interest Agrippa had in him, they besought him that he would further their cause, promising him a great sum of Money: whereupon he addressed himself in what he could to further those of Damasco. But Aristobulus, who had an inkling of this conclusion and promise, ac-
B cused his Brother to Flaccus: and after inquisition was made, and he found guilty of the fact, Agrippa grew out of the Presidents favour, and falling again into extreme poverty, he came to Ptolemais; and for that he had no means of maintenance, he determined to sail into Italy. And for that he wanted money, he commanded Marsyas his free-man, that by all means whatsoever, he should seek to take up money upon interest. He spake unto Protus (who was Agrippas Mothers freeman, who by the Testament of his deceased Mistress was left unto Antonias protection) that upon his Masters bill and promise, he would lend him some money. But he alleadging that Agrippa before that time ought him money, extorted from Marsyas a bill of his hand for twenty thousand Attique drachmes, deducting out of that sum two thousand and five hundred, which Marsyas took for himself: which he might the more easily do, for that Agrippa could not otherwise chuse. Having therefore
C received this money, he went to Anthedon, where getting shipping he prepared himself for the journey.

Whereupon he made a shew that he would obey their demand; but as soon as it was night, he caused the cables of the Ship to be cut, and cast off, and sailed to Alexandria: there requested he Alexander Alabarca to lend him two hundred thousand drachmes in silver. But he protested that he would trust him with nothing. But admiring Cy-

Thus Cypros having furnished her husband for his journey into Italy, returned her self and her children into Judæa by land. But Agrippa, as soon as he arrived at Puteol, wrote unto Tiberius Cæsar, who lived at Capreas, signifying unto him that he came to do his duty, beseeching him that he would grant him free and favourable access. Tiberius with all expedition returned him a very kind answer, certifying him that he would be very glad to see him safely arrived in Capreas. In a word, as soon as he was arrived, Cæsar expressed and made it known, that his affection was answerable to his Letters, and both
E embraced him and lodged him. The next day Cæsar received Letters from Herennius Capito, who advertised him that Agrippa ought three hundred thousand drachmes of silver, which he borrowed and paid not at the time prefixed, and that at such time as the appointed time of payment was come, he was fled out of the Countrey, and place of his procuration, and by this occasion had deprived him of the means to constrain him to make satisfaction. When Cæsar had read these Letters, he was sore displeased, and commanded those of his chamber, that they should not admit Agrippa to his presence, until such time as he had discharged that debt.

But he, nothing dismaied at Cæsars displeasure, required Antonia, Germanicus and Claudius Mother, who was afterwards Emperour, to lend him the sum of three hundred thousand drachmes, to the end he might not lose Cæsars friendship. Who remembring her Berenice, F Agrippas Mother, and with what familiarity they had conversed together, and how Agrippa likewise had been brought up with Claudius her Son, lent him that Money: Whereupon he paying the debt, without any contradiction enjoyed the Princes favour, and was so reconciled to Cæsar, that he committed his Nephew to Agrippas charge, commanding him to attend him always, whithersoever he went. Being by this benefit bound and tied to Antonia, he began to reverence her Nephew Caius, who was gracious in all mens eyes, and honored in memory of his Parents. At that time by chance there was one Allius a Samaritane, Cæsars free-man, of whom he borrowed ten hundred thousand drachmes of silver, and pay'd Antonia her due, and kept the reſt the more honourably to attend and wait on Caius. By whom being entertained with moſt inward familiarity, it hapned one day that riding in the ſame Coach with him, Agrippa wiſht (for they two were alone) that Tiberius might ſhortly ſurrender the Kingdom and Empire unto Caius, who was each way more worthy than he. Theſe words of his were overheard by the Coachman called Eutychus, who was Agrippas freeman, who for the time ſpoke not a word thereof. But being afterwards accuſed for ſtealing Agrippas garment (as he indeed had done) and brought back again after he had fled away to Piſo (who was the Prefect of the City) he asked him why he fled: who anſwered, that he had certain ſecrets which he deſired to reveal unto Cæſar, that appertained to his profit and ſafety: for which cauſe he was ſent by him in bonds to Capreas. Tiberius according to his dilatory manner, wherein no King or Tyrant ever equalled him, held him priſoner. For neither did he preſently admit any Embaſſadors, neither ſent he ſucceſſors to thoſe, who were Governours, and Prefects of his Provinces, when the former were dead; and no leſs negligent was he in yeelding audience to his Priſoners. But when his friends at any time queſtioned with him, why he uſed theſe accuſtomed delays; he anſwered them, that he deferred the Embaſſadours after that ſort, for fear leſt if he ſhould ſuddenly diſpatch them, they ſhould inſtantly return with new, whereby it ſhould come to paſs, that he ſhould be continually troubled in entertaining and diſmiſſing them.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13. Eutychus Agrippas freeman bethinks him to accuſe Agrippa to the Emperor.

For what cauſe Tiberius changed not his Governors.

And as touching his offices, he left them in their hands, to whom he had committed them, in regard of his Subjects welfare. For naturally all Magiſtracie is ſubject to avarice: but in eſpecial ſtrangers induce thoſe, who exerciſe the ſame, to gather and ingroſs the more inſtantly, when as the time of their Authority is ſhort and of ſmall aſſurance; whereas if they ſhould continue in the ſame for a long time, in regard of the gain they had made, and the much profits they had raiſed, they would be afterwards leſs greedy to extort further. Now if he ſhould ſend others to ſucceed them on a ſudden, it were impoſſible for him to content them, notwithſtanding their many bribes: whereas in giving them time to fill their purſes, when they had gotten well, they would abate the furious deſire of lucre which they affected before. And to this purpoſe he told them an example of a poor man that was a Lazar, to whoſe wounds a great number of flies aſſembled themſelves, and covered the ſame: at ſight whereof, ſome by fortune arriving there, and having compaſſion of his miſery, and ſuppoſing that the cauſe why he repulſed them not, proceeded from his diſability, approached near to help him; but he required them to let him alone. Whereupon they demanding the cauſe wherefore he that was hurt refuſed to be delivered from ſo irkſome an evil, he anſwered them, for that they ſhould do him more wrong, if thoſe flies were driven away; for that being already full of blood, they prick me not (ſaid he) neither ſuck me ſo earneſtly, but give me ſome eaſe; whereas if new ſhould alight on my wound which were hungry, and ſhould ſeize my fleſh in that deſperate eſtate that I am, they would procure my death. For theſe cauſes he ſaid; that ſeeing his Subjects already conſumed by ſo many exactions, he thought it a good policie in him, and a better proviſion for them, not to ſend them new Governors continually, who might after the manner of flies ſuck them to the quick, eſpecially if to their innated covetouſneſs he ſhould annex the fear of their ſudden diſplacing. Now to approve that to be true which I have declared of Tiberius diſpoſition, this action of his may ſuffice to juſtifie me. For having been Emperour for the ſpace of twenty two years, all thoſe Governours which he ſent into Jewry were two, namely Gratus, and Pilate his Succeſſor; neither demeaned he himſelf otherwiſe towards the reſt of his Subjects of the Empire.

Why Cæſar would not give audience to his priſoner.

Agrippa ſollicieth Antonia to bring Eutychus to his anſwer.

Anton a very much honoured by Tiberius.

Antonia diſcovereth Sejanus Conſpiracie to Cæſar.

And as touching his Priſoners, the reaſon why he delayed ſo much to give them audience, was, to the end that they who had been condemned to death, ſhould not ſpeedily be delivered from thoſe torments, wherewith he threatned them, and which they had deſerved by their wickedneſs. For whilſt he kept them in that pain, their miſ-hap increaſed the more. For this cauſe Eutychus could not obtain audience at his hands, but was a long time detained priſoner. Afterwards in proceſs of time, Tiberius tranſported himſelf from Capreas to Tuſculanum, which was diſtant from Rome ſome hundred furlongs. There did Agrippa ſollicite Antonia, to cauſe Eutychus to be called to his anſwer, as touching the accuſation which he pretended againſt him. Now Antonia was in great favour with Tiberius, both in regard of the affinity that was between them (in that ſhe was Druſus wife, who was Tiberius Brother) as in reſpect of her modeſty. For ſhe being young continued in her widowhood, and would not marry with any other, notwithſtanding Auguſtus importuned her to wed; but lived always in honour without blame. Beſides that, ſhe had done Tiberius a great pleaſure: for at ſuch time as Sejanus his friend, and a man of great account in thoſe days (by reaſon he had the Govern-

A ment of the Army) practiſed a Conſpiracie againſt him, whereunto divers of the Senate, and of his freemen, and his men of war likewiſe were acceſſary: yet brought the all their intents to nothing. This attempt had taken a great head, and Sejanus had finiſhed his purpoſe, had not Antonia uſed more adviſed courage, than Sejanus did in executing his treaſon. For having diſcovered the danger that threatned Tiberius, ſhe wrote and ſent her expreſs Letters by Pallas one of her truſty ſervants unto him to Capreas, certifying him in particular the whole proceſs of the Conſpiracie. Cæſar having true underſtanding thereof, cauſed Sejanus and his Confederates to be executed. Although therefore that before that time he honored Antonia greatly, yet did he afterwards honour her far more, in ſuch ſort as he truſted her in all things. When as therefore ſhe entreated him to give Eutychus audience: Tiberius anſwered, If, ſaid he, Eutychus hath falſely objected any thing againſt Agrippa, it ſufficeth that he endure that puniſhment which I have enjoyned him. But if in the torture he maintain that
B which he hath ſpoken to be true, it is to be feared leſt Agrippa intending to puniſh his freeman, do rather heap the puniſhment upon his own head. When Antonia had reported this anſwer of his to Agrippa, he did the more inſtantly ſollicite her, requiring her that the matter might be brought to trial. And for that Agrippa ceaſed not to importune her, Antonia took the occaſion, which was this: Tiberius being after dinner time carried in his Litter, and having Caius and Agrippa before him, ſhe walking foot by foot by the Litter, beſought him to C call Eutychus to his trial: whereunto he replied: The gods (ſaid he) know, that that which I do, I do it not of mine own will, but for the neceſſity I am preſſed with upon your requeſt: and having ſpoken thus, he commanded Macron, Sejanus Succeſſor to bring Eutychus before him: which was performed with all expedition. Whereupon Tiberius asked him what he had to ſay againſt him, who had enfranchiſed him? My Sovereign (ſaid he) Caius that is here preſent, and Agrippa rode one day together in the ſame Coach, and I ſate at their feet. After divers diſcourſes held between them, Agrippa began to ſpeak after this manner unto Caius; O, ſaid he, would God the day were come wherein the old man departing out of this world, would make you Governour thereof. For his Son Tiberius would be no hindrance unto you, for him might you make away. Then ſhould the world be happy, and I likewiſe have my ſhare in the felicity. Tiberius eſteeming this his accuſation to be true, and having of long time conceived a grudge againſt Agrippa, for that notwithſtanding he had commanded him to honour Tiberius, who was his Nephew, and Druſus Son; Agrippa had given
D ſmall regard to his commandment, and had not honoured him, but was wholly addicted unto Caius. For which cauſe he ſaid to Macron, bind me this fellow. He ſcarcely underſtanding that which he ſpake, and no way ſuſpecting that he ſhould give that commandment in reſpect of Agrippa, deferred the performance until ſuch time as he might more exactly underſtand his mind. When as therefore Cæſar turned into the Hippodrome, and by chance met with Agrippa in the teeth: This is he (ſaid he) Macron, whom I have commanded to be bound; and demanding of him once more by whom he ſpake: It is Agrippa, ſaid he. Then had Agrippa recourſe to ſubmiſſive and humble prayers, refreſhing the memory of his Son with whom he had been brought up, alleadging the education he had uſed towards his Nephew Tiberius: but he prevailed nothing, but was led away bound in thoſe purple ornaE ments which he then wore.

Agrippa unjuſtly Eutychus [illegible] ſpeeches [illegible] caſt into Bonds.

At that time it was very hot weather, and being in diſtreſs of wine, he was extremely thirſty and diſtreſſed, yea, more than became one of his Quality. Whereupon eſpying Thaumaſtus one of Caius ſervants, who carried water in a pitcher, he required him to give him drink: which when he had willingly beſtowed on him, he drank, and afterwards ſaid unto him, This ſervice thou haſt done me in giving me drink, ſhall do thee good one day. For as ſoon as I ſhall eſcape out of theſe bonds, it ſhall not be long before I obtain thy liberty at Caius hands, for that thou haſt not neglected to do me ſervice in this my impriſonment, as thou haſt beforetime done me whileſt I was in my proſperity and dignity: Neither deceived he the mans expectation of his promiſe, but rewarded and gratified him. For afterwards,
F when he had obtained the Kingdom, he begged Thamauſtus liberty at Caius hands, and made him ſuperintendent of his affairs, and after his deceaſe he gave order that he ſhould ſerve in the ſame place, with his Son Agrippa and his Daughter Bernice; ſo that he died very old, and much honoured. But this happened afterward. But at that time Agrippa ſtood before the place bound with other Companions, who likewiſe were in Bonds: and through the grief he conceived, he leaned againſt a certain tree, on which there ſate an Owl. One of thoſe Priſoners, who was by Nation a German, beholding that Bird, asked the Souldier that was fettred with him, who he was that was apparrelled in purple: and underſtanding that his name was Agrippa, and that he was a Jew, and one of the Nobility of that Nation, he required the Souldier,

Which when he had obtained, and having got near him, he certified him by an Interpreter of that which followeth: "Young man "(said he) the sudden change that hath befallen thee at this present, afflicteth and oppresseth "thee with great and grievous torment; neither wilt thou easily believe that thou shalt escape "from thy misery: yet so doth the divine providence dispose all things, that thou shalt short-

Know therefore, and I swear unto thee by the gods both those of mine "Ancestors, and those also, who have residence and presidence in this place, and who have "procured us this iron chain, that I will tell thee all, not to yeild thee pleasure by my vain "discourse, or to entertain thee with fruitless consolation; knowing well that when these H "Predictions shall happen to fail, they will breed thee more sorrow, than if thou hadst never "heard of them. But I have thought it good, yea, although it were with mine own danger, "to declare unto thee the Prediction of the gods. It cannot otherwise be, but that shortly "thou shalt be delivered from these bonds, and shalt be advanced to great honour and pow-"er; so that those, who at this day have compassion of thy calamity, shall bear envy to thy "glory, and thou shalt depart this life in great felicity, and shalt leave thy children mighty "possessions. But bear this in thy remembrance, that when thou shalt see this Bird once more, "thou must needs die within five days after. These are those things which the gods think "meet to foretel thee by this Bird. As for my self, I have supposed I should do thee wrong, "if I should conceal this Prediction from thee, having the foreknowledg thereof. I have "therefore thought good to impart this joy unto thee, whereby thorow hope of thy future I "profit, thou mayest more easily endure thy present misfortune: for which cause I beseech "thee, that as soon as thou shalt be partaker of this thy felicity, thou wilt endeavour thy "self to deliver us also from these adversities.

This presage of the German seemed to ridiculous to Agrippa, as it afterwards deserved most mighty admiration. But Antonia being sore grieved at the young mans calamity, thought it not only a difficult matter for her to intreat Tiberius for him, but altogether unprofitable in regard she should be repulsed: yet wrought she so much with Macron, that he was committed to the custody of such Souldiers, who were of a more reconciled behaviour, and had a Centurion appointed to keep him, that suffered him to use his daily bathings, and gave his friends and servants leave to visit him, by whose service and kindness his necessities might be relieved. His friend Silas also was admitted to speak with him, and amongst his K

See here the estate wherein Agrippa lived in prison for the space of six moneths. But Tiberius being returned to Capreas, began at first to be attainted with a certain lingring disease, and for that his sickness encreased more and more, he began to conceive a sinister hope of himself, and commanded Euodus, whom he most honoured amongst all his free-men, to bring him his

He had Caius also, his Brother Germanicus Son, who was in the flower of his age, and had travelled very diligently in good disciplines. To him also the people ascribed very much, in remembrance of the vertue of his deceased father; and as touching himself, he was of a sweet

Whereby it came to pass, that not only the people, but the Senate also held him in great estimation, as also all the Subjects in every several Province. For they that spake with him, were drawn partly by his affability, partly by the fidelity they saw in him: so that when he was dead, all of them mourned, not counterfeitly lamenting his loss, but with unfeined sorrow; for that there was not any one that supposed not his death to be every mans particular loss. He M thereforc demeaned himself so modestly towards all men, that his Son after his death was highly advanced thereby. For among the rest the men of War made their reckning, that although it should cost them their lives to get him the Empire, they would not refuse the hazard.

Tiberius by an Augury understandeth Caius After that Tiberius had charged Euodus to bring him the two young men the next morrow by break of day, he besought the gods of that place to give him an evident sign whereby he might know who should succeed him; For although he desired to leave the Empire to his success and succession before his death. Sons Son; yet made he more account of that which God should make manifest unto him.

He

A He therefore conceived a preſage, that he, who the next day ſhould enter firſt to ſalute him, it ſhould be he, who in the Empire ſhould neceſſarily ſucceed him. And having ſetled this thing in his fantaſie, he ſent unto his little Sons Maſter, charging him to bring him unto him by break of day, ſuppoſing that God had ordained that the Empire ſhould be his: but the matter fell out quite contrary to his expectation. For being in this thought, he commanded Euodus, that as ſoon as he might, and as ſoon as the day ſhould ariſe, he ſhould ſuffer him of the two young Princes to enter in unto him, who ſhould arrive the firſt. He walking out, met with Caius before the chamber door (for Tiberius was not there, who being ignorant of that which his Grandfather thought, was buſie about his breakfaſt) and ſaid unto him, that the B Emperour his father called for him, and withal ſuffered him to enter. When Tiberius beheld Caius, he ſuddenly began to conſider upon the power of God, who deprived him of the means to diſpoſe of the Empire, according as he had determined with himſelf, for that it lay not in his power: and he lamented greatly, not ſo much for that he ſaw his deliberation could not be brought to effect, as for that his Son Tiberius was diſtaſted of the Roman Empire; and beſides that, was in danger of his life. For he made reckning, that they who were more ſtronger than he, would not ſuffer him to converſe among them, and that alliance could not aſſure him his life: for ſometimes for fear, and otherwhiles for hatred, ſome one would accuſe him, that he went about and buſily ſought to ſeize the Empire; or that he had complotted ſome ſtratagem, leſt he ſhould loſe the Empire with his life. In a word, Tiberius was very much addicted to Aſtrological Predictions and Nativities; ſo that the greater part of thoſe things which he executed in all his life time, was ordered thereby.

The yeer of the world, 4001. after Chriſts nativity, 39.

Tiberius addicted to the Mathematicks.

C He ſeeing Galba one day coming towards him, ſpoke this of him to certain of his familiars: Behold the man that ſhall be one day honoured with the Romane Empire. And amongſt all the Emperours, he gave greateſt credit to divination, for that in certain things he had found the conjectures correſpondent to truth. But at that time he was grievouſly diſquieted, by reaſon of the misfortune that had happened; yea, he was in ſuch ſort grieved, as if his grandchild had been already loſt, and he blamed himſelf for that he had ſought theſe preſages: for that he might have died without falling into that diſaſter, in being ignorant of that which was to come: whereas now he ſhould die in the knowledg of their miſ-haps whom he loved moſt intirely. Being thus troubled to ſee that the Sovereignty of the Empire ſhould contrary to his intention fall into their hands, who by his will ſhould not enjoy the ſame; although it D were with hearts grief and contrary to his will, yet ſpake he to Caius after this manner which enſueth: My Son, although Tiberius be more nearly allied unto me than you are; yet notwithſtanding both by mine own advice, as alſo by the will of the Immortal Gods, I commit unto your hands the Empire of the Romans. I require you therefore that when you ſhall enjoy the ſame, you forget not the good will I have born towards you, who have eſtablished you in ſo high and worthy a dignity; and charge you likewiſe that you forget not your Cozen Tiberius; but knowing that by the will of the gods I am he, who after them am the authot of ſo many goods, which have befaln you, you return me the like good will and affection: and that you likewiſe take care of Tiberius, by reaſon of your mutual alliance: for you E ought to know that Tiberius ſerveth you for a bulwark to maintain your Empire, and your own life; and if he die, it will be the beginning of your miſ-hap. For it is a perillous matter for thoſe, who are raiſed to high Dignities, to be ſole and without allies. Furthermore, the gods do never leave them unpuniſhed, who attempt or act any thing againſt the laws of conſanguinity. Theſe were the laſt words which Tiberius ſpake to Caius, who promiſed him to perform all that which he required, notwithſtanding he meant nothing leſs. For incontinently after he was inſtalled in the Empire, he cauſed Tiberius to be made away, bethinking him of thoſe divinations: as alſo the ſame Caius died anon after by a Conſpiracie that was practiſed againſt him. When that Tiberius had declared Caius his Succeſſour in the Empire, he lived not many days after, and died after he had governed twenty two years, five moneths, and three days. Thus Caius was the fourth Emperour.

F The Romans having intelligence of Tiberius death, greatly rejoyced at the good news; yet durſt they not aſſure themſelves; and though of long time they would have willingly redeemed the truth of theſe reports with a good ſum of money; yet feared they leſt the news ſhould be falſe, and leſt if they ſhewed themſelves too diligent in expreſſing their ſigns of joy, they ſhould afterwards be accuſed for it, and loſe their lives thereby. For only Tiberius had done much miſchief to the noble families in Rome, being of himſelf a man cholerick, implacable towards all men without any occaſion, having a natural inclination ſo cruel, that the eaſieſt pain whereunto he adjudged thoſe whom he condemned, was death: notwith-notwithstanding therefore that each man took pleasure to hear the news, yet did each one conceal it, until such time as they might be more fully assured, through the fear of those miseries they foresaw, if the matter should fall out otherways. But Marsyas, Agrippas freeman, having certain notice of Tiberius death, ran speedily to comfort his Master Agrippa, with these good news, and meeting with him as he came out of the Bath, he made a sign unto him, and told him in the Hebrew tongue, the Lion was dead. Agrippa conceiving that which he meant, was ravished with joy, and said unto him: I will requite thee for all those benefits I have received at thy hands, and especially for this good news, provided that it prove true. The Centurion who had the keeping of Agrippa, considering what expedition Marsyas had used in running, and the pleasure that Agrippa had conceived in his report, he began to suspect some alteration, and asked him what had happened: and whereas he delayed to give him an answer, he importuned him the more. Whereupon Agrippa told him plainly what he had heard, in that he had grown already into inward familiarity with him. The Centurion rejoyced at his news, as well as Agrippa, hoping to speed the better thereby, and made Agrippa good cheer: but whilest they were in the midst of their banquetting, and drunk freely, there came one unto them, who told them that Tiberius was alive, and that within few days he would come to Rome. The Centurion troubled with this news, for that he had committed a capital crime in eating in the company of a prisoner, upon the news of Cæsars death, and by rejoycing with him, he drave Agrippa out of the place where he sate, and reproachfully said unto him; Thinkest thou (said he) that I know not how falsely thou spreadest the rumour of Cæsars death? yes, be assured thou shalt answer thy lie with the loss of thy head. This said, he caused Agrippa to be bound, whom before-time he had suffered to go at liberty; and shut him up in more close prison, than he had been before: so that Agrippa was all that night long in this extreme misery. The next day the rumour was spread thorow the whole City, that confirmed Tiberius death, and at that time every one boldly protested it. There were some also, who offered Sacrifices for this cause, and there came Letters also from Caius, which were addressed to the Senate, by which he certified them that Tiberius was dead, and how the Empire was committed to his hands. He writ another also to Piso, who had the Guard of the City, containing the like report: and besides that commanding him to transfer Agrippa from the company of those Souldiers, by whom he was kept, to the same place where he was lodged before; so that from that time forwards, he waxed confident. For although he was as yet a prisoner, yet lived he at his own discretion. Caius arriving in Rome, brought with him Tiberius body, which he burned most magnificently, according to the custome of the Countrey. And although he were very willing to deliver Agrippa the same day; yet he was disswaded from the same by Antonia, not for any ill will she bare the prisoner, but in regard of Caius honour, lest thereby he should shew himself to be glad of Tiberius death, in setting him at liberty so speedily, whom he had committed to prison. When as therefore some few days were over-past, he sent for him to his house, and caused him to be powl'd, and his garments changed, and that done, he set a Diadem upon his head, and made him King of Philips Tetrarchy, to which he annexed Lysanias Tetrarchy, and changed his chain of iron, into a chain of gold of the same weight, and sent Marullus into Judæa to govern there. The second year of Caius reign, Agrippa asked licence to repair into Judæa, to the intent he might dispose of his Kingdom, purposing to return again at such time as he had dispatched those affairs. Which when the Emperour had granted him, he came into Judæa, and was seen and saluted for a King beyond all mens expectation, serving thereby for a most notable example unto men, to express unto them how great the power of destiny is in humane affairs, considering the poor estate wherein he had been before, and the happiness which he enjoyed at that time. Some termed him happy, in that he resolutely followed his hopes, othersome could scarcely believe that he was in this sort advanced.

in great honour and with greater ſubſtance. This charge endured ſhe with great hearts grief, eſpecially, at ſuch time as ſhe ſaw him apparelled like a King, and invironed with a great multitude of people, and impoſſible was it for her to hide the bitterneſs of her grief, for which cauſe ſhe incited her husband and perſwaded him to make a voyage to Rome, and to purchaſe as much as he poſſeſſed. For, ſaid ſhe, I cannot endure to live, if Agrippa, Ariſtobulus Son condemned to death by the ſentence of his own father (ſo poor and indigent, that to redreſs his neceſſities wherewith he was daily preſſed by his Creditors, he was conſtrained at laſt to flie to Rome) ſhould return with ſuch titles of a King, and that her husband, who was a Kings Son, and was called to the Kingdom by his father, ſhould live obſcure, and paſs his life like a private man: Husband (ſaid ſhe) if heretofore it hath been no prejudice to thee to live in leſs Dignity, than erſt thy father hath done; now at leaſtwiſe deſire that due honour which belongeth to thy family: neither think it to be ſufferable to ſubſcribe to him in eſtimation, who in times paſt hath been maintained by thy bounty. Neither ſuffer it to be thought (through thine own ſloth) that he in his neceſſity had better means and induſtry to obtain an ample fortune, than you amidſt your mighty abundance, as if it redounded not to thy ſhame to be thought inferiour to him at this time, who not long ſince, except by thy mercy, had no means to live. Let us therefore haſtily repair unto Rome, and neither ſpare gold, ſilver, or any other expence, for that it availeth us not ſo much to keep the ſame, as to imploy the ſame in the purchaſe of a Kingdom. But Herod diſſwaded her as much as he might, for that he contented himſelf to live in quiet, and ſuſpected the confuſion that was at Rome, which he endeavoured as much as in him lay, to lay open to Herodias. But the more negligent ſhe ſaw him, the more inſtantly incited ſhe him to ſeek out the Kingdom, and never gave ſhe him over, until ſhe had conformed him to her deſire: Whereunto he the rather liſtned, in that ſhe might not be drawn from her reſolution. Having therefore furniſhed himſelf after the moſt magnificent manner, and ſpared no coſt, he repaired to Rome, and led Herodias his wife with him. Agrippa ſmelling their intent, and the preparation they made, made his proviſion likewiſe. And having notice that they were put to Sea, he ſent Fortunatus one of his freemen to Rome, with preſents to the Emperour, and certain Letters againſt Herod, with commiſſion to certifie Caius of every particular, according as the occaſion ſhould ſerve. He embarking himſelf after Herod, had a happy paſſage, and was only prevented by him, but for the ſpace that Herod preſented himſelf to Caius: for he incontinently followed him, and delivered his Letters. For they arrived at one time at Puteol, and found Caius at Baia, a village of Campania, diſtant from Puteol ſome five ſtades, inriched with moſt royal and ſumptuous Palaces, for that every Emperour enforced himſelf to exceed the honour of his Predeceſſour, by reaſon of the hot baths that naturally iſſued out of the earth, ſerving both for the health of the body, and recreation of the ſpirits. Whileſt Caius talked with Herod in that he viſited him firſt, he received Agrippas Letters, containing Herods accuſations, for they accuſed him of a conſpiracie made and complotted betwixt him and Sejanus, ſince the beginning of Tiberius Empire: And how for the preſent he favoured Artabanus King of the Parthians to the prejudice of the Emperor Caius: of this, the preparations Herod had ſtored up in his Arcenals, gave evident teſtimony, which were ſufficient to arm ſeventy thouſand men of war. Caius was ſore moved with theſe informations, and asked Herod if that which was informed him touching his warlike preparation, was true. He unable to contradict the ſame in any thing, for fear he ſhould be convicted of falſhood, avowed no leſs. Whereupon Caius ſuppoſing the accuſation of his revolt to be ſufficiently approved, deprived him of his Tetrarchy, and annexed it to Agrippas Kingdom; beſtowing Herods ſubſtance alſo upon him. He baniſhed him likewiſe for ever, and confined him in the City of Lions in France: and underſtanding that Herodias was Agrippas Siſter, he gave her all that which in right appertained unto her. And ſuppoſing that ſhe would not willingly accompany her husband in that his calamity, he told her that her brother ſhould be her warrant. But ſhe gave him this reply: Mighty Emperour, you ſpeak magnificently, and as it well beſeemeth ſo great a Majeſty, but there is a cauſe that hindreth me from partaking the benefit of that bounty, which you intend towards me, which is the affection that I bear unto my husband, whom if I ſhould forſake in this his miſery, it would very ill beſeem me, in that I have been a partner with him in his felicity. Caius diſpleaſed with this her reſolute anſwer, baniſhed her likewiſe with her husband, and gave the confiſcation of her eſtate alſo to Agrippa. God did after this manner puniſh Herodias, in regard of that envy which ſhe had conceived againſt her Brother; and plagued Herod, in that he had ſo lightly liſtned to the fooliſh perſwaſions of a woman. But Caius governed the Empire, the firſt and ſecond year of his reign, with moſt noble directions, behaving himſelf graciouſly towards all men, whereby he obtained the good good liking of the Romans, and the favour of his other Subjects. But in process of time the greatness of his estate made him surpass the limits of humane condition, and challenge to himself the title of Divinity, whereby he governed all things in contempt of God.

The Sedition of the Jews and Grecians in the City of Alexandria.

Hecio & Russinus, cap. 15. Al. cap. 17. Appion Prince of the Alexandrians Embassage, accuseth the Jews because they ascribed not Divinity to Cæsar.

AND whereas there arose a sedition betwixt the Jews and Grecians, that inhabited Alexandria, three chosen Embassadors on either side were sent unto Caius. One of these Embassadors of Alexandria was Appion, who charged the Jews with many outrages, and amongst other things he alleadged that they made no reckning of honouring Cæsar: and that whereas all other Subjects of the Roman Empire had erected Altars and Temples in honour of Caius, and in all other things had received him as a God, the Jews supposed it to be a dishonour for them to honour his Statues, or swear by his name. After that Appion had urged many things and inveighed grievously against the Jews, hoping that Caius would be provoked against them, as in all likelihood and appearance it should have faln out; Philo, the chiefest among the Embassadours of the Jews, a man of a famous memory, and brother to Alexander Alabarcha, being experienced in Philosophy, enforced himself to answer those accusations which were urged against the Jews. But Caius commanded him silence, and willed him instantly to withdraw himself; and was so sore displeased, that it appeared very manifestly, that he intended some hainous revenge against them. Whereupon Philo departed after he had been grievously taunted; and spake thus unto the Jews that flocked about him, We must be of good courage, since Caius in words seemeth to be displeased with us: for in effect he will arm God in our behalf against himself.

CHAP XI.

Caius sendeth Petronius into Syria, to make war against the Jews, who should refuse his Statue.

Alias, cap. 17. Cæsar sendeth Petronius into Syria, and commandeth him in spite of the Jews to plant his Statue in Gods Temple.

BUt Caius, being sore displeased for that the Jews only despised his ordinances, sent Petronius into Syria to succeed Vitellius in his room, charging him with a strong Army to invade Judæa; and if they willingly admitted his Statue, that then he should place it in the Temple of God; but if they denied the same, then, that overcoming them by war, he should enforce them to condiscend thereunto. As soon as Petronius came into Syria, he endeavoured himself to satisfie Cæsars command: and having assembled as great an Army as he could possibly levie, and leading forth with him two Legions of Roman Souldiers, he wintred at Ptolemais, intending upon the first spring to invade Judæa. All which he signified to Caius by his Letters: who commending him for his industry, advised him to use all expedition therein, and to make War against those who should disobey his commandments. Mean while divers thousands of the Jews resorted to Petronius, who sojourned at Ptolemais, "Beseeching him not to constrain them to do that thing which was contrary "to their Laws, or to transgress the Ordinances of their Fore-fathers. For, if (said "they) you have wholly decreed to bring and erect this Statue in our Temple, first deprive "us of our lives, and afterwards do that which shall seem good in your eyes. For it is im- "possible for us, as long as our souls remain within our bodies, to permit that which is for- "bidden by our Laws, or to suffer such impiety in regard of that honour, which we owe unto "our Law-maker, and our Predecessors who have ratified our Laws to the intent we should "increase in vertue. Petronius enraged at this their protestation, answered thus: If I were "Emperor, and of mine own mind enterprized this action, you had reason to use these kinds "of insinuations unto me. But since Cæsar hath sent me this commission, there is no contra- "diction, but that I must obey his decrees: for if you resist the same, you shall endure a most "severe and rigorous punishment for your disobedience and contumacie. Hereunto the "Jews answered: My Lord (said they) since your pleasure is such, as you will not in any "sort transgress the command and contents of Cæsars Letters, neither will we any ways vio- "late or infringe the prescript of our Law, under hope of Divine assistance, and in imitation "of the vertue of our Ancestors: for we are not so faint-hearted, that under hope of a vain "and untimely desire of life, we should break those Laws which Almighty God hath pro- "posed unto us, under the reward of eternal felicity: for which cause we will endure all for- "tunes whatsoever, so as our Countrey-law and Religion may remain inviolate, and we are ready

A ready to encounter any misfortune, under hope that God will assist us; for whose honour we fear not to adventure on any danger. This had we rather do, than by obeying thee through cowardize, to incur perpetual ignominy; and that which is more, God's wrath in neglect of his Laws, whose Authority, even in thine own judgment, is more to be regarded than Caius Commission.

Petronius conjecturing by these their answers, how hard a matter it was to estrange them from their opinion, and perceiving he could not do for Caius what he expected in the erection of his Statue, without great bloodshed, whereby much murther and inconvenience might follow, he took certain of his neareſt and deareſt friends with him, and posted to Tiberias, that he might more conveniently and circumspectly look into the Jews actions. They fearing some imminent The Jews met Petronius at Tiberias, beseeching him not to violate the sacred City with his Images.

B danger through the wars they expected from the Romans, and greater mischief through the breach of their Laws, assembled once more many thousands of them, and met with Petronius at Tiberias, beseeching him that he would not inforce them to that necessity, nor defile their sacred City with forbidden Images. Whereunto Petronius answered: Therefore (saith he) will you fight with Cæsar, without regard either of his ability, or your own weakness? We will not fight (said they) but we will rather die, than depart from our Laws. Whereupon prostrating themselves, and laying open their naked throats, they said they were ready to entertain their deaths. In these terms continued they for the space of forty days, neglecting their husbandry, whereas at that time it was the chiefest seed-time. For it was most resolutely concluded among them, rather to suffer death, than to admit the Statue. Whilest the matter stood upon these divers of their household train, and some of the chiefest among the Jews, came unto Petronius, beseeching him that he would consider the obstinacy of the people: neither give them occasion to draw them into desperate actions, but rather that he would write unto Caius, with what obstinacy the people refused the Dedication of his Image in the Temple: and how giving over the care of their Husbandry, they prepared themselves for the War, without any trust or confidence in their own strength, being rather addressed to die, than to suffer so great an indignity to be offered to their Religion. Besides, how giving over their Tillage, there was nothing to be expected but Robbery, whereas they should want means to pay their Customs, by which means they hoped that Cæsar would be moved to moderate his severity towards that Nation, and

D not to give them cause of Rebellion: and that if he might not be moved from the prosecution of the War, that then he might go forward with his business. This was the effect of Aristobulus request.

But Petronius, partly in respect of their prayers who instantly urged him; and the weightiness of the action; partly in regard of the contentious purpose of the Jews, supposing that Petronius promiseth the Jews to write unto Caius in their behalf, and exhorteth them to follow their husbandry.

it was a matter unworthy a man to put so many thousands of men to death, to satisfie Caius unbridled desire and insolence, and touched with the fear of God, and remorse of his own Conscience, he had rather to his own danger, inform the Emperour of the absurdity of the matter by his Letters, being no ways ignorant of his wrathful spirit, and forwardness in revenge,

E except his furious passion and expectation were answered. For this thought he; that although it altered not his resolution, but haply enforc't his displeasure against him, in that he speedily executed not his Command, yet that it was the duty of a good man, no not to refuse an assured death, if so be he might save so guiltless and huge a multitude. When as therefore he had assembled the Jews together in Tiberias (when many thousands of them resorted thither) and disposed all those warlike Forces that at that time gave attendance on him round about him, he told the Jews first of all, not his own, but the Emperours intent, who would shortly have them taste his displeasure, and enforce them to bear the burthen of his indignation, who were so bold as to contradict him. For himself, it necessarily concerned him, that since by the Emperours favour he had received so great honour, he should not commit any thing contrary to his Command.

F I hold it (said he) a matter most just to imploy my life and honour for you, to the end that so huge a number of men should not be drawn into danger of death: and I will respect the excellencie of the Laws of your Fathers, for which you think you ought to entertain a War and danger: neither is it lawful to suffer the Temple of God to be defiled by the authority of Princes. I will therefore write to Cæsar, and certifie him of your minds: and in all that I may, I will assist you to obtain your Request. God (whose power surpasseth all industry and humane force) vouchsafe to conduct you, and make you constant in the observation of your Laws, and grant that he, through excessive desire of humane glory, commit not any thing that may offend God. And if Caius be displeased, and inforce his inevitable displeasure against me, I will undertake all danger, and endure all torments both in body and spirit, to the end that I may not hold so many vertuous men, as you are, periſh in your good and juſt actions. Go therefore each of you and ply your work, and till G your Lands: myſelf will ſend unto Rome, and both in my ſelf and by my friends, I will imploy myſelf for you.

The year of the world, 4002. after Chriſts Nativity, 40.

After he had ſpoken thus, he diſmiſſed the Aſſembly, praying the chiefeſt amongſt them to encourage the Husbandmen to ply their buſineſs, and to confirm the reſt of the people in their good hope. Of himſelf alſo he ceaſed not to animate them. And truly God ſhewed his aſſiſtance to Petronius, and aſſiſted him in all his affairs, For as ſoon as he had finiſhed his diſcourſe unto the Jews, there ſuddenly fell a great rain beyond all humane expectation. For the day was very fair, neither was there any appearance of rain in the Air, and all that year long there was an extreme drought; ſo that men were paſt hope to have any moiſture, notwithſtanding, that ſometime there happened certain clouds in the Heavens. At that H time therefore the water fell in great abundance: and beſides the expectation and opinion of men, the Jews conceived hope, that Petronius ſoliciting their cauſe, ſhould not be repulſed. But Petronius was more amazed than all the reſt, ſeeing evidently that God undertook the affairs of the Jews, and gave them teſtimony of his manifeſt aſſurance; ſo that they that were their profeſſed Adverſaries, had no means to contradict them, as he himſelf wrot to Caius at large, with inductions and exhortations, to the end he ſhould not draw ſo many thouſand men into a deſperate reſolution and unhappy death. For without War it was impoſſible for him ever to make them forſake their Religion. Furthermore, that he would not cut off and loſe the revenew which he received of that Nation; and would not erect a trophy of an everlaſting curſe and malediction againſt himſelf. Adding moreover, what the power of their I God was: which he had ſo clearly declared, that no man ought to doubt, but that his merciful hand was over them. This is the contents of Petronius Letters.

After a long and continual drought there fell a ſudden ſhower.

Petronius writeth to Caius.

On the other ſide, King Agrippa, who at that time converſed at Rome, grew more and more in favour with Caius, having entertained him at a Banquet, wherein he inforced himſelf to exceed all others in ſumptuouſneſs, as in all other ſorts of delights and pleaſures; yea, with ſuch feſtivals entertained he him, that not only others, but alſo the Emperour himſelf could not attain to ſuch magnificence; ſo much enforced he himſelf to exceed all others through the great deſire he had to content and ſatisfie Cæſar in all things. Caius was abaſhed at this his courage and magnificence; ſeeing Agrippa enforce himſelf above his power and means to abound in ſilver; and all this to the intent to pleaſe him, For which cauſe Cæſar K in requital of his kindneſs, intending to honour Agrippa to his uttermoſt power in granting him that which he moſt deſired, being one day whet with wine, invited him to drink a carouſe: adding theſe words:

Agrippa honoureth Caius in Rome, and in reward thereof Caius willeth him to demand ſomewhat, who deſireth nothing elſe, than that Petronius Commiſſion to erect the Statue be revoked.

Agrippa, I have heretofore known the honour thou haſt ſhewed towards me, and thou haſt expreſſed the earneſt affection that thou beareſt me, in hazarding thy ſelf in divers dangers, into which thou haſt been drawn during Tiberius life-time; and haſt omitted nothing, no not in that which exceedeth thy power, to ſhew thy virtuous affection towards me. For which cauſe I think that it ſhould be a great ſhame for me, if I ſhould ſuffer my ſelf to be overcome by thee in kindneſs, without ſome anſwerable correſpondence: I will therefore put that in practice which I have heretofore omitted. For all thoſe things that hitherto I have beſtowed on thee, are of no reckoning. My L will is, that thy ready virtue ſhould at this preſent be requited, by ſuch means as might for ever make thee happy. Now he ſpake after this manner, hoping that Agrippa would beg ſome great Province at his hands, or the Revenews of ſome Cities.

But although he had already prepared his demand, yet did he not diſcover his intent, but gave Caius this ready anſwer, that whereas he had ſerved him to the diſlike of Tiberius, it was not for the gain he expected heretofore, and for the preſent alſo he did nothing under hope to be rich, contenting himſelf that he was in the Emperours good favour. That the benefits he had received by him were great, yea, exceeding all that which he durſt ever have hoped. For (ſaid he) although they be but ſmall in compariſon of your Greatneſs, yet in reſpect of my ſelf who have received them, and in my conceit and quality, they are very great. Caius M being amazed at this his courage, inſiſted the rather to perſwade him, that he would grant him all that he would require at his hands. Whereupon Agrippa ſaid: Dread Prince, ſince it is your good pleaſure to think me worthy to be honoured by your preſents, I will not requeſt any thing at your hands that may tend to enrich me; for that by thoſe goods you have already given me, I am greatly honoured: but I beſeech and requeſt one thing at your hands, which will purchaſe you the reputation of Piety, and will procure God to be propitious unto you in all your actions; and which alſo will breed me much glory among thoſe who ſhall hear that I have not been refuſed in my demand, which concerneth me more than

A than the neceſſities of this life. I therefore beſeech you, that it will pleaſe you to give commandment, that that Statue, which you have charged Petronius to erect in the Temple of the Jews may never be advanced there. This was Agrippa's requeſt, which to his great hazard he preſented the Emperour with, knowing very well how perillous a matter it was, and as much as concerned his life to demand any ſuch thing at Caius hands, that was not anſwerable to his humour. Caius on the one ſide moved with the ſervice Agrippa had done him, and on the other ſide ſeeing how great an indignity it ſhould be for him, if before ſuch an Aſſembly of witneſſes, he ſhould deny that which he had ſo inſtantly preſſed Agrippa to requeſt, as if ſuddenly he had repented himſelf, & admiring Agrippa's virtue (who having means within a little time to augment his particular eſtate, either by revenews or other commo-
B dities, had preferred the Common Cauſe, the Laws of his Countrey, and Piety before all theſe) he granted him his Supplication, and wrote to Petronius, prayſing him for that he had uſed ſuch diligence in aſſembling his Army, as alſo for all that whereof he had certified him, annexing theſe words: If (ſaid he) you have already planted the Statue, as I commanded you, let it remain in the place; but if it be not done, be thou no more troubleſome to the Jews, but diſmiſs thine Army, and repair thou in perſon to that place whither I have ſent thee. For I urge no more the erection of that Statue, for the deſire that I have to gratifie Agrippa, whom I intirely honour, and in ſuch ſort, as it is impoſſible for me to contradict any thing whatſoever, that either he hath need of, or ſhall require. Theſe were the contents of
C thoſe Letters, which Caius wrote to Petronius, before he underſtood that the Jews bethought them of Revolt: for they made it known, that rather than they would endure the Statue; they would hazard a War againſt the Romans: which when Caius underſtood, he was extremely ſorrowful: and being a man addicted to all villany, and eſtranged from all honeſty, and who gave place to no good counſel, incontinently after he had conceived a diſpleaſure againſt any man, and who likewiſe thought it a great good hap for him to accompliſh all that whatſoever he pleaſed, he wrote again to Petronius to this effect: Since the Preſent which the Jews have given thee, have more prevailed with thee than my Commandments have done, ſo as to pleaſe them, thou haſt deſpiſed that which I have enjoyned thee, I make thy ſelf the Judg how much thou haſt deſerved to incur my diſpleaſure, to the end that thou mayeſt ſerve for an example to all thoſe, who ſhall come after thee, that an Emperours
D Commandment ought not in any ſort to be neglected. Although this Epiſtle was both written and ſent, yet did not Petronius receive the ſame during Caius life time, for that they that carried the ſame, were ſtayed with croſs winds; ſo that Petronius received thoſe Letters that certified him of Caius death, before he received the other. For God would not forget Petronius, who expoſed himſelf to great dangers for the love of the Jews, and the honour of God. And Caius being taken out of the world by God's wrath being kindled againſt him, by reaſon that he affected Divine honours, received his reward, and Petronius obtained favour both at Rome, and thorow all the whole Government, and eſpecially among the principal Senators, againſt whom Caius was accuſtomed to vomit his cholerick diſgraces. He died a little after he had written the Letter to Petronius, by which he threatned
E and denounced him death. Hereafter will I declare the cauſe why he was taken out of this world, and the manner how Treaſon was complotted and wrought againſt him. The Letter that brought the tidings of Caius death, was delivered to Petronius firſt; and incontinently after he received that wherein he enjoyned him to kill himſelf. He highly rejoyced at this his good hap, and Caius death, and admired Gods providence, who ſpeedily and happily had rewarded him, both for the honour that he bare unto his Temple, as alſo for the aſſiſtance he uſed towards the Jews. Behold; how Petronius eſcaped from death, by an unexpected means.

That which hapned to the Jews which were at Babylon, and of the two Brethren Aſinæus and Anilæus.

IN thoſe days there happened a grievous Commotion amongſt thoſe Jews that inhabited Meſopotamia and Babylon, and ſuch ſlaughters and calamities as never the like hath been declared in our former Narrations; which in that I intend to report both particularly and ſeriouſly, I will rip up the whole cauſe thereof from his firſt Original. There was a City called Nearda belonginging to Babylon, ſtored with Inhabitants, and enriched with many fruitful Poſſeſſions, ſufficient to ſuſtain ſo great a multitude: Moreover, it was such as might be hardly invaded by the Enemy, both for that the River Euphrates hemmed it in on one side, as also for that it was defenced with very strong Walls. Upon the same River also there stood another City, called Nisibis, in which the Jews in respect of the strength of the place, kept their Dragma, which they were accustomed to offer unto God, and the rest of their Votive money. These two Cities therefore served them for two Store-houses; and from thence, according as time required, they sent the money they had gathered, to Jerusalem, and committed the Convoy thereof to divers thousands of men, for fear lest it should be taken away by the Parthians, who at that time had the Sovereignty in Babylon. Among these Jews lived Asinæus and Anilæus, two Brethren, born in Nearda; whose Father being dead, their Mother set them and bound them to the Weavers trade, for that amongst those Nations it was accounted no indignity to follow that trade: for both men and women exercise themselves therein. It happened, that their Master with whom they learn'd their occupation, beat them one day, for that they came somewhat late unto their work. They taking this chastisement of his as if a great injury had been done unto them, betook themselves to their weapons, whereof there were great store in that house, and retired themselves into a place where the flood divideth it self into two parts, which naturally aboundeth with excellent pastures, and such fruits as were reserved for the use of winter. To these men there flocked a number of needy persons, whom they armed, and became their Captains, and no man opposed himself against their insolent proceedings. Being by this means grown absolute and impregnable, for that they had builded themselves a strong Fortress, they sent unto the Inhabitants, commanding them to pay them Tribute for their Cattel which they pastured; so that this Tribute gave sufficient to entertain them, promising to those who obeyed them, all friendship, and that they would maintain them against all those that should injure them, of what place soever they were: but if they did not that which they commanded them, they threatned them that they would kill all their Cattel. The Inhabitants of the Countrey, knowing themselves unable to cross them, obeyed them, and sent them the number of Cattel which they required; so that greater Forces dayly coupled themselves with them, and they grew of that power, that they could make their excursions against those whom they intended to hurt. Every one respected them, and they were feared by all men, so that their renown came at last to the ears of the King of Parthia.

Nearda, Nisibis, two Cities of Babylon.

Asinæus and Anilæus, born in Nearda, retire into a certain place, and great Companies flock unto them.

The Governour of Babylon likewise intending to cut off this mischief before it grew to greater head, assembled as many men as he could possible, both Parthians and Babylonians, and marched forth against them; with an intent to root them out, before they should have any inkling thereof to prepare themselves for their defence. Having therefore prepared his Army, he lay in ambuth neer unto a marish, and the next day following (which was the Sabbath, in which the Jews forbear all kind of work, he making his account that the Enemy durst not make head against him, but without fight he should lead them away captives) he march'd easily, thinking to charge them unaware. Asinæus, who at that time sate idly with his fellows, having his Arms fast by him: Ye men (said he) methinks I hear the neighing of Horses, not such as when they are in their heat, but as when they are backt by men. Moreover, I hear the noise of their Bridles, and I fear lest the Enemies secretly stealing upon us, should circumvent us: let therefore some one of us go and discover what the matter is, and certifie us truly of that what he shall perceive: I would I were found a lyar in that which I have told you. This said, one of them went out to espie what the noise intended; who running hastily back again, told him, that he had not falsly conjectured as touching the intent of the Enemy, for that they were at hand, and would not suffer themselves any longer to be out-braved by them. He also declared, that there was a mighty number of Horsmen, who were assembled like a drove of Beasts, sufficient and able utterly to overcome Asinæus and all his Company, forasmuch as they were not in a readiness to defend themselves: for that our Law forbiddeth us in any sort to travel on the Sabbath. Asinæus determined with himself not to do that which the Spy had said, but thought that it was better for them to behave themselves valiantly in their necessity wherein they were plunged, and that if they must needs die, it better became them to make breach of their Law, then to hearten their Enemies by their submission. He therefore presently betook himself to his weapons, and encouraged all those that were about him, to make it known in effect what their valour was. Whereupon all of them at once marched forth against the Enemy, and slaughtered a great many of them, for that they, despising Asinæus and his followers, marched as if they went to lay hold on men already vanquished; but in the end they were constrained to betake them to flight.

Asinæus, after he had encouraged his Souldiers, putteth his Enemies to flight.

When

A When the bruit of this skirmish was brought to the ears of the King of Parthia, he was wholly astonished at the boldness of these two Brethren, and had a great desire to see them, and to speak with them. He therefore sent one of the trustiest of his Guard, to let them understand that although King Artabanus had been injured by them, in that they had invaded his Countrey; notwithstanding said this Embassadour, he making less account of the displeasure he hath conceived against you, than of your virtue, hath sent me unto you to give you my hand, and troth in his name for safe conduct and security in your voyage, requiring you to be his friends: he conditioneth therefore with you without any deceit or fraud, promising you gifts and honours, and determineth to increase your dignity by his power. Asinæus refused to enterprize this voyage, but sent his brother Anilæus with certain presents, such as
B he could possibly find. He therefore departed with the Messenger, and presented himself before Artabanus; who seeing Anilæus come alone, asked him how it happened that Asinæus came not with him: and understanding that he stayed in his marish through the fear that he had of him; he swore by the gods of his Ancestors, that he would do him no wrong, wishing them to give credit to his promise, and he stretched out his hand, which is the greatest sign which the Kings of that Countrey use to assure those that parley with them. For after they have mutually given one another their hands, there is no sinister practice to be feared, and they from whom a man expecteth any harm, are no more to be feared at such time as they have given this testimony of assurance. That done, Artabanus sent back Anilæus to perswade his Brother Asinæus to come to Court. Artabanus did this, supposing that this his
C amity with the two Brothers would be a bridle for the Jews, who otherwise might encroach upon his Governments. For, he feared lest if any rebellion should happen, and he should be troubled in that war, Asinæus and they of Babylon should grow more strong, both by the voluntary submission of the Jews, as by force: and thereby should do him the more mischief. Upon this deliberation he sent Anilæus, who easily perswaded his Brother, giving him to understand among other things, what good will the King bare him, and the Oath that he had sworn: so that both of them resorted to Artabanus, who received them very graciously, admiring Asinæus virtue, who had so great a courage to exercise his enterprizes, considering especially that he was a man of low stature, and who to look on seemed to be D contemptible: and he told his friends, that without comparison, he had a greater heart, than his body.

Asinæus and Anilæus are sought unto by Artabanus for friendship.

And when as in banquetting he had named Asinæus, and shewed him to Abdagasis the General of his Army, signifying unto him with what valour these Brethren were endowed in feats of Arms; Abdagasis required that it might be lawful for him to kill Asinæus, to the end he might punish the wrongs he had done to the estate of the Parthians. Never (said the King) will I give my consent to betray a man, who hath committed himself to my protection, and hath given me his hand, and who buildeth upon the oath I have past unto him in the name of the gods. But if thou be a valiant man in feats of Arms, thou hast no need to make me forswear my self, to the end I might do justice on him for his outrages committed against the E Parthians: but at such time as his Brother and he shall depart from hence, assail him, and overcome him by thy valour, provided that I be not privy to thy attempt. And afterwards calling Asinæus to him in the morning: It is time (said he) that thou return homeward, for fear thou provoke divers of the Captains of my Court, which contrary to my will, will endeavour themselves to kill thee. I commit the Countrey of Babylon to thy protection and guard, which by thy care and vigilancy shall remain exempt from all Robberies, and other such calamities. Reason it is that I procure thy good, because I have engaged mine honour and faith irrevocably unto thee, not upon any light matter, but for things that importune thee as as nearly as thy life. This said, he gave him certain presents, and incontinently dismissed him. Now as soon as he returned home to his own fortress, he fortified the places, F both those which before-time he had thorowly defenced, as the other which as yet no man had attempted to strengthen: and in short time he grew to that greatness, as no one man so obscure of fortune and beginning attained before him. Neither contented with the honours of the Babylonians, he was also held in great account by the Captains of the Parthians, who were sent to govern in the neighbouring Provinces: yea, so much increased his authority with his power, that all Mesopotamia was at his command. In this felicity and encreasing glory of his, he continued for the space of fifteen years; which never began to wane until such time as neglecting the antient study of virtue, and contemning the Laws of his Forefathers, both he and his factious followers being devoured in pleasure, yeilded themselves captive to forein lust. It fortuned that a certain Governour of those Parthians came into that Countrey, accompanied with his Wife, not only enriched and endowed with other perfections, but alſo admired for her incomparable comlineſs and beauty, whom without ever, ſeeing her, only by reſpect of her beauty Anilæus, Aſinæus brother loved entirely: and when as by no one of his allurements he could obtain her favour, neither had any other hope to enjoy the Lady, he could not bridle his unruly luſt, but he made War againſt her Husband: and killing the Parthian in their firſt conflict, his Wife became his, both in ſubjection and bed-ſervice, which thing was the original of many mighty calamities both to himſelf, and towards his Brother. For when as having loſt her former Husband, ſhe was led away captive, ſhe carried with her the Images of the gods of her Countrey, which ſhe highly eſteemed, according as it was the cuſtom of thoſe that inhabited that place, to have their gods whom they adored in their houſes, whom at ſuch time as they travel into a forein Countrey, they carry about with them. She therefore brought them with her, and uſed them according to the faſhion of her Countrey, at the firſt ſecretly: but after ſhe was known for Anilæus wife, then adored ſhe them according to the cuſtome, and with the ſame ſervice which ſhe uſed during her firſt husbands days, ſacrificing to her gods.

Anilæus killeth a Noble man of the Parthians, and leadeth away his wife.

Their chiefeſt friends ſeeing this, firſt of all reproved them, for that Anilæus committed ſuch things as were no ways uſed among the Hebrews, and altogether repugnant to their Laws, for that he had married a woman of a forein Nation, that contradicted and violated their accuſtomed Religion: for which cauſe they adviſed them to beware, leſt in ſubmitting themſelves too much to their unbridled pleaſures, they ſhould loſe the honour and power they had received from God, even until that preſent. But ſeeing their perſwaſions profited nothing, and that Anilæus likewiſe had villanouſly ſlain one of his deareſt friends, who had ſomewhat too freely reproved him (who at ſuch time as he lay a dying, being touched with the zeal of the Laws of his Anceſtors, and with grief againſt his murtherer, wiſhed that Aſinæus and Anilæus, and all their Aſſociates might die the like death: they for that they were tranſgreſſors of the Law; the other, for that they ſuccoured not themſelves in that oppreſſion, which they ſuffered for the maintenance of their Laws.) They were ſore diſpleaſed: yet notwithſtanding, they contained themſelves, calling to their remembrance that their felicity proceeded from no other cauſe, but from the valour of thoſe Brethren.

Anilæus being reproved for his wives Idolatry, killeth one of his friends.

But when they underſtood that the Parthian gods were adored by this woman, they bethought them that it behoved them not any more to bear with Anilæus in contempt of their Laws: for which cauſe, addreſſing themſelves to Aſinæus in great Aſſemblies, they exclaimed againſt Anilæus; ſaying, that he ought, although at firſt he had no power to diſpoſe of himſelf, yet now at laſt, to correct this error before it ſhould redound to their publike plague: for that both the Marriage was diſallowed in all mens eyes, as altogether contrary to their Laws, and that the ſuperſtitious obſervance of the gods, which the woman preſumed to uſe, was an apparent injury offered to the true God. But he, although he knew that his Brothers fault would breed ſome great inconvenience, both to himſelf and his followers, yet being overcome with Brotherly affection, he eaſily pardoned his Brother, aſcribing his error to the violence of his unbridled paſſion. But whereas dayly more and more he was tired with exclamations, and greater reproofs, at length he admoniſhed his Brother of the matter, chiding him for that which was paſt, and willing him to amend the error hereafter, by ſending home the woman unto her kindred. Yet did this admonition of his take no effect with him; for that the woman perceiving that the rumour that was raiſed among the people was for her ſake, and being afraid leſt for her love ſake Anilæus ſhould incur ſome danger, ſhe poyſoned Aſinæus, to the end that her Love being in Authority, ſhe might more freely practice her impiety. Now when Anilæus had gotten the Government into his own hands, he drew out his Forces againſt certain Villages belonging to Mithridates, one of the chiefeſt among the Parthians, and Artabanus Son in-law, which Villages he ſpoiled, and carried away moveables, men, ſheep, and other riches. When Mithridates, who at that time was reſident in thoſe Quarters, underſtood of the ſpoil of his Villages, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and the rather, for that without any occaſion or proffer of injury, Anilæus had aſſailed him in contempt of his eſtate, who was a chief Peer of the Country: for which cauſe he incontinently aſſembled the greateſt power of Horſe and Footmen he could gather, to ſet upon Anilæus and his Aſſociates. Leading his Forces therefore againſt one of the Villages, he kept himſelf in covert, to the end he might fight the next day; which was the Sabbath-day, on which the Jews attempted not any thing. Whereof when Anilæus was advertiſed by a certain Syrian, who dwelt in another Village, who had exactly told him all Mithridates intent, and the place where he intended to banquet with his Souldiers; after he had made his Souldiers take their refection, he departed by night, to the end he might charge the Parthians before they might be advertiſed of his coming. He therefore ruſhed in upon them about the fourth watch of the night, and ſlew thoſe whom he found aſleep, and the reſt being aſtoniſhed hereat, were forced to ſave themſelves by flight: he alſo took Mithridates priſoner, and cauſed him to be carried away naked on an Aſs, which is one of the greateſt diſgraces which the Parthians imagine may be offered them. Having after this diſgraceful manner carried him into a Forreſt, ſome of his familiars perſwaded him to kill him: but Anilæus told them incontinently, that they ought to deal with him far otherwiſe; for that it behoved them not to kill a man, who was one of the chief among the Nobility of the Parthians, and one who was moſt honoured in regard of that affinity and alliance he had with the King: that although all that which heretofore had been offered to Mithridates, were inſupportable; yet if they ſhould be the means of the ſafe-guard of his life, he would remit the injuries, and remunerate them for their mercy in ſaving his life; whereas if they ſhould deal ſeverely with him, the King would ſeek his revenge, and make a horrible ſlaughter of all thoſe Jews that inhabited Babylon: whom they ought to have compaſſion of, both for that they are of their blood, as for that if any miſchief ſhould befal them, they knew not whither to retire themſelves; whereas they might be aſſiſted with the flower and picked number of the men of their nation. Having thus diſcourſed and debated the matter in the ears of his Souldiers, his opinion was approved, and they were perſwaded; and ſo Mithridates was ſent back again.

Anilæus diſmiſſeth Mithridates.

But no ſooner returned he home unto his houſe, but that his wife hit him in the teeth, that he lived but by the mercy of his enemies notwithſtanding he were the Kings Son in-law: that he had made no reckoning to puniſh thoſe, who had ſo much injuried him: that he likewiſe contented himſelf to have his life ſaved, after he had been priſoner to the Jews. For which cauſe (ſaid ſhe) recover thou thy former virtue and honour, which thou haſt heretofore loſt, or I ſwear by the gods of the King my Father, that the bond of Marriage which is betwixt thee and me ſhall be diſſolved.

Mithridates, unable to indure theſe uſual reproaches, and on the other ſide, apprehending his wives haughty courage, from whom he feared to be ſeparated, he aſſembled the greateſt power of men of War that he could poſſible, notwithſtanding it were againſt his will, and led them forth; ſuppoſing himſelf to be unworthy of life, if he who by Nation was a Parthian, ſhould be cowardly put to the worſt by the Jews. When Anilæus underſtood that Mithridates came forth againſt him with a great force, he thought that it would redound greatly to his indignity, if he ſhould lie lurking amidſt his marſhes, and hoping that he ſhould have no worſe fortune againſt his enemies, than he had at the firſt, and building much upon his Souldiers, who were ever wont to get the upper hand in their encounters, he likewiſe drew forth his Army: to them alſo certain other adjoyned themſelves, who ſought nothing elſe but pillage, and hoped that with their only preſence they might diſmay their enemy.

But after they had marched about ninety ſtades, and paſſed thorow a Countrey that was ſcant of water, and were about the heat of the midday travelled with thirſt: Mithridates Army came in ſight, and charged them even at that time, when they fainted for want of drink, and through the extremity of heat, ſo as they could ſcarely wield their weapons. At that time Anilæus Souldiers encountring with Mithridates freſh men, were ſhamefully put to flight: whereby it came to paſs that a great number of them were murthered, and many thouſand men put to the Sword. But Anilæus himſelf, and all thoſe of his Company, retired themſelves in great haſte into a Foreſt, leaving Mithridates Lord and Maſter of the field, whereof he was very joyful. Notwithſtanding this diſaſter, an infinite number of lawleſs men reſorted to Anilæus who ſet little by their lives, provided there might no limit be propoſed to their unbridled licentiouſneſs, ſo that he gathered a greater number of men, than thoſe whom he had loſt: yet were they far different in valour from the former: for they were men wholly ignorant of Warlike diſcipline: notwithſtanding, he being accompanied with theſe men, went and ſet upon certain Boroughs of the Babylonians, which were totally deſtroyed by his rapine and violence. For which cauſe, the Babylonians and his other enemies, ſent unto Nearda to the Jews that were there, requiring that Anilæus might be delivered into their hands: whereunto condeſcending not (for although they had a will to perform their requeſt, yet it lay not in their power to deliver him) they required that they might live in peace. And to intreat of the conditions of peace, the Babylonians ſent certain men to confer with Anilæus. They having ſurveyed the place wherein Anilæus kept, aſſailed both himſelf and his followers by night, and ſlew all thoſe they encountred with, without reſiſtance, and amongſt the reſt Anilæus. When the Babylonians ſaw that they were delivered from the oppreſſion of Anilæus, who till that time had been as it were a bridle unto them, to reſtrain and curb the hatred they conceived againſt the Jews, with whom they had had oftentimes been at odds, by reason of their contrariety of their Religions, whereby it G grew that they oftentimes fell at debate upon each opportunity wherein they met.

The year of the world, 4003. after Christs Nativitie, 41.

At that time therefore that Anilæus men were discomfited, the Babylonians set upon the Jews on all sides; who seeing themselves in danger by reason of the insolence of the Babylonians, against whom they were to weak to make resistance, and on the other side unable to live amongst them, they went and dwelt at Seleucia, a City famous in regard of Seleucus the Son of Nicanor, who builded it. In that City dwelt divers Macedons, divers Greeks, and a great number of Syrians. The Jews fled thither, and sojourned there about some five yeers, without any molestation: but in the sixth yeer when the plague grew rife in Babylon, the Jews that remained there, were enforced to seek them some new habitation; and that remove of theirs into the City of Seleucia was the cause likewise of their further mischief, H as I will make manifest. The Greeks who dwell in Seleucia, are ordinarily at debate with the Syrians, and have always the upper hand; but after that the Jews came to inhabit in that place, in a certain Sedition that arose among them, the Syrians had the upper hand, by the means of the Jews, who joyned their forces with theirs, who of themselves were valiant and good Souldiers.

The Jews afflicted by the Babylonians, repair to Seleucia.

The Greeks had been repulsed in this tumult, seeing they had but one only means left them to maintain their former honour, but to break that league of friendship which was between the Syrians and the Jews, devised in private each one with those Syrians, with whom they were acquainted, promising to live in peace and amity with them, whereunto they condescended willingly. For, the chiefest of these two Nations concluded the peace, which presently after followed, to the end that on both parts they should joyn in hatred against the Jews. So that altogether charging them at unawares, they slew more than fifty thousand of them: and all of them were slain, except some few, who through the mercy of their friends, and warrantize of their Neighbours were suffered to escape. These retired themselves to Ctesiphon a City of Greece, that was not far from Seleucia, where the King sojourneth every year, and keepeth the greatest part of his moveables; hoping in that place through the reverence of the King they might remove in more safety and security. All the Nation of the Jews that were in these Quarters stood in great fear: For the Babylonians and the Seleucians, with all the Assyrians of that Country, accorded amongst themselves to make a general War against the Jews: whereby it came to pass that they assembled themselves at K Nearda and Nisibis, trusting themselves to the strength of these Fortresses, which were inhabited also by men who were expert in Arms. See here what the estate of those Jews was, who remained in Babylon.

How Caius was ſlain by Chæreas.

CAius did not only expreſs and manifeſt his fury towards thoſe Jews that dwelt in Jeruſalem, and in other neighbouring places; but alſo thorow all the Countreys both by Land and Sea, which were ſubject to the Roman Empire, filling the whole world with an infinite number of miſchiefs; yea, ſuch and ſo hainous, as the like hereof hitherto have never been heard of. But Rome in eſpecial felt the force of his fury, which partook no leſs calamity and miſery, than any other City: but eſpecially the Senators, Patricians, and Noble men were plagued. They alſo that were called Roman Knights, who in wealth and dignity were next unto the Senators, for that out of their number ſuch men were choſen, who were to ſupply the Senate, were vexed with intolerable injuries. For with ignominies they were detracted, with baniſhments and confiſcations weakned, and by ſlaughters wholly exterminated. He likewiſe uſurped the name of God, commanding his Subjects to dignifie him with more than humane honours; and aſcending the Capitol, which amongſt all the Temples in Rome is moſt religiouſly honoured, he was ſo bold as to ſalute Jupiter, and to call him Brother. Many ſuch impieties committed he, by which he expreſſed, that his unbridled and boundleſs madneſs did never forſake him. Amongſt other his mad pranks that he played, this is worthy of memory: for on a time, thinking it to be too much trouble for him to croſs the Sea between Puteol a City in Campania, and Miſenum another Town ſeated by the Sea-ſhore in a Gally; and otherwiſe eſteeming it a thing correſpondent to his greatneſs, who was Emperor, to exact that ſuperiority on the Sea, which was anſwerable to his ſovereignty on the land, betwixt one Cape of the Sea unto another, for the ſpace of thirty furlongs or ſtades, betwixt which the Gulf had his courſe, he cauſed a Bridge to be built, on which he commanded himſelf to be drawn in a Charriot, as if that way were anſwerable to the dignity of his deity. He left not one Temple in Greece whatſoever, that he ſpoiled not of thoſe excellent pictures or Imagery that was therein; Giving a commiſſion that all Statues, and whatſoever ornaments or gifts, and preſents that were dedicated in any Temple, ſhould be brought unto him; ſaying, that ſuch things as were admirable, ſhould be reſerved for a place of admiration, ſuch as was the City of Rome: with theſe ſpoils of the Temples decked he his Palace and Gardens, & generally all his houſes and Palaces that he had in Italy. He was ſo impudent alſo, as to give direction, that Jupiter Olympius Statue, which the Greeks had in great eſtimation, and Phidias the Athenian carver had made, ſhould be tranſported to Rome. But Memmius Regulus, to whom he directed this commiſſion, executed it not, becauſe the Maſons informed him, that without ſpoiling it they could not remove it from the place. It is reported alſo, that he was hindred from this execution by ſuch prodigies as are almoſt incredible: which he certified Caius of, giving him to underſtand, what the occaſion was, that had moved him to diſobey him therein: & whilſt he was in danger of death for this his delay, the ſudden and ſucceſsful death of Caius warranted him from the ſame. Yea, ſo far ſtretched his unbridled fury, that having a daughter newly born, he cauſed her to be carried into the Capitol, and laid at the feet of the Image of Jupiter; ſaying, that the child was common betwixt him and Jupiter, leaving the judgment to all men, which of the two parents was the greateſt. And notwithſtanding all theſe his miſdemeanours, yet did men tolerate him.

Caius compareth himſelf with Jupiter.

He gave liberty to ſlaves alſo to accuſe their Maſters of whatſoever crimes they would: which was ſo much the more hateful, becauſe all things were done by Cæſars authority, and to his good liking: ſo that Pollux, who was Claudius bondman, durſt accuſe him, and Caius the Emperour was contented among the Judges to hear his Unkle brought in queſtion for his life, hoping (although it fell out otherwiſe) to pick out an occaſion to put him to death. For having filled all the Countries of his Empire with falſe accuſations, and all ſorts of miſchiefs, and giving ſlaves a prerogative above their Maſters; their Lords deviſed many conſpiracies againſt him, ſome for ſpite, and with an intent to revenge them of thoſe injuries they had received: other ſome pretending by his death to prevent thoſe inconveniencies that threatned them. In a word, his death concerned the ſecurity of the Laws, and the ſafety of all men: and had he not been ſpeedily cut off, our nation had almoſt been utterly exterminated. For which cauſe I thought good to make an exact and ample declaration of every occurrent; namely, for that the knowledge thereof maketh very much towards the manifeſtation of Gods power and will, which brings conſolation unto thoſe who are in adverſity, Caius gave ſlaves free liberty to accuſe their Maſters, and countenanced Pollux to accuſe his Maſter Claudius.

Many conſpiracies againſt Caius.

The year of the world, 4004. after Christs Nativity, 41.

Three Conspiracies against Caius. Æmilius Regulus. Cassius Chæreas. Annius Minutius.

sity, and keep them within the bounds of modesty, who suppose that their prosperity should G continue always firm, and although they neglect virtue, think that no evil may befal them. Three plots of Conspiracies were intended against him, and purposed to his utter ruine, each of them was attempted by men of great reckoning. For, Æmilius Regulus, who was born in Corduba in Spain, was fully resolved to kill him, himself, or to make him away by the means of his Confederates. Chæreas Cassius, Colonel over a thousand men, was the Chieftain of another Band; and Annius Minucianus was in no less readiness to do his uttermost herein. The cause that moved them to accord thus altogether in hatred against Caius, was, that in respect of Regulus, he was by nature a detester of all iniquity: for he was a man endowed with great magnanimity, and beautified with a liberal spirit; so as he dissembled not any of his counsels, but communicated them with many, who were either his friends, or va- H liant men fit for execution. And as touching Minucianus, he was induced to seek his revenge, through the desire he had to do justice on him in Lepidus behalf, who had been one of his especial friends, and one of the rarest men that were ever found among the Roman Citizens (whom Caius had put to death through the fear he had conceived of him) knowing well that all they, against whom Caius was incensed, could not escape with less indignity, than loss of life. As for the third man Chæreas, he could not endure the shame and reproach of cowardise that Caius had objected against him, but feared besides, that his friendship and inward familiarity with Caius would draw him into manifest dangers: for which cause, and his own security and honours sake, he thought good to make him away. Generally all of them were resolved to rid the world of Caius, and bring an end to his pride I and tyrannical power, for their hope was that their attempt should have good success: which if it happily fell out, their Countrey and Common-weal should reap the fruits thereof, for whose security and safety, it became them to hazard themselves, though it were with loss of their heads. But above all the rest, Chæreas was egged on with a desire he had to grow famous, and through the facility and convenient means he had to finish the same, because his Colonels room gave him most secure access unto him. About that time the Circensian Games were solemnized, which is a kind of Pastime which the Romans very willingly behold, and to this intent they resort to the place of these exercises, and the common people is wont to demand somewhat at their Emperours hands, which they desire to obtain; and they, after they have examined their requests, do never refuse them. Now they required K with instant and importunate supplications, that Caius would discharge them of their taxations, and moderate the excessive tributes which they payed: but he would give no ear unto them, and caused those to be apprehended, who called upon the matter most earnestly; sending his Guard, some of them one way, some of them another, to put them to the sword. After he had given this commandment, and they who received the charge, had fully executed, a great number of men were slain. The people seeing this, ceased to exclaim any more, setting light by their goods; and seeing before their eyes, that their refusal would be the cause of their death. These considerations incited Chæreas the more to execute his enterprize, to the end he might finish his furious and lawless life, whose pleasure was all mens injury and prejudice. And very oftentimes was he determined to set upon him whilest he L banquetted, yet he deferred to do the same, not for that he failed or fainted in his resolution, but because he expected some fit opportunity to hit him home, and speed him to the death. He lived Captain of Caius Guard a long time, yet took he small pleasure in conversing with him.

The Circensian Games. Caius causeth divers to be murthered, who request mitigation of their exactions.

Chæreas for many causes is incited against Caius.

But after that Caius had appointed him to gather in his Tributes, and that money which was confiscate, he seemed to have less occasion than before: for at that time he had doubled their payments, in the execution whereof he followed his own nature, rather than Cæsars command, and spared those of whom he ought to have compassion for their poverty sake. Caius was sore displeased herewith, and objected against him, that the cause why he delayed the bringing in of his money, was his cowardise and negligence: And among other outra- M ges that he offered him, as oft as he gave him the Watchword, as he usually went to fetch it once a day upon his watch-day, he gave him the names of women, and other that were full of ignominy, notwithstanding that he himself was not exempt from note of no less daintiness. For in certain Ceremonies which he himself had established, he attired himself like a woman, and was disguised with certain vails, whereby he might the better counterfeit that sex, and yet notwithstanding durst he object this dishonour to Chæreas. As oftentimes as Chæreas received the Watch-word, so oftentimes grew he in choler: which was increased the more at such time, as he delivered the same to his Companions, who openly mocked & jested at him. For when it was his turn to receive the word from Cæsars mouth, he ordinarily fitted him with ſuch an one as might move laughter; which made him the bolder to conſpire with his Confederates, in that he had juſt occaſion to be diſpleaſed: among theſe was a Senator, and one that had paſt all honours and offices, otherwiſe an Epicure and lover of delights. Him did Timidius accuſe (in that he was his enemy) that he had uſed certain injurious ſpeeches againſt Caius: and for proof hereof, he alledged Quintilia for his witneſs, a woman among all Stage-players dearly beloved of many, but in eſpecial, by Popedius, by reaſon of her incomparable beauty: and for that ſhe refuſed to bear witneſs in a matter falſely objected againſt him, whom ſhe intirely loved, Timidius required, that ſhe might be examined by torture. Caius provoked herewith, commanded Chæreas with all expedition and diligence to ſee Quintilia tortured: and the rather gave he Chæreas theſe Commiſſions to kill and torment thoſe whom he pleaſed, for that he had conceived this opinion, that he would acquit himſelf with more cruelty, to the end he might exempt himſelf of that reproach of faint-heartedneſs which was wrougfully inforced againſt him.

Popedius is accuſed of a crime by Timidius unto Cæſar.

Whileſt thus Quintilia was led forth to be tortured, ſhe trod upon the foot of one of thoſe who were of the Confederacie, giving him to underſtand that he ſhould be of good courage, for that there was no fear that ſhe would bewray any thing in torture, but would endure it with conſtancy: notwithſtanding, Chæreas tormented her cruelly, which he rather performed by conſtraint, than of his own free will. And ſeeing he could enforce nothing out of her, he brought her back to Caius in ſo pitiful an eſtate, that all they that beheld her, had compaſſion on her. Caius likewiſe himſelf was moved, and bethinking him of thoſe pains ſhe had endured he deſiſted from the enqueſt and accuſation which was proſecuted againſt Popedius & Quintilia, and gave her a certain ſum of mony, to comfort her againſt the indiſpoſition that might happen by reaſon of her torments, which ſhe had ſo couragiouſly endured.

Caius commandeth Quintilia to be tortured, who confeſſeth nothing.

Popedius is abſolved.

This diſpleaſed Chæreas very much, as if he had been the cauſe of all thoſe evils that had hapned to thoſe two perſons, having been ſo great, that to heal them, it behoved Cæſar to miniſter a medicine. He conſulted therefore with Clement, who was Captain of the footmen, and Papinius, who had the command of the Guard, and ſpake unto them to this effect: "We "have (ſaid he) O Clement, imployed our ſelves to the uttermoſt for the Emperours ſafety: "for by our providence and travel we have wrought ſo much, that of all thoſe, who have con- "ſpired againſt him, ſome of them have been ſlain: the reſt in ſuch ſort tormented and mar- "tyred, that Caius himſelf had compaſſion on them. But what reward or honour receive we "for all theſe ſervices? Clement hearing theſe words, held his peace, giving manifeſt teſtimony by his looks, and the change of his colour, that he was greatly aſhamed he had ſo long time obeyed the Emperours commandments: and whilſt he thought with himſelf that it was no policy for him to open his mouth againſt Caius cruelty, Chæreas emboldned himſelf to diſcover the calamities and dangers wherein both the City and the whole Empire were plunged, telling him, that the common report was, that Caius was the cauſe of them:

Chæreas conferreth with Clement and Papinius.

But (ſaid he) thoſe that will narrowly examine the truth, will judge that I, and Papinius that ſtandeth by me, and you, Clement, more then we, have cauſed the Romans torment, and the worlds miſery, for that of our own will we have been miniſters of Caius commands; and although the means lieth in us to make an end of thoſe violences that are committed againſt the Citizens, and injuries to the whole world: yet we ſerve him for his Guard and hangmen, inſtead of men of War. And we bear Arms, not to maintain our Liberty, and the Romane Empire, but to preſerve him, who keeps their bodies and minds in ſervitude: and every day are we ſoiled in their blood who are ſlain and tortured, until ſuch time as ſome one ſerve us with the ſame ſauce, to ſatisfie Caius cruelty. For it is not for the good will he beareth us, that he maketh uſe of us: but that which is more, we are ſuſpected by him, and he will cauſe us to be ſlain, as he hath done others. For his diſpleaſure is not limted by juſtice, but by his will: we alſo ſhall ſerve him for a mark to aim at. For which cauſe, it behoveth us to provide for the ſecurity and liberty of all men, and eſpecially to warrant our ſelves againſt thoſe dangers that threaten us.

Clement declared by apparent ſigns, that he thought well of Chæreas reſolution, but he counſelled him to make no words of it, for fear the rumour thereof ſhould be ſpred among the people, and the ſecret ſhould be diſcovered before the execution: and leſt that Caius getting an inkling thereof, they ſhould all of them be drawn into danger of death; and in the mean while, it behoved them to hope that ſome good fortune would fall out to their furtherance: and that for himſelf, his age had taken from him the neceſſary courage that belonged to ſuch enterprizes. It may be (ſaid he) that I may furniſh you with ſome advice more ſecure than yours is, Chæreas: for a more honeſter than it is, who is he that can propoſe? This ſaid, Clement returned to his houſe, ruminating with himſelf upon thoſe words which he

he had both heard and ſpoken. But Chæreas waxt fearful, and conferred with the Colonel Cornelius Sabinus, whom he knew to be a man of reputation, a lover of liberty, and greatly diſcontented with the eſtate about the miſeries of the Common-weal; and ſeeing it was neceſſary to attempt that with all expedition which he had intended, he thought good to impart the matter to him; fearing leſt Clement ſhould diſcover all the Conſpiracy, conſidering that delay and procraſtination would be but an occaſion to hinder the action. When as therefore he perceived him to give willing ear to all that which he intended, and that already he was confirmed with no leſs reſolution than himſelf was; but in that he knew not with whom he might familiarly communicate the ſame, he ſaid nothing: whereas otherwiſe he was ready, not only to conceal that which he had heard, but alſo declared that which he had in his heart, he was ſo much the more encouraged. For which cauſe, without further delay they went to Minucianus, who was conformable unto them in virtue, good affection, and great courage; and who beſides that, was ſuſpected by Caius by reaſon of Lepidus death. For, Minucianus and Lepidus were very great friends, & had been affociates in the ſame dangers. For Caius was feared by all thoſe who had any publike Office, ſparing none of them in particular or general, but made them all groan under the burthen of this fury.

Cornelius Sabinus.

Annius Minucianus.

Now they knew well one another, that all of them were diſpleaſed to ſee the Common-weal in that eſtate: but the apprehenſion of the danger ſuffered them not to manifeſt the hatred that each of them bare to Caius, although their ſecret conceit ingendred among them a certain amity. For, before that time, as often as they met together, they were accuſtomed to eſteem Minucianus for the moſt honourable man of the company, as in truth, among all the Citizens of Rome he was the moſt famous, valiant and beſt eſteemed among them: being therefore aſſembled at that time, he was firſt of all requeſted to ſpeak his opinion. For which cauſe he asked Chæreas what the watch-word was he had received that day (for all the City knew very well what mockery Caius uſually uſed in giving Chæreas the Watch-word:) Chæreas, notwithſtanding this diſgrace, failed not to anſwer him, relying on the wiſdom of Minucianus, and ſaid unto him;

But give you me for the Watch-word, Liberty; mean while I give you thanks for that you have awakened me more ſpeedily, than of my ſelf I have accuſtomed to be. You need not now any further inforce your ſelf to incite me by your words, ſith both you and I have undertaken the ſame reſolution. Before we were aſſembled in this place, our thoughts were united. Behold here my ſword, that is girt unto my ſide; this ſhall ſuffice for us both. And if you pleaſe you ſhall be my Captain, and I will march under your Command, and will follow you under aſſurance of your aſſiſtance and wiſdom. They, who have valiant hearts, never want Arms: for it is a confident courage that makes the weapon walk. That which enkindleth me thus to this action, is not the conſideration of my particular intereſt: for I have not the leiſure to think on thoſe dangers that threaten me, through the grief that I conceive, to ſee the Liberty of my Countrey changed into ſervitude, and the force of the Laws wholly aboliſhed, and all ſorts of men aſſigned to death by the cruelty of Caius. It is I that deſerve to be truſted in this execution, and I make you my Judge, ſith you have the like incention as I have.

Chæreas with certain others intend to kill Caius.

Minucianus, perceiving with what affection Chæreas ſpake, embraced him with all love; and after he had praiſed him, he exhorted him to continue his conſtancy: then departed they one from the other, with prayers and wiſhes; and at that time there hapned a preſage that confirmed them the more. For as Chæreas entred into the Senate, ſome one among the people caſt out a word, that redoubled his courage. Diſpatch (ſaid he) that which thou haſt to do; for God will aſſiſt thee. Chæreas was ſomewhat afraid, leſt ſome one of his Aſſociates had betrai'd him. But at laſt, he thought it was ſome one of thoſe, who, being privy to his reſolution, gave him a Watch-word to animate him the more; or that it was God, who, governing and obſerving of humane affairs, puſhed him forward. After he had imparted this his deliberation to divers; ſundry Senators, Knights, and men of War being advertiſed hereof were in Arms. For, there was not any one that ſuppoſed not that Caius death was the greateſt good hap the Common-wealth could expect. For which cauſe, all of them enforced themſelves as much as they could, to aſſiſt the execution with couragious and virtuous reſolution: and as forward were they in affection as in power; in words as in effect, deſiring each of them to be partakers in the diſpatch of a Tyran. For Caliſthus alſo, who was Caius freeman, and raiſed him to great Authority, yea, ſuch as he almoſt equall'd him, adjoyned himſelf to them for the fear he apprehended of all men, and for thoſe great riches which he had gathered together; for that he was a man of a corrupt conſcience, and eaſily won by bribes and preſents, doing wrong to al men, & abuſing the pow'r he had, againſt whomſoever he pleas'd, Caliſthus, Caius freeman, certifies Claudius, that Caius commanded him to poyſon him.

contrary

A contrary to all right and reason. Besides, for that he knew the unbridled nature of Caius, who having once conceived an ill opinion of any man, could never afterwards be disswaded or reconciled. Amongst divers other dangers that he had to apprehend, the greatness of the danger of his riches was not the least, which was the cause that made him serve Claudius; and secretly to follow him, under hope, that after Caius death, he should be his Successour in the Empire, and that at that time he should by him be maintained in the same estate, which he enjoyed: and by this means thought he to obtain his amity and good liking, by giving him to understand how Caius had commanded him to poyson him, and how he had invented infinite delays to defer this execution. As for mine own part; I think that Calisthus forged this matter. For if Caius had pretended to kill Claudius, he had not been disswaded by Calisthus allegations, who had incontinently received his reward, if he had deferred to execute his Masters command, with all expedition in a matter so acceptable to him. So it is, that the Providence of God would not permit Caius to execute that rage against Claudius; and Calisthus was thereby thanked for a benefit which he no ways deserved.

The year of the world 4005. after Christs Nativity 43.

Those that were about Chæreas day by day, followed the action very slowly, notwithstanding that he willingly delayed not, but thought all occasions fit to finish his purpose in, for that he might assail him at such time as he ascended up into the Capitol, or even then when he solemnized those Ceremonies, which he had instituted in honour of his Daughter, or at such time as he stood in the Palace to scatter Gold, and Silver money among the people, by casting him from the top of the Palace into the Market place, or at such time as he celebrated those Mysteries, that were introduced by him. For, no man suspected Chæreas; so discreetly had he behaved himself in all things: and he perswaded himself that no man would have thought that he should lay violent hands on Caius. And although he had done nothing to any effect; yet so it is, that the power of the gods was sufficient to give him force, and to kill him without drawing weapon. Chæreas was sore displeased against his companions, in respect that he feared that they would let slip their occasions; and although they perfectly knew that he travelled for the maintenance of the Laws, and for the good of them all: yet did they request him to delay a little, for fear lest in the execution he should in some sort miscarry, and for that cause the City might be brought in trouble, by the informations that would be made of that act; and that finally when Caius should be so much the better defenced against them, they should not know how to shew their virtue, when the time required that they should assault and set upon him. They therefore thought it good that the opportunity to set forward this business, should be the time in which the Games of the Palace were celebrated, which were solemnized in honour of Cæsar, who first of all disanulled the Peoples Authority, and appropriated it to himself. This Solemnity is celebrated in a Tent before the Palace, where the noble Citizens, with their wives and children remained to behold the sport, and Cæsar himself likewise. At that time concluded they that it would be an easie matter for them, when as so many thousands of people should be shut up in so narrow a place; so that he, who would step formost to give the stroke, might very easily be succoured, for that he could have no force in Arms, although his Guard should have the courage and desire to defend him. Chæreas resolved upon this, and it was concluded that the first day of those sports that were next at hand, the deed should be done: but their adventure was greater than their conclusion. For the delay was such, as the third day was almost past, and hardly could they be drawn to attempt the matter on the third day. At which time Chæreas assembled all the Confederates, and told them that the opportunity of time had overslipt them, accused and reproached them of slackness in that execution, which had been so virtuously resolved among them: and that it was to be feared, lest if any should be discovered, the whole matter should wax frustrate: by which means Caius might grow more cruel than he was before. See we not (said he) that by how much liberty we take from our selves, by so much we augment Caius tyranny? whereas we ought first of all to obtain security for our selves, and afterwards purchase perpetual felicity to others, the greatest glory whereof shall redound unto our selves. Now they having nothing to reply against so honourable a resolution, and yet notwithstanding no ways enforcing themselves towards the action, but remaining altogether dismayed without one word speaking, Chæreas spake thus:

Chereas expecteth the occasion to assail Caius.

The final conclusion of the Confederates as touching Caius death.

Most noble and generous Gentlemen, what is the cause that we linger and delay in this sort? See you not that this day is the last day of the Games, and that Caius is ready to depart to Sea? for he hath determined to sail into Alexandria, and to see Egypt: verily it will be a small honour for us, if we suffer him to escape our hands, to the end that both by land and Sea, he may triumph over the Romans vain boast and negligence. How can we chuse but condemn our ſelves juſtly, and challenge nothing but diſhonour, if ſome Egyptian ſuppoſing that men of free condition could not any longer indure his inſolence, ſhould put the matter in execution? For mine own part, I will dream no longer upon your conſultations, but this very day will I hazard my ſelf; and betide me what can, I will ſuſtain all fortunes with pleaſure and courage. For I am a man of that mind, that no danger can be ſo great or grievous to daunt me, as that Caius ſhould be ſlain, during my life-time, and I ſhould be deprived of ſo deſerved an honour, which ſo worthy attempt may challenge. This ſaid he departed with an intent to attempt and end the matter, and encouraged the reſt to do the like; ſo that all of them were deſirous to ſet hand to the enterprize, without any further delay. The cuſtome was, that the Captains of the Guard entred the Palace with their ſwords by their ſides, and in ſuch equipage they asked the Emperor the Watch-word. At that time it fortuned that it was Chæreas turn to fetch the Watch-word, when as a great number of people flocked to the Palace, to take up their places to behold the Games with great preſs and noiſe; wherein Caius was greatly delighted: for there was no diſtinction of place either for Senators or Knights, but each one ſate together confuſedly, men and women, ſlaves and freemen. Caius, arriving there firſt, had offered ſacrifice in honour of Cæſar Auguſtus, in dignifying whom likewiſe thoſe ſports were ſolemnized. It came to paſs that whileſt thoſe Beaſts were embowelled, that were appointed for Sacrifice, Aſprenas Gown, who at that time was Senator, was beſprinkled with blood: whereat Caius began to laugh; yet notwithſtanding, this was a preſage for Aſprenas. For he was ſlain that very day that Caius was. It is reported that Caius at that time, contrary to his own nature, behaved himſelf moſt affably toward all men, ſo that all the aſſiſtance were aſtoniſhed to behold the courteſie that he uſed. After the ſacrifice was done, he ſate him down to behold the Paſtimes, and had about him the moſt noble of his friends and familiars. Now was there every year a Theater builded, according to this form and faſhion that enſueth: It had two gates, the one towards the open yard; the other opening upon the porch, by which the actors had their egreſs and regreſs, without diſturbance of thoſe who ſate to behold the paſtime. There was within the ſame a certain ſeveral room, ſeparated from the reſt, where the Players and Muſicians kept. When the people were ſeated, and Chæreas, with the Captains were near about Cæſar, who ſate on the right ſide of the Theater: Batibius one of the Senators, a man very expert in feats of Arms, asked Cluvitus privily in his ear, who ſate by him and had in like ſort been Conſul, whether he heard any news? who anſwering him, that he had heard nothing. On this day (ſaid Batibius) ſhall the Tragedy be plaid of a Tyrans death. Cluvitus made him this reply in Homers words.

Whiſt: leſt ſome Greek ſhould liſten to our talk.

Now whileſt ſome one darted certain apples and rare and precious Birds at the people, Caius took great pleaſure to behold how they ſtrove one with another round about him, buffetting one another to ſee who ſhould get the ſame: but at that preſent there chanced two preſages: for the ſport that was repreſented, was of a Judg, who was apprehended and crucified, and in the Dance they repreſented Cynera, who was ſlain with Myrrha her Daughter: and there was a great quantity of blood gathered to counterfeit both the murther of the Judg that was crucified, as alſo of Cynera. It is affirmed likewiſe, that the day was the very ſame, whereon Philip the Son of Amyntas King of Macedon, had been ſlain by Pauſanias one of his familiars, at ſuch time as he entred the Theater. Whilſt Caius was incertain with himſelf whether he ſhould remain until the ſports were finiſhed, for that it was the laſt day of them, or rather ſhould reſort to the Bath, and after he had taken his refection, return back again thither as he had done before time; Minucianus ſitting next unto him, fearing leſt the occaſion ſhould be overſlipt, aroſe, for that he had ſeen Chæreas depart out of doors, with an intent to go and encourage him. But Caius catcht him by the Gown, ſaying, Whither go you, my friend? At which time for the reverence ſake that he bare unto Cæſar, he ſate him down again: but the fear that he had, grew ſo forceable, that he aroſe again; ſo that Caius could not detain him, ſuppoſing that he had departed thence to diſpatch ſome important buſineſs. At that time did Aſprenas counſel Cæſar to repair to the Bath, telling him that after his refection he might return thither again; all which he did, being deſirous that the reſolution might take effect. They that were with Chæreas were ready diſpoſed to take advantage of the time, and were agreed each of them to ſtand prepared and in a readineſs, in a place appointed, to the intent to act the Tragedy: and the delay was very grievous unto them, for that it was already three a clock after noon. So that Chæreas ſeeing that Caius lingered ſo long, intended to go in unto him and aſſail him in his ſeat: but he conceived

A that he could not bring that to pass without great loss and murther of the Senators, and Knights that were there present. Now although he had this apprehension, yet addressed he himself to the execution thereof, supposing that the loss that might happen by the death of some one, would be well recompensed by the security and liberty, that would redound unto all men. When as therefore they were in a readiness to enter the Theater, news was brought them, that Caius was risen to come forth; by means whereof there arose some noise. For which cause the Confederates turned back into the Theater, and appeased the people, telling them that they displeased and annoyed the Emperor: but the effect was, to draw him aside from all those, who might yeeld him any assistance; and so to set upon him. Before Caius marched Claudius his Unkle, and M. Minucianus his Sisters Husband and Valerius B who at that time was Proconsul, who might not by any means be drawn from their place, although they had the will, by reason of the Place and Dignity which they held. Caius followed after them, accompanied with Paulus Aruntius. Now when he was entred into the Palace, he left the ready way where his Officers were, and Claudius and his Associates held: he turned aside by an unfrequented way to the Baths, upon purpose to see certain young Boys, who were come out of Asia, and were sent him out of that Countrey, partly to sing in those Ceremonies that were instituted by him, and partly to dance in Arms about the Theater; & in that place Chæreas came and encountred him, asking him the Watch-word: which Caius gave him very reproachfully according to his custom. For which cause without any further delay, Chæreas assailing him both in word and act, drew his sword and gave him a great C wound, which notwithstanding was not mortal: some say, that Chæreas purposely wounded him after that sort, because he would not kill him at once, but to his further torment increase the number of his wounds: but I cannot believe the same, for that in such executions a man hath no leasure to determine how to strike. And if Chæreas had such an intention, I account him the veriest fool that might be, for that he rather took his pleasure to content his despite, than readily to deliver both himself and others, who by his delay in being of his Confederacy might be drawn into hazard. For, if Caius had not been suddenly slain, he could not have wanted means of rescous, and it should seem that Chæreas had not pretended to do so much mischief to Caius, as to himself and his fellow Confederates. And being in this uncertainty, whether his enterprize should have fallen out happily or no, he had without reaD son both undone himself and lost the occasion: whereas having happily hit home, he might without a word speaking warrantize himself against those, who would offend him. But let each man think what best pleaseth him. Caius feeling the grief of the wound (for he was strucken between the shoulder and the neck, and his sword could not pierce further, by reason that it hit upon the first bone of the brest) he cried not in any sort, neither called for any of his friends, whither it were that he distrusted them all, or that he had some other thought, and in lamenting himself, he passed onward. But he was met by Cornelius Sabinus who was already prepared to encounter him, who thrust him down upon his knees: whereupon all of them invironed him round about, and with mutual exhortations encouraged one another to do their uttermost in murthering him. At length in all mens opinion they E agreed on this; that it was Aquila that gave him the deadly wound, that severed his soul from his body. But this act ought to be attributed to Chæreas. For although divers set to their hands in the action; yet was he the first, who had bethought him of the action, having a long time before any of them premeditated the same, after what sort it should be attempted: and he also was the first that durst boldly impart it unto others, and who after they had allowed of his resolution, assembled them: and when as every one was to speak his opinion, he concluded the same very discreetly, and had always done far more than the rest; so that by his earnest and honourable perswasions, he encouraged those that were faint-hearted, since at such time as the opportunity presented it self, to set hand to the execution, he was the first that attempted it, and who valiantly strook and made an easie way to the rest, who found Caius calm enough, in that he was a man almost thorowly slain. For which cause, it is necessary, that all that which others have done, should be ascribed to Chæreas advice, virtue and diligence.

Thus died Caius, being slaughtered with many mortal wounds: now when Chæreas and his Companions had dispatched him, they perceived well that it would be impossible for them to save themselves, if so be they should return by the way that they came; so much were they ravished with that which they had done. For they drew themselves into no small danger by murthering an Emperour, who was cherished and beloved through the folly of the common people, and whose death the men of war would not leave unpunished. Now in that the ways were narrow where the murther was done, and they themselves also were hindred by reason of the great number of people, and Officers and Souldiers that gave their attendance that day in guarding the Emperour; they took another way, and retired themselves into Germanicus lodging, who was Caius Father, whom they had lately slaughtered. This House adjoyned unto the Palace. For although the Palace was but one, yet consisted it of divers lodgings which were builded by several Emperours; whose names, whether they had begun or finished the works, were imposed on the same Buildings. When as therefore they were escaped from the press, they were in safety as long as the inconvenience that had befallen the Emperour was as yet hidden. The first report of his death came to the Germans who were of his Guard, being a Company chosen out of that Nation named the Celtique Band, for the preservation of the Emperours person. These men are very prone unto wrath, and amongst all other Barbarians, it is a rare thing in them to examine the causes of their execution: otherwise they are men strong in body, and who in the Wars always give the first onset, yeelding great advantage to those on whose side they fight. They having notice of Caius murther, were vehemently aggrieved thereat, for that it is their manner to censure all things not according to right, but as they were answerable to their own profits: Caius in especial was dearly beloved by them, in that he had obtained their favour by bestowing much money upon them. Their Captain was one called Sabinus, who was not advanced to that estate, either for his virtue or for the Nobility of his Ancestors (for he was but a Fencer) but for his mighty strength and huge body. They therefore ran about with their naked swords searching for Cæsars murtherers from house to house; and meeting with Asprenas at first, whose Gown (as we have said) was bebloodied with the blood of the slaughtered sacrifice, which was a presage that boaded him but little good fortune, they hewed him in pieces. The second was Norbanus (who for his Nobility and Ancestors might derive his Titles from the noblest Citizens, amongst whom were divers Generals of Armies) who seeing they made no reckoning of his Dignity, and being of himself endowed with great force and strength, he took a sword from one of them which first assailed him; with whom he grapled, and made them know that he intended they should buy his blood very dearly; and indeed so had he done, but that being invironed by divers, who assailed him at once, he was beaten down, and slaughtered with many deadly wounds. The third was Anteius, one of the number of the Senators, who with some others met not with these men by chance, as the two other had done; but to shew the hatred that he bare unto Caius, and the pleasure that he took to see him lie dead, was come out of his house, being egged on with envy to feed his eyes with that spectacle. For Caius had banished Anteius Father, whose name likewise was Anteius, and not content therewith, he had sent his Souldiers to kill him. He therefore with great pleasure beheld the slaughtered carcass of this Tyrant; but hearing the uproar that was raised in every part of the house, he thought good to hide himself: yet might he not avoid the narrow search of the Germans, who were so displeased, that they slew all those whom they met with, whether they were guilty or guiltless of the fact: Thus were these three made away.

What sort of people they were that lamented Caius death.

But after the rumour of Caius death was heard in the Theater, every one was amazed, and could scarcely believe it. For although divers of them were very glad that he was taken out of the world, perswading themselves that it would highly profit them; yet did their fear hinder their belief. On the other side, there were some, who desiring not that any such mishap should befal Cæsar, and conceiving in their thoughts, that it was impossible to be done, for that there was no man so hardy, as to enterprize the same; they supposed the report to be utterly untrue. Of this mind were certain women and children, slaves and souldiers. These by reason they received wages at his hand, tyrannized with him, being his ministers in all those outrages that he offered to many good Citizens, in partaking the booty, and other advantages that Caius drew unto him. As for the Women and Children, they were of that opinion, by reason that such kind of people take delight in Plays, Jests, Donations of flesh, and other such Pastimes, which Caius in word pretended to do to gratifie the common people, but in effect it was to have means to satisfie his rage and cruelty. He was also gracious among the servants and slaves, for that by him they had the liberty to accuse and contemn their Masters, and were therein countenanced by Caius. For when they falsely accused their Masters, they were easily believed; and when they discovered their Masters treasures, in recompence of their discovery they were not onely made free by him, but also sent home with rich and ample rewards. For the reward that was assigned them, was the eight part of those goods that were confiscated. As for certain of the Nobility, although the matter seemed true to some of them, for that before time they were privy to that which the rest intended, and notwithstanding they desired that the enterprize should be effected;

A yet kept they all things close, and gave no sight of joy, nor made any shew that they heard that which was reported. For some of them feared lest if they should be frustrated of their hope, they should bring themselves in danger of punishment, for that they had discovered their intent sooner than they should have done. They likewise who knew the enterprize and were Confederates with the Actors; yet did they more closely conceal it the one from the other; fearing lest if they should discover the matter to any one of those, who drew any commodity from Caius tyranny, they might bewray them: whereby if Caius should be yet alive, they might incur the danger of punishment. For the voice was, that he had been wounded in certain places; yet that he was not slain; but as yet alive, and among his Physicians hands, who dressed his wounds. No man therefore durst liberally discover the secrets B of his heart to his neighbour: for they that spred those reports, were either friends (and for that cause were suspected as favourers of his tyranny) or enemies, and by that means in that they were but sinisterly affected towards Caius, there was no certainty to be gathered of that which they said. There arose also another report, which abashed and beat down the hearts and hopes of the Nobility, namely that Caius setting light by the danger wherein he was, and as little also by the wounds he had received, was come into the Market-place all bloody as he was, and after that manner declaimed before the people. See here how they that spred these rumors, preferred their conjectures, which were void of all reason; which distracted those uncertainly that heard the same, according as they were affectioned. This notwithstanding, no man removed from his place, for fear lest they should be suddenly accused, C knowing well that they should be censured, not according to their thoughts and affections, but according to the disposition of their Judges and Accusers.

The grief of the mind, 40 yeers after Christs Nativity, 43.

Divers rumors of Cæsars death.

But after that the Troop of Germans had invironed the Theater with their naked swords, all the assistance expected nothing but death; and as soon as any man entred, they were seized with such an amazement, as if they had already felt the strokes; so that they knew not what to do, having no heart to depart from thence: and otherwise perswading themselves, that if they stayed there any longer, it would breed them further danger. Finally, when the Souldiers were entred into the Theater by force, all the whole Assembly cried out, and besought them, protesting that whatsoever was done, it was besides their knowledg, whether it were either attempted by Conspiracy, or any other means. They therefore most humbly D intreated them, that they would spare them, and not inflict the penalty of the guilty on those that were innocent: for their own parts, they besought them to search out those who had committed the act, if any such thing were committed. And thus spake they with tears, beating their breasts, and calling the gods to witness, allead ging all that which the present danger suggested them with, and as much as such as pleaded for their lives could proffer. By these perswasions of theirs the Souldiers fury was abated; so that they began to repent themselves of that which they had executed in the Theater: for this also was a cruelty, as they themselves (notwithstanding their barbarous incivility) supposed it to be, which was, that the heads of Asprenas and other that were slain, were carried and set upon an Altar. Whereat all the Assistants were most grievously discontented, remembring themselves of the dignity E of the men, and having compassion of that which had befallen them, considering also that they themselves were not far off from dangers, being uncertain whether they should save themselves: whereby it came to pass, that some of those, who had for good cause hated Caius, durst not freely rejoyce at his death, because they were upon the point to lose their own lives, having as yet no appearance of any safety.

The German Souldiers resort to the Theater.

At length Auruntius, a man who was gracious among the people, and was one of the common Criers, who had a strong voice, and by crying such goods as were to be sold, had gathered so great substance, as that he was accounted one of the richest men in Rome, and in great estimation amongst all men in that behalf, entred the Theater in a mourning Habit, and after a lamentable manner: and although he inwardly hated Caius, yet for the fear he conceiF ved lest he should lose his goods, and in consideration of the present danger, he dissembled his joy, wearing all those Garments of mourning, and using no less lamentation, than if he had bemoaned the death of his dearest friend. After this manner came he into the Theater, publishing Caius death, to the intent that the people might not be ignorant of that which had hapned: After this, he began to repress the rage of the Germans, and commanded their Captains and Tribunes to put up their swords, certifying them of the Emperours death, which act of his did manifestly save the lives of all those who were assembled in the Theater; and all them likewise whom they could have met with. For if they had had but the least surmise, that Caius had as yet been alive, there was not any sort of cruelty which they had not committed. For they bare him so great love and affection, that to warrantize him from that miſ-hap, they would have redeemed him with the loſs of their own lives. But as ſoon as they underſtood he was dead, they repreſſed their furious rage, which egged them forward to revenge: knowing that it availed them nothing to diſcover their affections towards him, in that he could yeeld them no requital. Beſides, the fear they had leſt that in purſuit of their tyrannous murthers, the Senate ſhould be incenſed againſt them, if ſo be the Government of the eſtate ſhould be returned into their hands, made them contain themſelves. Thus was the fury of theſe Germans appeaſed for the death of Caius.

Chæreas, Minucianus, and Clement conſult about Cæſars death.

Mean-while Chæreas (who feared very much leſt Minucianus ſhould fall into the Germans hands, and in their fury be ſlaughtered by them) ſought for him among the Souldiers, enquiring of every one whether they knew if he were ſlain or no. Whereupon Minucianus & Clement were brought unto him, who in his preſence commended Chæreas exploit, and gave him thanks in the name of the whole Senate, who witneſſed that it was to the general benefit and good of the Common-weal, and that the greateſt perſons were beholding to him, for that he had neither wanted good advice in his deliberation, nor courage to execute his reſolution; alleadging that the nature of tyranny was ſuch, that being puffed up with a ſhort pleaſure of unjuſt and intollerable rule, it finally (as being hated by all good men) determined and ended in miſery, as manifeſtly appeared in that which had befallen Caius; who before any thing was either deviſed, practiſed or executed againſt him, was already hateful to all men, and had in ſuch ſort violated all Laws; that his greateſt friends were reſolved to take Arms againſt him, who in appearance had deprived him of life, when both in truth and in effect it was he himſelf, who was the Author of his one ruine.

Artian a certain Phyſician diſmiſſeth ſome.

Hereupon all they aroſe who were in the Theater, and raiſed great noiſe and trouble in ſeeking to ſave themſelves. The occaſion was, that a certain Phyſician called Artion, being called out to go and dreſs certain men that were wounded, making a ſhew as if went to go and prepare ſuch things, as were neceſſary for thoſe that were wounded, made thoſe iſſue out with him who ſate neareſt unto him: but the truth was, that he did it to the end to draw them out of the preſent danger. Mean-while the Senate aſſembled themſelves in the Palace, and the people flocked together to make enquiry after thoſe, who had murthered Caius: the people with an intire and ſimple intent, the Senate onely to uſe ſome formal proceeding. For Valerius Aſiaticus, who had otherwhiles been Conſul, came forth among the people, who were in an uproar; and ſuppoſing it a ſtrange matter that no man knew who had ſlain the Emperour, whileſt every one enquired who it was that had done the deed: O ſaid he, would it had been I that had done it. But the Conſuls publiſhed an Edict, containing the accuſations that were preſented againſt Caius, commanding the people and Souldiers, who were as yet in the Theater, to retire themſelves to their lodgings. And the people were put in great hope, that they ſhould be eaſed of thoſe taxations, wherewith before time they had been burthened: and the men of War were promiſed Honours and Dignities, if they would contain themſelves in their accuſtomed order, and ſtir up no further trouble. For it was to be feared, leſt if they had been further fleſhed in ſlaughters, the City ſhould have fallen into ſome great danger through rapines and ſpoils both of houſes and Temples. But by this time all the whole order of the Senate were aſſembled, eſpecially thoſe who were Confederates in Caius murther; who ſeemed to gather courage, and to ſpeak boldly, as if the Government of the eſtate had been fallen into their hands.

The Senate and people enquire after thoſe that ſlew Caius.

CHAP. II.

Claudius took upon him the Government of the Empire.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 2.

WHileſt the eſtate of the Empire was thus diſtracted, Claudius was ſuddenly fetcht out of his houſe: for the Souldiers aſſembling themſelves together, and conferring among themſelves what was requiſite to be done, perceived that it was impoſſible, that ſo many and ſo weighty affairs of the Common-weal ſhould be well diſpoſed by a Popular Government; and that this change alſo would yeeld them little profit, if ſome of thoſe who were in Authority ſhould happen to obtain the Sovereign Government. Furthermore, that it would be every way prejudicial unto them, if they had not a part of the Governance, and a hand in the adminiſtration of the Common-weal. Whileſt therefore the Sovereign Authority remained as yet undiſpoſed, they thought meet to elect Claudius, who was Caius Unkle for their Emperor; who was a man of that reputation, that none of thoſe, who had been aſſembled in the Senate, was more capable than he was, both in regard of the virtue of his Anceſtors, as alſo in reſpect of the doctrine wherewith he was endowed dowed. Who likewiſe being by them exalted to the Dignity of the Empire, would honour them, and with all anſwerable bounty acknowledg their good deſerts. This concluſion of theirs was both admitted, and preſently executed: ſo that Claud us was received and elected Emperour by the Men of war. But Cnatus Sentius Saturninus having intelligence that Claudius was in this ſort elected (who in appearance ſeemed virtuouſly to contradict, but in effect deſired nothing more) preſented himſelf before the Senate: and being neither amated nor amazed in any ſort, he freely ſpake his mind; and as it became his Birth and Nobility, he ſpake unto the Aſſembly after the manner that enſueth:

Cnaius Sentius Saturninus declameth in the Senate.

"You Lords of Rome, although it be an incredible matter, that the Liberty which hath ſo "long time been unexpected, ſhould return and viſit us; yet ſo it is, that we ſee the excellency "thereof; although it be uncertain how long time the gods will beſtow it on us: which is ſuch "that it may rejoyce us for the preſent; what iſſue ſoever it may have hereafter. For to them "that know what virtue is, it is no ſmall felicity to live one hour in freedom of mind, and "in a free Countrey governed by ſuch Laws, which in times paſt have made our Common-"weal to flouriſh. For mine own part, I cannot remember our antient Liberty, for that I was "born after the ſubverſion thereof: But I infinitely deſire to have the happy fruition of that "which we enjoy at this preſent. And I think them alſo very happy, who are born & brought "up in virtuous ſtudies. I likewiſe ſuppoſe that a ſecond honour next to the Immortal Gods "is to be aſcribed to them, by whoſe virtue at laſt, though very late even in this our age, we "have obtained the felicity to enjoy the ſame, which happineſs would God with our inhe-"ritances we might bequeath to our Poſterity. For in regard of our ſelves, this day ſufficeth us "both, as well all thoſe that are young, as they alſo who are old. For the aged ſhall forſake "this life with more pleaſure, in that they have had the knowledg of that bleſſing, which is "annexed to their Liberty: and the younger ſhall be furniſhed with a royal example in admi-"ring and knowing their virtues, by whom we enjoy this benefit of freedom. For in regard "of the preſent time, there is not any thing that we ought more earneſtly to effect, than to "live virtuouſly. For only uirtue is the thing that confirmeth men in their Liberty. I cannot "ſpeak of the time paſt, but only by hear-ſay: but for that I have ſeen with mine eys, and "perceived by my obſervation, I know how great miſchiefs tyrannies do ordinarily breed "in a Politike eſtate: for they utterly extinguiſh all virtue, and deprive freemen of all that "perfect magnanimity that may be in them, and teach both to flatter and to fear, for that "the Common-weal is abandoned not to the wiſdom of the Laws, but ro the fury of intem-"perate Governours. For ſince Julius Cæſar bent his thoughts to overthrow the Popular "Government in Rome, and violated that happy courſe of Law, whereby our State was po-"licied, the Common-weal hath been overthrown. For in ſubjecting the Law to his good li-"king, and himſelf to his particular deſires, there is not any kind of miſery and miſchief "that hath not overthrown our City; ſo that his Succeſſours have imployed themſelves to "the uttermoſt, and with a certain emulation, to aboliſh the Laws of our Countrey, ſtriving "which of them might deſpoil our Commons-weal of her Nobleſt Citizens: for that they "have made their account, that their ſecurity conſiſted in communicating their ſecrets with "ſuch as were baſe and abject; abaſing not only the haughty courages of thoſe men, who "were famous for their Nobility and virtue, but alſo by ſlaughtering a great number of them "by all ſorts of puniſhments: and whileſt each of them laboured to be abſolute in their com-"mand, they enforced themſelves to oppreſs the Common-wealth.

Liberty purchaſeth by virtue.

Tyrannies breed many miſchiefs in Common-weals.

Julius Cæſar.

"But amongſt all the reſt, Caius, who this day hath loſt the benefit of life, hath wrought grea-"ter miſchiefs himſelf alone, than any other, by enforcing his brutiſh and beaſtly wrath, not "only againſt the common Citizens, but alſo againſt his own Parents and Friends; demean-"ing himſelf alike towards all men, and manifeſting his unjuſtice in that he purſued them "with moſt injury, who were moſt innocent: and by this means grew hateful not only to "men, but alſo to the immortal gods. For it is not enough for Tyrans to ſatisfie their con-"cupiſcence, to uſe all ſorts of outrages, to raviſh both mens wealth and their wives; but alſo "their gain and glory is, when they may utterly ruinate both their fortunes & families, who "are their enemies. For all Liberty is oppoſed againſt Tyranny, and it is impoſſible (notwith-"ſtanding all the miſeries that it may be imagined or offered) that Freemen ſhould accord "with Tyrans, how little time ſoever it be that they have exerciſed their tyranny. They alſo "know to well with how how many miſchiefs they have intangled their ſubjects (although "they have not the ſpirits to revenge themſelves of thoſe wrongs that are done unro them) "& being well aſſured into what incumbrances they have drawn them, perſwade themſelvs, "that they have but one only means left them to warrantize themſelves from ſuſpitions; and "to procure their own ſecurity, which is, to put them to death, if they may poſſibly do it.

"Sith therefore at this present you are delivered from so many mischiefs, and are no more "subject, except to one another (which is a pledg of concord for the present, and of securi"ty in time to come, and glory unto him that hath redressed the estate) you shall deal very "well & wisely in my opinion, to provide for the Common-weal, foreseeing very diligently "all that which concerneth the good and profit thereof. It is free for any man to speak his "opinion of that which displeaseth him, for that there is no Superiour to countermand their "sayings, or that is exempt from reproof, if he offend against the Common-weal, or that "may threaten with the Authority of an Emperour for that shall be said. For what else in "these later times hath increased and furthered our overtopping tyranny, than their sloth"ful fear, who durst in no sort oppose themselves against his lust? For being intangled by a "certain kind of pleasure of a quiet life, and accustomed to live after the manner of slaves, "and being afraid also to die virtuously, and desirous to live with shame, we are fallen in-
"to these scarce sufferable calamities, and into such mischiefs as have concerned us to near"ly. First of all therefore, you ought to honour those, who have slain the Tyran, by digni-
"fying them with as great honours as may be imagined, and especially Chæreas. For he on"ly hath been the man, who by the power of the gods, and through his great wisdom and "valour, have given you your Liberty. Neither ought you to forget him, but to heap Ho"nours on his head; yea, especial favours, as to the man who first of all consulted, and first of "all hazarded himself against a Tyran for your Liberty. It is an honest, and well-beseeming "action in men of free hearts, to restore and repay condign kindness for the benefits that "they have received: such is this man in your behalf, not like to Brutus and Cassius, who "murthered Cæsar; for they were the originals of seditions and Civil wars in this City: and
"this man by the death of a Tyran, hath not only at once delivered you of him, but also
"hath cut off those mischiefs that arose by him.

An exhortation to maintain Liberty.

Chæreas to be honoured for his noble attempt.

Thus spake Sentius, and his advice was entertained with great applause, not only by the Senators, but the Knights also that were there present. Whereopon a certain Senator called Trebellius Maximus arose, and stepping to him, pulled off the Ring which Sentius had on his finger, wherein was inchased a stone with Caius picture in it, which Sentius had forgot to pull off: so intent was he about that which he both said and did: and by this means the ingraved Image was broken, Now for that it was late, Chæreas demanded the Watch-word at the Consuls hands, who gave him the word, Liberty. Thus all of them were astonished at this change, and could scarcely believe that which happened. For since that time that the Popular Government had been abolished, the Consuls had never given the Watch-word until that present time. For before the City was oppressed by tyranny, the Consuls commanded the Men of war. After that Chæreas had received the Word, he gave it to his Souldiers, who subscribed to the Senates Authority: of these there were about four Companies, which preferred the lawful Government before a Tyranny, who also retired themselves to their Chieftains. As for their parts, the people returned to their several houses, full of joy, hope, and courage, for that they had regained the Government of the state, which belonged unto them, and not to any particular Governour. In a word, Chæreas was their only hope: He foreseeing that there would some mischief follow, if Caius Wife and Daughter should remain alive; and that if all his friends and family should not be utterly extinguished, all those who should be spared, would serve to no other end, but to the ruine of the Commonweal and the Laws: and on the other side, desiring to see a final end of that which he had begun, and to satisfie that hatred he had conceived against Caius, he sent Julius Lupus one of the Captains of the Guard, to kill both his Wife and Daughter, which he did. And the cause why he gave this charge chiefly to Lupus, was, for that Lupus was Clements Kinsman, who was a Confederate in the execution of Caius; to the end, that partaking after this manner the death of the Tyran, he might be known to have dealt as forwardly for the Common-weal, as if from the beginning he had been a Counseller and agent in the Conspiracy. Notwithstanding there were some of his Companions of that opinion, that it should be but a cruelty to deal with a woman in that sort, for that Caius had offended through the corruption of his own nature, and not by the counsel of his wife; and that all those evils which he committed in the Commonweal, by desolating the flower thereof, was his own offence, not hers.

Chæreas requireth a Watch-word at the Consuls hands.

Chæreas sendeth Julius Lupus to kill Caius Wife and Daughter.

There were others that accused her to be the cause of all that which Caius had committed, alleadging that she had given him an amorous drink, by which he was tied and entangled in such sort unto her, and so led and transported by her love, that she governed all that which concerned the estate of Rome, and the world subject to Rome; but her Defenders prevailed nothing. For finally it was resolved she should lose her life.

To finish this Tragedy Lupus was dispatcht, who lost no time in the accomplishment of their

A their intent who had ſent him, for fear he had to be blamed, and accounted but coldly affectionate towards the good of the Common-weal. As ſoon as therefore he came into the palace, he found Cæſonia, Caius Widow, lying faſt by the body of her ſlaughtered Husband, deſtitute of all that which the Law gratifieth thoſe that are dead with, altogether bloody and greatly afflicted, having her daughter faſt couched by her: being in this eſtate, ſhe was heard to utter no other words, but that ſhe blamed Caius, for that he had not given credit to that counſel which ſhe had given him ſo often: which words of hers, were by certain of them interpreted two ways. For ſome of them thought that ſhe meant, that ſhe had counſelled her Husband to give over his cruelty, and murthers which he exerciſed againſt his Citizens: and that in his Government he ſhould uſe a tempered meaſure with virtue, for fear leſt his B Subjects miſliking of his manners, ſhould ſeek his deſtruction. Others took it, as if ſhe had encouraged Caius to ſet upon the Conſpirators, and kill them without any delay; yea, before they had committed any offence, and by that means provide for his ſecurity. They therefore ſaid, that Cæſonia blamed Caius for that he had behaved himſelf too careleſly, in that wherein ſhe had counſelled him. Such were the words Cæſonia ſpake, and ſuch was the expoſition, as divers men interpreted the ſame.

The year of the world, 4005. after Chriſts Nativity, 41.

Cæſonia accuſeth Caius, for that he would not give credit to her counſels.

She ſeeing Lupus coming, ſhewed him Caius body, and beſought him with tears and complaints to come no nearer. But perceiving that he continued in his reſolution, and made no account of her words, but did that for which he came, after that ſhe knew the cauſe of his arrival, ſhe offered her naked throat unto him with a great courage, uſing ſuch ſupplica- C tions as they ordinarily do who deſpair of their lives. For ſhe willed him to defer no longer to finiſh that tragedy which his Companions had begun, and died in this ſort couragiouſly by the hand of Lupus: and after her was her daughter ſlain, which was very young. This did Lupus certifie Chæreas of with all expedition. This was Caius end, after he had lived four years wanting four moneths. Before ſuch time as he obtained the Empire, he was an intemperate and wicked man, and addicted to his pleaſure, a favourer of tale-bearers, exceeding fearful, and for that cauſe, when he got the upper hand of any man, he was ready to kill him. He eſteemed this the onely freit of his power, when he abuſed the ſame againſt innocents; and gathered or heaped up great ſpoils and booties by wicked and unjuſt murthers, rapines, and oppreſſions; lifting himſelf above all humane Authority, and affecting to be eſteemed D as a God, ſuffering himſelf to be tranſported by the peoples praiſes. Furthermore, all that which the Law condemned and puniſhed, as a thing moſt deteſtable, that made he uſe of to puniſh virtue with. He never remembring any friendſhip that had been done him, how great ſoever it either was, or had been, at ſuch time as he was in his choler, and was apt to inflict puniſhments in his rage on juſt and upright men. All that which was anſwerable to virtue was odious in his eys. In all things that him liſted he had ſo violent appetitites, that it was impoſſible to contradict him; ſo that he was not aſhamed to uſe the unlawful company of his own Siſter: whereby it came to paſs, that the Citizens of Rome began to hate him extremely, for that the like matter had not been ſeen nor heard of: of a long time men could not believe the ſame, yet notwithſtanding they ſufficiently expreſſed the hatred they bare E againſt the fact he had committed. It cannot be ſaid of him, that he builded any work beſeeming his royal magnificence worthy the mentioning, or profitable either to the preſent or future world, except ſome Ports that he made near to Rhegium and Sicilia, for harbour of ſuch ſhips as came and went into Egypt for corn, which doubtleſs is a goodly and mighty work, and very profitable for ſuch as travel by Sea. True it is, that it was not brought to perfection, but only half finiſhed, becauſe the Workmen travelled leiſurely. But the chief cauſe thereof was, that he ſpent his ſtudy in unprofitable matters, and loved rather to conſume his ſubſtance to feed his own private luſts wherein he took great delight, than to erect and build any goodly or famous work, which might have redounded to the profit of the Common-weal. Otherwiſe, he was a man well-ſpoken, and very expert in the Greek and F vulgar Roman tongues, apprehending preſently that which others ſaid: and although they had ſpent long time in diſcovering their minds, yet anſwered he them upon the inſtant; and in affairs of conſequence he had ſuch a moving perſwaſion and power, as no man could exceed him, both in regard of his quick ſpirit and eaſie apprehenſion, as of the exerciſe and pain he had taken. For being Tiberius Brothers ſon, whoſe Succeſſour he alſo was, he was enforced to be ſtudious, ſeeing that Tiberius, who was of the ſame years, was in like manner excellently learned. Caius therefore enforced himſelf to imitate the Emperour Tiberius, whoſe near kinſman he was, and ſurpaſſed all thoſe that were in Rome at that time; yet notwithſtanding all theſe great advantages, which his good inſtruction had bred in him, could not hinder the misfortune that befel him, by the abuſe of his Authority. So rare a thing it is to see them, who have liberty to do what they list without punishment, to govern themselves with modesty. In the beginning he took delight in the friendship of very honest men, to get credit and reputation, thinking to outstrip the most excellent: but after he was given over to licentiousness, the affection that he bare them was changed; and instead thereof, he grew in hatred of them from day to day: whereby they were inforced to conspire against him, and seek his ruine.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 3.

Now, as I have heretofore declared, Claudius understanding of that which had befallen Caius his Nephew, and seeing all his house wholly troubled for this occasion; was in such distress, that he knew not what to do to save himself; but went and hid himself in a certain corner, where he was surprized, having no other cause to apprehend his danger, except his Nobility. For during the time that he lived a private man, he behaved himself modestly, kindly, and favorably unto all men, being wel seen in the Sciences, and principally in the Greek tongue, shunning as much as in him lay, all tumult and train that might breed trouble. When as therefore the people at that time were wholly amazed at the trouble, and the Palace was replenished with souldier-like fury and fear, and nothing reigned more in general than confusion and disorder; the Souldiers of the Guard, who were the most experienced and hardy amongst the men of War, consulted amongst themselves what course they were to take. Neither were they much discontented with Caius death, in that they supposed that upon just occasion, he was put to death; for which cause they rather bethought themselves on that which concerned their estates, and how they might assure themselves in those dangers, seeing the Germans were wholly bent against those, who had slaughtered Caius; rather incited thereunto of their own cruel natures, than of any good affection they had towards the welfare of the Common-weal. All which things troubled Claudius, and put him in fear of his life, the rather for that he saw Asprenas head and the rest of the Nobility that were massacred, carried about to be seen: for this cause he kept himself in a certain place, which was only accessible by certain steps or stairs, and hid himself therein, because it was obscure. In that place one of the Souldiers of the Palace called Gratus, being unable to discern who he was, in regard of the obscurity of the place, and supposing him to be some one that desired to be concealed, he drew near unto him to the intent he might the better know him: and when as Claudius besought him, that he would depart and leave him, he passed the more onwards, and laying hold of him and drawing him into the light, knew him; crying out to those that followed him: This is Germanicus, let us take hold of him, and create him Emperor. Claudius perceiving that he was ready to be attached, and fearing lest they should put him to death in the like manner as they had done Caius, besought them that they would pardon him, protesting unto them his innocency, and how he had in no sort been either accessary or agent in that which had been done. Whereupon Gratus beginning to smile, took him by the hand, saying, that he had no cause in that sort to suspect his life: For (said he) it behoveth thee to pull up thy spirits, and to bethink thee how to govern an Empire, of which the gods (who have the care of the whole world) have despoiled Caius, to reward thy virtue with. Arise therefore, and take possession of the Throne of thine Ancestors. This said, he lifted him on his shoulders, for that Claudius could not walk on foot, through the fear and joy that he had conceived of that which had been told him.

Upon these speeches divers of the Souldiers of the Guard assembled about Gratus and perceiving that it was Claudius, whom they supposed to be dragged to his death, they had compassion of him as on an innocent, for that they knew him to be a man of a milde nature, who all the time of his life intermedled with nothing, and who in like sort had been often in great danger during Caius life. There were others of them that said, that the judgment of this matter pertained to the Consuls: whereupon, although a great number of Souldiers flocked about him, and the simple people that were unarmed fled from them; yet could not Claudius go onward in his way; so weak and feeble felt he himself in his whole body. It fortuned likewise, that they who carried his litter, perceiving his flight, fled away for fear, and left him, so little hope had they that their Master should escape with his life, whom they saw to be thus drawn by their Souldiers. Now when Gratus and his Associates were arrived in the Court of the Palace, which (as it is reported) is the place which was first of all inhabited in Rome, they began to think upon that which was to be done: thither also there flocked a great number of other Souldiers unto them, who took pleasure to behold Claudius, enforcing themselves to place him in the Imperial Dignity, in regard of that good affection which they bare to Germanicus his Brother, whose memory was much honoured among all those, who had at any time conversed with him. Moreover, they ripped up how many avaritious acts the Senate had committed, and how great errors the chiefest Senators had defaulted in;

in, before the Publike Government was changed. Moreover, they considered upon the danger and difficulty of their actions then in hand; for that the Government being administred by one only man, would be dangerous for them, if he should obtain the same by any other means; whereas if Claudius should enjoy the same by their permission and good will, he would have them in remembrance who had favoured him, and would recompence them according to their merits. This was the effect of their discourse, which they held among themselves, or when they met with one another. Finally, all of them at length concluded upon this advice, and environed Claudius, and lifting him up upon their shoulders, they carried him into the Army, to the intent that no man might hinder them to finish that which they intended. There fell a debate also betwixt the Senators and Citizens: For, the Senate desirous to recover their former Dignity, and enforcing themselves to avoid the servitude that had befallen them by the outrage of Tyrants, intending the maintenance of their offered good fortune. Contrariwise, the people envied them that Dignity. And knowing that their Emperours should be as it were certain bridles, to restrain the avarice of the Senate, and the refuge of the people, they were very glad to see that Clandius was advanced; making their account that if he were created Emperour, they should avoid a Civil war, like unto that which happened in Pompeius time.

Claudius carried on mens shoulders into the Army

Difference betwixt the Citizens and Senators.

"The Senate knowing that Claudius was carried into the Army by the Souldiers, chose out "some of their order, and now sent them as Embassadours in their behalf, to signifie unto "him that he ought to use no violence in obtaining the Empire, but rather to remit the "charge of the Common-weal to the Senate. That he both was and should be one of the "Senators, and have the conduct of the Common-weal, and dispose it according to Law, "perswading him to call unto his remembrance those grievous mischiefs, which the former "Tyrants had wrought in the Common-weal, and what dangers he himself had also suffered "with them, during the reign of Caius their late Emperour. That it should ill become him, "who had detested the fury of others tyranny at such time as they used outrages, now wil-"lingly to be drawn to oppose himself against his Countrey. That if he would obey them, "and continue to express the virtue and constancie of his life, which in times past he led "with commendation, he should obtain those Honors which free Citizens could afford him, "and in suffering himself to be governed by Laws, to the end he might have part in the com-"mandment, and to be commanded in his turn, he should obtain the praise of virtue. That if "he should not be disswaded by the slaughter of Caius, which was fresh in memory, for their "own parts they would hinder his proceedings as much as in them lay. They also alleadg-"ed, that they were furnished with men of War, and store of Armour, and a great number "of domestical servants, all which they would employ against him: But over and above these "things, they had far greater helps, namely their hope, and good fortune, and the gods, who "are wont to fight for those who maintain virtue and goodness. They solemnly protested "also for their own parts, that they were of that mind, that there was nothing more honest "and just, than to fight for their Liberty and Countrey. The Embassadours that brought this message, were Veranius and Broccus, who both of them were Tribunes of the people. They prostrating themselves on their knees before him, humbly besought him that he would draw the Common-weal into Civil war. And seeing that Claudius was inclosed with a great company of men of War, in respect of whom the Consuls were of no force, they besought him that it would please him to demand the Government at the Senates hands, and receive it from them if he were resolved to be Emperour; for that it would be an act more holy, and coupled with justice and good hap, if he should obtain the same with their good will, and not in despight of those, who would vouchsafe it him willingly.

The Senate perswade Claudius to resign the Dignity offered him.

CHAP. III.

The Sedition that arose betwixt the Senate and the People.

ALthough Claudius knew with what presumption the Senate had sent this Embassage, yet did he modestly entertain the same for the present. But supposing that it stood very little with his security to commit himself to their trust, and being encouraged by the exhortation of the Souldiers, who promised him their utmost endeavour, and by the incitation of King Agrippa, he determined in no sort to let the Sovereignty escape out of his hands, in that it was so willingly and freely bestowed on him when he thought least on it. After that Agrippa had performed all those duties unto Caius which were requisite for such an one as had been by him advanced to Honour, and having taken his body and laid it in a litter, he brought him out before the Souldiers of his Guard, and certified them them that Caius was yet alive, and for that he found himself sick of those wounds that he had received, he sent to seek for Physicians. But afterward, understanding that Claudius was taken by the men of War, he thrust so much, that he got himself passage unto him, whom he found altogether dismaid, and ready to surrender all things into the Senates hands, and incouraged him, and incited him to take upon him the Government of the Empire which the men of War had offered him. Which done, he departed, & was suddenly sent for by the Senate, whither he resorted altogether perfumed with odors, as if at that time he were returned from some Banquet, and had known nothing of that which had happened: He therefore asked the Senators what was become of Claudius, who certified him of the truth; and besides that required him to give them his opinion and counsel as touching the present Affairs: "His answer was, that he was ready to adventure his life in the behalf of the Senate; "Yet by the way he told them, that they ought to have an especial regard of the Common-"weal, rather than all the pleasure they could pretend; and that they who would be Lords "of an Empire, had need of Arms and men to maintain themselves, lest being weak and un-"furnished, they should be deceived in their expectations. The Senate replied, that they had "great store of furniture, and that they would contribute money; that they had good store of "men of War, to whom they would annex their slaves, and give them liberty. But Agrip-"pa replied, Would God, Grave Fathers, that you were able to perform the matters you in-"tend; yet will I not fear to discover that unto you, which concerneth you nearly. You "know well, that the Army which is with Claudius, consisteth of such men, who have been "long time trained up in feats of Arms; and that those that are to fight on your side, are but "men gathered together, and such as you couple them with, are the very scum of your "slaves, who are both intractable and untrained. We shall therefore enter fight against ex-"pert Souldiers, and commit our fortunes to such men as scarcely know how to draw their "swords: I rather think it meet that we send unto Claudius such men, as may perswade him "to give over the Empire. And to perform this Message, behold my self in a readiness to "be commanded by you.

Claudius confirmed in his resolutions by Agrippa.

Agrippa telleth the Senate his opinion.

To this effect spake Agrippa; and hereunto the Senators accorded, and sent him to Claudius, appointing him certain others to accompany him. As soon as he came to Claudius, he secretly discovered unto him in what perplexity the Senate was, and gave him instructions to answer and mean himself like an Emperour, and to shew his Dignity and Power. Whereupon Claudius gave the Embassadours this answer; "That he wondred not that the Senate "were so unwilling to be commanded by a Sovereign; in regard of that cruelty which the "fore-passed Emperours had used to their destruction. But for the present, they should taste "of his mercy, and feel his moderate rule; and they should live under the Government of "such an one, who although in name he had the Imperial Authority; yet that that in effect "he would govern all things by their disposition. For which cause he wished them in no sort "to distrust him, whom as they themselves could witness, they have seen and known to have "dealt virtuously and justly in many affairs, although the state of times had been far different. Those that were sent from the Senate hearing these words, returned back again. But Claudius instantly assembled his men of War, and exacted an Oath of fidelity from them, bestowing on every one of them who were of his Guard in way of largess, five thousand drachma's, amounting to some 25 pound a man, of our sterling money. He presented their Captains also with presents answerable to the Qualities, promising to perform no less bounty to all the rest of the men of War, in what place soever they were. Hereupon the Consuls assembled the Senate in the Temple of Jupiter the victorious, before day, and some of them hid themselves through the fear they had of that which should be spoken: othersome departed out of the City, and resorted to their Country-farms, foreseeing with themselves the issue of all these things: and perceiving that their hope of liberty was lost, they thought it far better for them to be exempt from danger, and to pass their life in repose, though it were with subjection, than to be altogether uncertain of their security and safety, by maintaining the Dignity of the Senators: yet about some hundred of them drew themselves together and no more. Now whilest they were consulting upon that which they were to do, they suddenly heard a shout of Souldiers that were assembled round about them, requiring the Senate to chuse them an Emperour, and not to suffer their State to be lost through a multitude of Governours: and to this effect spake they, lest the Government should be given to divers, and not to one. This course of theirs gave little content to the Senators, both in regard of the loss of that liberty which they expected, as through the good liking they had of Claudius; notwithstanding there were some that pretended some hope to be advanced, both in respect of the Nobility of their race, as in regard of their alliance that they had by marriage with the Cæsars. For, Marcus Municianus, a man of himself of noble descent, and and who had married Julia, Caius ſiſter, ſtood up to demand the Sovereign Government: but the Conſuls reſtrained him, alleadging excuſe upon excuſe. Another Minutiananus alſo one of Caius Tutors with drew Valerius Aſiaticus from thinking on thoſe things: and there had happened as great a ſlaughter as had ever been heard of, had any of theſe had the liberty to deſire the Empire, or oppoſe themſelves againſt Claudius. For amongſt others, the Fencers, who were of no ſmall number, they of the Watch, and the Saylers joyned themſelves together with the Men of war. They therefore that pretended to demand the Empire, gave over their ſuit, partly in the Cities behalf, partly for their own private ſecurity.

Some affect the Empire.

About the day-ſpring Chæreas and his Companions went forth to debate the matter with the Souldiers: but they ſeeing by the beckning with their hands they would draw them to ſilence, and were upon the inſtance to fall into diſcourſe, made a great noiſe to cut them off from proceeding any further, for that all of them were earneſtly affected to have an Emperour and Sovereign Lord, and required with all expedition that they might have one proclaimed and known. At that time the Senate was ſo diſtracted, both for the manner how they ſhould command, as for the means they ought to uſe to cauſe themſelves to be obeyed, conſidering the Souldiers ſet light by them; and thoſe that were confederates in the death of Caius, ſuffered not the Senate to obey the Souldiers. At length, Chæreas being unable to conceal his paſſion wherewith he was ſurprized, and hearing that they asked for a Monarch, promiſed that he would give them one, if they would bring him a token from Eutychus, who was the Wagoner to the green Band, whom Caius had loved extremely, in ſo much as he imployed his Souldiers in ſervile labours, as to build him ſtables for his Horſes, & reproached them with divers like matter, telling them that he would bring them Claudius head, ſhewing them that it was a matter ill beſeeming them, if after a mad man they ſhould commend the Empire to a fool. Yet none of theſe words could divert them from their purpoſe: but all of them drew their ſwords, and with diſplayed Enſigns, marched towards Claudius to unite themſelves with thoſe, who had already bound themſelves by an Oath to ſerve him faithfully. So that the Senate was abandoned, and deſtitute of all defence; ſo as there was no difference betwixt private men and Conſuls. All of them were aſtonithed and confuſed, not knowing what to do, becauſe they had thus provoked Claudius diſpleaſure againſt them. And now fell they to reviling one another, in teſtimony of the repentance they conceived for theſe their proceedings. Whereupon Sabinus one of thoſe who had murthered Caius, aroſe and proteſted, that he would ſooner cut his own throat, than conſent to the eſtabliſhment of Claudius, or behold with his eyes the miſery and thraldom of his Countrey: he likewiſe encouraged Chæreas, telling him that he deſerved very little by cutting off Caius, if he thought to live without the liberty of his Countrey. To which he anſwered, that he made no account of his life; yet that he intended to ſound Claudius mind, and with this reſolution they concluded. Mean while certain of the Senators ſought on every ſide to break thorow the midſt and thickeſt of the Souldiers, to go and do reverence and homage to Claudius: amongſt whom was Q. Pompeius one of the Conſuls, whom the men of War accuſed to be one of the principal Actors to incite the Senate to recover their liberty, and they drew their ſwords againſt him. And if Claudius had not reſtrained them, they had ſurely diſpatched him: but he made him ſit down by him, and by that means delivered him from the danger. The other Senators, who accompanied him, were not entertained thus honorably; but ſome of them were wounded, even then when they preſſed forth to ſalute Claudius. Apomas retired himſelf ſore wounded, and the reſt were in great danger to loſe their lives. But King Agrippa drawing neer unto Claudius, deſired him to uſe as much lenity as was poſſible in him towards the Senators, for that if any miſchief ſhould betide them, he ſhould have no other perſons to command. To the which counſel of his, Claudius gave place, and aſſembled the Senate in the Palace, cauſing himſelf to be carried thorow the City in the company of his Souldiers, who marched before him, doing much miſchief to the common people. But amongſt thoſe that ſlew Caius, Chæreas and Sabinus were come out into the ſtreets, notwithſtanding, they were forbidden by Pollio, whom not long before Claudius had made Captain of his Guard. And as ſoon as Claudius came into the Palace, whither he aſſembled his friends, he pronounced ſentence againſt Chæreas. For although his action was accounted both generous and noble; yet was he condemned for this, becauſe he was perfidious; whereupon he was adjudged to die, to give example to others, to the end that Princes and Emperours may hereafter live in ſafety. He was therefore led to his death with Lupus, and divers other Romans. It is ſaid of Chæreas, that he endured this accident with a great courage, which he expreſſed not only in that he changed not his countenance, but alſo by the reproaches which he gave Lupus who wept. For when Lupus was putting off his cloaths, and complained of the cold that he felt, he taunted him thus, alluding to his name which was Lupus; That never any cold did harm to a wolf. Furthermore, when he came to the place of execution, where a great number of people were gathered together to behold the ſpectacle, he asked the Souldier that was appointed to behead him, if he were a cunning headſman; and whether he had a new ſword, wiſhing him to uſe that wherewith he murthered Caius. His death was happy, for he received but one ſtroke; whereas Lupus was faint-hearted, and received divers, becauſe he ſtretched not out his neck freely. Some few days after, at ſuch time as the Romans ſolemnized their expiations, and that every one honoured the memory of his dear friend, they gave Chæreas a part of that honour, and caſt his portion into the fire, ſaying, That was to deface and purge their ingratitude, whereof they were guilty towards him. Thus ended Chæreas his life. But for Sabinus, although Claudius had not only abſolved him, but alſo ſuffered him to exerciſe his office, as before time he had done: yet thought he that he ſhould do amiſs and againſt juſtice, if he falſified his faith to his Aſſociates and Confederates; for which cauſe he ſhortned his own days, thruſting his ſword through his own body to the very hilts.

INcontinently after this, Claudius caſhierd all thoſe of the Souldiers whom he ſuſpected; and publiſhed an Edict, by which he confirmed the Kingdom to Agrippa, that Caius had given him, accompanying his bounty with many praiſes; annexing moroover unto his Government all that which Herod his Grandfather had poſſeſſed, to wit, Judæa, and Samaria, which in that they were as one lawful Inheritance, appertained unto him. He gave him alſo out of his own Dominions, Abela and all the Countrey about the mount Libanus, that in times paſt appertained to Lyſanias. And he cauſed the alliance that was paſt betwixt them twain, to be engraven and regiſtred in an open place of the City of Rome. He took from Antiochus the Kingdom that he had, and gave him in exchange a portion of Cilicia and Comagena. He ſet Alexander Lyſimachus Alebarcha at liberty, who had been his old friend and ſometimes Governour in Arabia, and other whiles his Mother Antonias ſteward, who had been committed priſoner through Caius diſpleaſure, and married Bernice, Agrippas Daughter, with his Son Marcus: which after the death of Marcus, who died before he was eſpouſed, was afterwards married with her Father Agrippa's allowance to Herod his brother, for whom Agrippa beg'd of Claudius the Kingdom of Chalcis. At that very time the Jews that were in the City of Alexandria, mutined againſt the Greeks. For after Caius death, the Nation of the Jews which had been oppreſſed during his reign, and injuriouſly dealt withal by the Alexandrines, recovered their former courage, and inſtantly fell to Arms. For which cauſe Claudius gave commiſſion to the Governour of Egypt, to pacifie and appeaſe that uproar. He ſent alſo his Letters Patents into Alexandria and Syria, at the requeſt of the two Kings Agrippa and Herod, to this effect:

Claudius Edict in favour of the Jews in Alexandria.

Tiberius Claudius Cæſar Auguſtus Germanicus, Father of the people, ſignifieth this that followeth: Underſtanding that the Jews Inhabitants in Alexandria, and for this cauſe called Alexandrines, have at all times enjoyed the the ſelf ſame Priviledges of the City, which the antient and firſt Alexandrines have had: Which favours they have obtained by the Largeſs of thoſe Princes that were our Predeceſſours, as it hath been plainly made known unto us, as well by Letters which have been written unto us, as by confirmed Decrees: And that ſince Alexandria hath been annexed to our Empire by Cæſar Auguſtus, their Priviledges have continued in force during the ſeveral Succeſſions of many of our Governours, which Rights of theirs have never been called in queſtion, no not in that time when Aquila was Governour in Alexandria: Since in like ſort Cæſar Auguſtus hath not letted them, but when the Chieftain of their Nation was dead, they might eſtabliſh other Subſtitutes and Governours in his place, willing that all of them ſhould yeeld him obedience in obſervation of their Laws and Cuſtoms, without conſtraint or impulſion to do any thing contrary to their Religion: yet notwithſtanding, the Alexandrines have mutined againſt the Jews, being in the City of Alexandria, in the time of the Emperour Caius, by reaſon of the folly and frenzy of Caius, who diſgraced and oppreſſed the Nation of the Jews, becauſe they would not violate their Religion, nor acknowledg the ſaid Caius for a god. Our will and pleaſure is, that no one of the Priviledges of the Nation of the Jews be aboliſhed by reaſon of Caius frenzy; but my mind is to maintain thoſe which heretofore hath been given them, to the end they may continue and live according to their antient Laws and Cuſtoms: Commanding you and every one of you very care- carefully to provide, that after the publication of this our Ordinance, they be in no sort troubled. This was the tenour of that Ordinance which was made in favour of the Jews in Alexandria.

But that which was generally made in favour of those, who were dispersed thorow the whole world, was to this effect: Tiberius Claudius Cæsar, Augustus Germanicus, High Priest, Father of the people, elected Consul the second time, signifieth that which ensueth. Our well-beloved friends, the Kings, Agrippa and Herod, have required us, that we will permit all those Jews that live under the Roman Empire, to use the same Laws and Priviledges which they have used heretofore, as we have granted to the Jews that dwell in Alexandria. Which suit of theirs we have willingly granted, not only in favour of those that require the same, but also for that I think them worthy such a grce: for whom I have been intreated, in regard of the fidelity and friendship they have always expressed towards the Romans. My pleasure therefore is, that no City, either Grecian or otherwise, shall deny any priviledg, from whence they shall be excluded, for that since the Emperour Augustus time they have never been exempted from them. It standeth with reason therefore, that henceforth the Jews, who live under our Empire, of what place soever they be, may observe their antient Customs without any contradiction: Giving them to understand, that hereafter they use our clemency so much the more moderately, without neglecting the Religion of other Nations, in retaining their own. And our will is, that this present Ordinance be published by the Magistrates of Cities, Colonies and Countries of Italy, and be sent unto Kings and forein Princes, by fit Embassadours, within thirty days at the least, to the end that they should be in such sort set up, that they may be seen and read by all those that pass by.

CHAP. V.

Agrippa's return into Judea.

BY these Edicts of Claudius Cæsar, which he sent both to Alexandria and other parts of the world, it plainly appeareth how well affected he was towards the Nation of the Jews. And presently after this, after he had dignified Agrippa with all kinds of Honour, he sent him back into his Kingdom to govern the same, commanding all his Presidents and Lieutenants in his Prouinces, thorow which he was to pass, to give him a friendly and honourable Convoy. But he having wisely and happily dispatched his affairs, returned in all haste. Assoon as he came to Jerusalem, he offered his sacrifices of thanksgiving which he had vowed, without omitting any thing that was commanded by the Law. He caused also divers Nazarites to be pould, and offered in gift that chain of gold that Caius had given him: which was of the same weight the iron chain was of, wherewith his Royal hands were manacled, in memory of the adversity he had past, and the testimony of the exchange thereof into better fortune: commanding that it should be hanged up in the Temple, and over the Chamber of the Treasury, to testifie unto those that should behold the same, that the highest Estates are subject to alterations, and that God can raise men again from obscurity to happy fortune. For this chain that hanged in the Temple, being consecrated to God, manifestly expressed unto all men, that King Agrippa was upon a very small occasion despoiled of his former Dignity, and made prisoner - and then a little while after that, he being delivered from his Bonds, was raised and exalted to a famous Kingdom; to signifie thereby, that humane affairs are of that nature, that that which is the greatest may be easily overthrown, and that which is declining, may recover again his antient honour and Dignity. When as therefore Agrippa had duely and devoutly acknowledged God's mercies, he deposed the High Priest Theophilus the Son of Ananus; and bestowed that Honour on Simon sirnamed Cantbara, the Son of Boethus. This Simon had two Brothers, and Boethus was their father, whose Daughter had been married to King Herod, as heretofore it hath been spoken. Simon held the Priest-hood with his Brethren and his father, in such sort, as befor-time the three Sons of Simon High-Priest, Son of Onias had done, during the Empire of the Macedonians, as we have declared in our former Books. After the King had given order for the Priest-hood, he thought good to recompence the good affection that they of Jerusalem had born unto him: for which cause he acquitted them of those Tributes that every family paid, knowing well that it became him to shew kindness unto them, who had been faithful and well-affected towards him. He created Silas, who had been his Companion in many dangers, General of all his Army. Not long after, certain young men that were Dorites, under the colour of constancie in case of Religion, who also had dayly expressed in their actions and unbridled rashness, brought the Image of Cæsar into the Temple of the Jews, and erected it in that place; which insolence of theirs highly offended Agrippa, who construed it as an Act that tended to the abolition of the Religion of their Countrey: for which cause, with all expedition he repaired to Petronius, who was Governour of Syria, and complained against those Dorites, who was no less displeased with the action, than he himself. For he supposed that such breach of Religion was the means to further impiety, and for that cause he wrote to those which had attempted this innovation, somewhat sharply, to this effect following.

Alias cap. 5. P. Petronius writeth to the Dorites to send them to him who have broken Cæsars Edict.

PUblius Petronius, Lieutenant to Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, to the Magistrates of the Countrey of Doria health: whereas Cæsar hath published an Edict by which he permitteth the Jews to live according to their Laws and Customes, some one amongst you have been so presumptuous to contradict the same in effect (although in words you protest that you obey him) and do all that which you can, to hinder the Jews from enjoying their Synagogue, inso much as in the same you have planted Cæsars Image, not only thereby opposing your selves against the Jews, but also against the Emperour himself, whose Image might have been better placed in his own Temple, than in a forein Temple: and you have placed it in their Synagogue, whereas by right every one ought to be master of his place, according to Cæsars judgment: For it should be very ridiculous in me to alledge mine own judgment after that of Cæsars, who hath granted the Jews the liberty to live according to their own Laws and Customs, and hath commanded that they should converse in equal freedom among the Greeks. For these causes I command you, that they who have been so bold as to contemn Augustus Decree (against whom their own Magistrates have been displeased, excusing themselves that this accident happened not by their motion, but by the fury of the common people) he brought before me by the Captain Proculus Vitellius, to yeild a reason of that which they have done; exhorting the Magistrates, that if they will not be accounted parties in this contempt, they labour to discover those that are guilty unto Proculus, and give order that no Sedition or violence be offered thereupon. Which notwithstanding it seemeth that they effect, although we and the most honoured King Agrippa, whom I take for my good and special friend, labour nothing more, than that the Nation of the Jews should not assemble and take Arms under colour of their defence. And to the end, that whatsoever Augustus hath ordained as touching this matter, may be the better known unto all men, I have annexed his Edict which he published in Alexandria: and although they are sufficiently known unto all men, yet hath the most honoured King Agrippa read them unto me, at such time as I sate in my tribunal seat; concluding according to right, that the Jews ought not to be excluded nor hindered from enjoying those benefits, which are granted unto them by Cæsar: I therefore charge all men, that henceforward that they take heed lest they seek any occasion of mutiny or sedition, and that every one live according to his Religion. See here how Petronius proceeded in this matter, both to amend that which was past, as also to prevent that which was to come, that none should be so bold to attempt the like. After this, Agrippa took the Priesthood from Simon Cantharæ, and gave it again to Jonathan the Son of Anani, whom he esteemed to be more worthy than the other. But Jonathan declared that he was not desirous of this Dignity, for in effect he refused it, saying, O King, I most willingly acknowledg the honour which it pleaseth you to bestow upon me, and know well that it is a Dignity which of your own freewil you bestow upon me; notwithstanding that, God judgeth me unworthy. It sufficeth me that I have once been invested with the sacred Habit: for at that time I wore it with more holiness, than I can now receive it at this present; yet notwithstanding if it please you to know one that is more worthy of this honour than my self, I will inform you of one. My Liege, I have a Brother, who towards God and you is pure and innocent, whom I dare commend unto you for a most fit man for that Dignity. The King took great pleasure in these his words, and leaving Jonathan, he bestowed the Priesthood on Matthias his Brother, according as Jonathan advised him: and not long after this, Marsus succeeded in Petronius room, and took upon him the Government of Syria.

Agrippas acts until the time of his death.

The year of the world, 4099. after Christs Nativity, 46.

Silas was made General over the Kings Army : and for that he had always been faithful unto him, and had never forsaken him in any danger that was offered, without partaking the utmost extremity, but had always adventured on the greatest perils in respect of his intire and constant resolution; he made this account, that being so firm a friend to the King, he should also be partaker and companion with him in the Honour. For which cause in all things whatsoever, he submitted not himself to the King, but challenged to himself a liberty to speak what him lilted. For this cause he grew hateful in the Kings sight, for that in particular he boasted of himself beyond measure, and oftentimes refreshed the memory of those adversities the King had past, the rather to express how affectionate he had been toward him; and his continual talk was nothing else but of those travels he had endured. Now for that he observed no measure in this his discourse, the King took it as an injury done to his Honour, and was offended with the unbridled licence of this mans prattle. For, nothing soundeth more harsh in a mans ear, than the memory of his fore-passed misery, and it is but the fault of a fool to rip up the courtesies he hath employed on another man. Finally, Silas grievously provoked the Kings displeasure against himself, that rather subscribing to his wrath than his wit, he not only dispossessed Silas of his Generals room, but also sent him bound into his Countrey in that place to be held prisoner. This notwithstanding, time assuaged this displeasure, and the King drawing himself into better consideration, and remembring himself how many travels Silas had endured in his behalf, he revoked the sentence that he pronounced. At such time therefore as he was ready to celebrate the festival day of his birth, and all his subjects were addressed to take their pleasure, he speedily sent for Silas, to the end he might be partaker thereof, and banquet with them. But Silas, who was of a free nature, supposing that he had just cause to be displeased, concealed it not from those who were sent unto him, but spake unto them after this manner: "To what "Honour doth the King invite me at this present, to the intent incontinently to deprive me "thereof? For he hath not only deprived me of those Honours which he bestowed upon "me, in acknowledgment of the good affection I have always shewed unto him: but he "hath altogether spoiled me, and contumeliously intreated me. but if he think that he can "restrain me from speaking freely, he deceiveth himself. For my conscience knoweth how "many hazards I have delivered him from, and as long as I breath, I will ring in all mens "ears, how many travels I have endured for his conservation and Honour, in recommence "whereof I am this day in bonds, and shut up in an obscure prison, which I will never for"get. Yea, and when my soul shall depart out of this body, she shall bear with her the re"membrance of those benefits I have imployed on him. These words spake he with a loud voice, willing them to relate the same unto King Agrippa; who seeing that he was grounded in an incurable folly, left him in prison.

After this, the King began to fortifie the walls of Jerusalem, on the side of the new town, upon the common charge; increasing them both in length and bredth: and might he have thorowly finished them, it had been a Fortress invincible, by all humane force. But Marsus the Governour of Syria certified Cæsar what the work was; and Claudius suspecting some commotion, wrote expressly to Agrippa, commanding him thence-forward to desist from further building of the Walls, according to that form wherein he began: whereunto he would not disobey. This King Agrippa was of nature so ready to exercise liberality, and took so great pleasure to use his magnificence towards all sorts of Nations, that the great expences he was at, obtained him great reputation. So that his whole pleasure and delight was, to shew courtesie unto all men, and to purchase good esteem, being every way different in nature and disposition from King Herod his Predecessor. For Herod was naturally malicious, extreme in punishing of men, and irreconcileable to those with whom he was displeased, manifestly expressing that he loved the Grecians better than the Jews. For he beautified those Cities that belonged to strangers, and gave them money, and erected them Baths, and sumptuous Theaters, and Temples, and in some of them Galleries: but as touching the Cities of the Jews, he bestowed not this bounty on any of them, no not the least reparation or gift that was worthy the speaking of. Contrariwise King Agrippa was very courteous and lowly, and equally imparted his bounty unto all men. He was courteous unto strangers, and testified no less by the bounty he bestowed on them. To his Countrey-men he behaved himself himself affably, and in especial he was merciful to all those that were in misery. For which cause his ordinary Court, and the place he took most pleasure in, was Jerusalem. He was a diligent observer of the Laws of his Countrey, and lived religiously, and with as great piety as was possible: neither passed there one day wherein he offered not sacrifice. It happened at one time that a certain cunning Lawyer, who was called Simon, and dwelt in Jerusalem, had assembled the people by reason of the Kings absence, who for the present was in Cæsarea: In which assembly he alleadged many things against him, that he was a prophane man, and that upon just cause he was forbidden to enter the Temple, in that it was not lawful nor decent for those that were unclean to enter thereinto. These words of Simons thus wrongfully urged against him, were signified to the King by certain letters sent him by the Governor of the City: when as therefore he sate him down in the Theater, he commanded that very Simon to sit next him, and in peaceable and kind manner he spake thus unto him: Tell me, I pray thee, what thing thou seest fault worthy, or done contrary to the Law, in that which is done here? Simon having not any thing to reply; besought him to pardon him. The King grew friends with him far sooner than it could be imagined, resolving with himself, that mercy doth far better become a King, than wrath; and that moderation is more requisite, than haughty courage; so as after he had bestowed certain presents on Simon, he dismissed him. Now although he had many reparations in divers places; yet honoured he those of Berith above all the rest; and builded them a Theater surpassing all other in sumptuousness and beauty: and besides that he made them a sumptuous Amphitheater, and Baths, and Porches: in which he neither spared cost, neither scantled the beauty and greatness of the works in any sort. The Dedication also of these things was celebrated with great pomp and magnificence: he also made great Shews and Plays in the Theater, in which there were all sorts of Musick and Recreations. He made also divers Turnaments in the Amphitheater, expressing in all things the greatness of his Magnificence; and being desirous to delight the people with a Combat, he gathered all the Malefactors that he could get, and made two several Companies of seven hundred a piece, and brought them together to fight, to the end that in skirmishing they might receive their punishment; and besides, that by this warlike exercise he might present the people with a pastime concluded with the punishment of wicked men: for each of these Combatants slew one another.

After that he had finished these above-named buildings in Beryth, he resorted to Tiberias a City of Galilee, and was admired of all the other Kings, so that Antiochus King of Comagena came to visit him: the like did Samsigeran King of the Emesenians, Cotys King of Armenia the less, and Polemon Lord of Pontus: and besides all these, Herod Prince of Chalcis and his Brother, all whom he received and entertained most magnificently and amiably, to shew his greatness; to the end that all men might perceive that he was deservedly honoured with the presence of so many Kings. And during the time that these Princes were with him, Marsus the Governour of Syria visited him likewise, whom, to the end he might express the reverence he bare to the Romans, he met with, seven furlongs off from the City. This interview of so many Kings was the original of that discontent that grew betwixt him and Marsus; for whilest he sate in his litter, he sent for these other Kings. But Marsus suspected this concord and so great amity, supposing that this agreement of so many Kings, would be no ways profitable or beneficial to the Romans. For which cause he presently sent unto them, charging them with all expedition to return each of them into their own Countries: which strict commission of his Agrippa took in ill part, and for this occasion he conceived scarce kindly of Marsus. He took the Priesthood from Matthias, and gave it to Aelioneus the Son of Cithæus. After he had reigned three whole years over Judæa, he came to Cæsarea, which in times past was called the Tower of Straton, and there made he sports in honour of Cæsar, ordaining a certain feast for his Conservation, to the celebration whereof there were assembled a great number of those, who were of estate and dignity thorow the whole Countrey. On the second day of this solemnity, he shewed himself being apparrelled in a Robe of silver, made with admirable workmanship; and came in the same to the Theater in the morning. Whereas the first reflex of the rising of the Sun beating upon his Robe, he shining after such a sort, that all those that beheld him, were seized with reverence and fear. Whereupon certain sycophants (which did not a little dishonour him) exclaimed one on the one side, the other on the other, saluting him for a God, and in speaking to him, cried out thus: Be merciful unto us; hitherto we have feared thee as a man, but henceforward we will confess and acknowledg thee to be of a nature more excellent, than mortal frailty can attain unto. Agrippa reproved them not for using these words: neither rejected he their palpable and detestable flattery. But not long after, he looking upwards, perceived an Owl over his head

And ſuddenly he was ſeized with a terrible griping in his belly, which began with very great vehemency: for which cauſe turning his eyes towards his friends, he ſpake unto them after this manner: "Behold him (ſaid he) "whom you eſteem for a God, condemned to die, and deſtiny ſhall apparently convince you "of thoſe flattering and falſe ſpeeches, which you have lately uſed in my behalf: For I, who "by you have been adored as one immortal, am under the hands of death. B Whileſt he ſpake thus, his griefs augmented in ſuch ſort, that he was brought almoſt to his laſt; for which cauſe he was with all expedition conveyed into his Royal Palace, and the rumour was ſpred in every place, that very ſhortly he would be dead. For which cauſe the people with their wives and children put on ſackcloth, according to the cuſtom of the Countrey, to the end they might ſolicit God's Mercy on the Kings behalf, and all the City was filled with tears and lamentations. The King that lay in an upper-chamber, and looking down into the Court, ſaw them lying thus on the earth, could not refrain himſelf from tears. And after he had for the ſpace of five days without ceaſing, been tormented with griping in his belly, he gave up the ghoſt, in the fifty fourth year of his age, and the ſeventh year of his reign. For he had reigned four years under the Empire of Caius Cæſar (having firſt of C all governed Philips Tetrarchy three years, to which was annexed the Signiory of Herod in the fourth year) and three years under the Empire of Claudius Cæſar, during which time he governed over the above named Countries; and moreover, over Judæa, Samaria, and Cæſarea. His revenue amounted to twelve hundred myriades, beſides which, he made many loans. For in that he was very liberal in giving, he ſpent far more than his revenue, and ſpared not any thing to ſhew himſelf magnificent. Before the people knew of his death, Herod his Brother Prince of Chalcis, and Chelcias the Kings Lieutenant and friend, agreed between themſelves to ſend Ariſto one of their truſtieſt ſervants to kill Silas, who was their enemy, as if they had been commanded by the King.

After Agrippas death, they of Cæſarea and Sebaſte forgot themſelves of thoſe benefits they had received from him, and uſed him no leſs deſpitefully, than as if he had been their utter enemy. For they reproachfully abuſed him after his death, and reviled him in ſuch ſort, as it is unſeemly to report the ſame. Furthermore, all the men of War, who were at that time many in number, went unto the Kings lodging, and with one accord ſeized the Sta- E tues of the Kings Daughters, and carried them to the Brothel-houſe; where after they had placed them, they uttered all the indignities they could poſſibly; practiſing ſuch ſhameful matters, as they may not be expreſſed. Beſides this, reſting themſelves in the publike places, they banquetted in the open ſtreet, wearing chaplets of flowers on their heads, and perfuming themſelves with odours to ſacrifice to Charon, drinking to one another for joy that the King was dead. Thus expreſſed they their ingratitude, not only towards their King Agrippa, who had beſtowed ſo many liberalities on them; but alſo towards Herod his Grandfather, who had builded their Cities, and to his extreme charge erected their Ports and Temples. At that time Agrippa, the deceaſed Agrippas Son was at Rome, and was brought up under the Emperour Claudius. When Cæſar underſtood how thoſe of Cæſarea and Sabſtae had F injuriouſly dealt with Agrippa, he was ſore diſpleaſed, and moved with their ingratitude: and his purpoſe was, to ſend the younger Agrippa with all expedition to take poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of his Father, and there withal to diſcharge himſelf of his Oath: but divers of his freemen and friends, who were in great credit with him, diſſwaded him from the ſame, alleadging that it would be a dangerous matter to commit the greatneſs of ſuch a Kingdom to a young man, who ſcarcely had as yet attained to the age of eighteen years: and for whom it was impoſſible to ſupport the care of ſo great a Kingdom, conſidering that if he were at mans eſtate, he ſhould find himſelf over-burthened with the charge of a Kingdom. This advice of theirs was allowed by Cæſar; and for this cauſe he ſent Cuſpius Padus to govern Judæa, and the whole Realm; honouring his dead friend in this, in that he would not ſuffer Marsus, who had been his enemy, to enter into his Kingdom. He gave especial Commission also, that Fadus should sharply punish those of Cæsaria and Sebaste, for the outrages they offered to his deceased friend, and the excess that was committed against his Daughters who were yet living: commanding him to transport the Companies of the Cæsarians and Sebastens, and the five Roman Legions into the Countrey of Pontus to serve in that place, and to take those Roman Souldiers that bare Arms in Syria, to serve in that place: yet notwithstanding this Commandment of his they were not displaced. For, they sent Ambassadours to Claudius to appease him, and by this means they obtained the favour to remain in Judæa. After this they gave an entrance to those most grievous mischiefs and calamities that befel the Jews: for they spred the seed of the War which was awakened under Florus Government. And for that cause, after that Vespasian had obtained the victory, as it shall be hereafter declared, he caused them to depart out of that Province, and made them seek their Habitation elsewhere.

The Jews themselves were the cause of those Wars which began under Florus.

The dissension between the Philadelphian and the Jews: and of the Ephod which was the Sacerdotal stole.

Hedio & Rufinus, chap. 1. Cassius Longinus Præfect of Syria.

AFter King Agrippas decease (as we have heretofore declared in our former Book) the Emperour Claudius sent Cassius Longinus to succeed Marsus in the Government of Syria, whom he displaced of that honour in memory of Agrippa, who during his life-time had oftentimes required by Letters, that he should not suffer Marsus to govern the State of Syria. As soon as Cuspius Fadus came into Jewry to take charge of that Countrey, which he was to govern under Cæsar, he found the Jews that dwelt on the other side of Jordan in an uproar, who had taken Arms against the Philadelphians, about the limits of a certain Village, called Mia, which was stored with valiant Men at Arms. Now had those who inhabit beyond Jordan, armed themselves in this manner, without the consent of their Governours; and had slain a great number of the Philadelphians. Which when Fadus understood, he was sore displeased, for that they had not reserved the cause to his hearing, and opened their griefs they had conceived against the Philadelphians, but were so bold of their own Authority, and without fear, as to betake themselves to their Weapons. Having therefore apprehended some three of them who had been principals pals and Authors of the Sedition, he commanded them to prison, and executed one of them called Annibas, and banished the other two, whose names were Amram and Eleazar.

Anon of this, Tholomæus the Arch-thief was also taken, and brought unto him, who commanded him to be executed, in that he had done many Robberies in Idumæa and Arabia; and by this means all the Countrey of Judæa was cleared of all thieves by the care and providence of Fadus. After this he sent for the High Priests, and the Governours of Jerusalem, commanding them, according to the Emperours direction, that they should deliver up into the Castle of Antonia the long and sacred Robe, which the High-Priest only was accustomed to wear; to the end that it might be at the Romans disposition, as in times past it had been. This command of his they durst not contradict, yet notwithstanding, they required Fadus and Longinus (who at that time was come to Jerusalem with a great power, for fear the Jews, by reason of this Injunction, should grow to Rebellion) first, that it might be lawful for them to send their Embassadours unto Cæsar, to beseech him that the Sacred Robe might remain in their custody. Secondly, that it might please them to expect the answer which Cæsar would return upon this their request. Fadus gave them this answer, that he permitted them to send their Embassadours to Rome, provided, that beforehand they delivered him their Children for Hostages. Which when they had readily performed, the Embassadors were sent away. Now when they came to Rome, the younger Agrippa (who was his Son that latelely died) knowing the cause of their coming, and being ordinarily accustomed to attend upon Cæsar (according as we have heretofore declared) besought Cæsar, that he would grant the Jews their request, as touching the Sacred Robe, and that it might please him to signifie no less unto Fadus. On this his petition Claudius gave the Embassadours audience: and told them that he favoured their suit, willing them to be thankful to Agrippa, upon whose suit he respected them, and allowed of their demands: and besides this answer, he delivered them a Letter to this effect:

Annibas executed, Amaramus and Eleazar banished.

Being required by our welbeloved Agrippa, whom I both have, and at this present do bring up with me, and whom I know to be most devout; I have heard your Embassadors, who were admitted to my presence by his means, and have received their thanks for the benefits I have bestowed on your Nation: I have also willingly inclined to that instant and express request you have made unto me, and it is my pleasure, the Sacred Robe of the High Priest, and the holy Miter remain in your custody, in such manner, as our most dear and right honoured friend Vitellus heretofore ordained: To which demand of yours I vouchsafe my allowance; first in regard of mine own piety, and for that I desire that every one should serve God according to his own Religion: for that I am resolved, that in so doing, I shall gratifie King Herod and young Aristobulus, whose piety towards me I am privy to, and whose good affection towards you I can witness, with whom I have had divers occasions of friendship, both in regard of their virtue, as for the honour that I bear unto them. I have also written to this effect to Cuspius Fadus mine Agent: the names of those who have received my Letters, are Cornelius the Son of Ceron, Tryphon the Son of Theudion, Dorotheus the Son of Nathaneel, and John the Son of John. Given the eight and twentieth of June, in the year wherein Rufus, and Pompejus Silvanus were Consuls. At that same time Herod, who was Agrippas Brother that had lately deceased, to whose hands in times past the Goverment of Chalcis had been committed, required the Emperour Claudius to grant him the power over the Temple, and the sacred Vestments and necessaries, and the Authority of choosing the High Priest. All which he obtained, and from that time forward until the end of the War of the Jews, this power remained in all his Successors. According to this Authority Herod deposed Canthara from the Priesthood, and gave the Succession thereof to Joseph the Son of Caneus.

Hedio & Ruffinus, c. 2. al. 5. Monobazus the King of Adiabena begetteth two Sons on Helena his Sister, Monobazus and Izates.

AT that time Helena Queen of Adiabena, and her Son Izates conformed themselves to the Religion of the Jews, upon this occasion that ensueth: Monobazus King of Adiabena, who was also called Bazeus, being surprised with the love of his Sister Helena espoused her, and got her with Child. ing with her, he laid his hand on her belly, whileſt ſhe lay aſleep: and him thought, that he heard a voice that commanded him to take away his hand from off her belly, leſt he ſhould cruſh the fruit that was therein, which by God's Providence ſhould have a happy beginning, and no leſs fortunate ending. Monobazus was ſore moved at this voice; and as ſoon as he awoke, he told it to his wife; and afterwards when the child was born, he called him Izates. Beſides, he had another elder Son by the ſame wife, who was called Monobazus, according to his own name. And he had alſo other Sons by his other Wives: yet notwithſtanding Izates was moſt manifeſtly his beſt beloved, and ſo cheriſhed by him, as if he had been his only begotten Son. For which cauſe, his other Brothers envied him: which increaſed their hatred, for that all the reſt of them were aggrieved, becauſe Monobazus made moſt account of Izates. The Father manifeſtly perceived all this, yet did he pardon them, knowing that they did it not for malice, but for the deſir thet every one of them had to be beſt eſteemed by his Father. Notwithſtanding, being afraid leſt ſom miſ-hap ſhould betide Izates, by reaſon of the hatred his Brethren bare unto him, he gave him many great gifts, and ſent him to Abemerigus, who reigned at that time in a Fort called Spaſinus, committing his Sons life into his hands. Abemerigus alſo entertained him with kind affection, and loved him in ſuch ſort, that in proceſs of time he gave him Samacha his Daughter to wife, and for her Dowry, he gave him a Countrey of great revenue.

Izates ſent to Abemerigus, marrieth his daughter Samacha.

Monobazus being old, and ſeeing he had no long time to live, deſired before his death that his Son might come and viſit him; he therefore ſent for him and received him very lovingly, giving him a Countrey which he called Cæron, which bringeth forth great abundance of excellent Amomum. In this place was the remainder of the Ark, in which Noe was ſaved, during the Deluge; which remnants are to be ſeen at this day, if any man have a deſire to behold the ſame. Izates remained in that place until his fathers deceaſe. But on the very day of his death, Helena ſent for all the Lords and Governours of the Kingdom, and Captains of all the Army, and upon their aſſembly, ſhe ſpake unto them after this manner:

Cæron very fruitful in Amomum, in which the relikes of Noes Ark are to be ſeen.

I ſuppoſe (ſaid ſhe) that you are not ignorant of my Husbands mind, who hath deſired that Izates might be King in his ſtead, and hath eſteemed him moſt worthy of ſuch an Honour: yet expect I your judgment in this point. For he that received the Sovereignty, not from one mans hand, but from many, and hath the ſame confirmed unto him by their conſent, is happy. he uſed this diſcourſe unto them to try what their intent was, who were there aſſembled. hey underſtanding her mind, proſtrated themſelves firſt of all upon the earth before the Queen, according to the cuſtom of their Countrey, and afterwards anſwered her, hat they approved he Kings election, vnd took pleaſure to obey Izates, whom his Father deſervedly, and to all their contents and the deſire of the common people had preferred above the reſt of his Brethren: alleadging moreover, that they would put his Brethren and Kinſmen to death before his coming, to the end that he might enjoy the Kingdom with all ſecurity: for by their deaths all the fear that might grow by their hatred vnd envy might be extinguiſhed. Hereunto the Queen anſwered; that ſhe gave them thanks, for the favour they bare unto her and her Son Izates: notwithſtanding ſhe required them to ſuſpend their judgments touching the death of his Brethren, until ſuch time as Izates himſelf ſhould give his conſent thereunto.

Izates was made King by his mother Helena, and the Nobility, and Monobazus governeth the Kingdom till his coming.

They ſeeing they might not obtain the liberty to put them to death, gave counſel that they ſhould be kept priſoners until his coming, to the end, at leaſtwiſe for their own parts, that they might be out of dauger; and that moreover, until his coming there might one be appointed to govern the State, whom ſhe ſhould eſteem moſt truſty and faithful unto him. Whereunto Helena condeſcended, and made his elder Brother Monobazus King, and ſet the Diadem on his Head. and gave him his Fathers Seal Ring, with that Robe which they call Sampſera; exhorting him to govern the Kingdom until his Brothers arrival. Izates having certain notice of his Fathers death, reſorted thither ſpeedily, and receiving his Brother Monobazus willing ſurrender, took upon him the Government of the Kingdom.

During ſuch time as Izates ſojourned in the Fortreſs of Spaſinus a certain Merchant, who was a Jew, called Ananias, having acceſs to the Kings wives, taught them the manner how to ſerve God, according to the Religion of the Jews: and Ananias by their means growing acquainted with Izates, taught him the like, and accompanied him into Adiabena: being drawn thereunto by his earneſt intreaties, at ſuch time as Izates reſorted thither upon his Fathers ſending for It chanced alſo in like ſort that Helena was in like manner inſtructed by another Jew, and retained the Rites and Religion of the Jews.

Izates and his mother Helena learn the true ſervice of God according to the manner of the Jews.

After that Izates came into his Kingdom, and knew that his Brethren and Kinſfolk were impriſoned, he was much grieved. Conceiving therefore with himſelf that it would be a great

A great impiety in him to ſuffer them to be ſlain, or kept bound in priſon; and that on the other ſide, it were a dangerous matter for him, if being at liberty they ſhould remember the evil they had endured: for this cauſe he ſent ſome of them to Rome for Hoſtages with their children unto the Emperour Claudius, and the reſt unto Artabanus King of Parthia. Afterwards when he was thorowly aſſured that his Mother was wholly addicted to the Religion of the Jews, he endeavoured himſelf the more to ſhew himſelf zealous therein: and ſuppoſing that he could not be a perfect Jew, except he were circumciſed, he prepared himſelf to be circumciſed. Which when his Mother underſtood, ſhe laboured to her uttermoſt to hinder his reſolution certifying him, that in ſo doing he ſhould bring himſelf in great danger; for that in being King, he would draw himſelf into the diſlike of his Subjects, if they ſhould B have notice that he was addicted to a new Religion, and to ſtrange Ceremonies, and that they would not endure, that in being a Jew, he ſhould be their King: ſo ſhe for a while for a diſſwaſion reſtrained him from his deſire. But the King required counſel of Ananias, who, according with Helena in the courſe of her diſlike, threatned Izates, that if he would not obey his Mother, he would forſake him, and depart from him, for that he feared, leſt if the matter ſhould be publikely known, he ſhould ſuffer ſome puniſhment, as being the only Author and Inſtructer of the King in unddecent matters; that otherwiſe he might ſerve God, although he were not circumciſed; ſince he had reſolved to live according to the inſtitution and Laws of the Jews, and that God would pardon him: for in this, true Religion conſiſteth more, than in the circumciſion of the body, though he were not actually circumciſed, ſince the C neceſſity and fear of his Subjects over-ruled him. By which words the King for that time was won to affect the ſame no further. But ſome little whiles after (for he was not wholly altered in that affection which he had) another Jew called Eleazar, coming from Galilee, and accounted a man of great experience in the Doctrine of our Religion, perſwaded him to be circumciſed. For, coming one day unto him, to ſalute him, he found him reading of the Books of Moſes, and ſaid unto him; O King, contrary to your knowledg you offend the Law, and God likewiſe; for it ſufficeth you not, that you underſtand the ſame, but the chiefeſt matter you are tied unto, is to do that which the Law commandeth: how long therefore will you remain uncircumciſed? And if as yet you have not peruſed the Law as touching this point, read it now, to the end you may know what impiety it is to D omit it.

After the King had heard this, he would no longer defer his Circumciſion: for which cauſe withdrawing himſelf into another chamber, he called a Surgeon unto him, who acted that which he required, and afterwards calling his Mother and Maſter Ananias unto him, he certified them what had paſt: whereupon they grew ſtrangely amazed, fearing leſt the King ſhould grow in danger of the loſs of his Kingdom, if this action of his ſhould come to light; for that his Subjects would not endure, that ſuch a man that followed a contrary Religion ſhould be their King: they feared alſo, leſt they themſelves ſhould be in danger, foraſmuch as the cauſe of all this matter would be imputed unto them. But God by his Providence prevented leſt any of thoſe things which they feared ſhould come to effect: for he delivered E Izates himſelf and his Children likewiſe out of many dangers, yeelding them his aſſiſtance in their doubtful and deſperate eſtates, declaring in effect that thoſe that only put their truſt in him, and depend upon his providence, are never deprived of the fruit of their Piety. But of theſe things we will ſpeak hereafter.

When Helena the Kings Mother perceived that the eſtate of the Kingdom was in peace, and that by all mens opinion, both home-bred and ſtrangers, her Son was reputed happy by the good will of God, ſhe was ſeized with a deſire to go and viſit the City of Jeruſalem, and adore God in the Temple, which was ſo much renowned through the whole world, and offer Sacrifice of Thanksgiving therein; for which cauſe ſhe beſought her Son that he would ſuffer her to perform her Vows: who willingly condeſcended to her deſire, and furniſhed F her royally with all things that were neceſſary for ſuch a Voyage; giving her a great maſs of Money with her, and bringing her onward on her way many days journey; ſo that at length ſhe arrived in Jeruſalem, to the great advantage of the Inhabitants of that City. For at that time the City was oppreſſed with a grievous famine, ſo as many died for want of food; for which cauſe Queen Helena ſent her ſervants, ſome into Alexandria to buy a great quantity of Corn, the reſt into Cyprus to buy dried Figs, who returned with all expedition they might; whereupon Helena diſtributed the Victuals among the poor, leaving a ſingular memory of her beneficence among the whole Nation. Her Son Izates alſo underſtanding of this Famine, ſent a great ſum of Money to the Governour of Jeruſalem. But hereafter will

Now Artabanus King of Parthia, perceiving that the Princes of the Kingdom had conspired against him, resolved with himself to go unto Izates, for the security of his life and person, hoping by that means, if it were possible to recover his Kingdom. He therefore retired thither, and brought with him about one thousand men of his Kinsfolk, and household servants. And by the way he met with Izates, whom he knew very well by his Royal Train, notwithstanding he were unknown unto him by countenance. Drawing therefore near unto him, he first of all humbled himself on his knees, according to the custom of the Country, and afterwards spake unto him after this manner:

Artabanus retireth himself to Izates and requireth his assistance.

Dread King, forsake me not who am thy servant, neither reject thou my prayers. For being dejected by the means of my misfortunes, and of a King become a private man, I have need of thy H succour. Consider therefore the inconstancie of fortune, and think with thy self, that by providing for me, thou shalt provide for thy self. For if thou makest no reckoning of the wrong that is done unto me, divers men will grow audacious to enterprize upon other Kings.

These words pronounced he with weeping tears, and with looks lowly fixed upon the ground. When Izates had heard Artabanus name, and saw his humble and submissive estate, he lept incontinently from his Horse, and said unto him: King, be of good courage, and let not thy present and perplexed condition dismay thee, as if thy misfortunes were irrecoverable. For this sorrow of thine shall be suddenly changed, and thou shalt find a better friend and Ally, than thou hopest for at this time. For either I will repossess thee of thy Kingdom of Parthia, or I will lose mine own Government. This said, he caused Artabanus to get on I Horsback, and walked by him on foot, yeelding him this Honor, as to a greater King than himself. Which when Artabanus saw, he was discontented, and sware by his Honor and fortune to come, that he would set foot on ground, if he would not get up on Horsback and ride before him: whereunto he obeyed, and mounting upon his Horse again, he conducted him to his Palace; yeelding him all the honor that was possible, both in his sittings and Banquets, as in his Assemblies, not respecting his present estate or condition, but his former Dignity: considering with himself, that such casual misfortunes and changes are incident to all men. Furthermore he wrote unto the Parthians, perswading them to receive their King Artabanus, assuring them on his faith and Oath, that he would obtain a free pardon for all that which was past, and to that intent he offered himself to be an Arbitrator between them. The Parthians K gave him this answer, that they would not refuse to entertain him, but that they could not: for that one who was called Cinnamus was advanced in his place and Dignity, and that they feared lest a Sedition should happen amongst them. Cinnamus, who was a noble and honourable minded man, knowing that their intent was such, wrote himself unto Artabanus, who had nourished and brought him up, exhorting him to return upon his faith, and to receive again his own Kingdom. Artabanus upon this motion gave credit to his words, and returned back again. Whereupon Cinnamus came forth and met him, and prostrating himself before his feet, called him King; and afterwards taking the Diadem from off his own head, he set it upon Artabanus head, who by this means was restored to his former estate by Izates mediation, after he had been driven out of his Kingdom by his chiefest Nobility. And he did not L forget the favours which he had received at Izates hands, but did him all the honour that possibly he could imagine: for he permitted him to wear the streight Tiara, and to sleep upon a gilded bed, which is a Priviledg that belongeth only to the Kings of Parthia. He gave him also a goodly and great Countrey which he had taken from the King of Armenia. This Countrey was called Nisibis, where in times past the Macedons had builded the City of Antioch, by them called Mygdonia.

Presently after Izates was in this sort honoured, Artabanus died, leaving his Kingdom to his Son Vardanes: who repaired to Izates, praying him to joyn with him in that War which he intended to wage against the Romans: but he prevailed not with him. For Izates knowing the Romans force and good hap, imagined that he undertook a matter beyond his M power. Furthermore, he had sent five of his young Sons to Jerusalem to learn our tongue and discipline, and his Mother likewise to adore in the Temple, for which cause he the rather held back and dissuaded Vardanes from enterprizing against the Romans, whose power and puissant conquest he ordinarily reckoned up unto him, to the end he might dismay him, and by these his allegations cause him to give over his purposed intent of war against them. But the Parthian was displeased with this his perswasion, and for that cause denounced a present War against Izates. But this his enterprize had but a fruitless issue: for God cut off all his Vologeſus King of Parthia.

When Monobazus King Izates Brother and the reſt of his Kinſfolk ſaw how happily all things ſucceed to Izates, and how in reſpect of his piety towards God, he was honoured and reverenced by all men, they alſo reſolved themſelves to forſake their Religiou, and to ſerve God after the manner of the Jews. But this intent of theirs was diſcovered. Whereupon the chieſeſt among them grew diſpleaſed; yet did they not manifeſt their deſpight, but kept it hidden in their hearts, thinking ſome fit occaſion to revenge themſelves as ſoon as they might. They wrote alſo to Abias King of Arabia, and promiſed him great ſums of money, if he would take Arms againſt their King, promiſing him that upon the firſt charge, they would forſake him, for that they deſired to be revenged on him, who was grown in hatred of their Religion. Having therefore confirmed their promiſe with an Oath, they incited him to make haſte. The King of Arabia performed that which they required, and marched forth againſt Izates with a great power. And when as the firſt charge was ready to be given, and before they came to handy-ſtrokes, all Izates Souldiers forſook him; and turning their backs to their enemies, fled in great diſorder, as if they had been ſurprized with a Panick fear; yet was Izates no ways diſmayed, but having diſcovered that it was treaſon and conſpiracie of his greateſt Peers, he retired himſelf alſo into his Camp, where he enquired of the cauſe that they pretended. After he knew that they had complotted with the Arabian, he cauſed the Conſpirators to be put to death: and the next day after went out to fight, and ſlew a great number of his enemies, and conſtrained the reſt to betake them to flight. He purſued their King alſo into a Fort called Arſam, which he battered and aſſaulted with ſuch ſpirit and diligence, that he took the ſame with a great quantity of booty that was therein, and returned to Adiabena with great triumph: but he took not Abias alive; for he himſelf had prevented his captivity with his death. The Lords of Adiabena ſeeing themſelves fruſtrated of their former hopes, in that by God's hand they were delivered into the hands of their King, could not contain their diſpleaſure, but practiſed further miſchief: for they wrote their Letters to Vologeſus King of Parthia, deſiring him to kill Izates; and to beſtow another King upon them who was a Parthian, for that they hated their King who had aboliſhed their Religion, and had embraced a ſtrange Law. The Parthian underſtanding hereof, prepared himſelf for the War; and having no juſt colour or pretext to enforce the ſame, he ſent a meſſenger unto him to redemand thoſe honours which his father had given him, which if he refuſed, he denounced War againſt him. Izates was not a little troubled in his mind, when he underſtood this meſſage: For he thought that if he ſhould reſtore the gifts, he ſhould offer himſelf great prejudice, for that it would be imagined that he did it for fear; knowing on the other ſide that if the Parthian ſhould recover that which he redemanded, yet would he not be in quiet, he therefore commended his cauſe to God, truſting that he would take care of him. And building upon this, that the greateſt good he might have, was to have God to help, he ſhut his wives and children in a ſtrong Caſtle, and his corn in his ſtrongeſt Tower: and afterwards burned all the hay and forrage: and having after this manner provided for all things, he expected the approach of his enemy. The Parthian came forward ſooner than he was expected, with a great power of Horſemen and Footmen. For he marched forward in all haſte, and encamped near unto the flood that ſeparateth Adiabena from Media. Izates likewiſe encamped not far from thence, having with him about ſix thouſand Horſe-men. To whom the Parthian ſent a meſſenger to give him to underſtand how great his power was, which extended from the River Euphrates as far as Bactria, recounting unto him what Kings he had under his ſubjection, threatning him to puniſh him very ſeverely, in that he behaved himſelf ſo ungratefully towards his Benefactors; yea, in ſuch ſort as the God whom he adored, might not deliver him out of the Kings hands. Hereunto Izates anſwered that he knew well that the Parthian far exceeded him in power, but that he was far better aſſured that God's power extended beyond all mens contradiction. And having returned them this anſwer, he betook himſelf to his prayers, and proſtrating himſelf upon the earth, and caſting aſhes on his head, and faſting himſelf, his wives and all his children, he called upon God, and prayed after this manner: O Lord Almighty, if I have not vainly ſubmitted my ſelf to thy protection, but have intirely choſen thee for my only and true God, be thou my help and aſſiſtance, and not only deliver me from mine enemies, but alſo abate, and controul their pride, who have not been afraid in their unbridled language, to prophane thy holy and sacred Name, and utter blasphemous speeches against thy power. Thus prayed he with sighs and tears, and God heard him: For incontinently, and the very same night, Vologesus received Letters, by which he was certified that a great number of Dahans, and Sacans taking opportunity by his absence, were entered into the Kingdom of Parthia, and spoiled the whole Countrey, for which cause he returned back into his Countrey without any further trouble. Izates delivereth up the Kingdom to his Brother Monobazus and dieth.

Not long after this, at such time as he had lived fifty five years, and reigned four and twenty, and left behind him four and twenty Sons, he died, and appointed his Brother Monobazus to succeed him in the Kingdom, requiting hereby his faith and Loyalty, in that during the time of his absence, and after the death of his Father, he had faithfully ruled and governed the Kingdom to his use. His Mother Helena hearing news of his death, lamented very grievously as reason would, in that she being his Mother was deprived of a Son that so zealously honoured and feared God, yet notwithstanding she was comforted, when she understood that her eldest Son was to succeed him in the Kingdom, and hasted her self with all diligence to go and meet him. As soon as she arrived in Adiabena, she lived not long time after her Son Izates. Whereupon Monobazus took both her body and his Brothers bones, and sent them to Jerusalem, commanding that they should be buried in three Pyramides which Helena had builded, some three stades or furlongs from Jerusalem. But hereafter will we recite the acts and gests of Monobazus during his reign. H

By these words of his, he deceived divers of them. But Fadus would not permit that such a fury of theirs should breed them any commodity: but he sent a Troop of horsemen, who charged them on the sudden, and slew a great number of them, and took divers of them prisoners alive; amongst whom was Theudas, whose head was stricken off, and was afterwards carried to Jerusalem. At that time there hapned a great famine in Jewry, during which Queen Helena sent huge sums of money into Egypt, and bought corn, and distributed the same to those that were in want, according as I have forespoken. At the same time James and Simon the Sons of Judas of Galilee, who had busied themselves to incite the people to resist the Government of the Romans, were put to death at such time as Cyrenius valued each mans goods, as we have heretofore declared. These did Alexander command to be crucified. Herod King of Chalcis took away the Sovereign Priesthood from Joseph the Son of Camydas, and transferred it to Anias the Son of Nebedæus. After Tiberius Alexander, succeeded Cumanus. Then died Herod, who was Brother to King Agrippa the Great, in the eighth year of Claudius Cæsar. He left behind him three Sons; Aristobulus, whom he had by his first wife, Bernicianus and Hyrcanus by Bernice his Brothers daughter. Claudius Cæsar gave the Kingdom belonging to him to Agrippa the younger. AT the time of the Feaſt of Paſcha (during which time we are accuſtomed to feed on unleavened bread) a great number of people aſſembled themſelves from all parts to the City of Jeruſalem. Whereupon Cumanus fearing leſt by this occaſion there ſhould ariſe ſome Commotion, he gave order that a company of his Souldiers ſhould be armed, and ſhould keep their Guard in the porches of the Temple, to the end if any trouble ſhould happen, they might repreſs it. Thoſe Governours, who had been his Predeceſſours, had done the like in ſuch manner of Aſſemblies. It came to paſs on the fourth day of the Feaſt that a certain Souldier diſcovering thoſe privities which were undecent to be ſeen, ſhewed them before the people: wherewith they that beheld the ſame, were ſore diſpleaſed, and provoked, ſaying, that the diſhonour was not done unto them, but to God, to whom it rightly appertained. And ſome of them of beſt reſolution caſt out certain ſpeeches againſt Cumanus, ſaying, that the Souldier was ſet on by him. Which when Cumanus underſtood, he was in like manner grievouſly offended in regard of thoſe injuries; yet exhorted he thoſe, whom he ſaw to forward in raiſing factions, to keep the Peace, for fear leſt a Sedition ſhould grow during the time of the Feaſt; and ſeeing they would in no ſort obey him, but contrariwiſe they ceaſed not to injure and revile him, he commanded that all the forces he had ſhould be in arms, and retire themſelves into the Fortreſs of Antonia that was near unto the Temple, as we have heretofore declared. The people ſeeing the armed Souldiers, were afraid, and began to flie: but becauſe the places thorow which they iſſued, were but narrow, they imagined that they were purſued by their enemies; ſo that they thruſt on one another in their flight, and divers of them were thronged to death. In this mutiny there died twenty thouſand men: and after this, inſtead of a Feaſt, there was nothing but mourning; and without bethinking themſelves of their prayers and ſacrifices, all of them began to weep and lament. So great a miſchief ſprung from the inſolence of one Souldier. This firſt lamentation was ſcarcely finiſhed, before a ſecond ſucceeded the ſame. For ſome of thoſe who had a part in this mutiny, being about ſome hundred ſtades from the City, robbed one Steven, that was Cæſars ſervant, in the High-way, and took from him all that which he had. Which when Cumanus underſtood, he preſently ſent ſome of his Souldiers to ſpoil thoſe villages, which were neareſt to the place where the fact was committed, and to bring the chiefeſt Inhabitants thereof in bonds unto him. In this pillage a certain Souldier found a Book of the Law of Moſes in one of theſe villages, which he took and brought, and before them all tore it in pieces, with hainous blaſphemies and vile ſpeeches againſt the Law and whole Nation. The Jews underſtanding hereof, ſuddenly aſſembled themſelves in great numbers, and ran to Cæſarea where Cumanus kept for that preſent, requiring him that he would revenge not their cauſe, but Gods, whoſe Law was on that ſort diſhonoured; ſignifying unto him, that it was impoſſible for them to live, ſo long as their Law was thus contemned. Cumanus fearing leſt a ſecond mutiny and uproar ſhould be raiſed among the people, by counſel of his friends cut off the Souldiers head, who had committed that outrage againſt the Law, and by this means appeaſed the ſedition that was ready to take head.

The Sedition of the Jews againſt the Samaritans.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 10. al. 12.

THere happened alſo an emnity betwixt the Samaritans and the Jews, upon this occaſion. They of Galilee, who reſorted to the City of Jeruſalem at the times of our ſolemn Feaſts, were accuſtomed to paſs thorow the Countrey of the Samaritans. And at that time it hapned, that their way lay thorow a Borough called Nais, ſcituate in a great champain field: where a quarrel ariſing betwixt divers Inhabitants of the place, and certain paſſengers, a great number of the Galileans were murthered. Which when the Magiſtrates of Galilee underſtood, they reſorted to Cumanus, requiring him to execute juſtice on thoſe that had murthered their Countreymen: but he being corrupted with money by the Samaritans, made no account of their complaint. The Galileans being provoked by this contempt of his, perſwaded the common people of the Jews to betake them to their weapons, and maintain their Liberty; telling them that ſervitude is of it ſelf tedious; but that when it is accompanied with outrages, it is intollerable. But their Governours laboured to pacifie them, promising them to deal so effectually with Cumanus, that he should take punishment of the murtherers: but they gave them no audience, but fell to arms, requiring Eleazar the Son of Dinæus to be their Chiefstain. This Eleazar was a Thief, who for many years made his abode in the Mountains: they therefore spoiled and burnt certain Villages of the Samaritans. After that the report of all that which had passed, came to Cumanus ears, he took a company of the Souldiers of Sebaste, with four bands of footmen, and armed the Samaritans likewise to go and make war against the Jews; whom they took, and slew many of them, and led more of them away prisoners. When the chiefest Governors in Jerusalem saw into what an infinity of miseries they were faln, they clothed themselves in sackcloth, and cast ashes on their heads, exhorting those that were mutinous, to forethink themselves of the ruine of their Countrey, the danger the Temple was in to be burned, the servitute of themselves, their wives and children, to prophane and strange Nations, and desired them to change their advice, and to lay aside their weapons, and cease to offer violence, to the end that they might hereafter live in quiet, and that every one of them would retire themselves peaceably unto their habitation. By which words in the end they being perswaded, returned home, and betook them to their business. The Thieves also retired themselves again into their strong Holds, & from that time all Judæa was replenished with thefts. The Governors of Samaria resorted to Numidius Quadratus Governour of Syria, who dwelt at that time in Tyre, to accuse the Jews for that they had fired their Villages, and spoiled them; telling him, that their loss did not so much trouble them, as for that they saw the Romans were contemned by the Jews: who notwithstanding ought to appear before them as their competent Judges; yet nevertheless that they assembled themselves in such sort, as if the Romans were not their Superiors. For which cause they addressed themselves to him, to the end they might have redress of those wrongs which they had received by them. This is that wherewith the Samaritans charged the Jews: who answered to the contrary, alleadging that the Samaritans themselves had been the Authors of that mutiny and uproar; and that Cumanus being wholly corrupted by their money had smothered the matter, and done no justice on the Murtherers. When Quadratus heard this, he reserved the judgment till another time, telling them that he would give sentence in the matter at such time as he came into Judæa, and had examined the truth on both sides; so that they returned without doing any thing.

The Samaritans accuse the Jews before Numidius Quadratus.

The Jews by the burthen of the Wars on the Samaritans and Cumanus.

Anon after, Quadratus came into Samaria, where he heard that the Samaritans had been the Authors of the trouble, and on the other side knowing that some Jews likewise intended some insurrection, he caused them to be crucified, whom Cumanus had left in prison. From thence he transported himself to Lydda, which is a Borough of no less bigness than a City: in which place he sitting on his Tribunal Seat, heard the Samaritans the second time, and discovered by the report of a certain Samaritane, that one Dortus one of the principall left among the Jews, and four other his Confederates induced the people to rebel against the Romans. These did Quadratus cause to be executed. As for Ananias, who was the High-Priest, and the Captain Ananus, he sent them bound to Rome, to render an account to the Emperour Claudius of that which they had done. Moreover, he commanded the chief Governours both of the Samaritans and Jews, that they should speedily repair to Rome; whither Cumanus and Captain Celer should conduct them, to the end they might be judged by Cæsar himself, upon the information taken on both sides. And fearing lest the common people of the Jews should break out into some Rebellion, he repaired to the City of Jerusalem, to give order that the Iews should attempt to raise no new stirs; but when he came thither, he found all in peace, and busied in the celebration of the Feast, and offering Sacrifices to God, according to their accustomed Ceremonies. Being therefore assured that no man would innovate or rebel in that place, he left them to their solemnities, and repaired to Antioch.

Dortus with four other are crucified. Ananias, Ananus, Cumanus, Celer, and some other are sent to Rome.

But the Iews that were sent to Rome with Cumanus, and the principal Samaritans had a day assigned them by the Emperour to decide the differences that were between them. Cumanus and the Samaritanes laboured all that they might by the mediation of Cæsars friends and freemen, to have the upper-hand of the Iews; and indeed the day had been theirs, if young Agrippa had not been at Rome. For he seeing that the matter was handled to the disadvantage of the Iews, besought Agrippina the Emperours wife, that she would labour her husband in such sort that he would be pleased to take full knowledg of that which was done; and that afterwards he should execute due justice on those whom he found guilty of that sedition. Claudius favourably gave ear to this request: and hearing the whole matter, he found found that the Samaritans were the first Authors of all those mischiefs, and cause them to be put to death who came before him to plead, and banished Cumanus: he gave order also that Captain Celer should be sent back to Jerusalem, and that there in sight of all the people he should be dragged about the City, until he died. Furthermore, he sent Claudius Felix, Pallas Brother to govern Judæa.

Herod & Bussinus, c.12.l.3. Claudius Felix Governour of Judæa.

In the twelfth year of his Reign, he gave Agrippa, Philips Tetrarchy, with Batanea; and besides that, annexed thereunto Trachonitis and Abila, which in time past appertained to Lysanias Tetrarchy, taking from this the Province of Chalcis, which he had governed for the space of 4 years. After that Agrippa had obtained this gift at Cæsars hands, he married his sister Drusilla to Azizus King of the Emesenians, who consented to be circumcised, because Epiphanes, King Antiochus Son would not give ear unto the marriage, for that he refused to entertain the Religion of the Jews, although in times past he had promised his Father no less. He gave Mariamme also to Archelaus, Chelcias Son, who by her Fathers consent was before-time promised him, on whom he begat a Daughter called Bernice. A little after this, the marriage of Azizus and Drusilla was broken off, on this occasion following: at such time as Felix governed Jewry, he saw Drusilla, and was surprized with her love, for that she surpassed all other women in beauty. He therefore sent a certain Magician called Simon, who was born in Cyprus, and one of his greatest friends among the Jews, who perswaded her to forsake her first husband, and to marry with Felix, giving her to understand, that she should be happy, if she refused not this match. She unadvised, and resolved to rid her self from the envious affection which her Sister Bernice bare towards her (who hated her in regard of her beauty, and for this caused ceased not to injure her) she condescended to forsake the Religion of the Jews, and to marry with Felix, by whom she had a Son called Agrippa. His death hereafter will I declare, and how in the Emperour Tiberius time he died, and was burned in the fire of the mountain Vesuvius with his wife. Bernice remained a widow, very long time after Herods death, who was both her Unkle and her Husband, and the report was that she had the company of her Brother. Finally, she wrought so much, that Polemon King of Cilicia caused himself to be circumcised, to the end he might espouse her, purposing by that means to make it known how falsely she had been accused. Whereunto Polemon gave ear because she was rich. But this Marriage continued not any long time. For Bernice through her impudency, as it is reported, abandoned Polemon, who giving over that Marriage forsook also the Religion of the Jews. At the same time Mariamme having refused Archelaus her husband, married with Demetrius one of the chiefest Jews that were in Alexandria, both in regard of his descent, as also his riches, who at that time also exercised the office of Alubarcha, that is to say, the Governour of Arabia. She caused the Son she had by him to be called Agrippinus. But of all this, will I speak more exactly hereafter.

The Emperour Claudius died after he had reigned thirteen years, eight moneths, and twenty days. Some say that he was poysoned by Agrippina his wife the daughter of Germanicus, Claudius Brother, which was first married to Domitius Ænobarbus, one of the greatest men of Rome: after whose death and long widowhood, she was finally married to Claudius, into whose house she brought her Son called Domitius, by his own Fathers name. Claudius had before-time put Messalina his wife to death, for the jealousie he had of her; although he had had children by her, namely Britannicus and Octavius. He had Octavia also by his first wife Pætina, which was elder than her Brethren, and was married to Nero, whom Claudius so named, and adopted for his Son. Agrippina, fearing lest Britannicus, growing to mans estate, should succeed his Father in the Empire, and desirous to make her own Son Emperour, as it is reported; she left nothing unattempted that might bring her Husband to his death; and presently sent Burrus, who was General of the Army, with certain other Captains, and those of greatest power among his free-men, to bring Nero into the field, and to proclaim him Emperour. He being thus established in the Empire, caused Britannicus to be secretly poysoned; and not long after this, he openly caused his Mother to be put to death, yeelding her this recompence, not only for that she had born him in her womb but also because by her policies he had obtained the Empire. He likewise murthered Octavia his wife, and divers other Noble men, under colour of some Conspiracie intended against him. But I will no further prosecute this matter, for that there are divers who have composed Neros History, of whom some have no regard of the truth, but have spoken at their pleasure, for that he had been their Benefactor: othersome transported with hatred and despight against him, have not been ashamed to publish such impudent lies against his renown, as they deserve to be condemned. Neither do I wonder that they have invented so many lyes against Nero, considering that in those Histories which they wrote as touching the precedent Emperours, they have not ſtudied to ſpeak truth, although they had not any occaſion to hate them, conſidering that they lived a long time after their death. But let theſe contemners of truth write as them liſteth, as they ſeem to take delight in that licence. For mine own part I intended to write nothing but the truth: neither ſtand I much on that which concerneth not the matter which I intreat of, purpoſing in all truth and diligence to declare that which hath befaln our Nation of the Jews, without omitting of either their misfortunes or follies, that have proceeded with them. I will therefore return to the diſcovery of our affairs. Azizus King of Emeſene being dead the firſt year of the Emperour Nero's reign, his Brother obtained the Kingdom: Ariſtobulus the ſon of Herod King of Chalcis, had the Government of the Signiory of the leſſer Armenia from Nero's hand. Cæſar gave Agrippa a certain portion of Galilee, commanding thoſe of Tiberias and Tarichæa to live under him. Beſides this, he gave him Julias ſcituate beyond Jordan, with fourteen Boroughs near adjoyning thereunto.

CHAP. VI.

The acts and geſts of Fœlix, Governour of Judæa.

Alias cap. 16. Fœlix puniſheth the thieves, and Magicians, and other ſeducers of the people.

Eleazar the ſon of Dinæus ſent to Rome.

But the affairs of Judæa grew dayly worſe and worſe. For the Countrey was repleniſhed again with Theeves, and Inchanters, who deceived the common People. Fœlix apprehended many of them dayly, and cauſed them to be executed and put to death. He took Eleazar alſo the Son of Dinæus, who was Captain of thoſe Outlaws and Theeves that ranged in the Countrey, and ſurprized him by a ſubtilty. For Fœlix had given him his word, that he ſhould in no ſort be endangered: whereupon he came and ſubmitted himſelf, and was preſently fettered and ſent to Rome. And for that he had conceived a diſpleaſure againſt Jonathan the High Prieſt, who had divers times admoniſhed him to uſe more circumſpection in the Government of Judæa, for fear he ſhould be blamed by the people, for that he had required Cæſar that Fœlix might be admitted to the Government, he thought it not amiſs to cut off Jonathan, who continually ſollicited and vexed him. For this cauſe, he perſwaded and bribed a certain man called Dora, who was born in Jeruſalem; and was one of thoſe in whom Jonathan repoſed his moſt truſt; to bring in certain Thieves to murther Jonathan, who willingly liſtened to his demands; and deſirous to gratifie the Governour; by this means that enſueth brought that to effect which he had intended. There were certain Thieves that came up to Jeruſalem, under colour to adore God, who carrying their ſwords cloſe hidden under their Garments, accoſted Jonathan and ſlew him. Now for that this murther was let ſlip, and not puniſhed; from that day forward the Thieves reſorted boldly to ſolemn Feaſts, having their weapons hidden under their garments and thronging in among the people, ſlew ſome of thoſe who were their Adverſaries, and otherſome, to pleaſure thoſe who had hired them with ready money to rid them of thoſe they miſ-liked. And theſe outrages committed they not only in other parts of the City, but in the Temple likewiſe, where they ſlaughtered ſome who little ſuſpected that any impiety ſhould be committed in that place. For mine own part, I think that God hath deſtroyed our City in deteſtation of that impiety: and for that he accounted the Temple for an impure manſion place, he hath ſent us the Romans, who have ſet fire on the ſame to purge the City, and make us ſlaves with our wives and children, intending thereby to teach us wiſdom by our own miſeries. Thus was the City filled with theſe Thefts and Murthers. And as touching the Enchanters and Deceivers, they perſwaded the common people to follow them into the Deſart, promiſing them to ſhew them ſigns and miracles done by the power of God: whereunto divers gave ear, and at laſt ſuffered the penalty of their folly. For Fœlix recalling them back again, puniſhed them.

Hegeſippus & Ruffinus, chap. 12. al. chap. 17. A falſe Prophet draweth the Jews to the mount Olivet.

At that ſame time there came a certain man from Egypt to Jeruſalem, who termed himſelf a Prophet, who incited the common people to follow him to the Mount called Olivet, ſcituate not far off from Jeruſalem, and only diſtant ſome five furlongs from thence, telling them from thence that he would make them ſee the Walls of the City fall unto the ground, by which way he promiſed to give them entry. Which being reported to Fœlix, he cauſed his Souldiers to arm themſelves, and departing out of Jeruſalem with great ſtore of Horſe and Foot, he ſet upon them, and ſlew four hundred of them, and took two hundred alive: as for the Egyptian he eſcaped out of the skirmiſh, and no man knew what became of him. The Thieves alſo incited the people anew to make war againſt the Romans, telling them them that they ought not to yeeld them obedience; and they burned and ſpoiled divers of theſe Boroughs which oppoſed themſelves againſt them. It chanced alſo that

A that the Jews which inhabited Cæſarea, mutined againſt the Syrians that were in the ſame City, in that they ſtrove to have an equal authority in the Government of the State as well as they. The Jews pretended the title of Superiority, becauſe that Herod, who was a Jew, had builded the City of Cæſarea: on the other ſide, the Syrians avowed the Jews ſayings to be true; but they replied alſo that Cæſarea was in times paſt called the Tower of Straton, and that at that time there was not one Jew that inhabited the ſame. Which when the Governours of that Countrey heard, they laid hands on the Authors of this Sedition, as well of the one as of the other party, and gave them the baſtinado, pacifying by this means the trouble for a little ſpace. For the Jews once more being puffed up with their riches, and contemning B the Syrians injuriouſly reviled and provoked them: on the other ſide, the Syrians being weaker in ſubſtance, but as great in heart (by reaſon the greateſt number of thoſe that bare Arms with the Romans were Cæſareans and Sebaſtens) at ſome times brake out into opprobrious ſpeeches againſt the Jews, and at length the quarrel grew to that heat, that they caſt ſtones at one another: ſo that on both ſides divers of them were both ſlain and hurt, yet had the Jews the upper-hand. Fælix perceiving that this debate might breed a War, came on between them, requiring the Jews to deſiſt from further violence, and commanding his Souldiers to beat down thoſe who would refuſe to obey him: by which means a great number were ſlain, and divers taken priſoners. Moreover, he gave his Souldiers liberty to ſpoil, and rob divers very rich houſes. The other Jews, who beſides their Authority were renowned for their moderation, fearing leſt the like miſery ſhould befal them, beſought Fælix to ſound C a retreat, and to call in his Souldiers, and to ſpare that which as yet remained, being ſore grieved at that which had happened: to which Fælix condeſcended. At that ſame time King Agrippa gave the Prieſthood to Iſhmael, the ſon of Phabeus. There aroſe alſo a diſſention betwixt the High-prieſts, and the other Prieſts and Governours of Jeruſalem, and each faction walked forth accompanied with a Troop of proud and mutinous perſons, who decided their debates with bitter words, and flinging of ſtones, ſo that no man might pacifie them. For all things were ſo out of order, as if there had been no Magiſtrates in the City, and the impudency and audaciouſneſs of the high-Prieſts permitted ſo much, that they ſent their ſervants to the granges, to ſeize the tenths that were due unto the Prieſts, whereby it came to paſs, that ſome poor Prieſts died of neceſſity and want; ſo much did the violence of the ſeD ditious at that time prevail above all right.

Alias chap. 19. Fœlix accuſed.

AFter that Portius Feſtus had been ſent by Nero to ſucceed Fælix in the Government of Judæa, the chiefeſt of thoſe Jews that inhabited Cæſarea, repaired to Rome to accuſe Fælix: and without all doubt he had been puniſhed for the injuries he had committed againſt the Jews, if Nero had not pardoned him upon his Brother Pallas ſubmiſſion and intreaty, who importuned him, and was at that time in great reputation with him. Furthermore, two of the chiefeſt amongſt the Syrians wrought Berillus, who had E ſometimes been Neros Maſter, and at that time was Secretary of Eſtate in the Greek tongue, by mighty bribes, to beg at Neros hand the revocation of the right and title, which the Jews enjoyed in the Government and Adminiſtration of the Common-weal. For which cauſe Berillus ſollicited the Emperour, and obtained a Letter at his hands, which was the cauſe of thoſe miſchiefs that afterwards hapned in our Nation. For the Jews of Cæſarea, underſtanding what Commiſſion the Syrians had gotten, were ſo much the more kindled and encouraged to make war.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 14.

As ſoon therefore as Feſtus was arrived in Judæa, he found the Countrey grievouſly afflicted with robberies, and the lower Countrey was ſpoiled with ſword and fire. The Theeves likewiſe at that time encreaſed wondrouſly, and they uſed ſhort ſwords after the manner of a F Perſian Cymetre, and crooked like the Roman Faulchion; with which they ſlew divers men. For thruſting themſelves into the preſs of people that came in great multitudes on the Feſtival days to celebrate God's ſervice, they killed thoſe very eaſily whom they liſted: and oftentimes repairing to their enemies Villages, they ſpoiled and burnt the ſame. But Feſtus ſent divers forces both of Horſe and Foot againſt certain Jews, that were ſeduced by an Enchanter, who had promiſed them ſecurity and repoſe from all their troubles and moleſtations, if ſo be they would follow him into the deſart; who ſlew both the deceiver and the deceived that followed him. At that time King Agrippa erected a ſtately building within the Palace at Jeruſalem neer unto the Porch. This Palace in times paſt appertained to the Aſmonians, Asmonians, and was scituate in a high place with a goodly prospect from whence they that listed, might with pleasure behold the whole City of Jerusalem, wherein the King took great delight, and beheld from thence that which was done in the Temple. The chiefest men of Jerusalem seeing this building were sore displeased. For neither doth our Custome or Law permit that any one should look on that which is done in the Temple, and especially forbiddeth that any man should behold the Sacrifices and Oblations. They therefore builded a high Wall upon the Gallery, which was within the Temple on the West-side, which did not only dam up the sight of the Royal-Chamber, but also that of the Gallery without the Temple on the West-side, where the Romans kept Guard near unto the Temple on the Festival days. Herewith was King Agrippa sore displeased, and the Governour Festus far more than he, who commanded them to pull down the Wall. But they besought him that he would give them licence to send their Embassadours to Nero, to this intent, alleadging that it was impossible for them to live, if any part of their Temple should be beaten down. Which being granted them, they sent ten of their chiefest Nobility, and with them Ismael the High Priest, and Chelcias the Treasurer of the Temple unto Nero: who no sooner heard their suit but he pardoned them, not only for that they had done, but he commanded that the building should remain as it was. All which he did in favour of his wife Poppea, who was intreated by the Jews, for that she was a devout Princess, to sue for them. She therefore commanded the ten Embassadours to return, and kept Chelcias and Ismael for pledges with her. The King understanding how all things had past, gave the High Priesthood to Joseph, sirnamed Cabi, which was the Son of Simons who in times past had been High-priest.

The Government of Albinus.

Albinus Governeur of Judea.

Ananus the Son of Ananus high Priest.

Hegesippus, lib. 6. cap. 21.

Ananus had five Sons that succeed him in the Priesthood.

CÆsar being advertised of Festus death, sent Albinus to govern Judæa. But King Agrippa commanded Joseph to lead a private life, and advanced in his stead a certain man called Ananus, the Son of Ananus, who is reported to have been most happy. For he had five Sons, all which supplied the place of the High Priest, after himself had long time before them enjoyed the room: the like whereof hath never happened to any of our Priests. The younger Ananus, who, as we said, was advanced to this place, was a rash and head-strong man, that followed the Sect of the Sadduces, who (as we have already declared) were amongst all other the Iews the most severe in executing justice: whereas therefore Ananus was of this disposition, he thought that he had a fit occasion offered him to do what him listed after Festus death, and during the time that Albinus was as yet upon his way. He therefore ascended and sate down in the Tribunal, assisted by the Iudges, and caused James the Brother of Jesus, who was called Christ, to appear before him, with certain others, and accused them for transgressing the Law, and blasphemy against God, and caused him to be stoned to death. They that were men of upright Conscience within the City, and diligent observers of the Law were very much displeased with this act, and sent secretly unto the King, beseeching him to prohibite Ananus, that hereafter he should commit no such like offence: for that his first action was not allowable. Some of them also went to meet Albinus, being on his way to Alexandria, to enform him that it was not lawful for Ananus to assemble the Councel without his licence. Albinus perswaded by these words, wrote a cholerick letter to Ananus, wherein he threatned to punish him. And for the same cause King Agrippa dispossessed him of the Priesthood, after he had held the same for the space of three moneths, and in his stead he established Jesus the Son of Damnæus. After that Albinus was arrived in Jerusalem, he employed all his care and study to pacifie the Countrey, by executing divers of the Theeves.

But the High Priest Ananias daily increased in honour and credit, and purchased the good will of the Citizens by his liberality and great gifts. But he had certain mischievous servants about him, who conversed with those that were most intemperate and audacious, who repairing from grange to grange, and took up many tents that belonged to the Priests, and beat those that refuse to tender them. The Priests used no less force, than did their servants, having no man that might restrain them: whereby it came to pass that the Priests, who were before-time maintained by the tenth, died at that time for want of victuals. And the Theeves renewing their enrrance into the City by night, during the Feast that was celebrated at that time, took the Secretary of Captain Eleazar alive, who was Ananias Son, who was the High Priest. And having bound him; led him out of the City, sending Ananias word, tha

To the performance whereof, Ananias perſwaded Albinus by manifeſt reaſons; and by obtaining his demand, encreaſed and begat a number of miſeries. For the Thieves uſed all the wily means they could deviſe in apprehending ſome one of Ananias houſe; and when they had taken any one of them alive, they would not deliver him, except before they might have one of their own delivered. So that encreaſing both in courage and number, they waxed more and more inſolent to afflict the Countrey.

The Thieves apprehend Ananias kindred and ſervant.

At that time King Agrippa enlarged the City of Cæſarea, ſirnamed Philippi, and in honour of Nero called it Neronias. He builded alſo to his great charge a Theater in favour B of the Berytians, wherein every year he ſpent divers thouſands of ſilver in ſport. He deſtributed oyl and corn for every one of the people, and garniſhed all the City with moſt antick and goodly counterfeited portraitures upon the porches. Briefly, he well-nigh tranſported into the City all the ornaments of the reſt of the Kingdom; for which cauſe his Subjects began to hate him, ſeeing he deprived them of their rare ornaments to adorn one ſtrange City. Jeſus the ſon of Gamaliel ſucceeded in the Prieſthood, which the King had given him, and taken away from Jeſus the Son of Damnæus: who reſigned him his place againſt his will. Whereupon there aroſe a diſcord between them. For having aſſembled their reſoluteſt followers, they grew from bitter words to fatal blows and ſtones. But amongſt all the reſt, Ananias was the richeſt in wealth, and by his bounty reconciled the more unto him. Coſtobarus alſo and Saul gathered each of them a band of raſcals and deſperate men C Theſe two were of the blood Royal, and by reaſon of their affinity and alliance with Agrippa, they were well beloued. For which cauſe they were outragious and violent, in ſpoyling and raviſhing the fortunes of the weaker ſort. From this time forward the eſtate of our City grew deſperate, encreaſing daily more and more in wickedneſs.

The Berytians receive much kindneſs at Agrippas hands.

Ananias, Coſtobarus, and Saul prepared to ſpoil the weaker.

When Albinus underſtood that Geſſius Florius came to ſucceed him, deſiring that they of Jeruſalem ſhould acknowledg ſome good turn at his hands, he called before him all thoſe priſoners that were notoriouſly guilty of murther, and cauſed them to be executed. As for thoſe that were impriſoned upon any ſmall or ſlight cauſe, upon payment of their fines, he delivered them: and in ſo doing, the priſon was cleanſed of Malefactors, and from that time D the Countrey remained full of Thieves and Robbers.

Hedio & Ruffinus, c. 17. al. 22. Albinus exacteth the haineous malefactors.

The Leviteſ, who were ordained to ſing Hymns unto God, ſollicited the King to aſſemble the Council, and thereby to permit them to wear the linnen Robe, which the Prieſts were accuſtomed to uſe, telling him that ſuch an ordinance would dignifie his eſtate very much, in that he would be always famous in memory of this new eſtabliſhment. This ſuit of theirs was eaſily reſpected and admitted; for the King, after he had conſulted with thoſe who were his aſſiſtants, ſuffered the Levites that ſung the Hymns, to lay aſide their ordinary Robe, and to apparel themſelves in linnen, as beſt liked them. He permitted alſo that another part of the Levites, who intended the ſervice of the Temple, ſhould learn to ſing the Hymns and Pſalms as they had required. All which he did contrary to the ordinances E af the Countrey; which being broken, there was nought elſe to be expected but puniſhment.

Agrippa giveth them of the Tribe of Levi leave to wear the linen Garments.

Agrippa permitteth the Miniſters of the Temple to ſing the ſacred Hymns.

At that time was the building of the Temple finiſhed. And the people perceiving that more than eighteen thouſand workmen ſhould be idle, and deprived of wages, whereupon they were accuſtomed to live in travelling in the building of the Temple: on the other ſide, being loath to reſerve their money through the fear they had of the Romans; to provide for thoſe workmen (in the entertainment of whom they reſolved to imploy their treaſure, for if any one of them travelled but one hour in the day, he was ſuddenly paid his wages) they requeſted the King that it would pleaſe him to repair the Eaſtern-gate on the outward part of the Temple, ſcituate in a deſcent, the walls whereof were in height four hundred F cubits; made of ſquare ſtones of white marble, from the top to the bottom, and every ſtone twenty foot long, and ſix foot thick.

The people of the Jews beſeech the King that it may be lawful for them to repair the porch.

This work was firſt builded by King Solomon, who was the firſt that builded our Temple. But the the King, who whom Claudius Cæſar had given the commiſſion of building the Temple, thinking with himſelf that it was very eaſie to break it down, but very hard to build it up, and that to re-edifie the Porch, it would coſt much time and expence, he denied their requeſt, permitting them nevertheleſs to pave their City with broad ſtone. He took the Prieſthood from Jeſus the Son of Gamaliel, and gave it to Matthias the Son of Theophilus. In whoſe time the War betwixt the Romans and Iews grew to the firſt head.

Pedio & Russinus, chap. 18.

The Succession and number of the High-Priests among the Jews.

There were 83 High Priests in all.

But I think it not amiss, but very answerable to the course of this present History to speak of the Priests, and to shew how they had their beginning, and to whom this honour may be lawfully communicated, and how many they were in number until the end of the War. The first of them was Aaron, Moses Brother, after whose death his Children succeeded him, and from that time forward the honour hath continued with their Successors. For it is a Law observed by our Ancestors, that no man should be admitted to the Priesthood, except he be of Aaron's Posterity: for albeit he were a King, if so be that he were of another line, it was impossible for him to obtain the Priesthood. All the Priests after Aaron, (who as we have said) was the first, until Phanasus, whom the Seditious created Priest in the time of the War, have been in number eighty three, whereof 13 have executed the office from the time that Moses erected God's Tabernacle in the desart until such time as arriving in Iudæa, King Solomon builded a Temple to God. For in the beginning, the High Priesthood continued with the possessors for term of life: but afterwards, although the Priests were yet alive, yet were there other Successours planted in their rooms. These thirteen were of Aarons Posterity, and obtained this degree in succession the one after the other. Their first Government was Aristocratie, which is the Government of the Nobility: afterwards a Monarchy; and finally, a royal Government. The number of years wherein these thirteen flourished, were six hundred and twelve years, from the day that our fathers departed out of Egypt, under the conduct of Moses, until the edification of the Temple that was builded in Ierusalem by King Solomon.

After these thirteen High Priests, there were eighteen others; who after Solomons time succeeded one after another, until the time that Nabuchodonosor King of Babylon, having encamped before the City, took the same and burned the Temple, and transported our Nation into Babylon, and led away the High Priest Josedech prisoner. The time of the Priesthood, and continuance of these eighteen, was four hundred sixty years, six moneths, and ten days: so long as the Jews have had the Royal Government. After the surprizal of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, until such time as Cyrus King of Persia dismissed the Jews, and gave them leave to return from Babylon into their own Countrey, with permission to re-edifie their Temple, there are seventy years; and at that time the Captives being returned, Jesus the Son of Josedech took upon him the High Priesthood, who with those of his posterity to the number of fifteen, have governed in a Democratie, or popular estate, until the time of Antiochus sirnamed Eupator, for the space of four hundred and fourteen years. This Antiochus was the first, who with his General Lysias displaced Onias, sirnamed Menelaus, of his Priesthood; commanding him to be slain at Beryth, and after he had driven his Son out of the Succession, he established Jacim High Priest, who notwithstanding was of Aarons race; but not of his family. For this cause Onias, the Son of Onias, and Nephew to the deceased Onias retired himself into Egypt: where growing familiar with Ptolomey Philometer and Cleopatra his wife, he perswaded them to build a Temple in the confines of Heliopolis, not unlike to that of Jerusalem, and to create a High Priest in the same: of which Temple in Egypt, we have made very oftentimes mention. After that Jacim had held the Priesthood for the space of three years, he died without Successour. For the City remained seven years without a High Priest. Again, the Asmoneans recovered the Government of their Nation, and after they had warred against the Macedons, they established Jonathan High Priest, who exercised the Office seven years: but afterwards he was slain by an Ambush, and treason conspired against him by Tryphon, as we have declared elsewhere. After him, Simon his Brother undertook the Priesthood, who was not long after slain treacherously by his Son-in-law at a Banquet. After him succeeded his Son Hircanus, who enjoying this dignity for the space of thirty one years, died when he was very old, leaving behind him Judas sirnamed Aristobulus, who dying by sickness, left his Brother Alexander his heir, both of the Kingdom and High Priesthood. After that Aristobulus had obtained the Royal Government, he enjoyed both Dignities one whole year. For this Judas sirnamed Aristobulus, was the first that set the Diadem on his head, causing himself to be called a King. The which Alexander did continue; for he also joyned the Kingdom with the High Priesthood, and reigned twenty seven years: and feeling himself draw near to his death, he left in Alexandras his wives hands to dispose of the Priesthood as she pleased. She therefore bestowed it on Hircanus: and as touching the Kingdom, she kept it in her own hands nine years, and afterwards died. Her Son Hircanus was High Priest for so long time: for after Alexandras death, his Brother Aristobulus made war against him: and having overcome him, he took the Kingdom from him, and not only seized the Crown, but the Priesthood. After he had reigned three years, and as many moneths, Pompey repaired to Jerusalem, and took it perforce, and laying hold of Aristobulus, sent him bound unto Rome with his children. After which he restored the Priesthood once more more to Hyrcanus, committing the Government of the Nation unto his hands, forbidding him in the mean ſpace to wear the Diadem. Beſides the firſt nine years, Hyrcanus governed twenty and four, but Barzapharnes and Pacorus Princes of the Parthians paſſed Euphrates, and made War againſt Hyrcanus, and took him alive priſoner, and made Antigonus, Ariſtobulus Son King. But after he had governed three years and three moneths, Soſius and Herod took him alive perforce, and Antonius ſent him to Antioch where he was put to death. After that Herod was created King by the Romans, there was never any High Prieſt created of the Poſterity of the Aſmoneans (for he gave the High Prieſthood to certain men of obſcure and baſe condition, who were of the order of Prieſts) Ariſtobulus only excepted. This Ariſtobulus was Hyrcanus Nephew, who was a priſoner among the Parthians: and having given him the Prieſthood, he married himſelf with Miriamme his Siſter, to the intent to continue himſelf in the good liking of the people, in remembrance of Hyrcanus: but afterwards fearing leſt all of them ſhould turn to Ariſtobulus ſide, he cauſed him to be ſlain, by finding out a means to cauſe him to be ſtifled, at ſuch time as he bathed himſelf in a fiſh-pond near to Jericho, as we have declared before this. After him he beſtowed the Prieſthood no more on any of the line of the Aſmoneans. Archelaus his Son, followed his Fathers ſteps in reſpect of the Prieſthood; and from that time forward the Romans have enjoyed the Sovereignty over Jewry. All they then that have exerciſed the Prieſthood from Herods time, until the day that Titus took the City and the Temple, have been in all twenty and eight. All the continuance of their Government was one hundred and ſeven years. Certain of theſe governed during Herods life, and in the days of Archelaus his Son: but after theſe two were dead, the Government was Ariſtocratical, or of the Nobility, wherein the Prieſts had the Government over the whole Nation. Thus much have we thought meet to ſpeak at this time as touching the High Prieſts.

How Florus, Albinus Succeſſor, offered many injuries to the Jews, which conſtrained them to take to Arms.

Geſſius Florus being ſent by Nero to ſucceed Albinus filled, all Iudæa with many miſchiefs and miſeries. He was a Clazomenian born, and was married to a certain woman called Cleopatra, no leſs miſchievous than himſelf; who being beloved by Poppea Neros Wife, obtained this dignity for him. He behaved himſelf ſo outragiouſly and violently in all his Government, that through the great injuſtice he committed, the Iews praiſed Albinus, as if he had been their benefactor. For he concealed his miſchief, taking care leſt it ſhould wholly be conceited or diſcovered: But Geſſius Florus behaved himſelf in ſuch ſort as if he had been ſent to make open ſhew and ſale of his villanies, publiſhed his injuſtice in the ears of our Nation without omitting either rapine or injuſtice in executing and inflicting puniſhment on the innocent. For he was pitileſs and covetous, and made no difference between Noble and ignoble, and was not aſhamed to be partaker with Thieves, of whom there were divers who made it their profeſſion to ſteal without any fear, in that they were aſſured of their ſafety, becauſe he was partaker with them. And in a word, there was no moderation in him; in ſuch ſort that the poor Jews being unable to endure the inſolent rapines and ſpoiling of their goods that they received by theſe Thieves, were conſtrained to abandon their own houſes, and to flie their Countrey and remained in ſome more commodious place of ſecurity, yea, though it were among ſtrangers. What need I ſpeak any more? he that conſtrained us to raiſe our ſwords againſt the Romans, was Florus, who made this account, that it was better for them to die all at once in great Troops, than to periſh by little and little. In brief, the War began the ſecond year of the Government of Florus in that Province, which was the twelfth year of Neros Empire. But they that deſire to know exactly all that which we have been conſtrained both to do and ſuffer, may peruſe my Books as touching the Wars of the Jews. For which cauſe in this place I will end this antient Hiſtory, after which I have begun to deſcribe the Hiſtory of the War.

Persians and Macedons, and finally under the Romans. All this, as I suppose, I have compiled and gathered together with careful diligence, and I have enforced my self to recite the number of those, who have been High Priests for the space of twou thousand years. I have also collected the Succession of Kings, their actions and Governments, with the power of their Monarchies, according as it is amply described in Holy Scriptures, as also I have promised in the beginning of my History. Furthermore, I dare boldly say, that whatsoever I set down, is so assured, that there is no man, either Iew, or of what Nation soever, yea, although he should have imployed the uttermost of his power, could more exactly communicate the same unto the Greeks, than I have done. For in their confessions and opinions who are of our Nation, I have such knowledg in that which concerneth our Doctrine, as I surpass them all: Aud as touching the Grecian Disciplines, I have studied and learned the tongue, although I cannot boast of the familiar and fit pronounciation of the same, for that I have lived in the Countrey. For amongst us we make but slender reckoning of those, who are exercised in divers tongues, for that this study is accounted prophane by us, and common not only to free persons, but unto slaves; and they only are esteemed to have profited in wisdom who fully know the contents of the Law, and who can expound the Holy Scriptures. For this cause, although divers have travelled in this exercise of writing Histories, yet are there scarcely two or three of them that have written successfully, and have received the fruits of their labours. And it may be that it shall not be mis-thought of, if I freely speak somewhar of my progeny and life, considering that there are men at this day living, who can approve or reprove me in that I set down. And in this place I will make an end of mine antient History, which I have reduced into twenty Books, containing sixty thousand verses. And if God grant me life, I will shortly intreat of our Wars, and the events of the same that have hapned hitherto, which is the thirteenth year of Domitianus Cæsars Empire, and the fifty sixth year of mine age. Moreover, I am resolved to discover in four Books, the divers opinions of the Sects of the Iews, as touching God and his Essence, and our Laws; according to which certain things are permitted us, and other some are forbidden.

The End of the Antiquities of the Jews.

THE LIFE OF
FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS,
The Son of Matthias, Written by himself.

KNow therefore that I am not baſely, but Nobly deſcended, being both on the Fathers and Mothers ſide, derived from the Line of the Prieſts: and foraſmuch as ſome are accuſtomed to draw the ground of their Nobility, the one from this man, the other from that; ſo among our Nation the mark of true Nobility is, to derive a mans Pedigree from the Prieſthood. Touching my ſelf I am not only lineally iſſued from the Prieſts, but I draw my Original from them, who amongſt the four and twenty Ranks or Families of Prieſts may juſtly challenge the ſuperiority. Moreover, by my Mothers ſide I am of the Blood Royal, for the Heirs of the Aſmoneans, from whom ſhe is deſcended, have for a long time exerciſed the Prieſthood and Princely power among our Nation. I will likewiſe make it known, how my Predeceſſours have ſucceeded the one after the other. My great Grandfathers Father was Simon, ſirnamed Pſellus, that is, the ſtutterer, who lived at ſuch time as Hircanus was High Prieſt, the firſt of that name, and the Son of Simon the High Prieſt, was in Office. This Simon Pſellus had nine Sons: the one of theſe was Matthias, ſirnamed Aphilas. This Matthias took to wife the Daughter of the High Prieſt Jonathan, by whom he had one Son, who was Matthias, ſirnamed Curtus, who was born in the firſt year of Hircanus Prieſthood. Matthias begat Joſeph the ninth year of Alexandras Government, and of Joſeph came Matthias the tenth year of the reign of Archelaus; and Matthias, begat me the firſt year of the Empire of Caius Cæſar. I likewiſe have three Sons, mine eldeſt is Hircanus, who was born in the fourth: my next Juſtus, who was born in the ſeventh: and Agrippa my laſt was born in the ninth year of Veſpaſians Empire. This Genealogy of mine do I in this manner propoſe, according as I have found it written in the publick Regiſters, to put them to ſilence who ſhall pretend to reprove or detract the ſame.

Joſephus Linage.

Joſeph the Son of Matthias was born in the firſt year of Caius Cæſars Empire, and the 4001 year of the world, and the 39 after Chriſts birth.

My Father Matthias was not only famous for his expreſs Nobility, but hath alſo been praiſed by reaſon of his juſtice and authority in Jeruſalem, which is the mother City of all the reſt of our Countrey. My bringing up during my tender years was with Matthias, who was my Brother by the ſame Father and Mother; with whom I happily profited in all kind of Science, having a good memory, and a quick apprehending Spirit: ſo that, being as yet a child of fourteen years of age, I was praiſed by all men in regard of the good affection I bare to learning, and the Prieſts and Nobleſt Citizens always aſſembled about me, to receive certain exact inſtructions from me in any thing that concerned our Ordinances. About the age of ſixteen years, my deſire was to have a ſearch and inſight into the Sects of our Nation, which (as I have ſaid) are three: the firſt of the Phariſees, which is the chiefeſt. The ſecond of the Sadduces. And the third of the Eſſeans. For I truly thought with my ſelf, that I might eaſily chooſe the better of the three, at ſuch time as I had been exerciſed and acquainted with them all: for which cauſe with great abſtinence and no leſs labour, I paſſed thorow them all; and not content with this experience, after I had heard that a certain man called Banus lived in the deſart, clothing himſelf with that which the trees brought forth, and feeding on no other kind of meat, but that which they willingly yeelded him, waſhing himſelf oftentimes by day and night in cold water to keep himſelf chaſt, I began to imitate his courſe of live: and after I had lived with him for the ſpace of three years, and ſatisfied my deſires, at laſt I returned into the City.

Joſeph from his infancie very ſtudious, and addicted to learning.

At the age of nineteen years, I began to intermeddle with publike affairs, following the Sect of the Phariſees, which very neerly reſembleth that Sect among the Græcians, who are called Stoicks. After I was ſix and twenty years old, it was my fortune to repair to Rome upon this occaſion that enſueth: During ſuch time as Fælix governed Judæa, there were certain Prieſts my familiars, men of much honour, and more virtue, who upon ſome ſlight were bound and sent to Rome by his commandment, to answer to that which was objected against them in Cæsars presence. Whereupon I being desirous to labour for their liberty, having special intelligence, that notwithstanding the torments wherewith they were martyred, they buried not in forgetfulness that piety which they ought to God, but lived on figs and nuts: for this cause I departed for Rome, and was encountred with many great and grievous hazards by Sea. For the ship, wherein I sailed, was wrack in the midst of the Adriatick Sea, and there was about six hundred of us that swam all night long, and upon the day-spring by God's Providence a Cyrenian ship came in sight, and both I and certain others, to the number of fourscore, out-swimming the rest, were taken up into it and saved. After I had in this sort escaped, I came to Dicæarchia, which the Italians call at this day Puteol, and grew acquainted with Aliturus a Jew born, who was a Player, and in good reputation with Nero; by whose means insinuating my self into Poppeas knowledg, who was Cæsars wife, I determined to beseech her to procure those Priests liberties with all expedition: which done, I by her means recovered their present liberty: and being gratified likewise by her with many great gifts, I returned into my Countrey. There found I the Common-weal too much addicted to factions and troubles, and divers too prone and ready to rebel and forget their Allegeance to the Romans. I inforced my self to repress the seditious, and exhorted them to change their opinions, representing before their eyes the quality of those, against whom they enterprized their War, with whom they might neither compare in experience of War, neither in good Fortune: For this cause I advised them, not to hazard and overthrow their Countrey by their rashness and rage, and with it their Posterities and themselves.

Joseph obtaineth the Priests liberties.

The Jews seditious.

To this effect spake I unto them, and instantly intreated them to forsake their untamed resolution, for that I foresaw that the end of this War would prove to our utter Ruine: but I prevailed nothing with them. For the fury of desperate and dissolute men prevailed above reason: for which cause fearing lest by continual inforcing of one thing, I should grow into hatred and suspicion amongst them, as if I favoured their enemies; fearing likewise lest if they should lay hold on me, they should be put to death, seeing that the Fort of Antonia was already seized upon by the seditious; I retired my self into the inner part of the Temple. In process of time, after Manahem and the chiefest amongst the Thieves were put to death; I came out again from the Temple, and conversed with the Priests, and chiefest Pharisees, who were surprized with great fear. And grievously were we dismayed, when we saw the people in Arms: and being uncertain what to do, and wanting the means to pacifie these mutinies, and apparently perceiving their manifest danger, both I and the Pharisees told them, our opinion was answerable to theirs, and counselled them to contain themselves in peace, and not to provoke the enemy. For our hope was, that Jessius would with all expedition draw out great forces, and chastise those peace-breakers. But as soon as he arrived, and fought with them, he was overcome, and a great number of his men were slain; whereupon grew the utter ruine of our whole Nation. For such as desired the War, were puffed up with that Victory, and conceived an assured hope that in the end they should overcome the Romans. Besides that, this ensuing occasion presented it self: The Inhabitants of the Cities that bordered upon Syria, laid hands on those Jews that dwelt among them, and slew both them, their wives and children, without any just cause or crime committed by them. For they had not conspired any ways, or intended to revolt from the Romans, or to use any hostility, or any secret conspiracy against any of those, with whom they were conversant. But among all the rest, the Citizens of Scythopolis, exceeded all other in impiety and wickedness. For being besieged without by certain of the Jews, they inforced those Jews that inhabited amongst them to take Arms, and charged those of their own Nation (which is both prohibited and unlawful by our Laws) who fighting against them discomfited them: but after this overthrow, they in such sort falsified and forgot their faith, that they had given to their Associates and fellow-Citizens, that they slew every mothers Son of them to the number of many thousands. The like misfortune also fell upon those Jews that inhabited Damasco. But of this we have more amply spoken in those our Books, which we have written of the Wars of the Jews: and at this present I make mention hereof, intending to signifie, and certainly perswade the Readers, that the War which was waged with the Romans, proceeded not of a resolute intent and purpose, but for the most part of inforced necessity.

Joseph dehorteth the Jews from sedition, is suspected by them of treason.

The Jews are plagued both by strangers and their own Countreyman.

The Jews constrained by necessity to make War.

After that Jessius was overcome (as we have heretofore declared) the chiefest men of Jerusalem perceiving that the Thieves made a party among the Seditious, and were strongly and plentifully armed and provided, they began to fear lest if they should be found disarmed, they they ſhould ſuddenly be overthrown by their enemies; as in effect it fell out afterwards, and hearing that all Galilee was not as yet wholly revolted from the Romans; but that a part thereof as yet entertained the peace, they ſent me with two other Prieſts, Joazar and Judas, who were both virtuous and honorable men, to perſwade the mutinous to lay by their arms, and to let them know that it was more behoveful for the good of the Nation, that ſuch men as were in authority and reputation, ſhould have the keeping thereof. The reſolution that was taken by them was, that they had them always ready upon all occaſions, but that they expected untill they were certified, what the Romans intended to do.

With this Commiſſion and ſuch like Inſtructions, I repaired into Galilee: where I found the Sephorites were in no ſmall hazard in reſpect of their Countrey, for that they of Galile had reſolved to forrage the ſame in regard of their league of friendſhip continued with the Romans, and contracted and ratified by Senius Gallus, Governour of Syria. But I delivered them all of that fear, and appeaſed the common people, by permitting them to ſend at all times when they pleaſed, their Hoſtages to Geſſius, who lay at Dora, a City of Phœnicia. I found likewiſe that the Inhabitants of Tiberias were already in Arms, upon this occaſion following: There were in that City three different factions, the one of the Nobiliry, whoſe Chieftain was Julius Capella, and all thoſe that accompanied him, that is to ſay, Herod the ſon of Miarus, Herod the ſon of Gamalus, and Compſus the ſon of Compſus (for Criſpus his Brother, who in times paſt had been Governor for Agrippa, ſirnamed the Great, was amongſt his poſſeſſions on the other ſide of Jordan) all theſe, I ſay, gave counſel at that time to ſubſcribe to the Romans authority, and to obey their King. But Piſtus would no ways accord to this advice, in regard of his Son Juſtus: for naturally he was vain-glorious The ſecond faction was of the common ſort, who concluded upon War. Juſtus, Piſtus Son, who was the ring-leader of the third faction, carried himſelf very doubtfully as touching the War; yet notwithſtanding he ſought and thirſted after innovation, hoping that by a change he ſhould encreaſe his power. "Preſenting himſelf therefore in the midſt of the multitude, he inforced "himſelf to perſwade the common ſort, that their City had always belonged to Galilee, and "that during the days of Herod the Tetrarch, who founded the ſame, it was the chiefeſt City, "whoſe pleaſure it was that the City of Sephoris ſhould yield obedience to that of Tiberias. "Furthermore, he avowed that they had not loſt that pre-eminence in the time of King Agrippa the Father, but had continued the ſame till Felix obtained the Government of Judæa. But for the preſent wherein they had been given by Nero to the younger Agrippa, "they had fallen and loſt their Superiority. For the City of Sephoris obtained the Sovereignty of Galilee, after that ſhe acknowledged the Roman Government, who had abo-"liſhed the Table Royal and publick Regiſters. By theſe words and others of like nature in-"forced againſt King Agrippa, he incited the people to rebellion, ſignifying unto them, that "the opportunity invited them to take arms, to the end that being aſſociated with the Gali-"leans, they might make themſelves Lords, for that all of them would willingly joyn themſelves with them through the hatred they bare the Sephorites, on whom they would re-"venge themſelves with great force, becauſe they continued in their allegeance, which they "promiſed to the Romans.

The Oration of Judas, Piſtus Son to the multitude.

Juſtus incites the people to Rebellion.

And by theſe words he won the peoples hearts unto him: for he was a man that was very eloquent, and by his ſubtilty and politike diſcourſe, eaſily overthrew all that which his adverſaries produced againſt him. For he was not ignorant of thoſe Sciences that are known unto the Greeks: but truſting to his wiſdom and good diſcourſe, he began to diſcover how all things had paſt at that time, to the intent that by ſuch colourable inſinuations he might ſmother the truth. But in the proceſs of our diſcourſe, we will declare that he was a man of a diſſolute life, and that by his and his brothers means, he wanted little of utterly overthrowing his Countrey. When as therefore this Juſtus had perſwaded the Citizens of Tiberias to take Arms, and had conſtrained divers men likewiſe, who were of the contrary opinion to do the like, he iſſued out with them, and burned the villages of the Gadarenians and Hippenians, that are ſcituate in the confines of Tiberias and Scythopolis. In this eſtate was Tiberias: And as touching Giſchala, their eſtate and affairs were brought to this iſſue: John the Son of Levi ſeeing ſome of the Citizens waxen proud by means of their Revolt from the Romans, laboured to reſtrain them, and required them to continue in their Allegeance: but notwithſtanding, all his perſwaſion and diligence he could not contain them. For the Nations round about them, as the Gadarenians, Gabaraganeans and Tyrians aſſembled a great Army, and with the ſame aſſailed Giſchala, and took it by force: and after they had conſumed it by fire, and utterly deſtroyed the ſame, they returned every one to their dwelling places. John being ſore diſpleaſed with this act, armed all thoſe that were with him, ſet upon theſe above-named Nations: and having obtained the victory, he re-edified Giſchala in far better ſort than it was before, incloſing it with a wall, to the intent it might be the better fortified againſt future invaſions.

Gamala faithful to Rome. The danger whereinto Philip, Jacims Son was fallen.

But thoſe of Gamala perſevered in their faith towards the Romans, for the occaſion that enſueth; Philip the Son of Jacim, who governed under King Agrippa, eſcaping beyond all opinion, and flying to the Royal Palace in Jeruſalem at ſuch time as it was beſieged, fell into another great danger; to wit, to be ſlain by Manahim, and thoſe Thieves that were with him: but certain Babylonians his Kinſmen being at that time in Jeruſalem, hindered the Thieves from executing their purpoſe at that time. When as therefore Philip had ſojourned there for the ſpace of four days, on the fifth he fled away, diſguiſing himſelf in a falſe hair, for fear he ſhould be diſcovered. And as ſoon as he was arrived in one of thoſe Villages, which was of his own poſſeſſion, ſcituate neer unto Gamala, he ſent for certain of his Subjects to make their repair unto him. But God would not permit; but for Philips greater good, he croſſed the ſcope of his intent, which otherwiſe had been the ruine of many: for being ſurprized by a ſudden fever, he committed certain Letters of his written to Agrippa and Bernice, who were yet but young, to one of his free-men, commanding him to deliver them to Varus, who was put in truſt by the King and Queen to adminiſter the Affairs of that Kingdom, for that they were gone to Beryth to meet with Geſſius. As ſoon therefore as he had received Philips Letters, and underſtood that he was eſcapt, he took it very harldly, for that he thought it would be ſaid, that the King and Queen had no uſe of him ſince Philip was arrived. He therefore brought him that had the carriage of theſe Letters, into the peoples preſence, objecting againſt him that he had forged that writing, alledging that he falſly lied, in that he reported that Philip was in Jeruſalem, making war with the Jews againſt the Romans: and for that cauſe he commanded him to be executed. Philip being ignorant of the cauſe why his free-man did not return, ſent another with Letters, to the intent he might diſcover what was become of his firſt meſſenger, and for what cauſe he ſtayed ſo long. But Varus accuſing his ſecond Meſſenger alſo very falſly, commanded him to be executed, as he had done the firſt. For the Syrians that inhabit Cæſarea had made him proud, inſomuch that he aſpired to high and great matters, by telling him that Agrippa ſhould be put to death by the Romans, in regard of thoſe faults which the Jews had committed, and that Varus who was Royally deſcended, ſhould poſſeſs his Government. For without queſtion Varus was held to be of the Blood-Royal, for that he derived his Pedigree from the Tetrach Sobemus that governed the Countrey that abutted on Libanus. For theſe cauſes, Varus grew proud, and retained Philips Letters by him, hoping by theſe means that the King ſhould have no knowledg thereof; and he ſet watch in every paſſage, for fear leſt any man ſhould flie, and certifie the King of that which had happened; and to give the Syrians the better content, who dwelt in Cæſarea, he put divers of thoſe Jews that dwelt among them to death. He intended alſo to undertake a War againſt the Jews of Bathanæa, who were called Babylonian Jews, by confederating himſelf with the Trachonites of Barthanæa. For which cauſe, ſending for twelve of thoſe Jews who were of moſt eſtimation amongſt the inhabitants of Cæſarea, he enjoyned them to repair to Ecbatane, to ſignifie unto thoſe of their Nation that dwelt there, that Varus underſtanding that they pretended to take Arms againſt their King and ſcarcely believing it, had ſent them unto them, to perſwade them to lay by their Arms. And that this ſhould be a certain ſign, by which they might perfectly expreſs that he had no reaſon to give credit to their reports who had enforced and objected ſo much againſt them. Furthermore, he commanded them that ſeventy of the chiefeſt of them ſhould be choſen out, to anſwer to thoſe accuſations wherewith they ſhould be charged. Theſe twelve arriving in Ecbatane, and entertained by thoſe of their Nation, found that they neither imagined nor intended any commotion: for which cauſe, they perſwaded them to ſend their ſeventy men: which they did, little ſuſpecting that which would happen.

Varus unjuſtly executeth him that brought the Letters. Varus tyranny in governing the Countrey. Varus ſeeketh to conceal his power and tyranny.

Varus killeth the ſeventy Jews with the Embaſſadors. The Jews retire themſelves into the Fortreſs of Gamala, and thither reſorteth Philip alſo.

As ſoon therefore as theſe with the other twelve Embaſſadors came to Cæſarea, Varus having inkling of their coming, met them on the way with the Kings forces, and ſlew them altogether with the aforeſaid Embaſſadors, & took his way towards the Jews of Ecbatane. But one of the 70 who had eſcaped, reſorted thither with all expedition, preventing Varus, and certified the reſt of that which had hapned. Whereupon, they incontinently fell to arms, and with their wives and children retired themſelves to the Fort of Gamala, abandoning their Villages, which were ſtored with all kind of goods, and many thouſand Cattel. When Philip had tidings hereof, he repaired himſelf alſo to the Fort of Gamala: where he no ſooner arrived,

A arrived, but the people cried out with a loud voice, exhorting him to take the Sovereignty, and to make War againſt Varus, and the Syrians of Cæſarea. For they had intelligence that the King was dead. But Philip moderated their fury, recounting unto them what benefits the King had beſtowed on them, and of what power the Romans were, againſt whom it was but a folly for them to take Arms; and in the end he perſwaded them to peace. The King underſtanding that Varus was determined to kill and murther all the Jews that were in Cæſarea, with their wives and children all in one day, (who were as many in number) he ſent unto him Equus Modius to ſupply his place, as it hath been by us declared in another place. Mean-while Philip kept the fort of Gamala, and the Countrey thereabouts, perſevering in their fidelity and loyalty to the Romans. As ſoon as I arrived in Galilee, and had perceived and learned B all occurrences that had happened; by thoſe who reported the ſame unto me, I preſently ſignified the whole eſtate by my Letters, to the Councel at Jeruſalem, to know what their pleaſure was I ſhould do. Who gave me this anſwer, that I ſhould remain where I was, and retain thoſe Embaſſadors that I had with me, if they thought good to take charge of Galilee. But they being very wealthy, by means of thoſe tenths and tithes that were given them; and very willing, becauſe they were due, to gather them up in right of their Prieſthood, reſolved with themſelves to return to their own houſes. But for that I entreated them to remain with me, until ſuch time as we had ſetled the affairs, they willingly conſented unto me. I therefore departed with them to the City of Sephora, and came into a Borough called Bethmaus diſtant from Tiberias ſome four furlongs, and from thence I ſent a Meſſenger to the Councel of Tiberias, exhorting the chiefeſt among the people, to come and ſpeak with C me: who coming forth to viſit me, accompanied with Juſtus alſo, I told them that I was ſent Embaſſadour unto them, with thoſe other, by the communalty of Jeruſalem, to perſwade them to deface that Building that was erected by Herod the Tetrarch, wherein divers figures of living Creatures were painted; for that our law forbad them to allow, or doe ſuch things, and I exhorted them to ſuffer us to doe that execution as ſoon as they might.

Joſeph by the commandment of the Councel remaineth in Galilee.

Capella and thoſe of his party, did for a long time refuſe to conſent thereunto: but in the end, we enforced them ſo much, that they condeſcended. Now whilſt we debated upon this concluſion, Jeſus the ſon of Saphias (of whom we have ſpoken heretofore, declaring how he was the Chieftain and conductor of the faction of ſailers and poor men) took with him cer- D tain Galileans, and ſet fire on all the Palace, under hope to get great riches thereby (for that there were certain roofs of the houſe covered with gold) who ſpoyled many things againſt our conſent. For after we had conferred with Capella, and the chiefeſt Tiberians, we retired our ſelves from Bethmaus into the higher Galilee. In the mean time Jeſus men ſlew all the Greeks that remained there, and who before the war had been their enemies. Which when I was certified of, I was grievouſly diſpleaſed, and came down to Tiberias, and diſpoſed of the Kings moveables, for fear they ſhould be carried away by the Robbers: and having recovered a candleſtick of Corinthian work, princely tables, and no ſmall quantity of maſſive ſilver: I reſolved with my ſelf to reſerve it to the Kings uſe. E Calling therefore ten of the chiefeſt Senatours, and Capella, Antillus ſon unto me, I delivered the veſſels into their hands, charging them to deliver the ſame to no man, except it were to my ſelf.

From thence, with mine aſſociates, I went to John at Giſchala, to know what his minde and reſolution was, and I preſently ſmelt out by him, that he affected innovation and tyranny. For he beſought me to grant him liberty, to tranſport Cæſars wheat that was ſtored up in the villages of higher Galilee, telling me that he would beſtow the ſame in re-edifying and repairing the walls of his Country. But I ſmelling out both his drift and counſels, denied him that liberty. For I thought that that wheat would either ſerve the Romans, or my ſelf, for that already I had the care of that Countrey committed to my hands by the City of Jeruſalem. When as therefore he could win nothing at my hands, he appealed to my F companions, who were improvident of thoſe troubles that were to come, and greedy of rewards, and obtained at their hands through his laviſh liberality, a liberty to diſpoſe of all the corn that was in the Province, in that I my ſelf was unable to contradict them both. After this, John uſed another ſubtlety: for he ſaid that thoſe Jews, who inhabited Cæſarea Philippi, being by the command of their King, to whom they were ſubject, kept priſoners within their walls; being in want of pure oyle, deſired to buy the ſame at his hands, for fear leſt contrary to their cuſtome, they ſhould be compelled to uſe that of the Greeks. But this ſpake he not in reſpect of Religion, or Devotion, but for his filthy lucres ſake. For knowing that among the Cæſareans, two ſextaries were ſold for a drachme, and that at Giſchalis eighty ſextaries were ſold for four drachmes, he ſent all that Oyl that was in that place unto them, doing it (as he thought) by my permiſſion. But I did not willingly condeſcend thereunto, but for fear leſt I ſhould withſtand the ſame, the people ſhould ſtone me to death. As ſoon therefore as I had given them leave, John gathered a great ſum of money by this cunning ſhift.

Joſeph ſends back his companions to Jeruſalem.
Joſeph Preſident of Galilee.

From this place diſmiſſed I my Companions, and ſent them back to Jeruſalem, imploying my ſelf wholly afterwards in preparing Armour, and fortifying Cities. After this, calling the ſtouteſt Thieves before me, when as I perceived that I might not recover their weapons from them, I perſwaded the multitude to hire them by rewards, telling them that it was more profitable for them to entertain them in their ſervice, than to ſuffer their Countrey to be ſpoiled by their excurſions. And thus having taken their Oaths, did I diſmiſs them under condition, that they ſhould not come into our Region, except they were called, or to receive their due pay, under condition, that they ſhould abſtain from ſpoyling either the Romans, or the inhabitants of the Countrey. But above all things my care was to keep Galilee in peace. And whereas my deſire was to get ſeventy pledges of their loyalty, choſen out amongſt their Nobility under pretext of friendſhip, as ſoon as they came unto me in way of friendſhip, I made them my Companions and fellow-Judges, and decreed many things according to their opinions, having an eſpecial care, leſt through raſhneſs I ſhould injure Juſtice, or through corruption of rewards ſtain mine incorrupted honour. At ſuch time therefore as I was thirty years old, at which years, although a man bridle himſelf from unlawful affections; yet hardly can he eſcape from the poyſoned ſting of detraction, eſpecially, if a great authority be annexed to his green years: I never offered vain and unlawful courting to any woman, neither could any man faſten a bribe on me, in that I pretended want of nothing: yea, refuſed thoſe tenths, which in right of Prieſthood I might have received from thoſe, that brought them me. Yet after the conqueſt of the Syrians, I took part of the ſpoil, which (as I freely confeſs) I ſent to Jeruſalem to my Kinſmen. And whereas at two times I had forcibly overcome the Sephorites, the Tiberians four times, and the Gadarenians once, and had brought John under my ſubjection, who had oftentimes ſought to entrap me; neither could I endure to revenge my ſelf on him, neither on any of the above named people, as in the ſequel of this Story I will make manifeſt.

Joſephs bounty towards his enemies.
The Galileans faith and love towards Joſeph.
John deſireth that he might bathe himſelf in the hot baths of Tiberias.

For which cauſe I ſuppoſe, that God, who is the trier, and ſearcher of all juſt hearts, both delivered me at this time out of the hands of mine enemies, and afterwards, and that many times out of dangerous and ſeveral misfortunes; as hereafter ſhall appear in time and place. But ſo great was the faith and benevolence of the common people of Galilee towards me, that their Cities being overthrown, and their Families led into Captivity, they ſpent not ſo many tears for their own calamities, as they beſtowed cares for my preſervation and ſecurity. Which when John perceived, he began to envy me, and beſought me by his Letters, that I would give him licence for his health ſake, to bathe himſelf in the hot baths of Tiberias: I ſuſpecting no treaſon, willingly granted him that which he demanded. Moreover, I wrote unto thoſe, to whom I had committed the truſt and adminiſtration of the City, to prepare him a lodging, and to furniſh all his companions with victuals, and to provide him alſo of all things neceſſary for his diet and entertainment. In the mean ſpace, I my ſelf paſt my time in a certain Village of Galilee, called Cana. But after that John came to Tiberias, he wrought the Townſmen in ſuch ſort, that forgetting both their faith and duty, they revolted unto him; and many of them lent a willing ear unto his entreaties, eſpecially ſuch as rejoyced in innovations were too prone to change, and greedy of diſſenſion: but in eſpecial, Juſtus, and his Father Piſtus, willingly entertained this occaſion to revolt from my obedience, and to ſubmit themſelves to John; yet was this conſpiracy of theirs prevented by my ſpeedy acceſs. For a certain Meſſenger came unto me from Silas, whom I had in former time preferred to the Government of Tiberias, who certified me of the Citizens intent, and exhorted me in all haſte to make my repair thither, for that otherwiſe, the City would ſhortly fall into another mans hands. As ſoon therefore as I had peruſed Silas letters, I travelled all night long with two hundred choſen men; and ſending a meſſenger before me, who might ſignifie my approach unto the Citizens, I neither loſt time nor way: and in the morning when I drew neer unto the City, the whole people came out to meet me, and amongſt the reſt, John; who after he had beheld me, and ſaluted me with a ſuſpicious countenance, fearing leſt his treaſon being diſcovered, he ſhould grow in danger of his life, ſpeedily retired himſelf into his lodging. And when as I drew near the City within a furlong, diſmiſſing all my Guard but one, and retaining only ten armed Souldiers with me, I began to expoſtulate with the Tiberians from a certain high place, from whence I might be heard, and councelled them

that

A that they would not revolt, leſt in ſo doing they might ſhortly repent them of their mutability, and breach of faith : for that no man hereafter would give them credit, being already either ſuſpected, or guilty of this their perfidiouſneſs.

Scarcely had I ſpoken this, but that I heard one of my attendants, who perſwaded me to deſcend, telling me that this was no time now to reconcile the Tiberians, or to perſwade them, but rather to ſeek for mine own ſecurity, and how I might eſcape mine enemies. For after that John had learned that I was deſtitute of followers, he ſent a thouſand of his choſen Souldiers, commanding them to kill me; who were at hand, and ready to commit the murther, had I not ſpeedily leapt down with my ſervant Jacob, and being relieved by Herod the Tiberian, had been brought to the lake; where finding a Bark by chance, and putting forth
B to Sea, I eſcaped contrary to mine enemies expectation, and came to Taricheas.

John ſeeketh to betray and murther Joſeph.

As ſoon as the inhabitants of that City underſtood how perfidiouſly and traiterouſly the Tiberians had dealt with me, they were ſore diſpleaſed, and betaking themſelves to their weapons, perſwaded me to lead them forth againſt them, telling me that they would revenge the injury that was offered unto their Governour, and they blazed this treaſon of theirs thorow all Galilee. For which cauſe a number of armed Galileans came unto me, requeſting me that I would invade Tiberias, and entering it, that I would ſpoil the ſame; and in the ruines thereof, that I would ſell the inhabitants with their whole Families under the Sphear. The like did my friends, who eſcaped with me out of the City, perſwade me. But I in no ſort would admit their ſuit, ſuppoſing it to be a matter unworthy my diſcretion, to re-
C vive a cauſe of Civil War, imagining with my ſelf, that ſuch a contention ought to proceed no further than words : yea, I proteſted unto them, that ſuch revenge would be prejudicial to themſelves alſo, if the Romans ſtanding at gaze, they ſhould ſpend themſelves in civil diſcords. By this means at length the Galileans wrath was appeaſed.

The Galileans require that they may invade Tiberias.

But when John perceived that he failed of his purpoſe, he began to fear : for which cauſe, taking with him thoſe armed men that he kept about him, and forſaking Tiberias, he repaired to Giſchala, and from thence he wrote his Letters unto me, excuſing the fact, as if he had been no ways guilty thereof, and beſought me, that I would in no ſort ſuſpect him, and confirmed his words with execrable Oaths, whereby he might win the more credit to his writing. But the Galileans, who were gathered in great multitudes from all parts of the Regi-
D on, knowing that he was a wicked and perfidious man, beſought me that I would lead them forth againſt him, promiſing me to overthrow both him, Giſchala, and all his Countrey. Therefore, after I had given them thanks for their love towards me, I promiſed them that mine offices of love ſhould be anſwerable to their kindneſs. Yet beſought I them to reſtrain themſelves, and to grant me pardon, for that I thought it better to appeaſe, than procure troubles.

John excuſeth himſelf to Joſeph.

This requeſt of mine the Galileans granted: Whereupon we preſently came to Sephoris. But the Townſmen, who were reſolved to continue faithful towards the Roman people, fearing my approach, endeavoring themſelves to diſtract me with ſome other affairs, whereby they might live in more ſecurity. Whereupon, ſending their Meſſenger to Jeſus the Cap-E tain of the Thieves, that kept upon the confines of Ptolemais, they promiſed him a great ſum of Money, if with his Army of eight hundred men, who lived under his command, he would wage War with us. He allured by their promiſes, bethought himſelf to aſſail us ſuddenly and unawares : for which cauſe he beſought me by a Meſſenger, that I would grant him leave and liberty to come and ſalute me : which when he had obtained, for that I was wholly ignorant of his Treaſon, taking with him a Troop of his Thieves, he haſted ſpeedily towards me: yet failed he of his purpoſed Treaſon; for when he was not far off from me, a certain fugitive of his Troop diſcovered his intent towards me. Which when I heard, I went out into the Market-place, faining that I knew nothing of his ſecret fraud, attended with a multitude of armed Galileans, and among theſe with certain Tiberians.

Afterwards, ſending abroad certain ſpies, who ſhould ſcour the High-ways, I command-
F ed the Keepers of the Gates, that they ſhould only ſuffer Jeſus to enter with the formoſt of his Company, & exclude the reſt: and if they ſhould attempt to break in by force, they ſhould beat them off. Who fulfilling that which was commanded them, Jeſus entered with a few : and being willed by me preſently to lay down his Weapons, except he deſired to be ſlain; he, ſeeing himſelf invironed with armed Souldiers, obeyed. Whereupon they that followed him, and were excluded, perceiving that their Captain was apprehended, ſuddenly betook them to flight; & leading Jeſus apart, I told him I was not ignorant of thoſe treaſons which he intended againſt me, neither by whoſe provocations he attempted the ſame. Yet told I him that that I would pardon him, if so be by changing his manners, he would be faithful unto me hereafter. Who promising me all that which I requested, I dismissed the man, and gave him leave to depart with his Weapons: yet threatned I to punish the Sepphorites, except hereafter they desisted from their Treasons. About the same time there came two Noblemen unto me, who were subject to the King of Trachonites, bringing with them both Horsmen, Armour and money: whom when the Jews would have constrained to be circumcised, if so be they would remain amongst them, I would not permit them to be troublesome to the Trachonites, alledging that every man ought according to his own mind, and not by other mens impulsion serve God: and that it was not to be suffered, that they, who for their security sake were fled unto us, should repent themselves of their trust they put in us. And thus having perswaded the multitude, I freely and abundantly furnished these men with all things necessary.

Josephs care of Religion.

In the mean space, Agrippa sent out his forces under the conduct of Equus Modius, to take the Castle Magdala by force, which for that they durst not assault, they beset the ways, and the rather troubled Gamala. But Ebutius Decadarcus who had the Government of the great Champain, hearing that I was come to a certain Village called Simonias, scituate on the confines of Galilee, and distant from the same some sixty furlongs, took with him by night one hundred Horse that attended him, and about two hundred Footmen, with certain inhabitants of the City of Gaba their Associates, whom he conducted by night, and assailed and beset the Borough where I was. Against whom after I had drawn forth a valiant Band of men, Ebutius labored all that he might, to toul us into the Champain, for that he trusted very much in his Horsmen: but he easily perceived that we might not be won. For knowing the advantage which the Horsmen had, if we should encounter them in the plain, considering that we were but Footmen, I resolved to fight in the place where we were, and Ebutius charged us for a while very valiantly. At length perceiving that he had no use of his Horsmen in that place, he sounded the retreat, and departed back again with lost labour to Gaba, having only lost three men in the Battel. But I presently pursued him with two thousand armed men: and when I came to Besara, which is scituate on the confines of Ptolemais, distant some twenty furlongs from Gaba, where Ebutius encamped at that time; and besetting all the passages with Corps of guard, whereby we might be more secure from the excursions of our enemies until we had carried out the wheat, whereof there was a great quantity stored up in that place, which was gathered out of the Townships thereabout, belonging to Queen Bernice, and loading divers Camels and Asses, which to that end I had brought with me; I sent the same Corn into Galilee. And having finished this business, I offered Ebutius the Battel: and whereas he detracted the same, being terrified by our boldness, I took my course to encounter with Noepolitanus, who (as it was reported) was in the Territory of the Tiberians, and forraged there. Now this Noepolitanus was a Captain of Horsmen, and had undertaken to defend Scythopolis against their enemies: Having therefore driven him from doing any wrong in the Countrey belonging to the Tyberians, I provided for the security of Galilee.

But John the Son of Levi, (who as we said) lived at Gischala, after he heard that all things fell out fortunately with me, and that I was loved of my Subjects, and feared by mine enemies, was sore aggrieved thereat: and supposing his own fortune was embased by my felicity, and being touched with no small envy, and in greater hope that he should hinder my good success, if so be that he could bring me in hatred with my Subjects; he solicited those of Tiberias and Sephoris to forsake me, and supposed also that the Gabarenians would revolt unto him, which Cities are the chiefest in Galilee. For he told them that under his conduct the Common-weal should be more discreetly governed: but among the rest, the Sephorites gave least ear unto him, for that neglecting us both, they only held for the Romans.

John maligneth Josephs good success.

As for the Tiberians, they would not consent to rebel: yet notwithstanding they promised him some friendship. But the Gabarenians wholly addicted themselves to John, by the means of one Simon, a principal Citizen, who was Johns fellow and friend. Yet did they not openly seem to allow him, for that they vehemently feared the Galileans, whose good will towards me they were long time assured of, but privily they sought another means to entrap me. And truely I fell into great danger upon this occasion. For when as certain Debarittenians (being audacious young men) had intelligence that Ptolomeis wife, the Kings steward, under the conduct of certain Horsmen should in great pomp travel along the great Plain, out of the Kings Countrey into the Roman Government, they suddenly set upon them, and putting the woman to flight, they spoiled all that which she carried with her. Which done, they they drave to Taricheas, a place where I then kept, certain Mules loden with apparel, and houſhold-ſtuff of divers ſorts: among which there were divers ſilver Veſſels; and five hundred pieces of gold. Intending therefore to reſerve theſe things for Ptolomey, as being one of the ſame Tribe, in that our Law permitteth not to defraud, no not our enemies, if they be of the ſame Tribe;; I told thoſe that brought the goods thither, that they muſt be kept to be ſold, to the end that the price of the goods might be beſtowed upon the building of the wals of Jeruſalem. This motion of mine, the young men interpreted very hardly, in that they were cut off from the part of the prey which they hoped for. For which cauſe, diſperſing themſelves in the ſtreets of Tiberias, they ſpread a rumor, that I would betray the Countrey to the Romans, alleadging that I only feigned that the prey was deſtinated towards the repairing the wals of Jeruſalem: wherewas the truth was, that I kept the ſame to the intent I might reſtore it to the owner. In which matter they were no whit deceived in their opinion. For after the departure of the young men, I called unto me two chief Citizens, Daſſian and Jannæus the Sons of Levi, intire friends to the King, and commanded them, that taking the houſhold-ſtuff with them, they ſhould convey it unto the King, threatning them with death, if they revealed this ſecret to any man.

Joſeph labour-eth to reſtore Ptolomey to his goods.

But when as the rumor was ſpread thorow Galilee, that I would betray the Region into the hands of the Romans, and all of them being grievouſly bent and intent againſt me to puniſh me; they of Taricheas alſo giving credit to the young mens fained ſpeeches, perſwading my Guard and the reſt of the Souldiers, that forſaking me whilſt I was aſleep, they ſhould come into the Horſe-race; and conſult with other in that place how to degrade me, and give the honour unto another. They being perſwaded, came to the appointed place, where they found many others there arrived: and all of them cried out with one conſent, that it was meet to take puniſhment on a Traytor, who hath ſought the deſtruction of the Common-weal. But he that moſt of all incited them to theſe troubles, was Jeſus the Son of Saphias, who at that time had the Magiſtracie of Tiberias in his hands, a man given over to all wickedneſs, and born to breed troubles, and ſtir up ſedition.

Sedition againſt Joſeph. Jeſus the Son Saphias, conſpireth againſt Joſeph.

This man, bearing Moſes Tables in his hands, and coming out into the midſt of the Aſſembly, ſpake thus with a loud voice: If (ſaid he) you be touched with no care of your ſelves, yet, at the leaſtwiſe contemn not theſe Sacred Laws, which thit your Chieftain Joſeph, a man worthy to be hated by all men, hath of long time dared to betray, and for that cauſe is worthy of extreme puniſhment.

After he had thus ſpoken, and was applauded by the acclamations of the people, he leading the armed men with him, haſtily repaired to the houſe where I kept, with a certain intent and purpoſe to put me to death. Meanwhile, I ſuſpecting nothing of all this Tumult, and tired with labour and wearineſs, took my reſt; when as ſuddenly Simon one of my Guard, who at that time only remained with me, ſeeing the incurſion of the people, came and awakened me: and certifying me of mine inſtant peril, he gave me counſel likewiſe, that rather, like a noble and undaunted Chieftain, I ſhould ſhorten mine own life, than ſhamefully die by mine Enemies direction. Whileſt he gave me this counſel, I committing my ſafety to God's hands, and changing my garments, went forth into the Aſſembly after a mournful manner, and wearing my ſword hanging about my neck, ſtealing by that way, by which I knew that none of mine adverſaries might meet me: and coming into the Horſe-race, I offered my ſelf to every mans eye, and lying proſtrate on my face, and watering the earth with my tears, I moved all men that beheld me to compaſſion. And when I perceived that the affections of the people were changed, I laboured all that I might, to divide them in opinions, before the armed Souldiers returned from my houſe: and confeſſing my ſelf that I was not wholly clear of that which was objected againſt me, I beſought them to underſtand to what uſe I reſerved that prey that was brought to my hand; after which, if they liſt they might kill me. And whileſt the multitude commanded me to ſpeak, the Armed men returned back, and beholding me, ruſhed in upon me with an intent to murther me: but being reſtrained by the peoples exclamations, they moderated their fury; ſuppoſing that after my confeſſion of treaſon, and reſervation of the Kings money, they might have a better occaſion to finiſh my Tragedy.

Joſeph moves the people to compaſſion.

For which cauſe, after ſilence, I began thus: Men and Brethren (ſaid I) if in your opinion I deſerve death, I refuſe not to die: yet before my death will I certifie you of the whole truth; truly, when as I perceived that this City was moſt commodious and fit to entertain ſtrangers, and that I perceived that many men, forſaking their own Countries; were delighted with your converſations, and willing to partake with you in all ſorts of fortune: I was reſolved to build up your walls with this mony, for which being thus deſtinated to do you good:

your indignation is provoked againſt me. Upon theſe words, the Taricheans and ſtrangers G cried out, giving me thanks, and willing me to be of good courage. But the Galileans and Tiberians continued in their hatred, inſomuch as they grew to debate betwixt themſelves, the one threatning me with puniſhment; the other contrariwiſe, willing me to aſſure my ſelf of ſecurity. But after I had promiſed the Tiberians that I would re-edifie their walls, and fortifie other convenient Cities, they giving credit to my words, repaired every one of them to their own houſes. And I beyond all expectation eſcaping from ſo great a peril, with certain of my friends, and ſome twenty Souldiers, returned to my houſe.

But once again the Thieves and Authors of ſedition, fearing leſt they ſhould be puniſhed for theſe their offences, begirt my lodging with ſix hundred armed Men, intending to conſume it with fire. Of whoſe arrival, as ſoon as I had intelligence, imagining with my ſelf that H it would be much diſhonour for me to flie, I reſolved to uſe valour and courage againſt them; for which cauſe commanding the gates to be ſhut, I required them from the top of the houſe, that they would ſend in ſome of them unto me, to receive that money, for which they had been drawn into this mutiny: whereby they might have no further cauſe to be incenſed againſt me. Which done, laying hold of one of the moſt troubleſome fellows, that with the reſt came in unto me, I cauſed him to be beaten with many grievous ſtrokes, and his hand to be cut off, and hung about his neck; and thus handled, we thruſt him out of doors to return unto thoſe that had ſent him. But they being wondrouſly afraid herewith, and ſuſpecting the like puniſhment if they ſhould ſtay there any longer, for that they ſuſpected that I had divers armed Souldiers in my houſe, they ſuddenly all of them fled away: and ſo by this ſtra- I tagem eſcaped I the other danger. Yet wanted there not ſome, who incited the people once more againſt me; ſaying, that the Kings ſervants, who were fled unto me for refuge, ought not to live, except they ſubmitted themſelves to their Laws and cuſtoms, from whom they required protection.

They likewiſe accuſed them, that they were of the Roman faction, and priſoners, and preſently the people began to mutiny, being deceived by their words, who laboured to flatter them. Which when I heard of, I once more informed the people, that they ought not to perſecute thoſe who reſorted unto them for reſcous: and I jeaſted at their folly who accuſed them of impoyſoning, and that the Romans would not vainly nouriſh ſo many thouſand of Souldiers, if they pretended to make away their enemies with poyſon. Being by theſe words K ſomwhat pacified, they had ſcarcely withdrawn themſelves a while, but that by certain outcaſts and wicked men, they were incited againſt the Nobility, ſo that with armed weapons they came to the Houſes of the Taricheans, intending to murther them. Which when I heard, I was ſore afraid, that if this wickedneſs ſhould be committed, no man hereafter ſhould dare to truſt his life in my hand. For which cauſe being aſſiſted by divers others, I haſtily reſorted to their lodging, and ſhut up the gates: and cutting a trench betwixt it and the lake, I called for a Bark, and entring into the ſame with them, I croſſed over into the confines of the Hippenians: and furniſhing them with money to buy them Horſes, for that they could not tranſport their own with them in that flight, I diſmiſſed them, requiring them to digeſt their preſent misfortunes with a conſtant mind. For I my ſelf took it very heavily, that I was once more inforced to land thoſe men in the enemies Countrey, who had committed themſelves to my truſt: yet thinking, that if it ſhould ſo fall out, that they ſhould fall into the Romans hands, they ſhould be ſafer, than if by ſuffering them to remain in my Countrey, I ſhould ſee them oppreſt: I adventured them thus. Yet were they ſaved, and the King gave them pardon. And this was the end of this tumult.

But they of Tiberias wrote unto the King, requiring him to ſend a Garriſon into their Countrey, and promiſing him to revolt and follow him. Which done, as ſoon as I came unto them, they required me that I would build them thoſe walls which I had promiſed them: for they had already heard that Taricheas was invironed with walls. Whereunto I condeſcended, and gathering ſtuff from every place, I ſet the workmen to their task. But ſome three M days after, departing from Tiberias toward Taricheas, which was thirty ſtades diſtant from thence; by chance a Troop of Roman Horſmen were diſcovered, not far from the City, which made the inhabitants believe that they were the Kings Army: Whereupon they preſently began to utter many things in honour of the King, and more in my reproach. And preſently a certain friend poſted unto me, and told me what their mind was, and how they intended to revolt from me. Which when I underſtood, I was wonderouſly troubled: For I had ſent back my men of War from Taricheas to their houſes, for that the next day was the Sabbath: for I would by no means, that the Citizens of Taricheas ſhould be charged or troubled troubled with entertaining Souldiers. And at all times, when I remained in that City, I took no care of the guard of mine own perſon, having had often proof of the loyalty of the inhabitants towards me. Being therefore at that time attended only with ſeven Souldiers, and a few of my friends, I knew not what to do. For I thought it not fight to call back my forces, for that the day was well nigh paſt; and although they ſhould have been with me the next morning, yet they might not have taken Arms, becauſe our Laws forbad the ſame, how great ſoever the occaſion be that is offered. And although I ſhould have drawn forth the Taricheans and the ſtrangers that were retired thither, and if under hope of prey, I had led them forth, yet ſaw I that they were too feeble to reſiſt their forces. On the other ſide, I already perceived, that if I ſtayed over long, the Army which was ſent by the King, being already entred the City, would have excluded me: I therefore determined to uſe this ſtratageme: I preſently therefore guarded the gates of the Taricheans with moſt truſty friends, ſuffering no men to paſs out of them; and aſſembling the chiefeſt of every Family, I commanded every one of them to lanch their Boats into the Lake, and to follow me with the Maſters of their ſhips. After which both I and my friend, and ſeven other Souldiers betook us to a Bark, and ſailed toward Tiberias. But when the Tiberians perceived that they had no forces come from the King, and that the whole Lake was covered with Barks; amazed and fearing the ruine of their City, for that they ſuppoſed the Ships to be loaden with Souldiers, they changed their opinion. For which cauſe laying by their Weapons, they themſelves with their wives and children came forth to meet me, entertaining me with happy acclamations: for that they thought I had heard no inkling of their intents, beſeeching me that for the ſafety of their City, I would enter the ſame. But I drawing near the City, commanded the Maſters of the Barks to caſt Anchor far off the ſhore, leſt the Townſmen might perceive that the ſhips were empty: And I my ſelf drawing near with mine own Bark unto them, accuſed them, for that contrary to their Oaths, they had been ſo fooliſhly induced to revolt. Afterwards, I promiſed them aſſured pardon, if ſo be they would deliver me ten of their chiefeſt Nobility: which when they had incontinently performed, I ſhipt them in a Bark, and ſent them priſoners to Taricheas: and by this policie one after another, I at laſt got all the Senate of Tiberias, and many of the chiefeſt Citizens, and carried them thither alſo.

Joſeph in danger for the Tiberians ſake.

Joſeph ſaileth to Tiberias.

At length, the reſt of the multitude, as ſoon as they perceived in how great danger they were, they beſought me that I would puniſh the chief Author of this Conſpiracy, who was called Clytus, a bold and raſh young man. But I that held it a wicked act to kill one of the ſame Tribe, and yet was enforced to puniſh him, commanded Levias one of my Guard to go unto him and cut off his hand: who not daring for that he was alone, to enter into ſo huge a multitude; for fear leſt his cowardiſe ſhould be diſcovered by the Tiberians, I called Clytus unto me, and ſaid unto him:

Clytus the Author of the ſedition in Tiberias.

Sith ungrateful and perfidious man, as thou art, thou deſerveſt to loſe both thy hands, I charge thee to become thine own Executioner, for fear leſt through delay thou procure thy further puniſhment. And whereas with many prayers he beſought me to grant him one of his hands, I hardly condeſcended: at length of his own accord, for fear he ſhould loſe both, he took a knife and cut off his left hand: and thus was this Tumult appeaſed.

As ſoon as I returned to Taricheas, and the Tiberians underſtood what ſtratageme I had uſed with them, they were all amazed, ſeeing how I had puniſhed their ingratitude and diſobedience without any bloodſhed or murther. After I had ſent for ſuch of the people of Tiberias as were in priſon, amongſt whom was Juſtus and his Father Piſtus, I invited them to ſup with me: and during the repaſt, I told them that I was not ignorant, that the Roman Army excelled all men of the world in power and force: notwithſtanding that I kept my ſelf ſilent, in the reſpect of thoſe Thieves that were round about, and I counſelled them that they alſo would do the like in expectation of ſome better days; and yet that in the mean time they would not think amiſs of my Government, becauſe the time afforded them not a more affable and commodious Governour. I admoniſhed Juſtus alſo, that before I came from Jeruſalem the Galileans had cut of his Brothers hands, accuſing him to have forged falſe Letters before the War; and that after Philips departure the Gamelites, being at odds with the Babylonians, ſlew Chares, Philips own Kinſman, and had moderately puniſhed his Brother-in-law Jeſus, who had married his Siſter. After this diſcourſe during ſupper time, I diſmiſt Juſtus and his friends early in the morning, with their freedoms. But before this came to paſs, it hapned that Philip the Son of Jacimus departed from the Fort of Gamala upon this occaſion that enſueth: As ſoon as he underſtood that Varus was revolted from King Agrippa, and that Modius Equus who was his friend, was ſent to ſucceed him, he certified him of his his estate by his Letters: which when he had received, he highly rejoyced at Philips safety, and sent those Letters to the King and Queen, who lived at Berytum. Whereupon the King understanding the false rumour that ran as touching Philip, that he was the chiefetain of the Jews Army, who undertook the war against the Romans, sent certain Horsmen to Philip to bring him to his presence: before whom he no sooner arrived but he embraced him very kindly, and shewed him to the Roman Captains, telling them that that was Philip of whom it was commonly reported, that he was in Rebellion against the Romans. He therefore charged him, that taking with him certain Horsmen, he should post in all diligence to the Fort of Gamala; and drawing his household servants from thence, he should lead and re-establish the Babylonians in Batanæa, and travel to his uttermost power, that the Subject should be continued in obedience and peace. After Philip had received this commandment from the King, he hasted to perform the same.

Agrippa's kindness and humanity towards Philip.

Hedio, Gadara.

But Joseph a certain Drougier or Treacle-seller, gathering together a sort of bold young men, and inciting the Nobility of Gamala, perswaded the people to fall from the King, and that betaking them to their Arms, they should recover their former liberty: and thus drew they other into their opinion, killing those that durst contradict them. Amongst these died Chares and Jesus his Kinsmen, and the Sister of Justus the Tiberian, as we have heretofore declared. After this, they requested me by Letters, that I would send them aid, and certain Labourers to begirt their Town withal. To both which requests of theirs, I easily condescended. About this time the Countrey of Gaulonite, as far as the Borough of Solyma, rebelled against Agrippa. I also inclosed Seleucia and Sogon, which were two strong places unaccessable, and fortified by nature, with walls I did the like also by Jemnia, Ameritha, and Charabe, a Borough of higher Galilee, although they were scituated among the Rocks. I fortified in like sort Taricheas also and Tiberias, and Sephoris, Cities of Galilee; and the Borough of the cave of the Arbalians, Bersobe, Selamen, Jotapa, Capharath, Comosogona, Nepapha, and the mountain Itabyrium. In those places hoorded I up great store of Corn, and laid up store of Armour and Munition for Defence.

Joseph stirred up a sedition in Gamala.

Many Jews revolt from the Romans.

Mean-while, John the Son of Levi, increased his hatred dayly more and more towards me, being greatly aggrieved to see my fortunes happy, and the success answerable: and whereas he was wholly resolved to rid me of my life, after he had encompassed his Countrey Giscala with wals, he sendeth Simon his brother with one hundred Souldiers to Jerusalem, to Simon the Son of Gamaliel, requiring him to labour the matter in such sort with the City, that my Authority might be disannulled, and that John by the common consent of all might be ordained Governour over the affairs of Galilee. This Simon was born in Jerusalem, noble in birth, and in Sect a Pharisee (which Sect of all other seemed most exactly instructed in the Laws of our Countrey) a man of excellent wisdom, who by his counsel was able to repair the decaying ruines of his Countrey who of long time had made use of Johns friendship, because he was at that time mine enemy.

John laboureth to supplant Joseph in his Government.

This man, solicited by the intercession of his friends, perswaded the High Priest Ananus, and Jesus the son of Gamala, and other of his line and faction, to cut off my increasing honours, and not to permit me to attain the fulness and content thereof. For it should be very profitable for them also, if I were removed from the Government of Galilee, Further, he told Ananus and the rest, that they were not to delay the matter, lest upon the discovery of their counsel I should invade the City with mine Army. Thus spake Simon: yet Ananus the High Priest replied, that it might not easily be done, for that divers Priests and Governors of the people bare witness for me, that I behaved my self honestly in that Government, and that it was ill done to intend an accusation against a man, who might not be touched with any misdemeanour. When Simon had heard what Ananus had said, he besought him and the rest also to speak nothing thereof; neither to make his motion known, certifying them that he had providently provided, that I should be speedily driven out of Galilee: And calling unto him his brother John, he charged him to send presents to Ananus. For (said he) in so doing they would work so much with him, that they would make him change his opinion. In the end, Simon obtained that which he long time sought after. For Ananus and his adherents were corrupted with Money, and accorded to cast me from the Government of Galilee, without the consent or allowance of any other of the Citizens. For which cause they thought good to send certain Noble men in birth, and no ways inferiour to one another in Learning, whereof two of them were of the common sort, and Pharisees; the one called Jonathas, the other Ananias; the third was Jozarus of the Tribe of Levi, who was also a Pharisee, and of the race of the Priests. But Simon was of the order of the Priests, and the youngest of of them all. These did they command, that calling together a Councel of the Galileans, they should demand why they loved me so well; commanding them, that if they answered that I was a Galilean, they should likewise say that Jerusalem was their country. But if they allowed me the knowledg of the Law, they were likewise willed to say, that they knew their country cultomes, or if in regard of the name of Priesthood, they should say they loved me, they should likewise averre that two of them were Priests. Being thus instructed, and receiving fourty thousand silver drachmes of the publick treasure, for their fellow and consort Jonathan, they set forwards.

Embassadours with souldiers sent to Joseph.

And for that at the very same time a certain man called Jesus of Galilee, was come to Jerusalem with a band of six hundred souldiers, they sent for him and hired him, and gave him three moneths pay, commanding him to follow Jonathan and his companions; and to do that which they should command them: and to these annexed they three hundred Citizens, whom they hired with reward. With this preparation the Legates set forward, being accompanied with Simon, Johns brother, who had one hundred souldiers with him, who had commission from those that sent them, that if I willingly gave over arms, they should send me alive to Jerusalem: and if I resisted, by their authority they might lawfully kill me. They had letters also directed to John, which incited him to make War against me. Moreover, they charged the Sephorites, Gabarites, and Tiberians, to maintain John against me. After that I had intelligence hereof, by my fathers letters, who had intelligence thereof by Jesus the son of Gamala, one of those who were present at the deliberation, and who intirely and familiarly loved me; I was much grieved, seeing with how much ingratitude my country-men requited me; who of malice had decreed upon my death: and for that my father invited me by most affectionate letters to draw my self homeward, telling me how much he desired to see me, who was his son, before he left this life; I imparted these things to my friends, and certified them, that within three days I would forsake their country, and retire my self into mine own. Whereupon they were altogether surprised with great sadness, and besought me with weeping tears, that I would not forsake them, for that they should be utterly overthrown, if so be they were left destitute of my conduct. But whereas by no means they might perswade me, and the care of mine own security prevailed very much with me; the Galileans fearing lest I should leave them, and by that means the thieves should be encouraged to set upon them, they sent messengers thorow all Galilee, to signifie unto them the resolution of my departure. Whereupon divers of them being made privie to these news, resorted unto me from all parts, bringing with them their wives and children; not so much, as I suppose, for the sorrow they conceived at my departure, as the fear that they had of their own estates: For they perswaded themselves, that if I remained among them, there could no mischief befal them. They assembled therefore in a great Plain, called Asochim, where I remained.

Josephs father signifieth all these news unto him.

Joseph resolveth to return home.

That night in my sleep I had a wonderful dream. For lying in my bed, and being wholly disconsolate and troubled with the news I had received, me thought that a certain man from above spake unto me after this manner: Pacifie thou the passions of thy spirit, and be thou free from all fear. For that which discomforteth thee, shall be that which shall make thee great, and happy beyond thine expectation. For not only these things shall turn to a fortunate end or issue, but also many other. Be not thou therefore dismaied, but remember thy self that thou art reserved to make War against the Romanes. After I had this dream, I awaked; and so prepared as I was, went I down into the Plain: and as soon as I came thither, all the people of Galilee, with their wives and children, humbling themselves upon the earth and weeping, besought me that I would not leave them for a prey to their enemies: neither that I would abandon their country to serve for a prey and mockery to their adversaries. But seeing that I made small reckoning of their prayers, they constrained me by oath to remain amongst them, and uttered divers injurious outrages against the people of Jerusalem, that envied them the peace and happiness which they enjoyed.

Josephs admirable dream.

A number of Galileans besought Joseph that he would not forsake them.

After I had heard these words, and seen the desolation of the people, my heart was broken with compassion, and I resolved my self that in respect of so great a multitude, my life could not be better hazarded than for their contentment. I therefore gave my consent to remain with them. I gave order that five thousand of the best souldiers, with their provision, should attend me: as for the rest, I sent them back every one to his own house. When these five thousand presented themselves, I annexed them to the other three thousand that I had with me, and drew out with them fourscore horsemen, and marched on towards Chabalon.

a borough upon the marches of Ptolemais, where I undertook to prepare them for the battel, expecting ſome aſſault from Placidus, who was come with two companies of footmen and one of horſemen, ſent by Ceſtius Gallus to burn the Country-towns Galilee, and other little Boroughs that bordered on Ptolemais. And for that he was entrenched before the city of Ptolemais, I encamped mine army likewiſe not far from the borough Chabalon, ſome ſixty ſtades off: and divers times drew I out my forces to bid him battel, but never would he offer any thing but skirmiſhes. For Placidus, perceiving my forwardneſs to fight, was abaſhed thereat, and retired himſelf: yet departed he not from Ptolemais.

Placidus againſt Joſeph.

About that time came Jonathan with the other Embaſſadors, who (as we have heretofore declared) were ſent by Simon, and the high Prieſt Ananus, who laboured to entrap me by policy, for that they durſt not aſſail me in open field. They therefore wrote a letter unto me to this effect: Jonathan and the Embaſſadors with him, who are ſent by thoſe of Jeruſalem to Ioſeph, Greeting. "We are certified by the chiefeſt men of Jeruſalem, that Iohn of "Giſchala hath oftentimes ſought to betray you: for which cauſe we are ſent to repreſs his "malice, and to exhort him hereafter to ſubmit himſelf unto you: and being deſirous to confer "with you, as touching that which concerneth the publick profit, we pray you to reſort unto "us as ſoon as you can, with ſome few attendants, becauſe the borough is not able to entertain "many. To this effect wrote they unto me, hoping that one of theſe two effects ſhould fall out: either that I comming diſarmed, ſhould be eaſily ſurpriſed by them; or that bringing with me a great company, I ſhould be condemned for an enemy to my country. The meſſenger that brought me this letter was a valiant young man, mounted on horſe-back, who had in times paſt born arms for the King. The time wherein he came unto me, was two hours within night, and even then was I banqueting with my friends, and the chiefeſt Governours of Galilee. After that one of my houſhold ſervants had certified me, that a certain Jew on horſback came to ſpeak with me, I commanded he ſhould be brought in; who embracing me but coldly, and delivering me the letter, ſaid unto me: They that are come from Jeruſalem, ſend you this letter; give them a ſpeedy anſwer: For I am commanded to make a ſpeedy return. They that ſate at the table with me, were amazed at the ſouldiers boldneſs. But for my ſelf, I willed him to ſit down, and to make merry with me: but he refuſing the ſame, I kept the letter in my hand in ſuch manner, as I had received the ſame, and began to talk with my friends of other affairs: and not long after riſing from ſupper, and diſmiſſing the reſt to their reſt, I only retained with me ſome of my moſt inward friends, and commanding my page to fill me wine, I opened the letters before any man perceived the ſame: and conceiting incontinently what they meant, I ſealed them anew, and as if I had known nothing of the contents, having the letter in my hands, I gave order that the ſouldier ſhould receive twenty drachmes for to bear the charges of his voyage. He having received the ſame, and giving me thanks, I perceived well that he was addicted to gain, and might eaſily be wrought with money. Whereupon I ſaid unto him, if thou wilt drink with me, thou ſhalt have a drachme for every glaſs thou drinkeſt. To this the ſouldier liſtned willingly, and having drunk good ſtore of wine, to get him the greater ſtore of money, he grew drunken; ſo that he was unable any longer to conceal his ſecrets: but of his own accord he declared the treaſon that was prepared, and how the ſentence of death was given by them againſt me. Which when I underſtood; I anſwered them to this effect: Ioſeph to Ionathan, and thoſe that accompany him, Health. "I am very glad to hear that you are arrived in Galilee in good health, eſpecially for that I may now deliver into your hands the government of the affairs thereof, to the "end (according as I have long time deſired) I might return into my country. I will not only "therefore viſit you at Xallon: but in any further place alſo, notwithſtanding you had never ſent for me. Notwithſtanding pardon me, though I come not at this preſent: for I am "now at Chabalon to confront Placidus, who pretendeth to invade Galilee. Reſort you therefore unto me, who ſhall read my letters. Farewel.

Jonathans letter to Joſeph.

A horſeman brought the letters.

Joſephs policy. Joſephs anſwer to Jonathan.

After I had written this anſwer, and delivered it to the ſouldier to carry it unto them, I ſent by the ſame way thirty of my moſt approved friends of Galilee, commanding them to ſalute them that were come, without any further ſpeech. I aſſigned alſo to each of theſe, one of my moſt reſolute and beſt ſouldiers, to take heed leſt any of thoſe I ſent ſhould confer with Ionathans men. They therefore ſet forward on their way: and Ionathan and the other ſeeing their firſt purpoſe failed them, they ſent me another letter after this tenour which enſueth: Ionathan and his company to Ioſeph, Health: We command you that within three daies, you make your appearanc before us, without any of your ſouldiers, in the borough of Gadara, Jonathans meſſage and letter to Joſeph.

Gadara; to the end you may answer to that which Iohn hath objected against you. As soon as they had written this, and saluted those whom I had sent, they went to Japha, which is the greatest town of Galilee, defenced with strong walls, and peopled with many Inhabitants. Against these the people of that City, their wives and children came forth, exclaiming against them with huge cries, charging them to return back, and not to deprive them of the good Governour they had. Ionathan and his companions were provoked with these cries; yet durst they not make any open shew of their displeasure, but without returning them any answer they resorted to other Cities, where they met with no less effectual exclaims from the multitude, protesting with a loud voice, that no man should be able to dissuade them from continuing Ioseph in authority in their government. Whereupon Ionathan with his followers marched forth without any further speech, and came to Sephoris, the greatest City of Galilee. But the Inhabitants thereof being addicted to the Romans, came forth to them: but for my part they neither praised nor blamed me. Departing from Sephoris, they came to Asochim, where the citizens sung the same song, that the Japheans did. Whereupon they being unable to contain their displeasures, commanded their souldiers to beat them with their truncheons, who exclaimed against them, and claimed me for their Governour. And when they drew near to Gabara, Iohn came out to meet them, accompanied with 3000 souldiers: and I having intelligence by their letters, that they were resolved to make war against me, departed from Chabalon, accompanied with 3000. souldiers; and having committed the camp to the charge of my trustiest friend, I went to Jotapata, because I would be within four stades of them, and sent them this letter: If your will be that I must needs come unto you, there are in Galilee two hundred and four Cities and Boroughs, I will meet you in any one of them, which you please, except Gabara or Gischala: for that the one is the place of Johns nativity, and the other is his associates and friends.

The Embassadors of Jerusalem coldly entertained in Galilee.

Joseph writeth again to them.

As soon as Ionathan had received this answer, he replied not any more, but sought the means to entrap me. John was of the opinion to write unto all the cities and boroughs of Galilee, supposing that without question there were one or two in them that were mine enemies, whom they might incense against me, as against their common enemy. He gave order also, that this his resolution should be sent to Jerusalem, to the end that those of the City, understanding that I was adjudged an enemy by the Galileans, might in like sort confirm that their decree by their opinion. For he said, that by this means it would come to pass, that the Galileans, who were well affected towards me, should forsake me for fear they had of them. This advice of Johns marvellously pleased them all, and was presently brought unto me about the third hour of the night, by one Sacchæus, who flying from them, came and brought me the news, and particularly related to me their intent. For which cause perceiving that the time required no longer delay, and supposing that Iacob was one of my most assured and trustiest servants, I commanded him to take two hundred men with him, and to belay the waies between Gabara and Galilee, and to send me those whom he should surprize, that came that way; and especially those that carried letters. I sent Ieremy also, who was one of my friends, to the marches of Galilee, with six hundred men at arms, to keep the passages that way toward Jerusalem, commanding him to lay hands on all those that carried letters, and to commit the men to prison, and to send me their packets.

The consultation of the Embassadors against Joseph.

Joseph belieth the waies of Galilee.

After I had in this sort instructed those whom I sent, I willed and commanded the Galileans the next day following to take their arms, and to furnish themselves with victuals for three daies, and to attend me at the Borough of Gabaroth. Those souldiers that I had, I distributed in four companies, and kept those with me in whom I reposed most confidence for the guard of my person: and having appointed Captains over them, and commanded them to be careful, I charged them to suffer no unknown souldier to enter in among them. The next day I came to Gabaroth, the fifth hour of the day, where I found all the fields about the City full of men of war, of those of Galilee, who resorted thither to assist me, according as I had commanded them. Thither also came there a multitude of other men from other Boroughs. As soon as I came to their presence, and was ready to speak unto them, all of them began to cry out, calling me their benefactor, and maintainer of their Country. After I had solemnly given them thanks for this favour they had shewed me, I charged them neither to offer war, or attempt any spoil in the champian Countrey, but to encamp amidst the fields, contenting themselves with that provision they had brought with them. For I told them all in general, that I would extinguish those troubles without effusion of blood. It hapned the same day that Ionathans messenger and letters fell into their hands, who had the guard of the passages by my appointment, and according to my direction the men were kept in ſecurity, as I gave order: and finding the Letters that were brought me, to be full of nothing but ſlanders and lies written by the Embaſſadours; I ſaid not a word to any man, but thought it beſt policy to ſet upon them. But Jonathans Souldiers having intelligence of my coming, retired both themſelves and their goods, and with them John alſo into Jeſus houſe, which was a great Tower, nothing different from a Cittadel, in which they hid a number of men of War, and locked up all the other gates ſave one; expecting that I ſhould come that way, to ſalute them. In a word, they had commanded their Souldiers that when I ſhould enter, they ſhould ſuffer no man elſe to enter with me, but exclude all the reſt. For they made no other account, but that by this means they might eaſily lay hold on me. But they were deceived of their hopes: For having notice before-hand of their intents, as ſoon as I came thither, entring into a lodging that was right over againſt theirs, I feined that I went to take my reſt. Whereupon Jonathans Souldiers ſuppoſing that I was aſleep, and that in troth I was ſafe; they came forth in all haſte into the Plain, labouring to diſſwade my Souldiers from their love and alleagance, and detracting my Government. But all things fell out contrary to that they thought: for as ſoon as they were diſcovered, the Galileans gave a great ſhout, teſtifying the good will they bare unto me, who was their Governour, and they blamed the Embaſſadors, for that without any cauſe of injury, they were come to diſturb the publick peace, willing them to be gone, for that they intended to admit no other Governour. When theſe things were ſignified unto me, I made no doubt to adventure my ſelf among them: For which cauſe I ſpeedily went out to hear what theſe Embaſſadours could alleadge againſt me. Upon my arrival the whole Troop ſhouted for joy, and applauded me with a loud voice, giving me thanks for my happy and peaceable Government.

John and the Embaſſadours forces retire to Jeſus houſe.

Joſeph preſenteth himſelf among his enemies.

Jonathan and his adherents hearing this, were affraid, leſt if the Galileans ſhould ſet upon them, they ſhould grow in danger of their lives, and began to bethink themſelves how they might eſcape. But perceiving that they might not retire, for that I required them inſtantly to ſtay, they were altogether diſmaied, and paſt their ſenſes. I therefore commanded the people to ſurceaſe their ſhooting, and planted the Souldiers of greateſt truſt in every paſſage, to prevent leſt John ſhould charge them unawares. After this, I exhorted the people to betake them to their weapons, to the end that if the enemy ſhould ſuddenly aſſail them, they might not be driven to diſorder. This done, I firſt of all began to rip up to Jonathans followers and fellows, what Letters they had written, and how they had certified him, that they were ſent by the Commonalty and Inhabitants of Jeruſalem, to make an end of thoſe debates that were between me and John, and how they had incited me to come unto them: Afterwards in the ſequel of my diſcourſe I produced their Letters in open view, to the end they might not deny any thing, ſeeing themſelves convicted by their own hand-writing, and ſpake thus unto them:

Joſeph objecteth treachery againſt the Embaſſadours.

In the mouth of two or three witneſſes conſiſteth truth.

If being accuſed by John, I ſhould produce two or three witneſſes that were men of reputation, to teſtifie for my life, it were a matter moſt evident that thou ſhouldeſt be compelled, O Jonathan and you my Lords Embaſſadours (after you had fore-inquired of their lives) to acknowledg mine innocency, and to acquit me of that whereof I am accuſed. But to the intent you may know that I have faithfully governed the eſtate of Galilee, I ſuppoſe that three witneſſes are too little for an upright man, for which cauſe I produce all theſe. Enquire of them how I have lived, and whether I have governed this Country in all honeſty and juſtice. I adjure you all therefore, who are my fellows and friends of Galilee, that you hide nothing of the truth, but that before theſe men, as before your Judges you profeſs, if I have done any thing that is contrary to right.

The Galileans teſtimony of Joſephs good Government.

Whileſt I ſpake after this manner, all of them with one accord called me their benefactor and defender, and gave teſtimony of my forepaſſed government, and exhorted me to continue the ſame hereafter. And all of them affirmed by a publick oath, that I had carefully prevented leſt any woman ſhould be violated, or any man by my means ſhould be drawn into any injury or inconvenience. This done, I publickly read the two Letters in the preſence of all the Galileans, which were taken from Jonathans meſſengers by thoſe, who were appointed by me to beſet the waies, and were by them ſent to me, which were full of injuries and falſhoods, alledging that I rather behaved my ſelf like a Tyrant than a Governour towards them: and beſides that, there were divers other things written and urged very impudently. Theſe Letters (ſaid I) were voluntarily offered me by thoſe that carried the ſame. For I was unwilling that mine adverſaries ſhould know that I had beſet the waies, fearing leſt they ſhould forbear to write hereafter.

Joſeph openly readeth Jonathans Epiſtles.

The people having heard this, were diſpleaſed and animated againſt Jonathan and his followers, lowers, and flocked on to murther them; and they had surely done it, had I not pacified the displeasure of the Galileans. As for the Embassadors that accompanied Jonathan, I told all of them that I pardoned whatsoever was past, if so be they would repent themselves of that which was done, and if upon their return into their Countrey, they would truly report unto those who had sent them, how all things had past under my Government. This said, I dismissed them, notwithstanding that I knew they would perform nothing of that which they had promised. But the whole multitude prosecuted their displeasure against them, requiring me to give them leave to punish those with all rigour, who had committed this slanderous act. But I laboured all that I might to perswade them, to lay no hands upon them, knowing full well that whatsoever mutiny it be, it cannot but breed prejudice to the Commonweal. This notwithstanding, the multitude would by no means be satisfied, but all of them ran in heaps with great fury to the lodging, where Jonathan and the Embassadours kept. Whereupon seeing that it was impossible to restrain their fury, I incontinently betook me to my Horse, and commanded the people to follow me to Sogan a Borough of the Arabians, distant from thence some twenty stades. By this stratagem I brought to pass, that the beginning of the Civil war might not be imputed to me.

The wrath and fury of the people against Jonathan and his fellow Embassadors.

Joseph pacifies the sedition without bloodshed.

After I came near to Sogan, I assembled the people, and told them that they should not violently submit themselves to their froward displeasures, nor entertain their unquenchable desire of revenge: and I commanded them to pick out an hundred of the chiefest and oldest men amongst them, who should make their repair to the City of Jerusalem; and there complain unto the people against those that had kindled sedition in their Countrey. And I said unto them, If the people be favourable and listen to your discourse, you shall perswade them to write unto me, that according to their command I remain in Galilee; and that Jonathan and his partners depart from hence. After I had given them this charge, and that they were furnished with all things necessary for their journey, in all expedition on the third day after the general Assembly, I dispatched them, and sent five hundred armed men with them, I wrote also to my friends in Samaria, so to further them that they might finish their journey in all security. For Samaria was already in subjection to the Romans; and it behoved my men of necessity, who would make a short journey to pass that way. For from Galilee, by this means a man may in three days arrive at Jerusalem. Furthermore, I guarded the Embassadors my self as far as the frontiers of Galilee, laying forces and Guards upon the ways, to the end that no man might easily discover or know of their departure. Which done, I sojourned for a certain time at Japha.

Joseph sends one hundred Embassadors to Jerusalem.

But Jonathan and his Companions having failed of their purpose intended against me, dismissed John to Gischala: as for themselves they went to Tiberias, hoping to bring the same under their obeysance; for that Jesus, who was President at that time, had written unto them, and promised them to perswade the people to entertain them, and to take their part if they came: and under this hope they also retired themselves thither. Sylas, who (as I declared) was left by me as mine Agent in Tiberias, certified me of all this by his Letters, requiring me to use all diligence: and I condescending thereunto, was brought in danger of my life upon this occasion that ensueth: Jonathan and his followers being come to Tiberias, perswaded divers who were mine enemies to revolt from me; but after they were certified that I was there in person, they were afraid, and came unto me, and saluting me, told me, that they reputed me happy, for that I had so wisely behaved my self in Galilee: and they rejoyced also in appearance, for that I was returned with honour, telling me that the honour that was done unto me, was their ornament, for that they were my instructors and fellow-Citizens, and that the friendship which I bore them, was more just than that of John: they therefore required me to repair unto my house, promising very shortly to deliver John into my hands: and these speeches of theirs they seconded with dreadful Oaths, which made me think that I had no cause to misbelieve them. Furthermore, they required me to take up my lodging in another place, for that on the morrow was the Sabbath-day, and it were an inconvenience that the City of Tiberias should be drawn into trouble on that day. I that suspected nothing, repaired to Taricheas, leaving notwithstanding certain of my friends behind me in Tiberias, who might curiously observe what the common talk was of me: and all along the way betwixt Taricheas and Tiberias I laid certain men in wait, who from one to another might certifie me of that which was discovered by them who remained in the City. The next day therefore they all assembled in the Proseucha or Oratory, which was an ample house, wherein they prayed, and was able to contain a great multitude. When Jonathan was entred into this place, he durst not manifestly speak unto them of a revolt, but only told them that their City had need of a better Governour. But the President Jesus without dissembling, ſpake plainly after this manner unto them; "It were better for you (my friends) that you "were ſubject to four men of Nobility and great wiſdom, than to one: and thereupon he "ſhewed them thoſe who accompanied Jonathan. Hereupon Jeſus aroſe and praiſed that which Jeſus had propoſed, and drew ſome of the people to his opinion. But the greater part took no pleaſure therein: and there had preſently followed a mutiny, had not the Aſſembly been diſmiſſed, by reaſon it was mid-day, which is the ordinary hour amongſt them to take their repaſt in. Thus did Jonathans conſorts remit the determination of the matter until the next day, retiring themſelves without any good done. Which being preſently reported unto me, I reſolved with my ſelf the next morning to repair to the City of Tiberias: and on the morrow I arrived there in due time, for I found the people already aſſembled in the place of prayer, and they that were drawn to the Convocation, knew not the cauſe why they were aſſembled. Jonathans partners ſeeing me there in perſon contrary to their expectation, were very ſore troubled, and bethought themſelves of this ſubtilty. They told the multitude that a certain friend of theirs had informed them, that he had diſcovered certain Roman Horſmen upon the frontiers of that Territory, ſome thirty ſtades from the City, in a place called Homonœa: and that the news being brought to them, thoſe of Johns faction had preſently ſignified the ſame unto them, to the intent they ſhould not endure their Countty to be ſackt by the enemy. They uſed this ſpeech, ſuppoſing that under pretext of reſcuing the Countrey, they might drive me abroad, and ſtrengthen the City for themſelves.

The Jews ſixth hour is to us eleven or twelve a clock at noon.

Jonathan and his Aſſociates ſubtilty.

Now although I knew very well what their intent was, yet gave I ear unto them, leſt I ſhould drive the Tiberians into an opinion, that I was negligent and careleſs of their ſecurity: I therefore rode out, and came to the place of which they had ſpoken, where finding ſcarce a footſtep or appearance of an enemy, I returned ſpeedily without delay to Tiberias. When I came there, I found the whole Councel aſſembled with a multitude of people, and John's partakers urging againſt me a very vehement accuſation, that I made no account to relieve them in their Wars, but that I ſtudied nothing but mine own pleaſure. And whileſt they ſpake theſe words, they produced four Letters, as being written unto them by thoſe who were upon the marches of Galilee, requiring them to come and ſuccour them, for that the Roman Horſmen and Footmen would within three days forrage and ſpoil their Countrey: for which cauſe they made haſte, and would not neglect their ſuit who beſought them. The Tiberians hearing theſe allegations, and ſuppoſing them to be true, cried out, ſaying, That it behoved them not in that manner to dally time, but to go and ſuccour their Countreymen invironed with great dangers. Whereunto I anſwered, that I was ready to obey them, and promiſed to march forth againſt the enemy with all expedition. Now I knew well the pretence of Johns partakers; and was of the opinion, that ſince thoſe Letters ſaid, that the Romans gathered head in four divers places, it was requiſite to divide our power into five Companies, appointing every one of them a Chieftain over them. For it is an honour for good men not only to give counſel, but alſo when need requireth, to be the firſt and formoſt in action: for I told them that it lay not in my power to lead any more than one Company. This my advice was pleaſing unto all the people, who preſently conſtrained theſe men to march out unto the War: whereby it came to paſs, that they were greatly confuſed to ſee that they might not finiſh that which they had imagined, becauſe I croſſed all their enterprizes. Hereupon, one amongſt them called Ananias, a wicked and perverſe man, counſelled the people to celebrate a ſolemn Faſt the next day in honour of God, and gave direction at the ſame hour, that all of them ſhould gather together in that place in Arms, to proteſt before God, that if they obtained not ſuccours at his hands, they held all ſort of reſiſtance unprofitable. He ſpake this not for any piety that was in him, but to the end to ſurprize both me and my followers unarmed. To this advice of his was I enforced to condeſcend, to the end it might appear that I contemned not that which appertained to the ſervice of God. As ſoon therefore as we retired every one of us to our ſeveral lodgings, Jonathan and his partakers wrote unto John, to reſort unto them early in the morning with his men of War, and all the power he could make; for that they might eaſily lay hands on me, and accompliſh that which they had ſo long time longed after. He receiving this Letter, willingly obeyed. The next day I commanded two of my ſtrongeſt and faithfulleſt Souldiers to hide their ſhort ſwords under their Gowns, and to attend me, to the end that if in any ſort we were aſſailed by the enemy, we might defend our ſelves. I put on my curets alſo, and girt my ſword by my ſide in ſuch ſort, as no man might perceive the ſame, and came with them to the place of prayer.

A begin our prayers according to the cuſtom of the Countrey, Jeſus ariſing, demanded of me what was become of the houſhold ſtuff that was taken out of the Kings Palace when it was burned, and where the bullion of ſilver was, and with whom I had left the ſame: of all which he therefore made mention, that he might delay the time till Johns approach. I anſwered that Capella had all, and thoſe ten of the chiefeſt Nobility of Tiberias, and willed him to ask of them whether it were true that I ſpake: who confeſſed that they had it. What (ſaid he) are become of thoſe twenty pieces of gold, that you received by the ſale of a certain weight of maſſive ſilver, where are they? I anſwered him, that I had delivered the ſame to the Embaſſadors, to defray their charges in their voyage towards Jeruſalem. Hereupon Jonathans partakers ſaid, that I had done amiſs, in employing the publick treaſure to the uſe
B of private Embaſſadors. The people being diſpleaſed herewith (for I very eaſily perceived the wicked diſpoſition of theſe men) and ſeeing that a ſedition was likely to ariſe, I thought it beſt to whet and animate the people the more againſt them: I ſaid, that if I had done amiſs in rewarding the Embaſſadors on the common ſtock, they ſhould need to take no further diſpleaſure for that: for ſaid I, I will repay thoſe twenty pieces of Gold out of mine own purſe. Hereupon the people were incenſed the more againſt them, in that they manifeſtly diſcovered what hatred they wrongfully bare unto me. Whereupon Jeſus feareing leſt ſome change might ariſe, commanded the people to depart, and required the Councel to ſtay, for that it was unpoſſible to examine matters diſcreetly, where ſo much trouble and turmoil was. The people cried out, that they would not leave me alone among them. Whereupon there came one unto Jeſus, who ſecretly informed him that John with his armed
C men was at hand, who for that cauſe being unable to contain and conceal his joy, God ſo providing for the conſervation of my life (for had their purpoſe taken effect, John and his followers had utterly overthrown me.) Forbear (ſaid he) ye Tiberians, to enquire of the twenty pieces of Gold: but Joſeph meriteth not puniſhment for this matter but becauſe he affecteth the tyranny, and that by his words he hath deceived the people of Galilee, and gotten the Sovereignty to himſelf. Whileſt he ſpake theſe words, they ſought ſuddenly to lay hands on me, intending to murther me. But thoſe two, whom I had with me, perceiving their intent, drew their ſwords, threatning thoſe who ſhould dare attempt to offer me violence. The people likewiſe gathered ſtones to caſt at Jonathans partakers, and pull'd me away violently from mine enemies: and for that if I ſhould have gone but a little further, I had
D met with John and his Army, through the fear I had, I turned another way. For croſſing down a privy way that led me to the lake, I betook me to a Boat and went by water to Tarichea, avoiding this danger beyond all hope.

Joſeph almoſt ſuddenly ſurprized by the enemy, is delivered from peril.

Whereupon I incontinently ſent for the chiefeſt men of Galilee, and told them how contrary to all Law and right I had almoſt been murthered by Jonathan and the Tiberians. For which cauſe the Galileans were grievouſly diſpleaſed againſt them, and willed me without delay to make War againſt them; or if I liſt not my ſelf, to ſuffer them with all expedition to cut off both John and Jonathan, with all their followers. Yet did I reſtrain them the beſt I could, and pacified their diſpleaſure, and prayed them to expect until ſuch time as we E knew what news our Embaſſadors would bring, that were gone to Jeruſalem. For I told them we ought to execute no kind of thing without their approbation and conſent, and by theſe means I perſwaded them. But John ſeeing at that time that his policy had but very ſlender ſucceſs, returned back again to Giſchala.

Joſeph certifieth the Galileans, how traiterouſly Jonathan and the Tiberians had dealt with him.

Some few days after, our Embaſſadors, who were returned from Jeruſalem, certified us that the people of Jeruſalem were ſore diſpleaſed with Ananias the High Prieſt, and Simon the Son of Gamaliel, for that without their common conſent they had ſent Embaſſadors into Galilee, and ſought to diſplace me of the Government there, and their diſpleaſure was ſo kindled, that they were ready to ſet their houſes on fire. They brought me alſo Letters, by which the Governors of Jeruſalem, upon the inſtant requeſt that the people had made unto them, confirmed me in the Government of Galilee, commanding Jonathan and his Aſſociates
F to return back again with all expedition. After I had received theſe Letters, I repaired to the Borough of Arbela, where I aſſembled the Galileans: before whom I commanded the Embaſſadors to report how much the people of Jeruſalem were diſpleaſed and diſcontented, in regard of thoſe things which Jonathan had injured me in; and how they confirmed me in the Government of this Countrey, and had called and commanded Jonathan and his Confederates back again to Jeruſalem: to whom I ſpeedily ſent that Letter that was directed to them, commanding the Meſſenger to obſerve very carefully both their actions and acceptance. After they had received the Letters, they were greatly troubled, and ſent for John and thoſe of the Counſel of Tiberias, with the Governor of Gabara, and conſulted with them them what they were beſt to do. The Tiberians opinion was, that they ſhould continue G and maintain their eſtates, and that they ſhould not forſake the City which had already ſubſcribed to their authority, eſpecially for that I would invade them : for that I had ſo threatned them, they were not aſhamed to fein and imagine. This advice not only pleaſed John, but he furthermore gave this counſel, that ſome two Embaſſadors ſhould be ſent from them to the people of Jeruſalem, to accuſe me for that I had unjuſtly governed the common-weal of Galilee, telling them that they might very eaſily incenſe the people againſt me, both in regard of their authority, as alſo for that the common people are by nature variable and inconſtant. This counſel that John gave was allowed by them all : whereupon it was thought fit that Jonathan and Ananias ſhould in perſon repair to Jeruſalem, and that the other two ſhould remain at Tiberias, and for their Convoy they gave them an hundred H armed Souldiers.

The Tiberians intend war againſt Joſeph. Jonathan with his followers taken and kept captive.

The Tiberians had before this provided for the ſecurity of their Walls, and gave commandment to all the Citizens to take Arms, and afterwards ſent for ſome ſupplies to John to ſtrengthen their Garriſon, if they ſhould any ways be provoked by me. For John kept at Giſchala. Mean-while Jonathan travelling onwards of his Journey, came to Dabaritta, a City ſituated upon the uttermoſt Borders of Galilee in a great Plain : and there met he about midnight with ſome of my Troops that kept the Watch, who commanded them to lay by their Arms, and kept them ſafely bound, as I had commanded them. Hereof Levi, who had the charge of this Quarter, certified me by his Letters : wherefore diſſembling the matter for ſome two days, I ſent Letters to the Tiberians, by which I counſelled them, that laying I their Arms aſide, they ſhould diſmiſs every one to his own dwelling place. But they returned me an injurious anſwer : for they ſuppoſed that Jonathan and his train were already arrived in Jeruſalem. But I ſetting light by their injuries, reſolved to circumvent them by this cunning ſtratagem : for I thought it a dangerous matter to kindle War againſt the Citizens. Being therefore very willing to draw them out of their Walls, I choſe out ten thouſand of my beſt Souldiers, whom I diſtributed into three Bands, and lodged one Company of them ſecretly at Dora, to lie there in ambuſh. I encamped alſo another thouſand in a certain Borough ſituate in a mountainous place, ſome four ſtades diſtant from Tiberias; commanding them that as ſoon as I gave them a Watch-word or ſign, they ſhould break forth: as for my ſelf, I withdrew my ſelf and kept in the open field, and ſate me down on the K graſs. Which when the Tiberians perceived, they made continual excurſions towards me, uſing many bitter and injurious taunts againſt me : and ſo great folly poſſeſſed them, that they ſpread a magnificent couch in the open Plain; and marching round about the ſame, they ſcornfully ſeemed to lament me, as if I had lien therein, whileſt in the mean time I took pleaſure to laugh and look upon their follies.

But being very deſirous to ſurprize Simon by ſome policie, and Joazar alſo with him, I ſent unto them, requiring them that they would march forth a little without their Walls, attended by their friends and Guard for their ſecurity ſake; for that I was determined to confer with them upon a peace, and to confirm the one half of the Government unto them. upon Simon deceived by his folly, and overcome and blinded with greedy deſire, came forth L with all expedition : but Joazar ſuſpecting ſome ſtratagem, would not adventure without the Walls. As ſoon as I ſaw Simon attended by his friends and Guard, I went out to meet him, and embraced him kindly, giving him thanks for that he was come down; anon after walking along with him, as if I intended to communicate ſomewhat with him in ſecret, I withdrew him from his friends, and laying hands on him, I delivered him to my friends to lead him into the Borough, and gave a ſign unto my Souldiers that they ſhould come down, and with them I aſſaulted the City of Tiberias. There was a ſharp skirmiſh on both ſides, and the Tiberians had well nigh gotten the victorie : for my Souldiers began to flie; but perceiving how the matter went, I animated thoſe of my company, and with them gave a valiant onſet on the Tiberians, who almoſt had the better, and chazed them into their City, M and ſent another company by the Lake, to ſet fire on thoſe houſes which they ſhould firſt fall upon. Hereupon the Tiberians thought that their City was taken by force, and caſt down their Weapons for fear, praying me to have compaſſion on their wives and children, and to pardon their City. For this cauſe being moved with compaſſion, I reſtrained the fury of my Souldiers; and for that it was late, I retired my ſelf with my Souldiers, both to the intent I might ſpare the City, and relieve my wearied and wounded Souldiers. Hereupon I ſent for Simon to come and banquet with me, and comforted him in his misfortune, promiſing him to ſend him to Jeruſalem, and to aſſure him in his journey homeward, and to furniſh him for his ordinary expences with all things neceſſary. The next day I aſſembled ten thouſand

Souldiers

A Souldiers, and presently made mine entry into Tiberias; and having assembled the chiefest citizens in the horse-race, I commanded them to discover unto me who they were that were the Authors of that rebellion: who having satisfied me, I laid hands on them and bound them, and sent them incontinently to Jotapata. As for Jonathan and his consorts, I set them at liberty, and gave them money for their charges, and sent them back to Jerusalem with Simon and Joazar, and five hundred souldiers for their guard. Hereupon the Tiberians reassembled themselves before me, beseeching me to pardon their misdeeds, promising me to recompence by their future fidelity their forepassed and foul faults: beseeching me also to restore those goods unto the Citizens, which in way of pillage were taken from them. Whereupon I gave a present command, that all the prey should be brought and laid before B me: and whereas the Souldiers delayed to perform the same, I espying one of those Souldiers that stood by me, better apparelled than he was wont to be, asked him where he had gotten that garment: who confessing that he had taken it in the spoil of the City, I chastised him with strokes, and threatned a worse punishment to all those that would not restore that which they had taken away: whereby recovering a great part of the prey together, I gave every Citizen that which he knew to be his own.

Those goods that were taken from the Citizens are restored.

In this place I cannot chuse but in some sort I must reprehend Justus, who wrote upon this argument; and others, who promising a History, are not afraid in contempt of truth, either for favour or hatred, to commit lies to their posterity. For they differ nothing from counterfeiters of evidences, and razers of records, but that these men are more corrupted by im- C punity. For he, to the end he might seem to imploy his time well, undertaking to set down the events of this War, hath belied me in many things, and hath not been ashamed to belie his own Country. For which cause I am necessarily enforced in this place to discover that which hitherto I have concealed, and to reprove that which he hath falsly testified of me: neither is it to be wondred at, that I have so long time deferred the performance thereof. For whosoever writeth a History, ought of necessity to speak the truth; yet is it not lawful for him to inveigh against the wickeder sort too vehemently, not for that they are worthy of this favour, but for his own modesties sake.

A reproof of Justus the Historiographer, that falsly accused Joseph.

"Tell me therefore Justus (for thou desirest to be held for the man of greatest note amongst "all other Historians, and art not ashamed to vaunt and boast thy self of that title) tell me I D "pray thee in familiarity (for I must so talk with thee as if thou wert present before me) how "I and the Galileans have been the authors of that rebellion, which thy Country began both "against the Romans and their King. For before I was chosen Governor of Galilee by the "People of Jerusalem, both thou and all the Tiberians were not only up in Arms, but had "already made war against the ten Cities of Syria. Thy self hadst burnt their villages, and one "of thy servants died in that encounter: yet not I alone protest this, but it is extant also in "writing in the records of the Emperour Vespasian, how the inhabitants of these ten Cities "cried out to Vespasian in the City of Ptolemais, requiring that thou mightest be punished, as "the author of their mischiefs: and assuredly thou hadst been punished by the Emperor, had "not Agrippa, who had received commission to execute thee, upon the instant request of his E "sister Bernice spared thy life, and kept thee bound in prison for a long time. Furthermore, "thy politick behaviours do sufficiently express what the rest of thy life hath been, and how "thou hast caused thy Country to rebel against the Romans: whereof I will produce here- "after most evident arguments, and for thy cause will I urge somewhat against those other "Tiberians, and I will make it plain to those that shall read these Histories, that thou hast "been no friend to Rome, nor faithful to thy King. And I enforce these my authorities from "the greatest Cities of Galilee, Sephoris and Tiberias, in which thou Justus wert born. For "Sephoris is scituate in the heart of Galilee, having round about it a number of villages, and "being a City sufficiently able in it self to attempt and execute any noble action at their "pleasure, yet notwithstanding the citizens thereof resolved to observe their faith to the Ro- F "mans, and thrust me out of doors, forbidding every man among them to bear Arms for the "Jews. And to the end they might be more assured in my behalf, the inhabitants deceived "me, in that they entreated me to encompass their City with a wall: and that done, they "willingly entertained a Garrison which was sent them from Cestius Gallus, who was Gene- "ral of the Roman Legions in Syria in contempt of me, although at that time I had a great "power, and terrified the Country round about. But when our great City of Jerusalem was "besieged, and that Temple which was common to all our nation, was in danger to fall into "the enemies hands, the Sephorites sent no succours, to the end it might not be said that they "took Arms against the Romans: But thy Country, Justus, being scituate upon the Lake of

Genazareth distant from Hippus thirty stades, from Gadara sixty, from Scythopolis six- G
score, in a Countrey obedient to the King, having not any City of the Jews round about it, might have very easily kept their faith to the Romans, if they had listed. For both the City and people were furnished with munition in all abundance: But as thou sayest, I was the cause at that time. And who afterwards? For thou knowest that before the siege of Jerusalem, I was in the Romans hands, and that Jotapata was taken by force, and divers other Castles; and that many other Galileans were spent in divers battels. At that time shouldest thou have delivered thy self of that fear thou hadst of me, laying thine arms aside and presenting thy self to the King and the Romans, when thou undertookest these arms not of thine own accord, but enforced. But the truth is, you expected Vespasians coming, even until such time as he begirt your city with a siege, and then laid you your arms aside for fear of H danger: yea, even then had your City been overthrown, except the King in excuse of your folly, had obtained your pardon at Vespasians hands. It was not therefore my fault, but your offence, that behaved your selves like enemies. Do not you remember how oftentimes I have obtained the victory against you, and how few times you could complain of bloodshed. But you falling at dissention one with another, having been the instruments of your own ruin; and not for the love you bare either to the King, or the Romans, but of your own malice slew an hundred eighty five citizens, at such time as I was besieged by the Romans in Jotapata. Nay more, is not this true, that during the siege of Jerusalem, whereof I have made mention, there were more than two thousand Tiberians slain, or otherwise taken prisoners? But perhaps thou wilt alleadg, that at that time thou wert no enemy, for that thou wert fled to I the King: but I tell thee that thou fleddest thither for the fear thou hadst of me. I am a wicked man, as thou sayest: but what art thou? Whom King Agrippa, upon many presents delivered from punishment, at such time as thou wert condemned by Vespasian to lose thy head. For what cause having made thee prisoner twice, and having so many times past the sentence of banishment against thee, and having once commanded thee to be thine own murtherer, hath he given life upon the importunate sollicitation of his sister Bernice? And after so many crimes committed by thee, having entertained thee for his Secretary, when he found thy corruption in that office, he banished thee from his presence.

Justus condemned to death.

But I will not too exactly touch thee with these matters, yet notwithstanding I wonder at thine impudence, that hast openly protested, that thou hast written more exactly and per- K fectly of this matter, than any man; whereas thou art utterly ignorant of those things that were done in Galilee. For at that time wert thou at Berytum with the King, and wert no ways privy to the siege of Jotapata; seeing thou didst not follow us. Neither couldst thou be able to learn how I behaved my self therein, for that there was no one left alive to give thee certain intelligence. Thou wilt perhaps say, that thou hast carefully described that, which happened during the siege of Jerusalem. And how may this be possible? For thou wert neither agent nor looker on in that war; neither hast thou read the Commentaries of Vespasian. But I conjecture hereby that thou hast not read them at all, forasmuch as thou hast written clean contrary to that which is contained therein. And if thou art so confident, that thy History is truer than other mens, why didst thou not publish it during Vespasians and Titus lives, who L were the Generals of that war; neither before King Agrippa, and those of his race, who were all of them very expert in the Greek tongue? For thou hast kept it written by thee above twenty years, and mightest have produced witness of thine exact diligence before them, who were privy to all things. But now when they are dead, and thou thinkest that no man liveth that may reproove thee, thou hast undertaken boldness to publish thy work. But I have used no such policy or fear in my books, but have presented them to the Emperours themselves, who have been eye-witnesses and actors thereof. For I knew in mine own soul that I had set down all things truly: Whereupon I obtained my expected approbation. Moreover, I communicated the same History with divers others, whereof some of them were present in the War, as was King Agrippa, and some of his kindred. And Titus the Em- M perour himself was so desirous that men should search for the truth of that History out of these Books, that he placed them in a Library, and caused them to be published, being subscribed with his own hand. As for King Agrippa, sent me seventy two Epistles, testifying the truth of my Books, whereof two of them are under written, to the end that the truth may appear thereby. King Agrippa to his dear friend Joseph, Health: "I have with great content"ment over read thy book, wherein thou seemest in my opinion to have handled this matter

A "when we meet next, I will between me and thee certifie thee of certain things which thou "knowest not. Thus was he a witness of the truth of my accomplished History: not flatter- "ing me, for it became him not; neither deriding me, as you perhaps may object; for far was "it from so notable a mind to be subject to so servile a folly: but only to this end, that the "truth of my writings might be commended to the reader by the worth of his testimony. And thus much have I thought good to set down in way of answer to Justus.

Josephus prosecuteth his History, and leaveth to debate with Justus.

Now as soon as I had pacified these troubles in Tiberias, and had established a counsel of such as were well affected towards me, I bethought my self of that which concerned me to do in respect of John. All they of Galilee were of the opinion, that I should arm them all, and that in battel aray I should march against John, and do justice upon him, as he that had
B been the author of all this mischief. But for mine own part, I misliked their counsels, for that my desire was to extinguish these troubles without blood-shed; and for that cause I incited them with all diligence that was possible, to learn the names of all those who served under him: which being done, & I made privy what they were, I published a proclamation, by which I promise both safety and pardon to all those, that should forsake John, assigning them the term of twenty daies, to determine of that which seemed best for their own security: and I threatned to set fire on their houses, and confiscate their goods, except they gave over their armes. They hearing these things, were greatly troubled, and forsook John, and after they had laid down their weapons, they came unto me to the number of four thousand: so that only fifteen hundred men remained with John or there abouts; either of
C Citizens, or strangers of Tyre. When John perceived that he was circumvented by this policy, he ever after remained quiet in his country in great fear.

Four thousand of Johns followers forsake him and follow Joseph.

At that time the Sephorites grew so bold, that they took arms under the confidence and strength of their walls, and for that they saw me distracted with other business. They therefore sent to Cestius Gallus Governour of Syria, praying him to repair unto them, with all expedition, to take possession of their City, or to send them a Garrison of men at the least. Gallus promised to come unto them, but he set down no certain time of his approach Whereof when I was advertised, I took the men of war that I had, and marched against the Sephorites, and took their City by force. The Galileans very glad of this opportunity, and supposing the time was come wherein they might satisfy the insatiable hatred that they bare
D against that City, marched on with that intent, as if they would have wholly ruinated the City, with all the inhabitants. They therefore traversed the streets, and set fire on the houses, which they found wholly desolate: for the inhabitants were fled away for fear, and were retired into a Fortress. They therefore ransackt all things, and left nothing unspoiled; neither was there any kind of misery which they inflicted not on their countrymen. Which when I saw, I was sore grieved, and commanded them to give over; signifying unto them that it was impiety in them, to shew themselves so savage towards their countrymen. And seeing that neither by any prayer or command that I made, I could draw them to obedience for that their hatred surpassed my counsels, I commanded those that were about me, and whom I most trusted, to spread a rumour that the Romans charged us on the other side of E the City with great force. All which I did, to the end that by this rumour, I might pacifie the fury of the Galileans, and save the City of Sephoris: and this policy took good effect. For when they heard this news, they were afraid, and forsook their pillage, to trust to their heels, in special, for that I who was their General did the like. For I made a shew, that I believed the rumour to be as true, as they believed it: and by this stratagem the City Sephoris was saved beyond all hope.

Sephoris spoiled.

And hardly escaped Tyberias from being spoiled by the Galileans, through this occasion which ensueth: The chiefest of their councel wrote unto the King, that he should come unto them, and take possession of their City. The King promised to satisfie them very shortly, and answered them by his letters, and delivered them to one of his chamber, called F Crispus a Jew born, to carry them to the Tiberians. The Galileans knowing this messenger, took him and brought him unto me: which when the common people understood, of meer spleen they fell to arms, and the next day divers of them assembled themselves from all parts and came to the City of Asoch where I made my abode, and made huge acclamations, calling the Tiberians traitors, and the Kings friends, and demanding of me licence and liberty that they might repair to Tiberias, and raze it to the ground, being as much displeased against the Tiberians, as they were against the Sephorites.

Tiberias in danger of ruin.

Which when I heard, I stood in great doubt how I might deliver the Tiberians from that displeasure, which the Galileans had conceived against them; for I could not deny but that the

Joseph consulteth with himself.

the Tiberians had written and sent for the King: for the answer which he made them, did evidently express the truth. And having a long while debated the matter with my self, I said unto them, I know as well as you, that the Tiberians have offended: neither will I hinder you from spoiling their City, yet must you proceed to the execution thereof with some judgment. For the Tiberians alone do not betray our liberty, but others also, who are more accounted of in the country of Galilee. Stay therefore until such time as I am throughly informed, who they be that are authors of this treason: and then you shall have them all under your hands, with all those amongst them, whom you may particularly think worthy punishment. By these perswasions I won the people, who departed from me wholly contented and pacified. As for the messenger that was sent by the King, I caused him to be imprisoned, having respect to an urgent necessity of mine own, which constrained me to depart out of the Kingdom within a little while. And calling Crispus secretly unto me, I charged him to make those souldiers drunk, who had the charge of him, to the end that he might in all security flie back to the King. Thus Tiberias being ready to be destroyed, the second time by my government and providence, avoided at that time a great and fatal danger.

The Galileans wrath pacified, conceived against the Tiberians.

At the same time Justus, the son of Pistus, fled unto the King without my knowledg: the cause of which flight of his, I will orderly express. As soon as the Romans had begun their war against the Jews, the Tiberians concluded to obey the King, and in no sort to rebel against the Romans. But Justus egged them on to take arms, thirsting after alteration, and hoping both to obtain the government of Galilee, as of his own country: but his hope failed him of a successful end; for the Galileans being enviously bent against the Tiberians, for those injuries they had suffered at their hands before the war, could not allow Justus to be their Governour. My self also, whom the people of Jerusalem put in trust with the government of Galilee, was oftentimes so much moved, that I failed little of killing Justus, so intolerable was his wickedness. He therefore fearing lest my displeasure should shorten his days, went unto the King, supposing that he might live more freely and securely with him.

Justus desireth to command Galilee.

The Sephorites beyond their expectation having escaped this first danger, wrote unto Cestus Gallus the second time; requiring him to come unto them, to the end that he might be the sooner seized of their City; or that he should send them forces to withstand the incursions of their enemies: and finally they wrought so much, that Gallus sent them store of horsemen, and after them foot men, who came by night, and were received into their City. But seeing that the country round about them was but in poor estate, by reason of the Roman horsemen, I took my souldiers, and came to Garizim, where I encamped some twenty stades off from Sephoris, and by night I approached the same, and set ladders to the wall, with which I entred a great number of my soldiers, and became master of the better part of the City; from whence notwithstanding we were afterwards constrained to retire, for that we knew not the place, killing before our departure twelve Roman footmen and two horsemen, with some Sephorites, to the only loss of one of ours. Afterwards a fight happening between us and their horsemen in open field, we fought for a long time with disadvantage: For the Romans having invironed me on all sides, my rereward through the fear they conceived, began to retire. In this skirmish I lost one of my guard, called Iustus, who in times past had served in the very same place under the King. At that very time the Kings forces both of horse and foot came thither, under the government of Silas, Captain of the guard, who encamping some five stades off from Julias, beset the high-wayes that bended towards Cana with men of war, and the fort of Gamala, to hinder the inhabitants from receiving any commodities from the country of Galilee.

Joseph assailed the walls of Sephoris.

Silas Captain of the Kings guard.

As soon as I received news hereof, I sent out two thousand souldiers, with Ieremy their Coronel; who shrowding themselves within a stade of Julias, near unto the floud Jordan, offered nothing else but light skirmishes, until such time as I had gathered three thousand souldiers more, and was come unto them. The next day having planted an ambush in a certain trench near unto the enclosure of their camp, I touled out the Kings souldiers to skirmish, having first forewarned my souldiers to fain a flight, until such time as they had drawn their enemies as far as the ambush; which they cunningly executed. But Silas supposing that our men fled for cowardice, set forward to follow them as fast as he might possible: but they that lay in ambush charged him on the back, and discomfited his army: and I presently turning and making head against them, constrained the Kings forces to trust to their heels. At that time the estate of the country was at a good point, had not some cursed spirit thwarted mine honest purposes. For the horse whereon I road, falling into a certain bog, cast me on the ground:

Joseph putteth the Kings souldiers to flight.

A ground: whereby mine hand being thruſt out of joynt about the wriſt, I was carried into a Borough of Cepharnom. My Souldiers hearing hereof, and fearing leſt ſome more ſiniſter misfortune had befaln me, than indeed had done, reſtrained themſelves from purſuing the enemy any further, and turned their backs through the grief they had conceived by reaſon of mine accident. Having therefore ſent for Phyſicians, and cauſed my ſelf to be dreſſed, I ſtayed there for that day; and being ſeized with a fever, I was carried by night to Taricheas, according to the advice of my Phyſicians.

Joſephs misfortune animateth the enemy.

Silas and his Souldiers having news of mine accident, recovered their courages; and underſtanding that we kept but ſlender watch in our Camp, they laid an ambuſh by night on this
B ſide Jordan, with their Horſmen, and as ſoon as the day appeared, he drew out our Souldiers to fight: who willingly condeſcended thereunto, and being come into the Plain, they perceived the men that lay in ambuſh, by whom they were put to flight, and ſix of our men were ſlain. But they purſued their Victory no further: For having news that certain Souldiers had paſt the water of Taricheas to Julias, they were afraid and returned back.

Veſpaſian and Agrippa arrive at Tyre.

Not long after, Veſpaſian arrived at Tyre, accompanied with King Agrippa. Againſt whom the Tyrians began to utter many reproaches, telling Veſpaſian that the King was both an enemy to the Tyrians and the Romans, alleadging that Philip his General had betrayed the Kings Palace and the Romans Army in Jeruſalem, and that by the Kings commiſſion. Which when Veſpaſian underſtood, he reproved this impudent boldneſs of the Tyrians, for blaming a King of that power, and a friend to the Romans: and adviſed the King to ſend Philip
C to Rome, to yeeld account of his actions. But notwithſtanding that Philip was ſent thither, yet preſented he not his ſelf before Nero; for finding him extremely buſied with troubles and Civil wars, he returned unto the King without doing any thing. When Veſpaſian was arrived at Ptolemais, the Governors of the ten Cities of Syria cried out againſt Juſtus the Tiberian, accuſing him for burning of their Boroughs. Veſpaſian therefore delivered him bound unto the King, to the end that the Subjects of his Kingdom might have him puniſhed. But the King before that time, unwitting to Veſpaſian, had kept him priſoner, as it hath been heretofore declared. The Sephorites alſo reſorted to Veſpaſian to ſalute him, and receive a Garriſon from him, with their Commander Placidus, who made many roads into the Countrey, and purſued them until ſuch time as Veſpaſian arrived in Galilee: of which arrival I
D have amply ſpoken in my Books of the Wars of the Jews, how he came, how he fought againſt me, the firſt time near to the City of Tarichea; how I departed from thence to repair to Jotapata, by taking my deliverance, and all my actions and fortunes during the Wars of the Jews, and the Siege of the City of Jeruſalem. But now me ſeemeth that it is neceſſary that I deſcribe other things exploited by me during my life time in other places, than in the Wars of the Jews. After the ſiege of Jotapata was ended, I was priſoner with the Romans, and kept very carefully: yet notwithſtanding, Veſpaſian did me much honour. For by his commandment I married a Virgin, that was one of thoſe that had been taken captive in Cæſarea. But ſhe remained not long time with me: for after I was ſet at liberty, and that I followed Veſpaſian, ſhe retired her ſelf to Alexandria. After which I married another woman in Alexandria, from whence I was ſent to Titus to the Siege of Jeruſalem, where I was
E oftentimes in danger of death. For the Iews laboured what they might to take and puniſh me: and the Romans ſuppoſing that as many and oftentimes as they were repulſed, it was by my treaſon, cried out continually to the Emperor to execute me for a Traitor. But Titus well experienced in the changes of War, pacified the violence which his Souldiers intended againſt me, by his ſilence. And after the City of Ieruſalem was taken, Titus often ſollicited me to take that which I liked among the ruines of Ieruſalem, promiſing to give it me. But I making but ſmall account of any thing after the ruine of my Countrey, beſought him that he would give me certain free-men, and the Sacred Bible, which I received for a great conſolation in my miſeries. All which he graciouſly granted me. Not long after having beg'd my M Brother, and fifty other of my friends, they were given me, and I was refuſed in nothing. Entring into the Temple by Titus permiſſion, I found a great number of priſoners ſhut up therein, and all thoſe women and children of my friends and familiars, whom I knew, I delivered them, to the number of one hundred and ninety, without paying any ranſom: and I reſtored them to their former free condition. Being ſent with Cerealis and one thouſand Horſe into the City of Tecoa by the Emperour Titus, to ſpie if the place were fit for a Camp; in returning from thence I ſaw divers priſoners, who were on the Gibbet, among which were three of my familiars; whereat I was grieved in my ſoul, and I came and ſignified the ſame unto Titus with tears: who incontinently commanded that they ſhould be taken down, and as carefully dreſt and cured as might be: two of which died notwithſtanding the utmoſt diligence of the Phyſicians, and the third ſirvived. G

Joſeph repaireth with Titus to Rome, and is honorably entertained by Veſpaſian.

After that Titus had appeaſed the troubles of Judea, conjecturing with himſelf that the poſſeſſions which I had in Jeruſalem, would yeeld me but little profit, by reaſon of the Roman Garriſon that ſhould be placed there, he planted me in a poſſeſſion in a champain countrey: and intending to embark himſelf to depart for Rome, he took me with him in his own ſhip, and did me great honour. As ſoon as we came to Rome, Veſpaſian had great care of me; for he lodged me in his own houſe, where he kept before he was Emperor, and honored me with the title of a Citizen of Rome, & gave me an annual penſion in money, and as long as he lived, continued his good affection towards me, forgetting no kind of bounty which he might uſe towards me. Whereupon I was ſo much envied, that I grew in danger thereby H
Joſeph envied and ſlandered. to loſe my life. For a certain Jew called Jonathan having ſtirred up a ſedition in Cyren, and gathered about him ſome two thouſand Inhabitants of the Countrey, was the cauſe of their overthrow: and as touching himſelf, being bound by the Governour of that Countrey, and afterwards ſent unto the Emperor, he ſaid it was I that had ſent him Arms and money. But Veſpaſian knew his falſhood, and condemned him to death, and commanded him to be executed. After this, mine enemies objected divers crimes againſt me in regard that I was in good reputation: but God ſo wrought that I eſcaped them all. Moreover, I received in gift from Veſpaſian an ample poſſeſſion in Judæa, and at that very time I forſook my wife, becauſe her manners pleaſed me not, although ſhe were the mother of my three children, of whom Joſephs third wife. two are deceaſed, and the third, who was called Hircanus, is yet alive. After this I married a wife that was born in Candy, and was by Nation a Jew, and by birth noble, and one of the I greateſt reputation amongſt the inhabitants, endowed with as laudable manners, as any other vertuous woman whatſoever; as her after-life moſt plainly expreſſed. By her I had two ſons, Juſtus, who was the eldeſt, and Simonides, who was alſo ſirnamed Agrippa. Thus far as touching my domiſtical affairs. That bounty which I received from the hands of the Cæſars, hath always continued mine. For after Veſpaſians death, Titus, who ſucceeded him in the Empire, continued the ſame favour which his father had ſhewed me. For although I were oftentimes accuſed, yet were not mine adverſaries believed. Domitian, who ſucceeded him,
The perpetual favor of the Cæſars towards Joſeph. augmented mine Honors. For he puniſhed thoſe Jews that accuſed me, and gave order that the Eunuch and ſlave whom I kept to teach my Son, and by whom I was accuſed, ſhould be puniſhed. He granted me exemption alſo from all the tributes of Judæa, which is one of the greateſt Honors that a man may receive. And as touching Domitia the Emperors wife, ſhe always continued her good affection towards me. Behold here the ſhort recital of my whole life: whereby let each man conjecture of my manners as him liſteth. But, O thrice excellent Epaphroditus, after I have given and offered thee all this antient Hiſtory of our Nation. I will for this preſent pauſe in this place.

TO

The Right VVorſhipful, His eſteemed Friend, Mr. Anthony Palmer, Eſq.

SIR, my affection that had rather be an Actor, than an Orator (do well, than ſpeak well,) hath pickt you out to be the Patron of this Tragical Hiſtory of the Wars of the Jews. The reaſons that drave me hereunto, are neither the expectance of worldly benefits, nor the fruitleſs up-ſhot of oſtentation: but your vertue (which is not beloved reſpectively, but only for it ſelf) hath created this good conceit in me, which (if you ſo pleaſe) your acceptance may continue. Now ſince, as the Philoſopher ſuppoſeth, it is an action worthy a good man, to do good unto his friend; ſo it is no leſs commendable to accept an office of kindneſs from a friend. For by giving, we bewray our well-wiſhing; and by receiving, we proportion and continue friendſhip: upon this ground I pray you build the good entertainment of my Preſent, and nouriſh this good cuſtom in me (which was uſual both amongſt Grecians and Latins) I mean my Tranſlation: which if it pleaſe you, I have my wiſh. As for my maligners, I expect no worſe from them than Jaſon the Theſſalian, who being aſſailed and wounded by an enemy (who had an intent to kill him) had an Impoſtumation opened, that ſaved his life: their ſtab and ſtrook of diſgrace ſhall cure and heal the hidden and neglected infirmities of my mind; and notwithſtanding, I ſhall both Genio & ingenio live to love you, and lament their want of Charity. Thus heartily commending me, I haſtily take my leave, being tied prentiſe of late to other mens importunities.

Your loving Friend,

THO. LODGE.

By FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS,

The Son of MATTHIAS.

As touching the War and destruction of the JEWS.

The Preface.

In which the Author taxeth divers Hiſtorioghraphers of untruth; and declareth his intent, and ſpecifieth the principal points of this Hiſtory.

The duty of an Hiſtoriographer, and how things that are paſt ſhould be written.

Forasmuch as the War which was enterprized betwixt the Jews and Romans, hath (amongſt all other) been the greateſt that either hath been attempted in our age, or heard of in any other; either between City and City, or Nation againſt Nation: there have been ſome, who (rather building their diſcourſe on the vain and unprobable report of others, than their own judgments) have (according to the manner of Orators) made a Hiſtory of their hearſay, and have filled their diſcourſes not only with vanity, but alſo with contradiction. Others there were (who for that they were witneſſes or actors of the ſame (have according to their own fancies preferred many lies; either to flatter the Romans, or exerciſe their hatred againſt the Jews: forging ſomewhiles accuſations, otherwhiles breaking out into praiſes, without any obſervation of Hiſtorical verity. For this cauſe, I Joſeph the Son of Matthias, by birth an Hebrew and a Citizen and Prieſt of Jeruſalem: who in the beginning of theſe Wars bore arms againſt the Romans, and afterwards (being thereunto forced by neceſſity, was preſent at all thoſe things, which were attempted and proſecuted in thoſe Wars; have thought good to diſcourſe in the Greek tongue (in favour of all thoſe who acknowledg the Sovereignty of the Roman Empire) all that which heretofore in my own Language I have imparted to thoſe Barbarians that inhabit the Eaſt. For at ſuch time (as I have already ſpoken) as theſe moſt bitter and buſie Wars took their beginning, the Romans were at Civil wars among themſelves: and as touching the Jews (who were in years valiant, and in wits turbulent) they being both ſtrong in power, and rich in money, did ſo inſolently abuſe the time, that being animated by the greatneſs of thoſe Seditions and troubles; they ſomewhiles ſwam in hope, ſometimes ſweltring in fear of poſſeſſing or loſing certain Sovereignties in the Eaſt. For the Jews hope was, that all thoſe of their Nation (even they who inhabited the parts beyond Euphrates) would have both followed them in their Rebellion, and ſeconded their follies with their Forces. Moreover, at that time the Frenchmen (who bordered upon the Romans) ſuffered them not to live in peace: and the Germans alſo began to take Arms. Finally, after the death of Nero ſeditions reigned every where: ſo that by reaſon of the opportunity of theſe times, many men went about to make themſelves Kings, and the Souldiers whetted on with the covetous deſire of gain, deſired nothing more than trouble and alteration. For which cauſe, I think it a matter both worthy reproof, and ill-beſeeming my reputation, if in ſo weighty affairs, I ſhould ſuffer the truth to be ſmothered in uncertainties, and ſhould permit the Parthians, Babylonians, and the furtheſt diſtant Arabians, and thoſe of our Nation inhabiting beyond Euphrates, together with the Adiabenites, to obtain the true knowledg of thoſe events by mine induſtry; whileſt the Grecians, and divers of thoſe, who have not born Arms with the Romans, being diſtracted with factions, and deceived by adulation, ſhould be ignorant hereof. Yet ſome of theſe there be, who (notwithſtanding their falſe informations) ſtick not to write Hiſtories, Joſeph himſelf had a hand in the Wars of the Jews.

After Neros time all things full of trouble.

Joſeph firſt writeth this Hiſtory in the Hebrew tongue before.

not only void of all truth, but also no ways answerable to the subject which they undertake. For whilest they labour to dignifie and extol the Romans, they altogether suppress the fame and fortunes of the Jews: yet cannot I conjecture by what means they may be held great, who triumph in the conquest of men so obscure and abject. Nay, whilest they thus extol the Romans valour in conquering the Jews, they nothing at all respect the continuance of the wars, nor the multitude of the Roman Souldiers, nor the honour of their Captains, whose titles are much embased, if they (having laboured so much to conquer Jerusalem) should have any thing derogated from the honour and prosperity of their attempts. For mine own part, I am not resolved to contradict those, who shall enhance the glory and noble actions of the Romans, neither to extol and dignifie the deserts of mine own Nation, but my resolution is in all truth and sincerity to set down each occurrent, without respect or partiality towards either part. In performance whereof, I will fashion my discourse according to the matter I entreat of, and as my grief and sorrow shall invite me, to lament the miseries of my Countrey: For the civil dissension that dismembred the same, was the cause that brought it to confusion: and those Tyrants that reigned amongst us, were such, who forcibly drew the Romans with sword and fire to seek the desolation of our holy Temple. The truth whereof Titus Cæsar himself can justifie, who destroyed the same; who during all those Wars still pitied the people, for that they (as he well perceived) were kept in awe by the Seditious: and who oftentimes of his own accord deferred the surprizal of the City, purposely protracting the Siege, to the intent that in the mean time the authors of the Sedition and bloody wars might have leisure to repent & submit themselves. Now if any man think that I write this, as one that exclaimeth against the Tyrants and their thieveries; or that in bewailing the miseries of my lost Countrey, I accuse their villanies, and thereby transgress the limits of a History, let it be imputed to my grief, and so pardoned. For amongst all the Cities that ever were governed by the Romans, our City only attained to the top of felicity, which now alas is brought into extreme misery, captivity and desolation. Nay, if all the misfortunes and calamities which the World from the beginning hath seen, be compared with the infelicity and fall of the Jews, they are slight and of no moment.

The glory of the Romans is diminished, if you derogate from their labours at the Siege of Jerusalem.

Titus his piety towards the Jews.

All calamities that happned sithence the beginning of the World, being compared with those the Jews suffered, are of no moment.

And to increase our sorrow, no Foreiners, but our own familiar friends and Countreymen have been the Actors of our Tragedy. This considered, if any man of too severe and Stoical judgment shall reprehend this my Lamentation, let such an one attribute the deeds I recount to the History which I write, and reserve the lamentations and sorrows thereof to me, who am the Historiographer: although in my mind I may justly challenge the smooth-tongued Grecians; for that (notwithstanding, these our so miserable and memorable Wars hapned in their days, in respect whereof all other former troubles were obscure and of no reckning) they have restrained their tongues and pens; and undertaken an over-curious silence, to the end they might carp at these with greater liberty, who undertake the publishing thereof: whom though in learning and eloquence they both exceed and outstrip, yet are they inferior unto them in the matter and subject they intreat of. For they forthsooth decipher and set down the valiant Acts of the Assyrians and Medes, as who should say, the antient Writers had but coldly and scarce conceitfully handled the same: and yet God knoweth, they come so far behind those antient Authors in their writings, as they neither second them in sence, nor equal them in understanding. For such as in times past published any worthy History, endeavored to write that which they themselves had seen: and for that each of them were eye-witnesses of those affairs they committed to writing, they more effectually performed all that which they promised, the rather, for that they accounted it to be an act of dishonesty, to report and publish lyes in stead of an History. And truly in my opinion that man is both worthy commendation and praise, who striveth by his studious endeavors, to Register not only the occurrences of times past, both also those memorable events that have hapned in his days: and he only and truly is to be accounted industrious, not that altereth and pruneth at his pleasure another mans works, but he that of himself compileth an History, whereof no man hath before-time written. For mine own part (the rather for that I am a stranger) I have been inforced to my no small labour and expence, to refresh the memory and truth of these events in the ears of the Greeks and Romans. For as touching their own learned men their mouths are always open to gains and controversies, and to this purpose their tongues still run on patens; marry, if they come to a History wherein they should both tell truth, and with great labour enquire of those things that are past, here are they mum, the travel is too tedious, the bit is in their teeth, so that they leave the matter to their performance, who are incapable and unapt both in style and study, to Register the noble Actions of Royal Princes.

The Grecian Historiographers overpass the Wars of the Jews with silence.

Who may rightly be called a Historiographer.

Since therefore the Grecians make no account of the truth of History, it behoveth us both to esteem and honour it. Now to discover unto you the Original of the Jews, what their estate hath been in times past, and after what manner they departed out of Egypt, to shew what Countries they conquered, and what Colonies they planted, were in my judgment both impertinent and to little purpose; considering that divers of mine own Nation have before my time made, and written an exact History of the noble attempts of our Ancestors: yea, many Greeks also have translated these mens writings into their own tongue; and have as truly, as rhetorically exemplified the same. I will therefore begin my History in that time where these Writers and our own Prophets ceased, and set down at large all those Wars that hapned in my time: and as for those things that exceed my knowledge and remembrance, I will only touch them briefly, and in a word or two. First, how Antiochus sirnamed Epiphanes, took the City of Jerusalem, and possessed the same for the space of three years, and six moneths: and finally, how he was driven out of that Countrey by the Asmoneans. After this I will set down the dissentions that hapned amongst Antiochus Successors for the Kingdom, and how by this means they drew Pompey & the Romans into the managing and medling with their affairs. How Herod likewise the Son of Antipater, being assisted by Sosius, utterly overthrew and cancell'd their felicity and Authority: and how in Augustus Cæsars time, and after the death of Herod, and during the Government of Quintilius Varro, a sedition was raised among the people: and how in the twelfth year of Neros reign the War began to take head and continuuance. That likewise which hapned in Cestius time, and what warlike executions the Jews performed in their first attempts and Revolts, how they strengthned the Cities and Forts about them, and Nero (hearing of the great overthrow which his Army received under Cestius their General, and fearing lest he should lose all) made Titus Vespasian the General of his Army, who being attended by his eldest Son, came into Judæa, accompanied with as great a company of Romans as he could possibly gather; what number of their Allies invaded and spoiled Galilee, what Cities they surprized in that place, either by forcible assault, or by any other composition. Besides all these things, I will express what order and discipline the Romans observe in their Wars, and wherein they are accustomed to exercise their Souldiers. I will note down also the places and nature of the Countrey of Galilee, and the description of Judæa, together with the Mountains, Lakes, and Fountains thereof, with all the properties of the same; not forgetting those miseries which the captive Cities suffered: neither how they were surprized. All which (together with all those evils and miseries which during those troubles befel me) will I discover and discourse with all truth and diligence, the rather in that I publish them in their ears, who are no ways ignorant of them.

Antiochus Epiphanes, the first author and Fountain of the Wars of the Jews.

The Epitome of the Wars of the Jews.

After this I will set down how (upon the declining and downfal of the Jews) Nero died; and how at such time as Vespasian had undertaken the expedition to Jerusalem, he was with-held from the action, to receive and enjoy the Imperial dignity: and how at that instant when he returned himself into Egypt to establish that estate, the Iews began to mutiny among themselves, how many Tyrants arose among them, who hatched much civil discord and debate in their Government. Again, how Titus departing out of Egypt, came the second time into Iudæa, and ranged over the Countrey, and how and where he levied and encamped his Armies. How and how oftentimes the City hath been vexed by sedition, especially at such time as he himself was present. What onsets he gave, and how many Mounts he raised in begirting the City with a treble wall: the strength and provision of the City, the scituation and plat-form of the Temple, and the Altars therein: the Rites and Ceremonies which were used upon Festival days, the seven Purifications and Offices of the Priests: the Garments also of the High Priest, and the holy Sanctuary of the Temple. All which I will recount without any dissimulation, or swerving from the truth of History. After this I will relate what cruelty the Tyrants used against their own Countreymen, and what humanity the Romans shewed unto strangers, and how oftentimes Titus (who desired the safety both of the City and Temple) provoked and invited the seditious to mutual amity. Furthermore, I will report how the people of the Iews (after these many and grievous wounds which they both suffered and sunk under, sometimes by war, otherwhiles by sedition, and many times by hunger) were at length overthrown to their utter confusion. Neither will I omit the slaughter of such as revolted, neither the punishment inflicted on those that were captive: but I will set down how the Temple was burned against Cæsars will, and what an infinite mass of sacred treasure was devoured by the fire.

The manners and sacrifices of the Jews.

The humanity of the Romans towards the Jews.

But to shut up the History, I will annex the surprizal of the City, and what signs and wonders hapned before the same: the Captivity also of the Tyrants themselves, and the number of those that were led away into Captivity: and what misery every one of them endured: how the Romans continuing their wars, utterly raised the fortresses of their Captives: Finally, how Titus in travelling thorow the whole Countrey established a form of Government therein; and afterward returning into Italy, triumphed with much honour. All these things have I comprehended in seven Books, endeavouring as much as in me lieth, to flie and avoid all occasion of reproof, and reprehension from those men, who knew these affairs, and were actors in the wars. All which I have done for their sakes, who rather affect truth, than follow their pleasure: and according to that order and form I have proposed, I will begin and prosecute my Style and History.

CHAP. I.

How Jerusalem was destroyed by Antiochus.

The year of the World, 3882. before Christs Nativity, 162.

AT such time as Antiochus, sirnamed Epiphanes, made War against Sextus Pompeius for the whole Government of Syria, there arose a sedition among the Jews: wherein every one endeavoured himself to have the Sovereignty over others; and those of chiefest Authority and Nobility amongst the rest, disdained to submit themselves to such as were their equals. At that time a certain man called Onias (who was one of the High Priests) having gotten the upper hand, did drive the Sons of Tobias out of the City; who flying to Antiochus for refuge, besought him in all humility that he would lead his forces into Judæa; offering themselves to be his guides in that expedition and voyage. Antiochus (who long before that time desired such an occasion) easily condescended to their request; and levying a great Army, entred their Countrey, and took the

A the City by force, and ſlew the moſt part of them, who favoured Ptolomey : and giving his Souldiers liberty to ſack the City, he himſelf ſpoiled the Temple alſo ; and for the ſpace of three years and ſix moneths forbad all ſacrifices and ceremonies, which before-time were accuſtomed and uſed in that place. Whereupon Onias the High-Prieſt fled unto Ptolomey, and having obtained a grant of a piece of ground from him, within the liberties and precincts of Heliopolis, he built a Town and Temple in that place, reſembling the City and Sanctuary in Jeruſalem.

But neither was Antiochus ſatisfied with the unexpected ſurprize of the City, nor with the pillage and ſlaughter of the Citizens, but was ſo far tranſported by his paſſions, and incenſed with the remembrance of thoſe evils which he ſuſtained during the ſiege of the City, that he compelled the Jews to forſake the cuſtoms of their Countrey, commanding them from that time forward to uſe no more Circumciſion of their Children, but that they ſhould B immolate ſwine upon the Altar: which when all of them joyntly refuſed to obey, the moſt conſtant among them were for that cauſe put to death. Bacchides being made chief of the Garriſons by the appointment of Antiochus, what with his innated cruelty, and the impious commandment that was left him, omitted no occaſion to further his wicked impiety, inſomuch as he particularly tormented ſuch as were of Noble birth, and Quality : that each day for the moſt part, he repreſented unto them the freſh face and memory of the deſolation of their City : till all of them at laſt being provoked and whetted on through the grievouſneſs of that which both themſelves and others indured, addreſſed themſelves with confidence to proſecute their revenge. At length Matthias the ſon of Aſmoneus, one of the Prieſts, C who was born in a Village called Modin, accompanied with his five Sons and his own houſhold armed with ſwords, ſlew Bacchides : and fearing the power and multitude of the enemies Garriſons, preſently retired himſelf into the Mountains. Thither reſorted divers of the people unto him : for which cauſe he waxing more confident and couragious, came down from the mountains, and overcoming the Captains of Antiochus, drave them out of the borders of Judæa. At ſuch time therefore as through his happy ſucceſs he became potent, and was by common conſent of the people (for that he had delivered them from the ſubjection of ſtrangers) made their Ruler : he died, leaving his eldeſt Son who was called Judas, to ſucceed him in the Government. Who fearing leſt Antiochus would ſtill continue Wars againſt him, gathered together an Army of his Countreymen, and was the firſt among the D Jews that made a League with the Romans ; and drave back Antiochus Epiphanes at ſuch time as he enforced himſelf once more to invade the borders of Judæa, repulſing him with a great overthrow. And whereas the remembrance of this victory was yet freſh in mens minds and memory, he aſſaulted the Garriſon of the City : for as yet they were not deſtroyed (in which conflict he forced them to forſake the higheſt part thereof, which is called Holy) and betake themſelves into the lower part : and having obtained the Temple, he made every place clean, and compaſſed it with a wall, and made new veſſels for the ſervice of the Temple, and planted them therein, becauſe thoſe that had been before-time conſecrated there, were prophaned : He builded likewiſe another Altar, and began to renew the accuſtomed ſacrifice, and obſerve the Rites of Religion.

E Scarcely was the City brought to the former eſtate, but Antiochus died, who left a Son and Heir behind him, who was not only inheritor of his Kingdom, but alſo of his hatred againſt the Jews : who having gathered together fifty thouſand footmen, and almoſt five thouſand Horſmen, and fourſcore Elephants, entred by the mountains of Judæa ; and took a town called Bethſara, near which Judas met him in a place called Bethzachary, where the paſſage was ſomething ſtrait : and before the Armies joyned battel, Eleazar Judas Brother, ſeeing one Elephant higher than the reſt, bearing a great tower on his back, and adorned with golden furniture, thinking Antiochus had been there, ran from his company, and breaking the ranks of the enemies, he came unto the Elephant : but he could not reach him (whom he deemed to be the King) he was ſo highly mounted ; for which cauſe wounding F the Elephant in the belly, the Elephant fell upon him, and preſſed him to death : which act of his had no other ſucceſs but this, that by attempting ſo great a matter, he gave a teſtimony that he preferred his renown, before his life.

Now he that governed the Elephant was but a private perſon, and although by hap Antiochus had been there, Eleazar had atchieved nothing elſe in this valiant attempt ; but yet he adventured his life, under hope to perform ſome valiant exploit. And this act of his was a preſage unto his Brother of the event of the whole War that enſued. For the Jews fought ſtoutly, and a long time ; but yet Antiochus army (being both more in number and more proſperous) obtained the victory ; ſo Judas therefore after the loſs of many of his company, fled unto unto the Gophonites, with those of his side who escaped: And Antiochus went to Jerusalem, from whence after some stay he departed for want of necessaries, leaving a sufficient Garrison; as for the rest of his Army, he led them for the Winter time into Syria. Yet notwithstanding the Kings departure Judas rested not: but encouraged by many of his Nation, who daily came unto him, and gathering also together those who escaped out of the former Battel, at a Village named Adasa, he fought with Antiochus Captains, where after much and many approbations of his valour in assaulting and slaughtering a great number of his enemies, he himself at length was slain, and within a few days after, his Brother John also was betrayed, and slain by their treacheries who favoured Antiochus.

Of the Succession of Princes, from Jonathan until Aristobulus.

The year of the world, 3805. before Christs Nativity, 159.

AFter him succeeded his Brother Jonathan, who carefully studied for the peace and security of his people, and fortified himself by the friendship of the Romans, and was reconciled to Antiochus his Son; yet did none of all these things profit him, or quit him from danger. For the Tyrant Tryphon (who was tutor to Antiochus) laying wait for him, and seeking to spoil him of his friends took Jonathan at such time as he came with a small company to Antiochus who was at Ptolemais, and binding him, led an Army against Judæa: from whence being repulsed by Simon, Jonathans Brother, and overcome by him, in displeasure and revenge thereof, he slew Jonathan.

But Simon valiantly bestirring himself in the Government and guide of the affairs of the Common-wealth, took Zara, Joppe, and Jamnia (which were bordering towns: And overcoming the Garrison at Accaron, he destroyed the City, and assisted Antiochus against Tryphon who besieged Dora, before that expedition which he made against the Medes. Yet would not the greedy mind of the King be satisfied, notwithstanding that Simon had thus faithfully served and assisted him in the death of Tryphon; but that within short time after, he sent unto Cendebeus (who was the General of the Army) commanding him to sack and spoil Judæa, and to take Simon and make him a slave. But Simon though aged in years, fought both youthfully and valiantly, and sent his Sons with the most resolute men he had, before, against Antiochus, and himself with the residue of his Army, assaulted another quarter of their enemies Camp; and having laid many ambushes even in the mountains, he in every place was victorious: and after this his most famous victory, he was proclaimed High Priest, and delivered the Jews from the Government of the Macedonians, under which they had been two hundred and seventy years. Finally, by the treachery of Ptolomeus his Son-in-law, he was murthered at a Banquet; who imprisoning his wife and two Sons, sent certain men to kill the third Son, whose name was John, otherwise called Hircanus. But the young man understanding the success of his Fathers voyage, hasted unto the City accompanied with a great multitude; for he greatly hoped that the people would remember his Fathers prowess, especially because Ptolomæus iniquity was hated of all men; Ptolomæus also hasted to enter the City at another gate: but he was speedily repulsed by the people, who had already received Hercanus. For which cause he presently retired himself into a Castle named Dagon, situate beyond Jericho.

After that Hercanus had obtained the office of the high Priest, which was left him by his Father, and had offered sacrifices unto God, he led forth his forces with all speed against Ptolomæus, hoping to help and deliver his mother and brethren that were detained Prisoners with him: and assaulting the Castle, notwithstanding that in all other things he had the better hand yet was he overcome by just grief and compassion. For at such time and so often as Ptolomæus perceived himself to be in danger, he brought Hircanus Mother and Brethren upon the wals, and beat them where he might behold them in their torments, threatning to cast them down from the wall, except Hircanus would presently depart. For which cause Hircanus was more moved with compassion and fear, than with anger and wrath. But his Mother being no ways dismayed with stripes which she endured, nor with death wherewith she was threatned, lifted up her hands to her Son, beseeching him that in regard of her miseries, he would not be moved to spare so impious a person, for she esteemed her death threatned by Ptolomæus, dearer than immortality it self; if so be he might receive just punishment for the villany which he had impiously commited against their house. But when John had perceived the resolute mind of his mother and heard her entreaty, he was moved to assault the Castle, and straightway seeing her beaten and torn, he relented with compassion, and was

By which means the Siege continued long, and the Jubilee year was come, which falleth out every ſeventh year: wherein the Jews ceaſe from all affairs, as their wont is every ſeventh day. Ptolomæus delivered from the Siege by this accident and occaſion, put Johns mother and his brethren to death, and afterwards fled to Zeno the Tyrant of Philadelphia, who was alſo ſirnamed Cotylas.

In the mean while, Antiochus being grievouſly vexed at that which Simon had done unto him, ſent his Army into Judæa, and beſieged Hircanus in Jeruſalem, who opening Davids Sepulcher (who had been one of the richeſt amongſt all the Kings of Judæa) took more than three thouſand Talents of money from thence; and wrought ſo much with Antiochus, that upon the payment of three hundred talents of money, he made him raiſe the Siege and depart
B the Countrey. This Hircanus was the firſt of all the Jews that with his own goods maintained out-landers and Souldiers. But ſo ſoon as Antiochus had bent his power and forces againſt the Medes, he took handfaſt of that opportunity he had offered him, to revenge himſelf, and preſently aſſaulted the Towns of Syria, aſſuring himſelf he ſhould find them (as indeed they were) void of Souldiers to defend them. Whereupon he took Medaba and Samea, with the places thereunto adjoyning, Sichem and Garizim, which border upon the Cuthæans, who inhabit the places adjoyning to the Temple, that is made after the imitation of that which is at Jeruſalem. Moreover, he took many Cities of Idumæa, and amongſt the reſt Doreon and Mariſa: and coming into Samaria (where now Sebaſte is ſcituated, which was builded by Herod) he beſieged it on every ſide, and left his two ſons Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, to continue the C Siege, who diligently beſieged the place. There was ſuch a famine in the City, that they were conſtrained to eat unaccuſtomed meats. For which cauſe, they required aid of Antiochus, ſirnamed Spondius, who willingly aſſiſted them, but he was overcome by Ariſtobulus and Antigonus, and was purſued by the aforeſaid brethren unto Scythopolis, whither he then retired himſelf: but they retiring again unto Samaria, beſieged the City, and at laſt taking it by force, deſtroyed the ſame, and led away their inhabitants captives. Whileſt thus fortune favoured them more and more, they ceaſed not to purſue their good ſucceſs, but led their Army to Scythopolis: and taking it, they divided and ſpoiled all the Countrey.

Of Ariſtobulus, Antigonus, Judas Eſſæus, Alexander, Theodorus, and Demetrius.

THis felicity and good hap of John and his Sons, was accompanied with the envy of many of his Countrey-man: and this diſcontent of theirs, was the cauſe of a mutiny. For divers of the Jews riſing up in Arms againſt them, were ſo much overruled by their ambitious paſſion, that they could not contain themſelves from the proſecution of an open and bloody War: wherein notwithſtanding they were put to the worſt. From
E that day forward John paſſed the remainder of his life in all felicity and happineſs; and after he had governed the Common-weal for the ſpace of thirty three years, he departed this life, leaving behind him five valiant ſons. He was a man truly happy, and ſo favoured by fortune, that he had no occaſion to complain of her niggardice in bounty. Finally, he alone might juſtly boaſt himſelf of three excellent endowments. Firſt of all, that he was the Prince of his Countrey: Secondly, that he was High Prieſt: Thirdly, a Prophet, to whom God ſo ſpake, that he was ignorant of no future accidents. He foreſaw and foretold that his two eldeſt Sons ſhould not continue long in the Government (whoſe lives are worth rehearſal, although they much declined from their fathers felicity:) for the eldeſt Son Ariſtobulus,
F after his fathers death tranſlated the Principality into a Kingdom; and was the firſt that put a Crown on his head; four hundred, eighty and one years, and three moneths, after the deliverance of the people from the captivity of Babylon. As for Antigonus (who was his ſecond brother, and whom in appearance he ſeemed to love moſt intirely) he made him partaker of his dignity, and committed the reſidue of them to priſon. He impriſoned his mother alſo, for that ſhe had contended with him as touching the Principality, (which John had ſolely committed to her diſpoſe) and was ſo far given over to all kind of cruelty, that he not only kept her priſoner in bonds, but alſo put her to death by famine. But the revenge of his impiety was this, that he ſlaughtered his own brother Antigonus, whom he intirely beloved, and made both a Competitor and Partner with him in the Kingdom. For by reaſon of thoſe ſcandalous ſlanders, which his envious and malignant Courtiers contrived and invented againſt him, he commanded him to be put to death.

Nevertheless, upon their first information, Aristobulus (overmastered by brotherly affection) gave them no credit; the rather for that he was certainly assured, that all things for the most part which were objected against him, were rather enforced upon envy, than alleadged on good ground.

Antigonus in honour of his brother ascended up into the Temple.

But when as Antigonus returned from the War, attended with many testimonies of his valour and prowess, upon that Festival time, wherein according to the custome of our Country, we celebrate the Feast of Tabernacles; it hapned at that time, that Aristobulus fell sick and was diseased. Antigonus therefore about the end of those Festival days being attended by his armed men, ascended up into the Temple to offer sacrifice, and the rather resorted he thither in greater Pomp and Majesty, because he intended to honour his brother. Hereupon, certain cursed and wicked detractors repaired to the King, buzzing in his ears, that this great guard of Souldiers which accompanied Antigonus, and that his haughty resolution and Kingly presence, was rather for a Sovereign, than a Subject: inferring hereby, that he entred the City in this Equipage, with an intent to murther him, not contenting himself to have the only honour of the Kingdom, except he might reduce the power and possession thereof into his own hands. Aristobulus though unwillingly, yet at last being won to believe them, desirous (in seeming not to suspect) to shew himself provident, commanded his Guard to hide themselves in a certain obscure place under the ground: as for himself he took up his lodging in a certain Castle, which in times past was called Bari, and afterwards Antonia: giving his Archers this Commission, that if Antigonus came unarmed, they should let him pass; if otherwise, that they should kill him. He sent certain messengers also to Antigonus, repuiring him to repair unto him disarmed. But the envious Queen prevented this good intent of his by a subtil stratagem complotted and acted by those, that with her conspired against him. For she perswaded those that were put in trust to discharge this message, to discover nothing of that which the King had commanded them: but to signifie unto Antigonus, that his brother having intelligence that he had made himself many accomplished and compleat Armours, with other fair and worthy furniture for the War in Galilee (which by reason of Antigonus sudden departure from that place, and his own instant infirmity he might not behold) would count it no little favour and felicity to behold and see him in his warlike Ornaments. Which when Antigonus understood (who by reason of his brothers disposition suspected no mischief) he armed himself, and resorted unto him intending to delight and content him with his musters. But no sooner arrived he in the streight, which is called the Tower of Straton, but the Guard of Aristobulus set upon him, and slaughtered him, yielding by this means a demonstrative and certain testimony, that detraction distracteth and destroyeth all good nature and friendship, and that amongst all our most accounted affections, there is no one so defended and fortified as may abate the edge of envy.

Aristobulus commandeth his guard, that if Antigonus came armed, they should kill him.

The Queens cunning Stratagem against Antigonus.

Antigonus suspecteth not his brother.

At this time also who would not wonder at a certain man called Judas? who being by birth an Essean, was blessed with this felicity in his Prophecies, that his predictions were neither touched with mistaking, nor tainted with lying. This man perceiving how Antigonus passed thorow the Temple, cried out to his familiars who attended him in no small number (for ordinarily divers of his disciples did attend upon him:) Ah, how happy were it for me at this present, if I were dead, sith that truth dieth before me; and some one of my predictions are found faulty and deficient? For behold Antigonus yet liveth, who should this day have dwelt with death. The place which was destinated for his departure is the Tower of Straton, which is distant from this place some six hundred stounds, and yet notwithstanding, there are but four hours of the day to be past: now therefore is the time wherein my divination shall be falsified. Having spoken to this effect, the old man sate him down being altogether disconsolate and pensive, until such time as within a while after it was told him that Antigonus was slain in a place under ground, which was called the Tower of Straton, being of the same name with Cæsarea which is scituate upon the Sea-coast; which was the occasion that Judas staggered in his divination.

Judas the Prophet foreelleth Antigonus death.

Aristobulus through the grief he conceived at his brothers death falleth sick.

The sorrow which incontinently seized Aristobulus, for committing this hainous murther, augmented and increased his sickness in such sort, that his soul was continually troubled with the thought of his sin, and his body through extreme heat of passion dried up; and the grief that he felt was so vehement, that his entrails became exulcerate, so that he voided blood in great abundance. And it so fell out by the Divine Providence, that one of his servants, who was deputed to that office, bearing out that blood which came from him, missed his way, and came to that place where Antigonus had been slain, wherein as yet there appeared some signs and stains of the blood shed of Antigonus, on which he powred out the blood of the murtherer Aristobulus. Which when they perceived who stood hard at hand, they began

to

A to cry out with a loud voice, as if the ſervant had purpoſely ſpilled the blood in that place, Ariſtobulus hearing this cry, demanded the cauſe thereof; and the more that each man fled and feared to diſcover the ſame unto him, the more inſtantly ſought he to underſtand the truth; ſo that at length after he had uſed threats and violence, he was certified by ſome one of that which had paſt. Whereupon his eyes were ſuddenly filled with tears, ſo that in vehement agony of mind, he at laſt cried out and ſaid: it is impoſſible, but that the great eye of the Divine Majeſty ſhould ſee my wicked acts, and the ſudden vengeance of my Brothers bloodſhed ſhould purſue and overtake me. How long, O thou impudent body, wilt thou detain a ſoul already condemned and adjudged to my Mother and dead Brother? How long ſhall I thus lingeringly languiſh in ſpending a parcel of my blood unto them? Let them take
B it all at once, and let not the Divine vengeance laugh any longer to ſee the effuſion of mine entrails. This ſaid, he died after he had ſcarcely reigned one year.

His wife after his death delivered his Brother Alexander from priſon, and anointed him King, who was both the eldeſt, and ſeemed to be the moſt ſtayed among the reſt of his brethren. Who growing by this means to be both proud and potent, put one of his brethren to death, for aſpiring and hunting after the Kingdom: as for the other that remained alive, in that he contented himſelf with a private and contemplative life, he kept him near about him. He made war alſo againſt Ptolomey that was called Lathyrus, who had ſurprized the City of Aſoth, and put a great number of his enemies to the ſword: nevertheleſs, Ptolomey ſide ob-
C tained the Victory, who retiring himſelf into the Countrey of Egypt, by reaſon that his Mother Cleopatra purſued him with open war; Alexander forcibly entred the City of Gadara, and the fort of Amathunt (which was one of the greateſt of all thoſe that were round about Jordan) in which place Theodore, Zenos Son had hoorded up his chiefeſt and moſt precious movables, who ſuddenly ſetting upon him, recovered all that which was his, and furthermore laid hands on the Kings carriage: in ſeizing which, he ſlaughtered many Jews, to the number of ten thouſand. But Alexander, after he had recovered this loſs, invaded the frontire Towns upon the Sea-coaſt, and won Raphia, and Gaza, and Anthedon, which afterwards by King Herod was called Agrippias. But after he had conquered and overcome theſe places, the common ſort of the Jews raiſed a mutiny againſt him during a certain ſolemn and holy Feaſt: for all mutinies and ſeditions are commonly raiſed at banquets: and it is D thought that he could not have prevailed againſt thoſe treacheries, had he not been aſſiſted by the Piſidians and Cilicians, whom he hired to help him: for the Syrians, he refuſed to hire them, by reaſon of their natural hatred they bare againſt the Jews. Having therefore ſlain eight thouſand of the Rebels, he warred upon Arabia; and overcoming the Galaadites, and Moabites (and impoſing upon them a tribute) he returned to Amathunt: and whereas Theodorus was daunted with his proſperous ſucceſs, he finding the Caſtle without any to defend it, razed it unto the ground. After this, he preſently aſſaulted Oboda, King of the Arabians, who having laid ambuſhments in the Countrey of Galaad, in a place fit for ſuch a purpoſe, diſcomfited him and his whole Army, being driven thence into a deep valley where they were peſtered with a multitude of Camels.

The ſedition of the Jews againſt Alexander upon a feſtival-day.

Alexander aſſaileth the Caſtle of Amathunt, and razeth it.

E But Alexander eſcaped unto Jeruſalem, where the people who had conceived a hatred againſt him, being encouraged by his great loſs and ſlaughter of men, began again to rebel: but then alſo he overcame them, and in ſix years ſpace, at ſundry battels he ſlew above fifty thouſand Iews: notwithſtanding he never rejoyced in his victory, becauſe the ſtrength of his Countrey was conſumed thereby. For which cauſe giving over his wars, he began to ſeek the peoples favour by ſweet and milde ſpeeches: but they ſo much hated his inconſtant and variable manners, that when he demanded of them what he might do to win their favors, they anſwered, If he would die, for that ſcarcely they would pardon him if ſo be he were dead, who had committed ſo many hainous crimes. And thereupon the Iews ſent unto Demetrius, ſirnamed Acærus for help, whom in hope of great rewards came and joyned
F his forces with the Iews about Sichem: where Alexander met them both, with a thouſand Horſmen and ſix thouſand footmen, that were hired (having at that time ten thouſands Iews his favourites) and of the contrary part there were three thouſand Horſmen, and fourty thouſand footmen. Before the fight began, the two Kings ſent Meſſengers unto one anothers Army, perſwading one anothers men to forſake their Colours and Captains: for Demetrius hoped that Alexanders hired men would have forſaken Alexander and come unto him, and Alexander hoped that the Iews that followed Demetrius, would have left Demetrius and come to him. But when both parts perceived that the Iews continued obſtinate in their purpoſe, and the Greeks kept their fidelity, the two Armies encountred; in which encounter Demetrius had the upper hand (although Alexanders hirelings evidently shewed strength and courage.) But the end of this victory was such, as neither party expected: for they who sent for Demetrius, after his victory did forsake him; and fortune changing her colours, six thousand Jews fled unto Alexander into the Mountains, whither for safety he had betaken himself. This revolting much displeased and discouraged Demetrius, for he now thought that Alexander uniting his Forces, was able to bid him Battel, and he feared that all the Jews would at that present follow Alexander: for which cause he returned home. Yet the rest of the Jews having thus lost the help of Demetrius, would not for all this desist from their rebellion; nay, they so long warred with Alexander, till at last (the most of them being slain) he drave the rest into the City of Bemeselin, and when he had surprized and sackt the City, he led them captives into Jerusalem. But immoderate anger turned his cruelty into impiety: for having crucified eight hundred captives in the midst of the City, he killed their wives, and the children he massacred before their Mothers faces; and this pitiful spectacle he beheld with pleasure, drinking and making merry with his Concubines. Whereat the people were so terrified, that the night after, eight thousand of the contrary part fled out of the Countrey of Judæa, who stayed in banishment during the life of Alexander. Thus, after he had by those actions sought for the tranquility of his Kingdom, which he obtained not but with long time and great difficulty, he ceased to make war against his Countrey.

CHAP. IV.

Of the War of Alexander with Antiochus, and Aretas, and of Alexander and Hircanus.

After this, Antiochus, (who likewise was called Dyonisius, the Brother to Demetrius, who was the last of all the race of Seleucus) raised up new broils against Alexander, who fearing him because he had prepared war against the Arabians, drew a deep trench along that ground which lieth between Antipatris, and the Sea-coast of Joppe: and before the trench he builded a very high wall, and raised Towers of wood to hinder his enemies passage. But all this could not keep out Antiochus, but that burning the Towers, and filling up the trenches, he entred and passed over them with his Forces. And not tarrying at that time to revenge himself of him who had thus forbidden him passage, he presently marched forward against the Arabians. But the King of Arabia retiring himself into certain places of his Countrey which were fittest for defence, and returning suddenly to Battel with his Horsmen (who were in number 1000) rushed hastily upon Antiochus Souldiers, and found them unprovided; so that a hot skirmish began betwixt them, in which the Souldiers of Antiochus, whilest he lived, shewed themselves valiant (though they were on every side massacred by the Arabians) but so soon as he was slain (who was always ready to assist those that were in danger) all of them fled: and the greatest part of them were slain in the Battel and in flight; as for those that escaped, they fled into the town of Cana, where they all (except very few) died for hunger. After this, the people of Damascus being incited by the hatred they bare to Ptolomey the Son of Mineus, sent for Aretas, and established him King over Cœlosyria: who warring against Judæa, and overcoming Alexander in Battel, retired himself upon composition. Alexander having taken Pella, resorted once more to the Town of Gerasa, in that he was desirous of Theodorus Riches: and took the place, notwithstanding that it was fortified with three walls, and that upon every wall there was planted a Garrison. He took Gaulan, and Seleucia, and that Town which is called the Valley of Antiochus. Moreover, having taking Gamala, which was a most strong Castle, and imprisoned the Governour thereof, who was called Demetrius, because he was a wicked person, he returned into Judæa, after he had spent three years in war: where for his prosperous success he was joyfully received of his Nation. But no sooner ceased he from war but he fell sick, and falling into a quartane Ague, he thought that he should drive away his sickness, if he employed himself in some business: for which cause being notrid of his disease, he applied himself to War, and labouring above his strength, amidst those tumults, yeelded up the ghost in the 27 year of his reign: leaving the Kingdom to Alexandra his wife, fully accounting that the Iews would in all things obey her, because that she always by misliking and seeking to hinder his cruelty and iniquity, had won the hearts of the people. Neither was he deceived; for she being admired for her piety amongst them, obtained the Principality: the rather for that she was well acquainted with the Customs of her Country, and even from her

She had by Alexander two Sons, the eldeſt was called Hircanus; whom by reaſon of his years ſhe proclaimed high Prieſt, and becauſe of his dull nature, ſhe thought that though he were in Princely authority, yet he would moleſt no man: and therefore alſo made him King. As for the youngeſt Son Ariſtobulus, becauſe he was of a hot ſpirit, ſhe was willing that he ſhould lead a private life.

Hircanus firſt made High Prieſt, and afterwards King.

Now there was a certain Sect among the Iews, which were called Phariſees, who joyned themſelves with the Queen: theſe people were thoughr to be of the godlieſt ſort, and to be more skilful than other, in interpreting the Scriptures: and for that cauſe Alexandra favoured them the more, becauſe ſhe was ſuperſtitiouſly given to Religion. Theſe having by little and little inſinuated themſelves into the favour of a ſimple woman, now did domineer at their pleaſure, diſplacing, diſpoſing, impriſoning, and reſtoring to liberty whom they pleaſed, for no other purpoſe, but that they might enjoy the profits and commodities of the Kingdom; and Alexandra bare all charges. This Queen was alwaies deſirous of high attempts, and daily ſtudied to encreaſe her wealth: ſhe levied two Armies, and hired a great many ſtrangers: whereby ſhe did not only ſtrengthen her own Country, but alſo made her ſelf to be feared of other nations. She ruled others, but her ſelf was ruled by the Phariſees, who at laſt killed Diogenes, who was a gallant man, and highly in favour with King Alexander; affirming that through his counſel, the King commanded thoſe eight hundred before mentioned to be crucified: and further, they perſwaded the Queen Alexandra, that ſhe ſhould put to death all others, through whoſe counſel Alexander her husband had been incited againſt thoſe eight hundred. The Queen being blinded with ſuperſtition, thought it unlawful to deny any thing which they requeſted: ſo that they put to death whom they pleaſed, till ſuch time as the chiefeſt of thoſe, who were in this danger, in humble wiſe came to Ariſtobulus, who perſwaded his mother to ſpare them for thir dignity, and baniſh others, whom ſhe thought had deſerved puniſhment: who having obtained their liberty, diſperſed themſelves thorow the whole Country. Now Alexandra ſent an Army to Damaſcus, and becauſe Ptolomæus dayly vexed the City, ſhe took it without doing any thing worthy of memory: ſhe did ſollicite Tigranes King of Armenia with gifts and promiſes (who with an Army had beſieged Ptolemais wherein Cleopatra was) but he for fear of troubles in his own Countrey, in that Lucullus had entred into Armenia, withdrew himſelf from thence.

The Phariſees by their envy and accuſations are the death of many good men.

In the mean time Alexandra being ſick, her youngeſt Son Ariſtobulus with his ſervants (which were many in number, all truſty, and in the heat of their young years) got all the Caſtles, and hiring Souldiers with the money he found in thoſe Caſtles, he proclaimed himſelf King. But Alexandra (pitying the complaints of Hircanus) impriſoned the wife and children of Ariſtobulus in a Caſtle near unto the North part of the Temple, which in old time was called Baris (as we ſaid before) afterwards Antonius being Emperour, it was called Antonia, as in like manner Sebaſte and Agrippias, other Cities were named of Auguſtus and Agrippa. But Alexandra died before ſhe could revenge Hircanus of the wrongs which Ariſtobulus had done him. This Queen reigned nine years, and left Hircanus in poſſeſſion of all, whom during her life time ſhe had advanced to the Kingdom. But Ariſtobulus being both ſtronger in power, and more eſteemed in authority, encountred with his brother about Jericho, where many of Hircanus ſouldiers forſaking their King, fled unto Ariſtobulus: for which cauſe, both he and the remnant of thoſe that followed him, were forced to flie into the Caſtle called Antonia, where he found hoſtages to redeem them. For (as we have already ſaid) Ariſtobulus with his wife and children were impriſoned in that place: leſt any worſe miſhap ſhould betide him, he concluded a peace, upon condition that Ariſtobulus ſhould be King, and that he as brother to the King, would content himſelf with other dignities. Upon theſe conditions they were made friends in the Temple, where in the preſence of all the people, they in moſt friendly ſort embraced each other: which when they had done, they changed houſes, and Ariſtobulus went into the Kings Palace, and Hircanus unto Ariſtobulus houſe.

CHAP. V.

Of the War between Hircanus and the Arabians; and of the taking of Jeruſalem.

Antipater perſwadeth Hircanus to flie to Aretas King of Arabia, and to crave his aſſiſtance to recover his Kingdom.

NOw a ſudden fear invaded all the enemies of Ariſtobulus, when they ſaw him (contrary to all expectation) made King; and eſpecially Antipater, above all others, whom Ariſtobulus a long time had hated. This Antipater was an Idumæan born, and for his nobility and riches, was the chiefeſt and beſt reputed of his Nation. This man perſwaded Hircanus to flie unto Aretas King of Arabia, and crave his help to ſet him in his Kingdom. Furthermore, he perſwaded Aretas likewiſe to receive Hircanus, and to help him to recover his Kingdom, ſpeaking much againſt the manners of Ariſtobulus, and praiſing Hircanus; adding that he being King of ſo famous a Nation, ought to aſſiſt thoſe who were unjuſtly oppreſſed; and that Hircanus had manifeſt injury offered him, being forced to forſake his Kingdom, which by the right of ſucceſſion was due unto him. After he had thus made his way, he in the night time took Hircanus, and fled with him forth of the City: and making all haſte poſſible, they arrived at a Town called Petra with ſafety (which is a Town where the Kings of Arabia were accuſtomed to keep their Court) there he delivered Hircanus into the Kings hands, and through many gifts and entreaties obtained the favour that he might be conducted into his Kingdom. And to the effecting of the ſame, Aretas gave him an Army of fifty thouſand Horſe and Foot: which power, ſince Ariſtobulus was not able to reſiſt, he was overcome upon the firſt onſet, and was forced to flie unto Jeruſalem: and he had been ſurely taken, if Scaurus a Captain of the Romans by taking opportunity at thoſe troubles, had not raiſed the Siege. For Pompey the Great (who warred againſt Tigranes) ſent him out of Armenia into Syria: who coming to Damaſcus, found it newly taken by Metellus and Lollius; who diſmiſſing them from thence, and finding how matters ſtood in Judæa, haſted thither in hope of a booty. So ſoon as he entered into the confines of the Countrey, both of the brethren ſent Embaſſadors unto him, deſiring him to take their parts: but Ariſtobulus having ſent him 300. talents, he neglected to do Juſtice; for having received that ſumme, Scaurus ſent meſſengers unto the Arabians and Hircanus, threatning the diſpleaſure of the Romans and Pompey, except they would preſently raiſe their Siege: for which cauſe Aretas being much abaſhed, returned out of Judæa unto Philadelphia, and Scaurus repaired unto Damaſcus. Yet ſufficed it not Ariſtobulus, that he had eſcaped from being taken, but that gathering all his forces together, he purſued his enemies: and joyning battle with them about Papyron, he ſlew ſix thouſand of them, in which number was Cephalon, Antipaters brother. But Hircanus and Antipater being deſtitute of the Arabians help, were driven to hope for ſuccour even at their adverſaries hand. For which cauſe, as ſoon as Pompey after he had entred Syria came to Damaſcus, they in humble manner came to him, and giving him many gifts, proteſted unto him that which before they had done to Aretas; earneſtly requeſting him, that he would conſider the violence offered by Ariſtobulus, and reſtore Hircanus to the Kingdom: to whom both by years and manners it was due.

Mean while Ariſtobulus ſlept not, but having corrupted Scaurus, came in as Royal Pomp as he could; but not abiding to debaſe himſelf, and thinking it diſparagement in more abject manner than beſeemed a King to ſeek his own commodity, returned from Dioſpolis. Whereat Pompey being angry, at the requeſt of Hircanus and his followers, he went againſt Ariſtobulus, accompanied both with the Roman Army and the Syrians, who aſſiſted them. When they had paſſed Pella and Scythopolis, and came to Corea (where the confines of Judæa begin) as they paſſed thorow the midſt of the Country, they underſtood that Ariſtobulus was fled to Alexandrium (which was a Caſtle richly built and ſcituate upon a very high hill.) Pompey arriving in that place ſent meſſengers unto him, commanding him to deſcend; but he becauſe he was called in queſtion about the Kingdom, determined rather to hazard himſelf, than obey. But when he ſaw that the people began to fear, and that his friends willed him to think of the power of the Romans, whoſe ſtrength he was no wayes able to reſiſt: he followed their councel, and came unto Pompey: where having alleadged many reaſons to ſhew that he had juſt Title unto the Crown, he returned again into the Caſtle. And afterwards being urged by his brother to come and plead his Title, he came and returned thither again, without contradiction from Pompey. Thus wandred he betwixt hope and fear, and doubting how the matter would go with him, he came to Pompey as it were to entreat him to pardon all, and returned again unto the mountain, leſt he ſhould ſeem to derogate any thing from the Majeſty of a King: yet becauſe Pompey willed him to depart from his Caſtles, and to warn his Governours thereof to do the like (whom he had commanded to diſobey, except they received letters written by his own hand) in this he fulfilled Pompeys mind: yet being angry and diſcontented, he departed into Jeruſalem, and now fully determined to fight with Pompey. But Pompey not thinking it beſt to let him have time to prepare himſelf, followed him with all ſpeed, and ſo much the willinger, becauſe that near unto Jericho he had news of Mithridates his death, even in the fruitfulleſt place of Judæa, where there are great ſtore of palms and balm. This balſom is a ſhrub, whoſe ſtem being cut with ſharp ſtones, droppeth balm out of the wounds thereof, which men gather as it droppeth from the wounds thereof. After he had reſted there that night, he in the morning haſted to Jeruſalem: At whoſe ſudden arrival Ariſtobulus being daunted, in humble manner came unto him, and

A and promiſing him money, and to yield himſelf and the City into his hands, he by this means appeaſed Pompeys anger. But he performed no part of his promiſe; for Ariſtobulus his aſſociates would not ſuffer Gabinius (who was ſent for the money) to enter into the City: For which cauſe Pompey being moved to diſpleaſure, put Ariſtobulus in hold: and coming near the City, he took a view at what place it might be eaſilieſt entred, for he did not lightly perceive how he might batter the walls, they were ſo ſtrong. Moreover, there was a huge ditch before the wall, and hard by he beheld the Temple ſo ſtrengthned, that although the City were taken; yet it might be a ſecond refuge for the enemy. Whileſt thus he long deliberated what to do, there aroſe a ſedition within the City, wherein Ariſtobulus confederates thought it meet to fight, and deliver the King out of priſon: but thoſe that favoured Hircanus, would that the gates ſhould be opened to Pompey. At laſt Ariſtobulus friends having the B worſt, fled into the Temple; and to the end that they might fight it out to the laſt, they cut down the Bridge by which men go out of the City into the Temple. When the reſt had received the Romans into the City, and delivered unto them the Kings Palace, Pompey ſent a Captain called Piſo with Souldiers to ſeize the ſame; who leaving a Garriſon in the Town (ſeeing he could perſwade none of them that were in the Temple to peace) prepared all places about it to batter it. All which time Hircanus and his friends ſhewed themſelves ready to help them with councel, and to do whatſoever they were commanded. Pompey at the North ſide filled the ditch and valley with all kind of matter, which his Souldiers carried: although that by reaſon of the huge depth, and for the depth, and for that the Jews made reſiſtance, it was a hard thing to be done: and it had been left undone, had not Pompey (obſerving C the ſeventh day, wherein the Jews Religion forced them to abſtain from all labour) cauſed it to be filled up thoſe days; forbidding the Souldiers to fight at that time, to the intent he might fill the ditch more conveniently (for it was lawful for the Jews only to fight for their bodies upon the Sabbath.) At laſt when the ditch was filled, and the Towers were built upon the rampire, he beat the wals with thoſe engines that he brought from Tyre; but they were beaten back by thoſe who reſiſted from the top of the walls, who darted divers ſtones at them. Againſt the violent power whereof, the Towers that were builded in that quarter, being of a great and goodly building, reſiſted as valiantly, and as long as they poſſibly could. But the Romans found it but hard meaſure in this place, and Pompey admired the D conſtancy of the Jews; who being amongſt the thickeſt of their enemies darts, yet omitted not any ceremony: but (as though they had firm peace) they every day obſerved their ceremonies, offered ſacrifices and offerings, and moſt diligently obſerved all honour and divine ſervice: yea, in the very taking of the place, although every day they were killed at the Altar, yet did they not ceaſe from the lawful rites of their Religion. At laſt in the third moneth of the Siege, whereas ſcarcely one Tower was beaten down, they brake into the Temple, and the firſt that attempted to climb over the wall, was Fauſtus Cornelius, Silas ſon, and after him two Centurions, Furius and Fabius with their Regiments; who compaſſing the Temple about (while ſome ſought to hide themſelves, and other ſome reſiſted) they ſlew them all. There were many Prieſts alſo among the reſt; who, although they ſaw the enemies with naked ſwords ruſhing upon them, yet being nothing at all diſmayed thereat, continued ſtill their ſacrifices; and were ſlain even whileſt they offered and incenſed in the Temple: preferring the duty they ought to Religion, even before their own ſafety. Many alſo were ſlain by their own Countrey-men that favoured the adverſe part: and many caſt themſelves down head-long upon the rocks; otherſome in their fury having deſperately fired all things upon the walls, burned themſelves for company. So that there, twelve thouſand Jews were ſlain, but very few Romans, yet many were hurt: and amongſt all that Maſſacre, there was nothing ſo lamentable, as that the holy Sanctuary (which never any man ſaw before that time) was revealed to Strangers. Finally, Pompeius accompanied with his followers, came into the Temple where it was lawful for none but the High Prieſt to come, and ſaw the candleſticks, lamps, table, cenſers, and all the golden veſſels, and whatſoever was within the Temple. Moreover, he beheld the great quantity of odoriferous drugs, which were kept in ſtore in that place, and two thouſand Talents of holy money: yet did he not take away theſe things, nor any thing elſe belonging to the Temple. But the day after it was taken, he commanded the Sacriſtans to purge and make clean the Temple, and to offer ſolemn ſacrifice. He likewiſe proclaimed Hircanus High Prieſt (who had in all things ſhewed himſelf very forward, and eſpecially at the time of the Siege: as alſo for that he hindred a multitude of Swains (who addreſſed for War) from joyning themſelves with Ariſtobulus) and therefore like a good Captain got he the good will of the people more, by love, than by fear.

Amongſt others that were captives, there was Ariſtobulus father-in-law, who was alſo his uncle: as for those that had been the chief cause of these wars, Pompey caused them to be beheaded. He rewarded Faustus likewise; and those who fought valiantly with him, with very rich gifts, and imposed a Tribute upon Jerusalem, and took from that Nation the Cities which they had gotten in Cœlosyria: and appointed them to be governed by him who then was President for the Romans; making them keep within the bounds of their own Countrey. And in favour of Demetrius of Gadara (a libertine of his) he reedified Gadara, which the Jews had destroyed: he delivered the Mediterranean Cities from their Government (for they had not as yet destroyed them, because they were suddenly prevented) namely, Hippon, and Scythopolis, and Pella, and Samaria, and Marisa, and Azotum, and Jamnia, and Arethusa. The Towns also upon the Sea-coasts, Gaza, and Joppe, and Dora, which before was called Stratons Tower, and afterward by Herod was altered, who builded most sumptuous buildings in that place, and called it Cæsarea: All these Cities he restored unto the Inhabitants, and made them under the rule of Syria. And of this place, and Judæa, and of all places from the Borders of Egypt unto Euphrates, he made Scaurus Governor, leaving him two Legions of Souldiers. Which done, he took his journey to Rome by Cilicia, leading Aristobulus and his Family captives, who had two daughters and two sons, the elder whereof called Alexander, escaped in the way: As for the younger, whose name was Antigonus, he with his sisters was carried to Rome.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 9.

AT that time Scaurus took his journey into Arabia: but by the difficulty of the place he was so hindred, that he could not come to Petra, yet wasted he all the Countrey adjoyning to Pella; although whilest he stayed to do this, he endured much evill: For there arose a great famine in his Army, notwithstanding that Hircanus by Antipater means he sent them victuals. Scaurus also sent the same Hircanus as his familiar friend unto Aretas, to perswade him that by disbursing some money, he should work his peace. Upon whose motion Aretas condescended, and gave him three hundred Talents, and so Scaurus with his Army departed out of Arabia.

In the mean time Alexander the son of Aristobulus (who in the way to Rome escaped from Pompey) gathered together a great Army, and desperately set upon Hircanus, wasting all Judæa, which he hoped quickly to win; yea, the wall which was destroyed by Pompey at Jerusalem, had been builded up again as he hoped, had not Gabinius (who was sent into Syria to succeed Scaurus) who had oftentimes before shewed his valour, at that time also with an Army come against Alexander. Who fearing the worst, assembled all the forces that he could to make resistance, so that he had ten thousand footmen, and a thousand and five hundred horsemen; he fortified also the commodious places of the Countrey, to wit, Alexandrium, Hircanium, and Machærunt, which were near unto the mountains of Arabia. Gabinius sent Marcus Antonius before him with part of the Army, and followed after with the rest; and certain chosen men out of Antipaters company, and other companies of the Jews, whereof Malichus and Pitholaus were made chief, joyned themselves with Marcus Antonius; and presently after them followed Gabinius with all his company, who all went to meet Alexander.

But Alexander perceiving himself unable to encounter with all their united forces, fled: but drawing near unto Jerusalem, he was constrained to hazard the fight, where losing to the number of six thousand (whereof some three thousand were taken alive, and other three thousand slain) he escaped with the rest. But Gabinius, as soon as he came to the Castle called Alexandrium, understanding that many had forsaken their places, he by promising them pardon sought to unite themselves unto him before the War began: but when he perceived that they hammered on no abject resolution, he slew the most of them; as for the rest, he shut them up in the Castle. In this battle Captain Marcus Antonius did many things worthy of renown, and although he had always and at all times shewed himself valiant, yet there especially his valour appeared. Gabinius leaving some to win the Castle, went unto the Cities, and strengthned those that were not yet assaulted, and re-edified those that were destroyed, and by his commandment Scythopolis, and Samaria, and Anthedon, and Apollonia, and Jamnia, and Raphia, and Marisa, and Dora, and Gadara, and Azotus, and many more began to be inhabited; so that their Inhabitants joyfully peopled and dwelt therein. Which when he had done, he returned to Alexandrium, and began a more urgent siege: whereat Alexander being terrified and made desperate, he sent Embassadors to him, beseeching him to pardon his

This woman accosted and flattered Gabinius, for that she feared lest her Husband and the rest of the Captives at Rome should be any ways damnified. After this, Gabinius carried Hircanus to Jerusalem; and committing the Temple unto his charge, he made others of the Nobility Rulers of the Common-wealth, and divided the whole Nation of the Jews into five parts and Governments, whereof one was established at Jerusalem, another at Doris, the third at Amathunt, the fourth at Jericho, the fifth at Sephoris a City of Galilee: and the Jews being delivered from the Government of one man only, willingly suffered themselves to be ruled by the Nobility. But shortly after, Aristobulus escaping from Rome raised new troubles: who gathering a great Army, partly of those that desired a change, partly of them that loved him before, took Alexandrium, and began to compass it again with a wall: but hearing that Gabinius had sent Sisenna, Antonius, and Servilius against him with an Army, he went to Macherunt; and forsaking those that were not fit for War; he took with him almost 8000. armed men, amongst whom was Pitholaus Governor of them that were revolted, who with 1000 men fled out of Jerusalem. But the Romans followed and pursued them: and joyning Battel with them, Aristobulus with his men fought valiantly, till being by force overcome, the Romans slew five thousand of them, and almost two thousand fled into a Mountain; and the other thousand breaking the Ranks of the Romans with Aristobulus, were forced to Macherunt; where the King hiding himself the first night amongst the Ruines, hoped that having respit, he might gather another Army, and fortifie the Castle: but having for two days sustained the forces of the Romans, although unable to do it; at last was taken: and with his Son Antigonus, who had been imprisoned with him at Rome, he was carried to Gabinius, and from thence to Rome; and the Senate put him in prison: but his Sons they sent into Judæa, because Gabinius writ that he had so promised Aristobulus his wife, upon condition the Castles might be yeelded. Now Gabinius being prepared to war against the Parthians, Ptolomeus hindred him, who returning from Euphrates went into Egypt, leaving Antipater and Hircanus his friends to dispose of all things belonging to the war: for Antipater helped him with money, weapons, corn, and men, and he perswaded the Jews who kept the ways that lead unto Pelusium, to suffer Gabinius to pass. Now in the other part of Syria, at the departure of Gabinius there began a commotion, and Alexander, Aristobulus Son once more incited the Jews to Rebellion, and having gathered a mighty power, purposed to destroy all the Romans that were in that Countrey: which Gabinius fearing (who was returned out of Egypt at the beginning of these tumults) he sent Antipater before, who perswaded some of the Rebels to be quiet, yet 30000 remained with Alexander. For which cause he was very forward to fight; and went out to battel: the Jews came against him, and neer unto Itabyrium they fought, where 10000 were slain, and the rest were put to flight: and Gabinius returned to Jerusalem through the Counsel of Antipater: who having established that estate, went from thence and overcame the Nabathæans in Battel: he likewise permitted Mithridates and Orsanes privily to depart, who were fled from the Parthians, saying, that they had escaped from the Souldiers. In the mean time Crassus, who was appointed to be his Successor, had Syria delivered him, who toward the maintenance of the Parthian wars, took all the gold that was in the Temple of Jerusalem, & 2000 talents which Pompeius had forborn to do: who passing over Euphrates, was both himself and his whole army utterly overthrown: of which thing it behoveth us not to speak in this place. After the death of Crassus, the Parthians endeavoured themselves to enter Syria; but Cassius who succeeded him in the Government, repulsed them: and having gotten the upper hand he speedily resorted into Judæa, and taking Tarichea, he carried away about 3000 men captives; and put Pytholaus to death, for gathering a company of seditious people unto Aristobulus his part. He that caused and counselled his death was Antipater, who was married unto a Noble woman of Arabia called Cypris, by whom he had four Sons, Phasælus and King Herod, Joseph, and Pheroras, and one daughter called Salome; who sought the friendship of all Potentates round about him by courtesie and hospitality, and especially he got the good will of the King of Arabia by affinity, unto whose fidelity he committed his Sons, because he had undertaken the wars against Aristobulus. But Cassius made a truce with Alexander, and in the mean time went to Euphrates to hinder the passage of the Parthians, of which we will speak hereafter.

Cæsar delivereth Aristobulus from his bonds. Aristobulus and his Son slain by Pompeys friends.

AFter that Cæsar had forced the Senate and Pompey to flie beyond the Jonian Sea; and by that means made himself sole master of all at Rome, he set Aristobulus at liberty, and with two Legions of men sent him in haste into Syria, hoping through his means speedily to win both it, and also all places adjoyning to Judæa: but both the hope of Cæsar, and the forwardness of Aristobulus, was overthrown through envy: for he was poysoned by Pompeys favourites, and even in his own Countrey his body lay unburied, which notwithstanding was preserved from putrefaction with honey, till such time as Antonius sent it unto the Jews, commanding them to bury it in the Kings Sepulchre. His Son Alexander also, was beheaded at Antiochia by Scipio, being first according to the tenour of Pompeys Letters accused before the Tribunal seat, of such things as he had committed against the Romans, Ptolomæus the Son of Minæus, who ruled Chalcis which was under Libanus, having taken his Brethren, sent his Son Philippio with them to Ascalon; and he violently taking away Antigonus and his sister from the wife of Aristobulus, brought them to his father, and falling in love with the youngest, took her to wife: for which cause, he was afterward put to death by his father. For Ptolomæus having slain his Son, married Alexandra; and for that affinity sake, was more careful for her Brethren. After the death of Pompey, Antipater sought all means to get Cæsars favour: and when Mithridates of Pergamenus was hindred by the Garrison at Pelusium to pass any further with an Army into Egypt, and was by that means stayed at Ascalon, he perswaded the Arabians to assist him, the rather, because he was but a stranger, and he himself seconded him with almost three thousand armed Jews.

Moreover, he incited the Potentates of Syria, and Ptolomæus who inhabited Libanus, and Jamblicus, and another Ptolomæus to assist him; for whose sakes the Cities of that Countrey did willingly undertake the Wars. And now Mithridates strengthned by Antipaters means came to Pelusium, and because they would not suffer him to pass, he besieged the City, in which siege Antipater shewed his valour: for making a breach on that side of the wall, where his Quarter was, he first of all with his company brake into the City, and so Pelusium was taken. But the Inhabitants of Onias Countrey, who were Egyptians and Jews, suffered him not to pass any further: yet did Antipater handle the matter so discreetly with them, that they did not only suffer him to pass, but also provided victuals for his Army. Whereupon the City of Memphis would not fight, but yeelded of their own accord unto Mithridates: so that passing thorow Delta, he fought with the other Egyptians in a place called the Tents of the Jews; and being with all his company in danger, he was rescued by Antipater, who marching along the River side, set upon and discomfited the left wing of the Enemies battel, and rushing upon them that pressed upon Mithridates, he slew many, and pursued the rest that fled, till he got their Tents, and all with the loss of fourscore men. But Mithridates flying, lost eight hundred men, and being against all hope preserved out of those wars, was without all envy a true witness before Cæsar of all that which Antipater had both done and deserved. Whereupon Cæsar redoubled his courage with praise and promises unto him, and made him forward to hazard himself for him. In a word, he proved and shewed himself a stout Warriour, and having many wounds in every part of his body, he bare a badge and testimony of his valour and vertue. Afterward when the estate of Egypt was quiet, he returned into Syria, where he made him a Citizen of Rome, and granted him the immunities thereof: and did so honour him in other things, and used him so friendly, that he made him a pattern for all to imitate: and for his sake confirmed Hircanus in the High-Priesthood.

CHAP. VIII.

How Antipater was accused before Cæsar: of the Priesthood of Hircanus, and how Herod made war.

Antigonus Aristobulus Son cometh to Cæsar to accuse Pompeys friends for his fathers death.

AT the same time, Antigonus the Son of Aristobulus repairing to Cæsar, against his will was a cause of Antipaters greater felicity: for coming to complain of his Fathers death (who was, as it was thought, through Pompeys envy poysoned) and to accuse Scipio of cruelty, which was used against his Brother; whereas he should have abandoned all passion sion which moved him to mingle hatred with his miseries, contrariwise he accused Hircanus, and Antipater, as though they had unjustly driven him and his brethren out of their Native soil, and grievously injured the people, to obtain their intent; alledging that they had sent aid into Egypt to Cæsars forces, not for good will, but for fear of antient enmity, and that hereby they might acquit themselves of the good will they bare to Pompey. At these words Antipater (casting away his vesture) shewed the number of his wounds, saying, it was not needful to use words, to prove what affection he had born to Cæsar; for his very body should shew it, although he himself held his peace: adding, that he admired the impudent boldness of Antigonus, who being Son to an enemy of the Romans, and a fugitive from the Romans, and still continued his Fathers purpose, Novelty and Sedition, should dare to accuse others before the Roman Emperor, demanding of him how he durst hope to obtain any good thing, who ought to be contented with his life only: alledging that he craved not maintenance for that he wanted, but that he might raise a Rebellion amongst the Jews, and against them who should bestow any thing upon him.

Antigonus falsly accuseth Hircanus and Antipater.

Antipater casting of his garment, sheweth his many wounds.

Which when Cæsar heard, he said that Hircanus was most worthy to be High Priest, and bad Antipater wish what dignity he would have: who leaving that to the pleasure of the giver, he was made Governor of all Judæa. And moreover, he obtained to re-edifie the razed walls of his Country, and Cæsar commanded that those honours should he engraven in the Capitol, that it might be a token in time to come of Antipaters justice and vertue. Antipater having attended Cæsar out of Syria, first of all repaired the ruined walls of his Country which Pompey had razed: and going thorowout all the Countrey he threatned the obstinate, and perswaded the seditious to obedience, admonishing them that if they obeyed Hircanus, they might live in wealth and peace, and enjoy happiness, and an universal felicity; but if they suffered themselves to be led with the vain hopes of those, who for their private commodities sought for alteration, that then they should find him in stead of a Procurator, the Lord of all; and Hircanus in stead of a King, a Tyrant; and the Romans and Cæsar, in stead of friends, deadly enemies: for that they would not suffer his power to be overthrown, whom they themselves had established for King. But notwithstanding he spake these words, yet (because he saw Hircanus more dull, and not of so fervent a spirit as the care of the Kingdom required) he himself setled the estate of the Countrey, and made Phasælus his eldest Son Governor of the Army, and the Lord of Jerusalem, and of his own living, and sent Herod his youngest Son to govern Galilee (although he was very young.) who being by nature of a valiant courage, found out a present occasion to shew his brave mind; for he took Ezechias which was Captain of Thieves, who as he understood was wont to prey upon the confines of Syria with a great multitude, and put him to death with many other Thieves: which thing was so grateful unto the Syrians, that in all Towns and Villages they made songs of Herod, as though he had restored them to peace, and to their possessions.

Herod banisheth the Thieves out of Syria.

At length, the glory of this fact came to the ears of Sextus Cæsar, who was Cæsar the Emperors Kinsman, who then ruled Syria. Phasælus also did strive to overcome the towardness and good reputation of his Brother, by dayly increasing, and winning to himself the good wills of the Inhabitants of Jerusalem: so that during the time he governed the City, he did nothing insolently through might or power: for which cause the people honoured Antipater as their King, and reverenced him as Lord of all, yet was his fidelity and good will never the less towards Hircanus. But it is impossible that any man that liveth in prosperity, should not be envied. For Hircanus, although before time he were moved something at the glory of these young men, and especially with the prosperous success of Herod, being often annoyed with frequent Messengers, who spred his praise for every thing he did; yet in particular he was stirred up by many envious persons, who are wont to haunt the Courts of Princes, who were grieved that Antipater and his Sons ruled without offence. These men told Hircanus that he only enjoyed the bare name of a King, and that Antipater and his Sons ruled all; and that he so long would permit and wink at them, till that at the last, they would make themselves Kings; for they now did no more as such as pretend themselves to be Procurators. But leaving that Title, they took upon them the dignities of Lords and Masters, without any regard or reverence towards him; for Herod had put to death a great multitude of Iews against the Law, whereas neither by word of mouth, nor by writing, the King had given him any such authority: and that Herod, if he were not a King, but a private person was to be brought into judgment, there to answer the matter, and shew the King a reason, and satisfie the Laws of his Countrey; which permitted no man to be put to death, before by Law he was convicted. By these perswasions Hircanus grew angry: so that not concealing his wrath, he caused Herod to be sent for to answer the matter: who both for that his Father advertised him him thereto: and becauſe he truſted to the equity of his cauſe, firſt leaving a Garriſon in Galilee, he repaired unto the King; and came accompanied with a ſtrong Guard, leſt either he ſhould ſeem to derogate from Hircanus dignity, if he ſhould lead forth many; or that for want of defence, he ſhould expoſe himſelf to the envy of his Adverſaries. Sextus Cæſar alſo fearing the young man, leſt any evil ſhould betide him amongſt his enemies, ſent unto Hircanus, manifeſtly warning him to free Herod from the crime of Murther. For which cauſe Hircanus who loved Herod, and was willing ſo to do of his own accord, did acquit him. Whereupon, he ſuppoſing that he had eſcaped againſt the Kings will, went to Damaſcus unto Sextus, purpoſing not to obey, if hereafter he were ſent for. Nevertheleſs, Hircanus was once again incited by bad people againſt Herod, who certified him that he was gone away in a rage, and that he would enterprize ſomething againſt him: which Hircanus believing, knew not what to do, ſeeing his enemy more potent than himſelf.

Hircanus once more incited by the wicked.

Shortly after, Sextus Cæſar proclaimed him General of the Army, both in Syria and Samaria: ſo that now he was greatly to be feared, not only for that he was highly in favour with the Commonalty, but alſo for the forces which he commanded. So that hereupon Hircanus fell into an extreme fear, verily perſwading himſelf that Herod with his whole Army, would preſently come againſt him. Neither was his ſuſpicion in vain: for Herod angry at the pretended crime whereof he was accuſed, came with a great Army to Jeruſalem, intending to depoſe Hircanus; which he had effected had not his Father and Brother gone forth to meet him, and pacified him, intreating that he would account that terrour (wherein he had put his enemies) and his own indignation for a ſufficient revenge, and that he ſhould ſpare the King, by whoſe favour he came to be ſo potent: adding moreover, that he ſhould not think it a diſdain, that he was called to anſwer his accuſations; but ſeeing that he was acquitted of them, he ſhould ſhew himſelf grateful to the King. Neither ought he to revenge the diſcontent he had taken, that he ſhould ſhew himſelf unthankful to him who had ſaved his life. Moreover, he was to conſider the fortune of wars, together with the cauſe thereof, and think that the wars he now pretended were very unjuſt; bidding him not to be too confident of the victory, being to fight againſt his own King, who had always been gracious unto him, and never cruel; only being as it were urged thereunto, by ſome of his Councel, who being meerly envious, rather to ſatisfie their own miſlikes, than in regard of his diſgraces, framed a ſhadow of an accuſation. Herod pacified herewith, ſuppoſed it to be ſufficient for him to obtain the thing he hoped for, to have ſhewed his forces unto his Nation.

At this time began Civil war among the Romans neer unto Apamia: for Cæcilius Baſſus, for the love he bare to Sextus Pompey, ſlew Sextus Cæſar at unawares, and made himſelf Governor of his Army: and other Captains of Cæſars, to revenge his death, made after Baſſus with all their forces, unto whom Antipater by his two Sons ſent aid both for Cæſars ſake, that was ſlain, as for Cæſars ſake that was yet alive: for he was an intire friend, and well-willer unto them both, and theſe wars continuing long, Marcus came out of Italy to ſucceed Sextus.

Caſſius levieth money in the cities.

AT this time aroſe great and bloody Civil Wars amongſt the Romans, at ſuch time as Cæſar was traiterouſly ſlain by the treaſon of Caſſius and Brutus, after he had ruled the Empire three years and ſeven moneths. By reaſon of which murther their troubles daily increaſed, and the Nobility being at variance amongſt themſelves, every one followed that courſe, that they thought moſt expedient for themſelves. Whereupon Caſſius preſently marched into Syria, to take poſſeſſion of the Government of the Army which was about Apamia; where he made Marchus and the Legions that were at variance, and Baſſus friends: and raiſing the ſiege from Apamia, and leading the Army in his own perſon, he forced every City to be tributary; ſo that he grew to exact without meaſure. Whereas therefore he commanded the Jews to contribute ſeven hundred Talents, Antipater, who feared his diſpleaſure, appointed his Sons, and other of his friends preſently to gather the money; and eſpecially among the reſt, he gave this charge to one Malichus a friend of his, being of neceſſity enforced thereunto. But Herod firſt of all got Caſſius his favour, who brought an hundred Talents which he had collected out of Galilee, which was his part or Province: For this cauſe Caſſius accounted him as a dear friend. As for the reſt, he accuſed them of negligence, and was angry at the other Cities: So that for that cauſe he deſtroyed Gophna and Ammauntes, and other two of the baſeſt Cities; marching onward as if he intended to kill Malichus, for that he had been ſo careleſs and negligent in gathering the tribute tribute money. But Antipater (presently disbursing unto Cassius an hundred Talents) saved both him and all the rest of the Cities. Yet Malichus after Cassius was departed, did no more remember how beneficial Antipater had been unto him, but oftentimes did treacherously lie in wait for to murther Antipater, who hindered and withstood his villanous pretence; notwithstanding that himself had often confessed that Antipater had saved his life. Antipater, fearing both his power and subtilty, passed over the River Jordan to gather an Army, that he might revenge those treacheries. But Malichus being discovered, by his impudency overcame Antipaters sons: for through many oaths and excuses, he won Phasælus chief of the Garrison in Jerusalem, and Herod also who was master of the Armory, that they should be a means to reconcile him to Antipater. Whereupon Antipater intreating Marcus (who was General of the Army in Syria, and had determined to kill him) he was saved. The reason that Marcus would have put him to death, was, because Malichus sought to make an alteration.

Malichus forgetful of Antipaters kindness. Antipater gathereth an Army against Malichus.

Now Cæsar being young, and Antonius warring against Cassius and Brutus; Brutus and Cassius having gathered an Army in Syria, in consideration that Herod had stood them in stead where need required, they made him Procurator of all Syria; giving him a band of horsemen and footmen. Moreover Cassius promised him, that if the wars had an happy end, he would make him King of Judæa. But it so came to pass, that the power and expectation which all men had of Herod, was the cause of Antipater his fathers death. For Malichus being hereby put in fear, hired one of the Kings officers for a certain sum of money to poyson Antipater; by which means he died, being thus unjustly rewarded for his good will toward wretched Malichus. He was a worthy man and fit to govern, who had recovered the Kingdom being lost, for Hircanus. Malichus (perceiving that the people was incensed against him, because they suspected that he had poysoned Antipater) pacified and moderated their displeasure by denying the fact; yet to the intent he might be stronger, he gathered about him a Guard of armed men: for he thought that Herod would not let the matter slip so, but that he would presently come with an Army to revenge his fathers death. But by the counsel of his brother Phasælus (who sent him word that he should not openly be revenged upon Malichus, lest a sedition might arise among the people) he patiently permitted it so to be, and suffered Malichus to purge himself, and permitted him to be freed from suspition, and celebrated a most solemn funeral for his father: which done, he went unto Samaria, and appeased the sedition wherewithal the City was disquieted. After this he returned to Jerusalem, intending in that place to celebrate the Festivity, sending certain of his armed men before him, and appointing the rest to accompany him. But Malichus, who feared this approach of his, had sollicited Hircanus to give order, that no stranger should intermingle themselves among the people, who were at that time purified.

Herod intendeth to revenge his fathers death.

But Herod contemning both him that commanded, and his commission entered the City by night: whereupon Malichus once more came unto him, and wept for Antipater. Herod, although he could very hardly bridle his displeasure, yet dissembled he the same: and sent letters unto Cassius, wherein he complained of his fathers death: the memory of whose hate being refreshed by this offence, he writ again unto Herod, willing him to revenge his fathers death; which that he might the better effect, he secretly commanded the Captains of his Regiment that they should assist Herod. Now for that after the surprizal of Laodicea, all the best of the City came to Herod, bringing gifts and crowns, he appointed this for a fit time of his intended revenge. Now Malichus, suspecting that Herod would work revenge at Tyre, purposed secretly to get away his son, who was there a pledge, and he himself purposed to flie into Judæa: But despair of his own safety urged him to greater matters, for he hoped to incite the Jews to take Arms against the Romans, for that Cassius was now busie in the Wars against Antonius: so that he thought he might easily depose Hircanus, and so make himself King. But he was prevented by the destinies: for Herod suspecting his purpose, inviting him and Hircanus to supper: at which time he made a shew as though he had sent one of his servants, to cause a banquet to be prepared, but indeed he sent him to the Captains to foretell them that they might lie in wait for Malichus: who remembring what charge Cassius gave them, came forth of the City unto the shore next adjoyning unto the Town, all armed with swords; where compassing Malichus round about, they killed him with many wounds. Hircanus hereat astonished, fell in a swound, and being scarcely come to himself, he demanded who killed Malichus? One of the Captains answered, that Cassius gave the commandment: whereupon he answered, Truely Cassius hath preserved me and my Country, in killing him who was a Traitour to us both: but whether herein he spake as he thought, for that for fear he approved the fact, it is uncertain. And thus was Herod revenged upon Malichus.

How Herod was accused, and revenged.

Ant. lib. 14. cap. 20.

AFter Cassius was departed from Syria, there arose another sedition among them in Jerusalem: for Fœlix came with an Army against Phasælus, thinking so to be revenged upon Herod, for killing Malichus. It chanced that Herod at that time was at Damascus with Fabius a Roman Captain, who coming to assist Phasælus, by the way fell sick; so that he could not succour him: but it so fell out, that Phasælus without any help, did of himself overcome Fœlix, and therewithal reproved Hircanus as ungrateful, who had both favoured Fœlix, and suffered Malichus his brother to take and keep his Castles, (for already had he seized many of them, and especially one of greatest strength called Massada) yet all these did not [illegible] him from the violence of Herod, who was no sooner recovered of his sickness, but presently he took all the rest, and Massada: and at Hircanus humble sute, permitted him to depart from thence. He also chased Marion the Tyrant of the Tyrians out of Galilee, who occupied three Castles in that Countrey: as for all the Tyrians that he took, he spared their lives, and sent some away with rewards; whereby he got the good will of the City, and the hatred of the Tyrant. This Marion was made Tyrant of Tyria by Cassius, who, through the means of such like instruments, had gotten into his hand all Syria: and Marion for the hatred he bore to Herod, took with him Antigonus, Aristobulus his son: and by Fabius means, whom Antigonus had gained unto himself for money, he also got Ptolomæus to assist him in this expedition. Now Ptolomæus, who was father-in-law to Antigonus, furnished him with all necessaries: Herod likewise preparing himself against them, gave them battle in the entrance into Judæa, and got the victory: and having put Antigonus to flight, he returned into Jerusalem, where he was honoured by all men for his desart in that victory, so that even they that before despised him, by reason of his affinity newly contracted with Hircanus, sought his friendship and familiarity. This Herod long before this time had a wife which was a noble woman of that Countrey, named Doris, and had by her a son named Antipater; but he then married Mariamme, Alexanders daughter, who was Aristobulus his son, & Hircanus his neece, by reason whereof he came to be familiar with the King. But when Cassius was slain near unto Philippi, Cæsar departed into Italy, and Antonius into Asia; at which time the chief of the Jews came and accused Phasælus and Herod, alledging that they by force got unto themselves the rule and disposition of the Countrey, and left Hircanus only the bare name of a King. But Herod being then present, so won and wrought himself into Antonius favour by a great sum of money, that he permitted not his enemies to speak one word more; who thereupon returned home. Afterward an hundred men of the most honourable amongst the Jews, repaired to Daphne near to Antiochia unto Antonius (now doting on the love of Cleopatra) who being chosen from amongst the rest, because of their eloquence and Nobility of birth, propounded an accusation against the two brethren. Messala presented himself to return them answer, being assisted by Hircanus, whom he thought to be the fittest to govern their Common-wealth? who answered, Herod and his brethren. Whereat Antonius was exceeding glad (for he had been their fathers guest, and was most courteously entertained by Antipater, when he came with Gabinius into Judæa) and thereupon he made them both Tetrarchs, leaving unto them the rule of all Judæa: which, when the Jews Embassadors misliked, he took 15. of them and put them in prison, where he almost killed them, and rejected and derided the rest: whereupon there arose greater tumults amongst them in Jerusalem. At last, the Jews sent another Embassage of a thousand men unto Tyre, where Antonius sojourned, with an intent to come to Jerusalem with violence. Antonius hearing their exclaims, sent out the Magistrates of Tyre against them, commanding them to kill all they could catch of the Jews, charging them also to confirm their Authority, whom he himself had constituted Tetrarchs. But Herod and Hircanus went before them toward the Sea-shore, admonishing them earnestly to be contented, lest they by this their indiscreet proceeding, should become not only the cause of their own deaths, but also of War against their own Countrey; but for that they would not be reclaimed by these admonitions, Antonius sent out certain armed men, who killed many of them, and wounded the rest. Hircanus after this disaster both caused the dead to be buried, and the wounded to be cured; notwithstanding all this, they that escaped would not contain themselves in peace, but they so troubled the City, that Antonius in his displeasure, slew those that he had in hold.

Of the war of the Parthians against the Jews: of the flight of Herod and his fortune.

The year of the world, 3923. before Christs Nativity, 41.

TWo years after this, Barzapharnes Governour of the Parthians, accompanied with Pacorus the Kings son, seized upon Syria, and Lysanias who succeeded his father Ptolomæus, son of Minæus, promising a thousand talents, and five hundred women, perswaded him to put Antigonus in possession of the Kingdom of Judæa, and depose Hircanus. Pacorus induced by these promises, went himself along the Sea-coast, giving commandement to Barzapharnes to pass through the midst of the Countrey; but amongst the rest of the places bordering on the Sea, the Tyrians would not receive Pacorus (notwithstanding that the Citizens of Ptolemais and Sidon had given him entertainment) wherefore he gave part of his horse-men unto one who was the Kings Butler, called Pacorus, as himself was; commanding him to pass into Judæa, and learn what their enemies meant to do, and to help Antigonus where need required. Who as they wasted the Countrey about Carmelus, many Jews came of their own accord and joyned with Antigonus, shewing themselves very prompt to fight: for which cause he sent them before to take a place called Drymos; where having fought with his enemies, and put them to flight, he pursued them with all speeed as far as Jerusalem: and his number being augmented, he came unto the Kings house. But Hircanus and Phasælus met them with a strong Company, and fought with them in the market-place: where the enemies were forced to flie, and part of them were by Herod shut up in the Temple; and he appointed sixty men to keep them, which he placed in the houses next adjoyning; but the people bearing a grudge to his two brethren, burnt them with fire: whereat Herod being angry (for that his men were consumed with fire) set upon the people, and killed a great many of them, and every hour one laid wait for another: so that every day some was murthered. Now the feast of Pentecost drawing nigh, all places about the Temple, and all the whole City was filled with people of the Countrey, whereof the most part was armed, and Phasælus kept the Walls, and Herod with a small Company kept the Kings Palace, assaulting their enemies upon the sudden as they were in the Suburbs, kild a great many of them, and put all the rest to flight: part of them he couped up in the City, others he shut in the Temple, and the rest between the uttermost Rampire. Whereupon Antigonus requested that Pacorus might come and conclude a peace betwixt them. Phasælus moved by these his prayers, received the Parthian into the City, and entertained him into his house, accompanied with five hundred horse-men, who came under a pretence to make peace; but in effect he resorted thither to help Antigonus: he craftily conspiring against Phasælus, perswaded him to repair unto Barzapharnes as an Embassadour to treat a peace; notwithstanding that Herod altogether disswaded him, willing him to kill the Traitor, and not to trust his subtlety: adding that the Parthians were naturally unfaithful.

Pacorus departing out of the City, took Hircanus with him that he might be the less suspected, and leaving some horsemen with Herod named * Eleutheri, he followed Phasælus with the rest. When they came near unto Galilee, they found the Inhabitants at variance, and up in arms, and met with Barzapharnes (who craftily with pretence of courtesie and friendship hid his treachery) who after he had bestowed gifts upon them, and that they were returned, laid an ambush for them: whereof they had intelligence at such time as they came to a place of the Sea-coast named Ecdippon. For in this place they understood of the thousand talents that were promised, and how that Antigonus had given the Parthians more than five hundred women of those that were amongst them, and that oftentimes they had been laid wait for, and that they had been lately taken, but that delay was made till such time as Herod was surprized in Jerusalem, for fear lest he hearing what was become of them, might provide for himself. Now they might perceive that these were not only words, for they might behold their keepers not far off; yet would not Phasælus forsake Hircanus, notwithstanding that Ofellius often exhorted him to flie (unto whom Saramalla the richest among the Syrians had declared all the plat-form of their treason:) but he chose rather to go unto Barzapharnes, and to upbraid him to his face, that he had treacherously laid wait for him: but especially, for that in regard of money he had suffered himself to be corrupted: whereas he himself would have given more for his life and liberty, than Antigonus had done for the Kingdom. At these words the Parthian with Oaths and Protestations craftily freed himself from suspition, and no sooner repaired he to Pacorus, but presently the Parthians,

In the mean time a Butler was ſent out for that purpoſe, who ſought to ſurprize Herod, and by ſome ſtratagem to toule him out of the City, who wrought by all the means he could, according as he was inſtructed. But Herod, who was alwaies wont to miſtruſt the perfideous practices of barbarous Nations, being certain that thoſe letters which diſcovered the treaſons were faln into the enemies hands, would not go forth; though Pacorus pretended a juſt cauſe, inciting him to ride out and meet them that brought the letters: wherein was contained neither the taking of Phaſælus, nor the treaſons, but only what Phaſælus had done. But long before this, Herod by others underſtood, that his brother Phaſælus was taken; and Mariamne a very wiſe woman, Hircanus daughter, with many intreaties perſwaded Herod not to go forth: but that he ſhould beware how he truſted himſelf to the mercy of that barbarous people, who did now as it were openly aſſault him. Whileſt Pacorus was conſulting with his complices, how he might privily effect his treaſons (ſeeing it was not poſſible openly to circumvent a man of ſo great wiſdom) Herod in the night time, whileſt his enemies neither knew, nor ſuſpected his intent, took his neareſt kinsfolk, and fled into Idumæa: which being once known, the Parthians followed him. For which cauſe, he made his mother, his brethren, and the young maiden eſpouſed, and her mother and youngeſt brother to keep on their journey, and he with his ſervants warily aſſaulted the Parthians; and having in every aſſault killed a great number of them, he haſted towards the Caſtle of Maſſada, and in his retreat ſuſtained more harm by the Jews, than by the Parthians: who as they had been alwaies troubleſome, ſo now ſome threeſcore furlongs from the Town, ſet upon him; where Herod obtaining the victory, killed a great many of them, and in remembrance of that valiant act, he builded upon that place a moſt rich Palace for the King, and erected there a moſt ſtrong Tower, which by his own name he called Herodium. And when he fled, many joyned with him: But when he came to Threſa, a Town of Idumæa, his brother Joſeph met him, and perſwaded him to leſſen the number of his followers: for Maſſada would not receive ſuch a multitude: (for the number of the multitude was above nine thouſand) for which cauſe Herod according to his counſel diſmiſſed thoſe that were unfit for his turn, and ſent them into Idumæa, giving them neceſſaries for their journey. As for thoſe that were choſen men, and fit for his purpoſe, he retained them with him, and ſo was he received into the Caſtle: where leaving eight hundred Souldiers to defend the women, and proviſion ſufficient for thoſe that were within, he himſelf went unto Petra, a City of Arabia. Now the Parthians at Jeruſalem began to ſack the houſes of them that were fled, and the Kings Palace; they only abſtained from Hircanus money, which did amount to more than three hundred talents: as for other mens goods, they found not ſo much as they expected; for Herod, long before that time ſuſpecting the infidelity of the Parthians, had carried all his riches and jewels into Idumæa, and every one of his followers did the like. When the Parthians had taken the ſpoil, they were ſo impious, that they left no place of the whole Country free from their tyranous War. They deſtroyed the City of Marſa alſo, and bound Phaſælus and Hircanus, and delivered them to Antigonus to be ſcourged, who preſently with his teeth bit off Hircanus ears, to the end, that if by ſome alteration, he chanced hereafter to get looſe, he might be no more High Prieſt: for none might offer ſacrifice, that wanted any member of his body. But Phaſælus his fortitude prevented the cruelty of Antigonus; who having neither weapon, nor his hands at liberty, beat out his own brains againſt a ſtone, and died: demonſtrating himſelf by that act, to be the true brother of Herod, and that Hircanus had degenerated: he died manfully by a worthy death, and anſwerable to ſo famous a life. Yet ſome reported that he recovered after that hurt, and that Antigonus ſent a Chirurgeon under pretence to cure the wound, who filled the ſame with venemous medicines, and ſo killed him. Well, be it as it was, it was in him gallant reſolution. L E

It is reported likewiſe, that underſtanding before his death by the means of a certain woman, that Herod was eſcaped, he ſpake theſe words; now I ſhall die with a courage: who leave behind me one that will take vengeance of my enemies, and ſo he died. Although the Parthians had not yet received the women (which was the chief thing they lookt for) yet leaving them, they eſtabliſhed Antigonus in Jeruſalem, and led Hircanus priſoner into Parthia. But Herod with all ſpeed haſted into Arabia, as if his brother had been yet alive, to the intent he might borrow money of the King of Arabia, wherewith he only hoped that the cruelty of thoſe barbarous Parthians might be mitigated toward Phaſælus: for his opinion was, that although the Arabian had now forgot his fathers friendſhip, and were hard hearted, yet at leaſt he would lend him money, ſeeing it was to redeem his brother, whoſe M F

Son

A Son he meant to leave in pawn for it. For Herod took with him a Son of his Brothers into Arabia that was ſeven years old, and purpoſed to have given three hundred Talents for his ranſom, and had made the Tyrians interceſſors for him to the Parthians: but fortune prevented his endeavours, ſo that his love and care for his brother prevailed nothing. He found alſo that the Arabians had now caſt away the league of amity: for Malichus their King ſent to him as he was yet in the way, charging him with all ſpeed to depart out of his Dominions, framing an excuſe that the Parthians had ſent Embaſſadors unto him, to requeſt him to drive him out of his Countrey; but indeed the cauſe was, that he ſhould repay that which Antipater had deſerved, nor recompenſe his Sons now comfortleſs, for thoſe good turns that he had received at their fathers hands: and thoſe who counſelled him to this, were ſuch
B as offered to forſwear thoſe ſums, which Antipater had put them in truſt with, who were the chiefeſt men about him. For which cauſe, Herod perceiving the Arabians to be his foes for that which he thought would have procured him friendſhip, anſwered the Meſſenger accordingly as grief moved him, and took his journey towards Egypt: and the firſt night he lodged in a Countrey Temple, to the intent that thoſe of his company that were behind him might overtake him. The next day coming to Rhinocolura, his Brothers death was told him; where, after he had there mourned his fill, he went forward.

Herod perceiveth the Arabians to be his enemies.

Now the King of Arabia (though too late) repented himſelf of that which he had done to Herod, and ſent ſpeedy Meſſengers after him, to will him to return, repenting himſelf that he had ſo injuriouſly intreated him. When Herod was come to Peluſium, the watchmen of
C the City would not permit him to paſs: for which cauſe he himſelf in perſon went to the Governors, who reverencing the fame and dignity of the man, conducted him to Alexandria; whither he no ſooner reſorted, but Cleopatra received him very honorably, intending to make him the General of her Army which ſhe was preparing at that preſent. But he neither regarding the offers and requeſts of the Queen, nor yet diſcouraged by the hard winter ſeaſon, nor the dangers of the Seas, took his journey towards Rome; and being in great danger of ſhipwrack near unto Pamphilia, both he and the reſt of the paſſengers were enforced to caſt away the moſt part of their loading: with much ado he arrived ſafe at Rhodes, which had been ſore moleſted by Caſſius wars, there was he entertained by certain of his friends, Ptolomeus and Saphinius: and although his money grew ſcant, yet there he builded a great
D Galley with three ranks of Oars, and in it (being accompanied with his friends) he ſailed to Brunduſium, and from thence went preſently to Rome. Where firſt of all (in regard of familiarity between his father and him) he went to Antonius, declaring unto him both his own calamity, and the miſerable deſolation of the whole Countrey: and how leaving his deareſt friends beſieged in a Caſtle, himſelf in humble manner through the ſtormy winter Seas was come unto him; humbly craving ſuccour at his hands. Whereupon Antonius compaſſionating his calamity, and remembring his familiarity with Antipater, and contemplating the vertue of Herod who ſtood before him, determined upon the preſent to make him King of the Jews, whom before he himſelf had made Tetrarch: for he loved not Herod ſo well, but he hated Antigonus as much: for he held him both for a ſeditious perſon, and for an enemy
E to the Romans. Now to the accompliſhing of this, he found Cæſar far more ready than himſelf, who called to mind the ſervice that Antipater did in Egypt under his Father, and his entertainment and friendſhip in all things: and beſide all theſe, he was wrought and won by Herods courage and valour. For which cauſe, he procured the Senate to be aſſembled; at which time Meſſala, and after him Aratinus, in the preſence of Herod recounted his Fathers deſerts and fidelity towards the Romans, declaring Antigonus to be an enemy; not only becauſe that not long before he had revolted, but for that now laſtly in deſpight of the Romans, he had by the aſſiſtance of the Parthians uſurped the Kingdom. Upon which conſiderations the Senate being moved, and Antonius affirming it to be expedient for the Roman wars, that Herod ſhould be created King, the whole Senate condeſcended: and after the Se-
F nate was diſmiſſed, Antonius and Cæſar went forth with Herod between them, and the Conſuls went before accompanied with other Magiſtrates to offer Sacrifice, and to Regiſter the decree of the Senate in the Capitol. And Antonius feaſted Herod the firſt day of his Reign.

Of Herods War after he returned from Rome to recover Jeruſalem, and againſt the Thieves.

The year of the world, 3925. before Chriſts Nativity, 39.

Ant.l.14.c.23. Antigonus getteth Maſſada.

AT this time Antigonus beſieged thoſe that were left in the Caſtle of Maſſada, who had great ſtore of Victuals; and wanted nothing but water. For which cauſe Joſephus, Herods Brother purpoſed to flie unto the Arabians with two hundred of his deareſt friends, for that he had intelligence that Malichus repented him that he had given Herod no better entertainment. Yea, he had forſaken the Caſtle, had not great ſtore of rain faln that very night, wherein he intended to flie: for the Wells and Ciſterns being now filled with water, there was no cauſe to flie: ſo that voluntarily iſſuing out of the Caſtle, he aſſaulted Antigonus Souldiers, and killed very many of them; ſometime in open war, and ſometime by policy: yet fought they not always with fortunate ſucceſs, but returned ſometimes with loſs. In the mean time, Ventidius (who was General of the Roman Army which was ſent to expulſe the Parthians out of Syria) after he had repulſed them, reſorted into Judæa, under pretence to ſuccour Joſeph and the reſt that were beſieged, but in effect to get Antigonus money. When as therefore he drew neer unto Jeruſalem and had received the money he looked for, he departed with the greateſt part of his Army, leaving Silo behind him with a few to colour his pretence: and Antigonus hoping for a ſecond ſupply from the Parthians, freed Silo not to moleſt him for the preſent, ſeeing he was in great poſſibility. By this time Herod having ſailed from Italy to Ptolemais, and gathered a great Army of ſtrangers and his own Country-men together came into Galilee againſt Antigonus, being aſſiſted with the forces of Ventidius and Silo, whom Delius who was ſent from Antonius, perſwaded to eſtabliſh Herod in his Kingdom. But Ventidius was buſie in appeaſing the broils that the Parthians had made in the Cities, and Silo was corrupted by Antigonus: yet did not Herod want aid, for every day the further he marched into the Country, the more his Army increaſed, for all Galilee (a very few excepted) yeelded unto him. Whereupon he purpoſed firſt of all to go to Maſſada, to deliver his friends that were there beſieged, but Joppe hindred his purpoſe; which for that it was an enemy Town, he thought it beſt to take it before he went further, leſt that whileſt he was going to Jeruſalem his enemies ſhould have a place behind him to flie unto. Now Silo joyned Armies with Herod, rejoycing that he had found occaſion to reſiſt, becauſe he was perſecuted by the Jews; whom Herod with a looſe wing of his army and a ſmall company of men, terrified, and preſently put to flight, and ſaved Silo alſo who had much ado to make reſiſtance againſt them. This done, and Joppe taken, he haſted to Maſſada, and the people of the Countrey (ſome of them for his Fathers ſake, otherſome for his own, and many for both) joyned themſelves unto him: and many alſo came unto him for hope, becauſe he was now King; ſo that now he had a very puiſſant army: but Antigonus hindred his journey, by planting certain ambuſhes in places convenient where Herod was to paſs, and yet for all this he little harmed him.

Ventidius the Roman General taketh money from Antigonus.

Ant.l.14.c.24. Herod againſt Antigonus.

Herod intendeth after he hath taken Maſſada and Joppe, to beſiege Jeruſalem.

Herod having eaſily taken Maſſada, and reſcued his friends from thence, he went to Jeruſalem, where both Silo's Souldiers, and many of the City came and followed him, being now terrified with the greatneſs of his Forces: there pitching their Tents at the Weſt ſide of the Town, they that guarded that part aſſaulted them with darts and arrows; and others iſſuing by Troops forth of the City, aſſaulted the fore-front of the army. Whereupon Herod cauſed one to go about the walls of the City, and to proclaim how that he was come for the good of the whole City, and that he would not take revenge of any, though he were his open enemy, and that he would pardon even them that had been moſt ſeditious. But when Antigonus his followers with loud exclamations hindred the Criers voice from being heard leſt any man ſhould alter his mind: Herod preſently commanded his men to beat the enemies off from the wall, who with their arrows ſpeedily forced all that were in the Towers to flie. At this time Silo was detected to have been hired with money: for he ſolicited many Souldiers to cry out, that they wanted all things; and to ask money and victuals, and to crave to be diſmiſſed and ſent into ſome place of opportunity, there to abide during the winter, nay, he himſelf ſought to be gone. But Herod went unto the Captains that ſerved under Silo, and calling many of the Souldiers together, requeſting them not to forſake him at that exigent, whom Cæſar, Antonius, and the whole Senate as they knew had ſent thither, promiſing them that within one day he would relieve all their neceſſities. When he had thus entreated them, himſelf went about the fields, and brought them ſo much proviſion that

In the mean time Herod reſted not; for taking with him ten companies (five of the Romans, and five of the Jews, amongſt whom were mixed three hundred that were hired, and beſides them a few Horſmen.) He came to Jericho, where he found the ci-
B ty without Inhabitants, and 500 with their wives and families had placed themſelves upon the tops of the mountains; whom when he had ſurprized, he permitted them to depart. But the Romans brake into the City, and ſacked it, where they found the houſes ſtored with all manner of riches: and the King leaving a Garriſon at Jericho, returned. He ſent likewiſe the Roman Souldiers to the cities which were on his ſide, to wit, Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria, that they might abide there till winter was paſt. Antigonus alſo through Silo his means (whom he by money had made his friend) obtained that a part of his Army might (during the winter time) abide at Lydda, for Antonius ſake: and the Romans being now diſcharged from the Wars, abounded in all things.

And he himſelf having carried his Mother and the reſt of his Kindred, whom he took from Maſſada, into Samatia; and having placed them where no danger might betide them; himſelf went into Galilee, to ſubdue that part of the Country, which as yet was not in his hands, and to expel from thence the Garriſons left by Antigonus. And when he was come to Sephoris, notwithſtanding it ſnew mightily, he eaſily took it; for the Garriſon before he aſſaulted it, fled; and finding there great ſtore of proviſion, he refreſhed his Souldiers, which now with winter weather were ſore tired, and then ſent them againſt the Thieves, that lay lurking in dens and caves; who making often incurſions upon the countrey, moleſted the Inhabitants no leſs than if they had been an Army of enemies. And ſending before three companies of Footmen, and one Troop of Horſmen into a village called
D Arbela, himſelf forty days after came thither with the whole Army. For all this the Thieves feared him not, but arming themſelves came to meet him, truſting to their experience in warlike affairs, and their own deſperate courage: and joyning battel, the right wing of their battel put the left wing of Herods to flight: but he with his right wing preſently ſuccoured them, and recalled his men that fled; and ruſhing violently upon his enemies, he a little aſſwaged the forces of the enemy, till at laſt the forefront of their battel, not able to ſtand any longer, fled. Herod purſued them even unto Jordan, and killed many of them; thoſe that eſcaped fled over the River; and thus he freed Galilee from that fear, ſave that yet he had left ſome lurking in the caves, and therefore he was conſtrained there to make a longer a-
E bode. Wherefore firſt of all he gave the Souldiers the fruit of their labours, and diſtributed to every one of them an hundred and fifty drachmes of ſilver, and unto the Captains more, and ſo ſent them where they ſhould paſs the winter. Alſo he writ unto his youngeſt brother Pheroras to provide neceſſaries for them in the market; and to build a wall about the Caſtle of Alexandrium: which he performed.

In the mean while Antonius paſſed the time about Athens, and Ventidius ſent for Silo and Herod to aſſiſt him in the war againſt the Parthians, charging them, that before their coming they ſhould ſettle the eſtate of the Jews. Now Herod gladly and willingly ſent Silo unto Ventidius: and in the mean time he with his Army went againſt the Thieves in the caves. Theſe caves were in very ſteep mountains, ſo that there was no way to come unto them, ſave only by crooked and very narrow paſſages: and theſe mountains were all rocks of ſtone clean-
F throughout, hanging over the vallies; ſo that the King a great while was doubtful what to do, ſeeing the place was ſo difficult to come to. At laſt, Herod deviſed a way ſcarcely heard of before; for he put the valianteſt of his men into coffers, and ſo let them down into the edge of the caves, and they killed the Thieves and their families, and caſt fire at them that reſiſted. And Herod ſeeking to ſave ſome of them, cauſed a cryer to bid them come unto him: but there was not one that willingly came unto him, and thoſe that were forced choſe rather to die, than be his captives. So that an old man having ſeven ſons and a wife, who all requeſted that they might go forth to the King, and ſave their lives, killed them all after this manner: Himself stood before the door of the cave, and bad them come forth one by one, and always as one of them came forth, he killed him. And Herod being in a place where he might behold this spectacle, being moved with compassion, stretched forth his hand and requested him to spare his children: but he being nothing moved to compassion by Herods words, upbraided Herods base mind: and having butchered his Sons, he also killed his wife, and casting the dead bodies down into the vallies, finally he cast himself likewise down headlong.

Herod having thus taken the caves, and slain those that were in them, leaving a part of his Army, so much as he thought might suffice to repress any that should attempt any Rebellion, and making Ptolomæus chief over that part; returned into Samaria, carrying with him three thousand footmen, and six hundred Horsmen against Antigonus. After whose departure those that were accustomed to trouble Galilee, and molest it, having now (as they thought) opportunity, assaulted Ptolomæus at unawares and killed him: and wasted the Country, retiring themselves into marish grounds and secret places. Which when Herod understood, he presently came to succour the Country, and killed the most part of the enemies; and having taken all the Castles by force, he exacted an hundred Talents for recompence of that revolt to be payed by the Cities. Now the Parthians being put to flight, and Pacorus slain, Ventidius being willed thereto by Letters from Antonius, sent unto Herod a thousand Horsmen, and two Legions of Footmen to assist him against Antigonus. Now Antigonus writ Letters to the General of the aforesaid company named Machæra, desiring him to help him; and complaining that Herod injured him, promised him a sum of Money. But he thinking it not best to forsake him he was sent to succour, especially seeing that Herod would give more, would not be suborned by him: yet counterfeiting himself to be Antigonus his friend, meaning under that pretence to creep into the knowledge of his secrets; which not regarding Herods counsel he went to discover, notwithstanding that Herod disswaded him from it: But Antigonus perceiving his intent, shut him out of the City, and like an enemy drave him away from the walls, till such time as Machæra was ashamed of that he had done; and so returned to Amathunt unto Herod. And being in a rage that things fell out against his expectation, he killed all the Jews he found, not respecting whether they favoured Herod or Antigonus. Herod hereat was moved, and thought to be revenged upon Machæra as upon an enemy; yet he bridled himself and hasted to Antonius to let him understand Machæras cruelty. Machæra remembring how he had offended, followed the King, and with many entreaties besought him to be friends, and obtained it. Yet Herod kept on his journey to Antonius; and hearing that he was now with a great Army besieging Samosata (which was a very strong City neer unto Euphrates) he made the more haste; thinking it now a fit time to shew his vertue, and that thereby he might win Antonius favour the more. So soon as he came to Antonius he ended the siege, killing a great number of enemies, and had for his labour a great part of the spoil: and Antonius though before he admired his vertue; yet then was his opinion encreased, so that he had a greater hope of his honour and attaining to the Kingdom. So Antigonus was constrained to render the City.

Of the death of Joseph: how Herod besieged Jerusalem: and how Antigonus was slain.

Ant. l. 14. c. 25.

IN the mean season Herods affairs in Judæa went backward: for he left his Brother Joseph Governour of all, commanding him to do nothing against Antigonus till his return. For he little trusted to Machæras help, because of the parts he had played before. But Joseph understanding his brother to be far off, not regarding what charge was left him, went to Jericho accompanied with five companies which Machæra sent with him, thinking now in harvest time to have taken away their Corn: but being assaulted by the enemies upon the mountains, and in difficult places, himself was there slain, shewing himself in that fight a worthy and valiant man: and there was not one left alive of all the Roman Souldiers; for they were all newly gathered out of Syria, and they had no old Souldiers amongst them to assist them who were ignorant in warfare. Antigonus not contented with the victory, became such a Tyrant, that he caused the dead corps of Joseph to be scourged: and having the dead bodies in his power, he cut off Josephs head, although Pheroras his brother offered fifty Talents to redeem the same.

After

A After Antigonus had obtained this victory, there was such a change in Galilee, that those who favoured him, took the chiefest of Herods favourites, and drowned them in a pond. Also there arose a great change in Idumæa; where Machæra repaired the walls of a certain Castle called Githa. All this while Herod heard nothing of the news; for after Samosata was taken, Antonius made Sosius Governor of Syria, leaving order with him, that he should help Herod against Antigonus, and so he departed into Egypt. Sosius sent two companies of Souldiers with Herod into Judæa to help him, and he himself with the rest of the Army followed. When Herod was at Antiochia near Daphne, his brothers death was manifested unto him in a dream: And whilest he was troubled thus, so that he leapt out of his bed, even at the same instant the messengers who brought tidings of his death, entred into the house: and weeping a little for B grief, as it were deferring his sorrow till another time, he went towards his enemies; so that he hasted above his strength. When he came to Libanus, he took eight hundred Inhabitants of that mountain to help him, and joyned unto them one of the Roman Legions; and not expecting the day time, with them he entred into Galilee, and meeting with his enemies, he forced them to flie unto the place from whence they came: and every day he assaulted their Castle. But before he could take it, being wearied with cruel Winter, he was constrained to lead his Army into the next Village. Within a few days his number being increased by one other Legion which Antonius sent, he put his enemies in such a fear, that they in the night time fled and forsook the Castle. And now he hasted to Jericho to be revenged upon those that killed his brother: where there befel him a most strange accident, C from the which being against all hope delivered, he perswaded himself that God bare an especial love unto him. For when many Nobles that night had supped with him, supper being ended, and every one being gone forth, incontinently the house wherein he supt fell down. Herod took this as a Præsagium both of the dangers and prosperous success he was to have in his Wars. And the next morning early he removed from thence, and about 6000. of the enemies descending from the mountains, assaulted the Vanguard, but they durst not joyn battle with the Romans, but molested them standing a far off with stones and darts, and they wounded many: so that also Herod himself passing along, was wounded in the side with a dart. Antigonus desirous to shew himself most potent, as well in multitude of men, as also in courage, sent Pappus a friend of his, with an Army into Samaria, who there got the D victory of Machæra. Herod went about the enemies Countrey and took there five Towns, and destroyed two thousand of the Inhabitants, and firing the houses, he returned to his Army near unto a Village called Cana.

The year of the world, 3927. before Christs Nativity, 37.

Herod certified of his brothers death in a dream.

Herods dining Room fell after he had forsaken it, and gone to bed.

Every day there came flocking unto him a very great number of Jews, both from Jericho and from other parts of the Countrey, some of them hating Antigonus, otherwhile loving Herod for his valiant deeds: for many without any reason desired an alteration. Whilest thus he hasted to fight, Pappus with his men neither fearing the multitude, nor strength of their enemies, came fiercely upon them, and offered battel. The battel being begun, the others a while abstained, only Herod remembring his brothers death, ventured more than the rest, to the end to be revenged upon them that were the authors thereof: and so he easily over- E came the enemies Army; and still assaulting the fresh men, he put them all to flight. There was a mighty slaughter: for many being forced to flie into the Village from whence they came, he pursued them and slew an infinite number. Lastly, rushing amongst the enemies that fled, he brake into the Village, where all the houses were full of armed men, and every house-top full of men to defend it: and because he easily overcame those that were abroad, he overthrew the houses, and so forced them that were within to come forth. Others he killed in companies with the ruines of the houses wherein they were; and if any one chanced to escape, the Souldiers without, that were already armed, with swords kil'd them: so that there were such heaps of dead bodies, that they who had the victory could not pass thorow the streets for them. The enemies were so discouraged with this overthrow, that the whole F multitude of them (seeing those that were slain in the Village) fled away: and Herod by the benefit of his good fortune had even then come to Jerusalem, had not Winter storms hindred him, which was the only cause that he at that time got not a full conquest; and that Antigonus was not utterly overthtown, who through fear and desperation was purposed to leave the City. But Herod towards night having given his friends leave to depart to rest their weary bodies, being himself heated with his armour, after the manner of Souldiers, went to wash himself, accompanied only with one Page. And before he came to the bath, one of his enemies met him having a sword drawn in his hand; and then another; and afterwards a third; and after them more: and these escaped out of the battel, and came to the bath to hide themselves; and seeing the King there, they were sore afraid, and sought to

The next day after, he beheaded Pappus, who was the General of Antigonus his Army, and sent his head to his brother Pheroras, who was made Ruler of his Army, in revenge of his brother that was slain: for Pappus was he that slew Joseph.

Herod beheadeth Pappus, Antigonus Captain. Ant. l. 14. c. 12.

The winter being past, he with his Army came to Jerusalem, and besieged it, pitching his tents before the Temple, where it was easiest to take the City, and where before-time Pompey had entred it (which was about the third year after Herod was made King in Rome.) Now when he had quartered his Army as he thought best for his purpose, and cut off the Suburbs, he caused three Rampiers to be raised, and Towers to be builded upon them: and leaving H

Now when all his whole Army was assembled together, to the number of about some eleven Legions of footmen, and six thousand horsemen, besides the Syrians that came to help him, which were no small number; he laied his assault and battery to the Northermost wall; and the rather, because he thought I

Mean-while those Jews that were within the City were diversly troubled: for a multitude of the weaker sort, gathering themselves together about the Temple, grew to this resolution, that whosoever should fortune to die in this attempt, should be most happy and beloved of God. But those who were hardiest among them, joyning themselves together, robbed and took away from the rest what they could, but in especial they took victuals from that part that was next the City: so that they neither left meat for horses nor men; and the valiantest of them all being set to defend the walls against those that besieged them, hindred the adversary from erecting their Rampires; K
The Jews valiantly defend themselves. so that they still found some new device to hinder the force of their engines; neither did they any ways prevail so much as by their mynes which they made. As for the Thieves, the King sought to repress their incursions, by placing an ambush of men to intercept them; by which means he relieved the want and scarcity of victuals, by fetching provision from places far distant: But notwithstanding they in their fight failed in no sort to express, their incredible valour; yet did that military experience which the Romans had, over-master them by ods. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the eminent danger wherein they were plunged, they fought with them in open field: but where it chanced that the Romans by digging two several mynes, brake all at once into the midst of them, yet suddenly repaired they the breach that was made in the wall, and fortified the other part thereof. In a word, they neither L spared hands nor engines, but were all of them determined to fight it out even unto the last cast: and although they were besieged with so huge an Army, yet they defended the Town from them five moneths, till such time as certain of Herods chosen men, valiantly scaling and clearing the walls brake into the City, and after them Sosius his Centurions. Those places that neerest adjoyned the Temple, were the first of all that they intercepted, and the whole Army entering the City, it was lamentable to see how in every corner the people were massacred: for the Romans being displeased that the Siege continued so long time, became more cruel, and Herods Army endeavoured to let no one of the adverse part escape. By which means many were slain, both in the narrowest places of the streets, as also in their own houses, yea even then also when they fled into the Temple, without respect of age or M woman-hood. For although the King intreated the Souldiers to spare the people: yet for all that, they never restrained their cruel hands, but like mad men they raged against all; men, women, and children. At that time also Antigonus neither respecting his former condition, nor his present estate, came and prostrated himself at Sosius his feet, beseeching him to be merciful unto him; but Sosius nothing compassionating his calamity, cruelly derided him, and called him Antigona: yet did he not permit him to depart free as a woman, but put him in prison.

Now when Herod had conquered his enemies, he endeavoured to the utmost to appease the fury of the Souldiers; for all the whole multitude were desirous to see the Temple, and

He therefore preſently repreſſed the Souldiers from ſacking the City, inveying much againſt Soſius, and objecting againſt him; that the Romans would deſolate the City both of men and money, and leave him King of a place without Subjects: adding further, that he eſteemed not the Empire of the whole World to be a recompence for ſuch a maſſacre of his Citizens. Hereunto Soſius replied, that in equity the Souldiers were to have the ſacking of the Town, in recompence of that labour they had ſpent in the Siege. But Herod gave him this anſwer, that he had rather recompence every man out of his own Treaſury: and by this means he redeemed as it were B the reliques of his deſolate Country: and in the end performed that which he had promiſed. For he bountifully rewarded every Souldier and Captain, according to his merit, and gave Soſius a Kingly reward: ſo that no man went away without money. This done, Soſius dedicated a golden Crown unto God, and ſo departed, leading Antigonus captive with him, to the end to preſent him unto Antonius. This man deſirous to continue his life, and entertaining himſelf with this cold hope even until the laſt, received in the end that reward which his faint heart deſired, and was beheaded.

Herod being now King, made a diſtinction between the Citizens, and thoſe who had favoured him, he uſed very honourably, and put thoſe to death who had followed Antigonus: and C when money failed, he diſtributed all his Kingly ornaments and ſent them to Antonius and his Company. Yet did he not quite redeem himſelf from all annoyances. for Antonius being now captivate through Cleopatra her love, in all things yielded unto her deſire: and Cleopatra having raged ſo againſt her own kindred, that ſhe had not left one of them alive, now turned her fury upon Strangers, and accuſing the Nobility of Syria unto Antonius, ſhe perſwaded him to put them to death, that ſhe might thereby the eaſier obtain their poſſeſſions. Afterward her covetous mind ſought to effect the like againſt the Arabians, and the Jews alſo: inſomuch that ſhe ſecretly went about to cauſe the Kings of thoſe places, Malichus and Herod to be put to death. Antonius made a ſhew as though he would have granted her requeſt; yet he thought it great impiety to kill good men, and ſo great Kings: yet notwithſtanding, he no D more accounted them his friends, but took a great quantity of ground from the limits of both their Countries, and a vineyard in Jericho where Balm grew; and gave her all the Cities on this ſide the River Eleutherus (Tyre and Sidon only excepted.) Now when ſhe had obtained the Dominion of theſe Cities, ſhe followed Antonius unto Euphrates, who ſet forward to make War againſt the Parthians; and afterward by Apamia and Damaſcus ſhe came into Judæa: where Herod, having ſomething pacified her angry mind with great gifts, obtained to pay her yearly two hundred Talents for that part of his Countrey, which Antonius had given her; and ſeeking by all means poſſible to get himſelf an intereſt in her favour, he conducted her unto Pelluſium: and not long after Antonius returned out of Parthia, and brought Artibazes the ſon of Tigranes captive, and gave him to Cleopatra: for all the money E and riches which he had got, and the captives likewiſe, were beſtowed on her.

Of the treacherous practiſe of Cleopatra againſt Herod; of Herods War againſt the Arabians, and of a very great Earthquake.

ABout ſuch time as the Actiack War was a foot, Herod prepared himſelf to attend Antonius; ſeeing for the preſent all troubles were pacified in Judæa, and he had already got the Caſtle of Hircanion, which Antigonus ſiſter had in her F poſſeſſion. But Cleopatra craftily prevented him in this his journey; ſo that he could not go with Antonius: For ſhe deſiring the ruines of both the Kings (as was before mentioned) perſwaded Antonius that he ſhould cauſe Herod to make War againſt the Arabians: whom if he overcame, then ſhe ſhould be made Queen of Arabia; and if ſo be himſelf were overcome, then ſhe ſhould be Queen of Judæa: intending hereby, that one of theſe Potentates ſhould ruinate the other. But this practice of hers was greatly to Herods gain: for firſt of all, making head againſt thoſe of Syria that were his enemies, with all the power of horſmen he could make, which was very many, and meeting them at Dioſpolis, he overcame them, though they valiantly reſiſted: who having the overthrow, ſtirred up a mighty Army

Army of the Arabians to help them, ſo that an infinite company was gathered together about Cœloſyria, expecting the Jews near unto the City called Canatha. Where King Herod meeting them, purpoſed not to fight unadviſedly, but to compaſs his own Army round about with a wall, but his Army remembring their former victory, would not be counſelled, but violently aſſaulted the Arabians, and at the firſt onſet put them to flight. Herod purſuing his enemy, was greatly endangered by the treaſon of the Inhabitants of Canatha (who were ſet on by Athenio, that was one of Cleopatras Captains, who had always born him ill will) for the Arabians encouraged by their help, returned again to battle; and they two joyned their forces together, and ſet upon Herod in ſtony and difficult places, and put his Army to flight, and ſlew many of them: and thoſe that eſcaped fled into a little village hard by, called Ormiza; where the Arabians compaſſing them about, took both the men and their tents with all their furniture. Not long after this overthrow of Herods Souldiers, he came and brought help, but too late, and too little purpoſe: but the cauſe hereof was, for that the Captains of his Army would not obey his commandment: for if they had been obedient, Athenio had not had opportunity to work him that injury; yet was he revenged upon the Arabians, and daily made incurſions upon their borders, and ceaſed not to invade and ſpoil them, until by many, he had cried quittance with them for their one victory.

The Arabians defeat Herods Army.

The Actian War between Antonius and Auguſtus.

While thus he purſued his enemies, a great calamity befel him in the ſeventh year of his Reign, and in the midſt of the Action War: for about the beginning of the ſpring time, there chanced a great earthquake, which ſlew an infinite multitude of beaſts and thirty thouſand people: yet the Army had no harm, for it lay in an open place. With the report hereof, the Arabians were highly encouraged (for ſuch as report an evil occurrent, do always redouble the miſery thereof in relating it) for which cauſe, the Arabians, making account that all Judæa was overthrown, and that there was no man left alive to reſiſt them, entered into Judæa, aſſuring themſelves to conquer the Country: and before their coming, they ſlew the Embaſſadors of the Jews that were ſent unto them. Herod perceiving his Countrymen terrified by the ſudden approach of their enemies, and not only broken, but wearied with the greatneſs and continuance of their calamities, rowzed up their drooping ſpirits that were tired with ſuſpect, and encouraged them on this wiſe: "I ſee no reaſon of your preſent "fear, neither do I admire, that you were terrified with the puniſhment of Gods indignation: "but it is a cowardly mind to be daunted by the coming of your enemies, who are but men; "and whoſe violence, if your ſelves pleaſe, ye may repreſs. For mine own part, I am ſo "far from being diſcouraged by the approach of mine enemies, that I rather think that God "hath of his providence ſent this earthquake as a bait to allure and incite the Arabians to "invade us, to the end, that through our means he may puniſh them: for the cauſe that moveth them to aſſault us, is not the truſt they repoſe in their own valour and great Army, but "it is our miſery that inviteth them. Yet who knows not that the hope is fruſtrated, that is "founded not upon a mans private virtue, but upon another mans misfortune; there is nothing aſſured in humane affairs, in reſpect either of proſperous ſucceſs, or adverſe fortune "which a man may perceive to alter upon all occurents, as we our ſelves may witneſs by "our own experience. For in the firſt conflict ye overcame; in the ſecond ye were overcome; and now the third time (for ought I can conjecture) they, thinking themſelves ſure "of the victory, ſhall by us be overcome: for they who miſdoubt nothing, are raſh in their "proceedings; whereas they that are fearful and timorous, providently ſeek to prevent their "dangers: ſo that I am encouraged to hope for victory even by your fear.

Another calamity of Herods.

Herods Oration to his diſmaied Souldiers.

Fear giveth confidence.

"For when as you were too confident, and againſt my will and direction ruſhed in upon "your enemies, Athenio found opportunity to hurt us: but now ſith I perceive in your minds "a certain remiſneſs and a forecaſt, it is an evident token unto me of an aſſured victory. It "behoveth you therefore not only before the conflict to continue your accuſtomed minds, "but alſo in the conflict to ſhew that ye are men, armed both with hearts and hardineſs; to "the end, that our impious enemies may well ſee, that neither any humane calamity, nor "divine puniſhment can daunt the courage of the Jews, whilſt their breath is in their bodies: "and that never a one of you all will ſuffer the Arabians to domineer over your goods and "poſſeſſions, whom many times you have almoſt made your ſlaves. Be not therefore terrified "with this motion of a body that hath no ſoul: neither yet perſwade your ſelves, that the "earthquake portended any maſſacre, for even the elements themſelves by their own nature "are ſubject to ſuch defects, and portend no other miſhap, but that which they bring with "them. Perhaps the plague, and famine, and earthquake have ſome tokens demonſtrating "them before they come: but when they are once come, they ſignifie nothing elſe; but at "laſt, end and ceaſe of themſelves. But ſay we ſhould be overcome, can War enforce more harm

"harm against us, than the earthquake hath done? Truly, it is an evident token of our ene"mies ruine, and that by their own cause, who most cruelly, contrary to the Law of all Na"tions, butchered our Embassadours, offering to God such sacrifice for the good success of "their wars. They cannot hide themselves from the sight of God, and from his mighty "power, but presently they shall feel punishment for their offence, if filled with the coura"geous spirit of our Nation, we be stirr'd up to revenge that impious violating the Law of "all Nations, and so every one march on to fight, not for his wife and children, or Coun-
"trey; but to revenge the murther of our Embassadors: who will lead our Army, and know "better than we that are alive to direct the same. For my own part (if you will be ruled by "me) I will be the first that will lead you, and will hazard my self for you: for you know
"full well, that if your valour be not eclipsed by some headlong rashness, there is nothing "that may make head against you.

Herods peroration.

After he had by these or such like perswasions sounded his Souldiers, and found them in some sort encouraged thereby, he offered sacrifice to God. And presently after, with all his Army he passed over Jordan: and pitching his tents at Philadelphia, not far from his enemy, he made a shew to assault a Castle that was between them and him, and so skirmished with them a far of, desirous to draw them to the battel: for the enemies had sent to entercept the Castle, but Herods forces gave them the repulse, and in despight of them kept the hill. Thus every day made an offer to fight, braving the Arabians: and seeing they would not come to the shock (for they were in great fear, and Athemus their General for very fear was ready to give up the ghost) he assaulted them in their trenches, and cast down their rampier, so as they were constrained to come forth to Battel, without any order; and their horsmen, and footmen were confusedly mixt together. And although the Jews in number were inferior unto them, yet they were inferior to the Jews in courage: yet they became now more hardy, because they despaired of the victory: and so long as they stood to it, they had no great loss; but when they turned their backs, then many were slain by the Jews, and many perished being troden on by their fellows. Those that escaped, were forced to retire themselves into their trenches, where Herod besieged them: and although they were all ready to be put to the sword, yet was there such penury of water, that for drink they were all like to perish. For which cause, they sent Embassadors to the King, offering him fifty talents to let them go: but he contemned them, and so much more earnest was he, by reason that their want of water was so great, that coming out by flocks of their own accord, they offered themselves to the Jews: so that in this sort there came forth four thousand in five days, and the sixth day the whole multitude (despairing of their lives) came out to fight, with whom Herod conflicting, slew about seven thousand. Having in this sort weakned the Arabians, that he had now extinguished all their strong men, the Countrymen admired him, and were so much daunted at his puissance, that they wished him for their Ruler.

How Herod was exalted to the Kingdom.

INcontinent after this his prosperous success, there did betide unto him a Sea of cares and griefs, in respect of the love which he bare unto Antonius, whom Cæsar had now lately overthrown at the Battel which was fought at Actium: yet was he more afraid than hurt by this his suspition: for Cæsar accounted not Antonius fully conquered, so long as Herod and he kept together. Wherefore, the King timely foreseeing those dangers that might ensue, went to Rhodes, where at that time Cæsar abode: in which place, in the habit of a private man, and without a Crown, but with a Kingly courage, he presented himself before him, and with unfeigned constancie spake unto him in such manner as followeth: "I "was, O Cæsar, made King of Judæa by Antonius his means: and I must confess, that I have "been a King, who, what in me lay, have served his turn, and sought his profit: yea, I must not "deny, but that (had not the Arabians hindred me) I had with all the power I could have "made, seconded and assisted Antony against thee: yea, although personally I could not go, "yet did I what I could to help him, and sent him many thousand measures of Corn. Nay, "though he had the overthrow at Actium, yet did not I forsake him, who had deserved well "at my hands: and although I was not able to assist him with force of Arms, yet I confirmed "him by my counsel the best I could, inculcating oftentimes unto him, that there was one "only way to redress his adversity, to wit, by the death of Cleopatra, whom if he killed, I "promised him to assist him with money, strong holds, and an Army; yea, and with mine own person

Cæsars answer to Herod.

"perſon againſt thee: but the love of Cleopatra, and God who had already deſigned the victory unto thee, ſtopped his ears. For which cauſe, O Cæſar, I am conquered with Antonius, and have forſaken my Crown and Dignity with his fortunes: and I am come unto thee, hoping that at thy hands I may obtain pardon. To this Cæſar anſwered: "Live in ſafety, and reign now with greater ſecurity than before, for thou deſerveſt to rule others, who with ſuch conſtancie didſt defend and maintain thy friendſhip. At this time endeavour thy ſelf to continue faithful toward them that are more fortunate than Antonius was: for, for my part I have conceived a great hope and expectation of thy valour and poweſs; yet did Antonius well, in that he rather obeyed Cleopatra than thee: for by his follies have we now purchaſed thy friendſhip. That thou haſt begun to do well, it hereby appeareth, becauſe Ventidius hath ſignified unto me, that thou haſt ſent him ſuccours againſt his enemies. For which cauſe, by this my preſent decree, be thou eſtabliſhed in thy Kingdom, and I will ſhortly let thee know, that I will be beneficial unto thee: ſo as thou ſhalt have no cauſe to bewail the loſs of Antonius. By this ſpeech he exhorted the King not to miſdoubt of his friendſhip, and withal put a Crown upon his head, and made a decree, and ſealed it, teſtifying how he had remitted all things done by Herod, and confirmed him in his Kingdom, and rehearſed many things therein, greatly tending to Herods praiſe. Herod (having firſt pacified Cæſar with many gifts) requeſted him to pardon Alexander, one of Antonius his friends, who earneſtly and in humble manner deſired the ſame: but Cæſar being very angry, anſwered, that he for whom he entreated, had greatly and many times offended, and ſo repeld Herod with this anſwer.

Herods gratulation toward Cæſar.

Afterward, Cæſar, travelling into Egypt through Syria, was entertained by Herod with all royal pomp poſſible: and that was the firſt time that he ſhewed himſelf to take part with Cæſar, when neer unto Ptolemais he took a view of the Souldiers with Cæſar, and made a banquet for him and all his friends, and feaſted the whole Army likewiſe. And in as much as he travelled to Peluſium thorow drie grounds, when they returned again, he provided water for them, and furniſhed the Army with all neceſſaries: ſo that both Cæſar and the Souldiers thought the Kingdom a ſmall recompence for his deſerts. For which cauſe, after he came into Egypt, and that Antonius and Cleopatra were now dead, he did not only encreaſe his honour, but alſo reſtored unto him that portion of his Countrey which was taken away, and given to Cleopatra: and beſides that, Gadara, and Hippon, and Samaria, and other Cities about the Sea-coaſt; to wit, Gaza, and Anthedon, and Joppe, and Stratons Tower; and moreover gave him four hundred Galathians, which before were Cleopatra her Guard: and there was nothing that ſo much moved Cæſars liberality, as the courageous mind of him unto whom he was liberal. After the firſt Actian Solemnity, he added unto Herods Dominion, Trachon and Batanæa, and Auranitis bordering upon it. For this cauſe Zenedorus (who for money hired Liſanias his houſe) continually ſent Thieves out of Trachon to rob the people of Damaſcus: who in humble manner went to Varus (who was at that time Governor of Syria) entreating him to inform Cæſar of their calamity. Cæſar underſtanding thereof, writ back again, commanding him to extinguiſh all the Thieves: whereupon Varus with an Army went to thoſe places which were moſt ſuſpected, and rid the Countrey of the Thieves, and took the territory from Zenodorus: and Cæſar (leſt it ſhould again be a refuge for Thieves to ſpoil Damaſcus) gave it to Herod, and made him Ruler over all Syria. And ten years after, returning to his own Countrey, he commanded the Governors to do nothing without Herods counſel: and after Zenodorus his death, he gave him all the Countrey between Trachon and Galilee. But that which Herod eſteemed above all the reſt was, that Cæſar loved him beſt of all next to Agrippa: and Agrippa loved him moſt of all men next unto Cæſar. Thus now he touched the very top of felicity, and ſo increaſing in high mind, he imployed himſelf chiefly to piety.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Cities and Buildings re-edified and built by Herod, and of his liberality towards ſtrangers, and of his felicity.

The year of the world, 3947. before Christs Nativity, 17.

Ant. l. 15. c. 10, 12, 13, 14. Herods Buildings.

IN the fifteenth year after his Reign he repaired the Temple, and incloſed twice ſo much ground as was before about the Temple with a ſtrong Wall, whereon he beſtowed great coſts and charges to beautifie it: as the great Porches will teſtifie, which he built about the Temple, and a Caſtle on the North part thereunto adjoyning, which he built even from the foundation. The Caſtle was ſo rich and ſumptuous that

A that it was equal unto the Kings Palace; and in the honour of Antonius, he named it Antonia. He builded himself also a Palace in the upper part of the City, and in it two houses, huge, and richly adorned: so that the Temple was not to be compared unto them. And calling them by his friends names, he termed one of them Cæsarea, and another Agrippa; whose names and memory he did not only solemnize, and write in his private houses, but also throughout the whole Countrey, and in every part of the City. For in the Countrey of Samaria he compassed a Town with a wall, which was about twenty stounds, and called it Sebaste; and he sent thither six thousand inhabitants, giving them a most fertile soil and demeans. There also amongst other buildings, he erected a very huge Temple, and dedicated it to Cæsar, and gave the Inhabitants of that place especial Priviledges. About the Tem-
B ple was there a piece of ground containing three stounds and an half. For this Monuments sake, Cæsar added unto his Dominion another Country; for which cause he erected another Temple unto him, near unto the head of Jordan, of white marble, in a place called Panium, where there is a mountain rising an infinite height into the air, at the side whereof there is an obscure valley, where there are high rocks, that (by drops of water falling on them) are made hollow: so that the water, standing in their concavity till they run over, falleth down with a stream of such a length as is admirable. At the foot of this valley on the outside, there spring certain fountains, and many think this to be the head of the river Jordan; which, whether it be true or no, we will declare hereafter.

The fountain-head of Jordan.

C At Jericho also (between the Castle of Cyprus, and the other antient Kings houses) he erected other buildings, fairer and more commodious for them that came thither, calling them after the names of his friends. Finally, there was no convenient place in the whole Kingdom, wherein he erected not something in honour of Cæsar: and having in every place of his own Kingdom devised and dedicated Temples unto him, he in Syria also where he ruled did the like, founding in very many Cities, Temples, which he called by the name of Cæsar. And perceiving, that amongst the Cities of the Sea-coast, there was one called Stratons tower, which being very old and ruinated; and for the scituation thereof deserved reparation and cost: he repaired it with a white stone, and built a very Royal Palace therein, wherein chiefly he shewed a mighty mind. For this City standing in the midst between Dora and
D Joppe, there was no Port or haven in that coast: so that whosoever sailed from Phænicia into Egypt, were in great danger, by reason of the violent winds that blew from Africa; which blowing but a very easie gale, inforce the water with such violence against the Rocks on the shore, that the waves, rebounding back again a good way within the Sea, make the whole Sea tempestuous. But the King, with his liberality and cost overcoming nature, builded a Port or haven in that place, far bigger than that of Pyræum, and within it made most safe stations for ships. And although the nature of that place was altogether contrary to his intent, yet he so overcame that difficulty, that the Sea could do that building no harm: and it was so gallant and beautiful to behold, as though there had been no let any way to hinder the adorning thereof. For having measured out such a place (as we have spoken of) for the E Port, he laid a foundation in the bottom twenty ells deep of stone, whereof most of them were fifty foot long, nine foot thick, and ten foot broad, and some bigger; and all the bottom of the Haven where the water came, was laid with these stones. Which done, he raised a wall of two hundred foot; whereof an hundred foot was builded to break the violence of the waves, and had a name according to the use it served for. The other hundred foot served for a foundation of the wall whereof the haven was compassed, which was replinished with many goodly Towers, the greatest and fairest whereof he called Drusius, after the name of Cæsars Kinsman. There were very many vaults also to conduct such things into the Town as were brought into the haven, and about them a paved place for them to walk in, that came out of the ships: The entrance thereunto was on the North-side; for by reason of the scituation of the place, the North wind there is the calmest.

Herod makes a greater Port than that of Piræum.

An art description of an Haven.

F Before the entrance were three great Colossus held up on every side with Pillars; they which are on the left hand, are propt up by a tower, being a solid rock of stone. But at the entrance on the right hand were two huge stones joyned together, which make a greater tower than the other. There is also a house adjoyning unto the Haven built of white stone; the streets of the Cities coming to that place, are of one bigness and proportion. Upon a hil opposite to the mouth of the Haven, was there builded a Temple very beautiful and exceeding great, which he dedicated to Cæsar, wherein was placed Cæsars Colossus, fully as great as Jupiter at Olympus: for it was made after that example, equal to that at Rome, and that of Junoes at Argos. The City he builded for the Inhabitants of that Province, and the Port or Haven for Sea-faring men. The honour and credit he attributed to Cæsar; and by his name called called it Cæsarea. He also made other Buildings, as the Market, the Theater, and the Amphitheater, which are worth the memory. And he every fifth year ordained certain sports, and called them after the name of Cæsar. And himself first proposed very ample rewards in the 192 Olympiade, insomuch that he not only gave royal gifts to the victors, but also to the second and third after them. He repaired Anthedon also, which was destroyed by the wars, and called it Agrippium: and loving Agrippa very dearly, he caused his name to be engraven over the Portal he builded in the Temple. Neither was he unmindful of his Parents: for in the richest soil of the whole Kingdom he built a City for the Monument of his father: and by his name called it Antipatris, being a very rich soil, both for trees and rivers. At Jericho also he built a very gorgeous and strong Castle, and called it Cyprus, in honour of his Mother. He likewise built a Tower in memory of his Brother Phasælus, at Jerusalem, and called it Phasælus his Tower (of the compass and beauty of this Tower we will speak hereafter.) He also called another City Phasælus, which is scituate in a vally beyond Jericho, towards the North.

Having thus eternized the memory of his friends and Kinsfolk, he did not forget to do the like to himself: for he built a Castle on a Mountain near Arabia, having on one side a strong place of defence, and this Castle he called Herodium after his own name. By the same name also he called a Tomb, which he builded sixty stounds from Jerusalem, artificially made in manner of a womans Dug, which he richly adorned; for within compass of the top of it, he caused round turrets to be placed: and round about it he builded Princely houses, gallantly adorned both within and without. He also brought water from a great way off, with great cost and charges, and made a pair of stairs of pure white marble, to go up, which had two hundred steps. For the whole hill was made by art, and it was made of an exceeding height: at the foot thereof likewise he built another Palace, and houses to receive his friends and their carriages, so that this Castle, for the abundance of all necessary places, seemed a City, and yet was it all the Kings palace. Having erected thus many buildings, he shewed his brave mind in strange Cities likewise: for at Tripolis, and Damascus, and Ptolemais he builded publike Baths, which are called exercises. He builded the wall of Byblus; and seats, porches, Temples, and Markets at Berytus and Tyre: at Sidon and Damascus he builded a Theater, and a water-conduit at Laodicea, a Sea-town. At Ascalon he built fountains or lakes very sumptuous, and baths with pillars, that for greatness and gallant work were miraculous. To other places he gave woods and ports: and to many Cities he added fields, as though they had been fellow-cities of his Kingdom. Also, toward the maintenance of baths he gave a yearly annuity for ever: as namely, to those at Cous, to the intent he might be an eternal benefactor. Moreover, he gave all poor people Corn; and he often and in sundry places gave the Rhodians money to build a Navy of ships. At his own proper cost he repaired Pythium, which was burnt with fire. What should I say of his liberality which he extended to them of Lycia and Sami? or the magnificent gifts which he used towards all the people of Jonia; yea, all things that their hearts could desire: whereby he relieved all their necessities? Nay, both the Athenians, and Lacedemonians, and Nicopolites, and the Citizens of Pergamus in Misia, received very many benefits at his hands. He paved also a large street in Antiochia of Syria, which was in length twenty stounds, and that with fair marble. This street before that time was so full of dirt, that no man could go thorow it, and all along it he built Galleries, that people might go dry thorow it in rainy weather.

Some one may say, that these benefits he thus bestowed, were done for the proper use of those people on whom he bestowed them; but no man can deny, but that which he did for the Citizens of Elis, was not only common to those of Achaia, but to all the world, where the Games, called Olympica Certamina, were solemnized. For Herod seeing them decay only for want of maintenance, and that this was the only remainder of all the antient Monuments of Greece, he not only in his person at that time became one of the proposers of rewards in that Olympiade which he assisted when he went to Rome; but also gave a yearly stipend to maintain the same, lest for want it should be left off. It is not to be told what debts and tributes he remitted; for he delivered the Phasælites and Balaneotes, and other towns of Cilicia, from the payment of a yearly tribute: yet was he not so liberal to them as he would have been, fearing lest the envy of some might accuse him of some further meaning, if he should be more bountiful to the Cities than those that were the owners thereof. He exercised his body likewise in exercises fit for so valiant a mind: for he was a very skilful hunter, wherein he had always his purpose, by reason of his skill in riding; so that in one day he killed fourty wild beasts. That Countrey hath many Boars, but it hath more store of Harts and wild Asses. He was such a warriour as no man was able to encounter withal; so that many

A many were astonished to see him exercise himself, who admired him for casting a dart, and shooting an arrow. Beside the vertue both of his mind and body he had also good fortune; for very seldom the event of War was otherwise than he expected: which if it sometime chanced, it was not through his fault, but through the rashness of his Souldiers, or else through treason.

Herod besides the vertue of mind and body had the blessings of fortune.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the disagreement between Herod and his Sons, Alexander and Aristobulus.

B But his private and domestical sorrows, seemed to envy him in his publick felicity, and most adverse fortune befel him through the means of a woman, whom he loved as himself. For being now made King, he put away his wife, which he first married (which was a Lady born in Jerusalem, whose name was Doris) and married Mariamme the Daughter of Alexander, who was Aristobulus Son, which caused troubles in his house, both before, but especially after he returned from Rome. For he banished his eldest Son Antipater, whom he had by Doris, out of the City, only for his Childrens sake that he had by Mariamme; licencing him only at festival times to come unto the City in regard of some suspicion of treason intended against him. And afterward he slew Hircanus his wives Unkle, (notwithstanding that he returned out of Parthia unto him) C because after he suspected that he intended some treason against him; whom Barzapharnes after he had taken all Syria, took away prisoner with him. But his own Countreymen that dwelt beyond Euphrates, in commiseration redeemed him from thraldom; and had he been counselled by them, and not come unto Herod, he had not been killed: but the marriage of his Niece caused his death: for, for that cause, and especially for the love of his Native soil, he came thither. That which moved Herod to kill him was, not for that he sought the Kingdom, but because he had right unto the Kingdom. Herod had five Children by Mariamme, two Daughters, and three Sons. The youngest was sent to Rome to study, where he died. The other two he brought up like Princes, both for their Mothers Nobility sake, and for that they were born after he was King. But that which above all other was most D forcible, was the love he bare to Mariamme; which from day to day tormented him more violently, in such sort, that he left not any part of those griefs which this his best beloved enforced against him. For Mariamme hated him, as much as he loved her: and having a just cause and colour of discontent, and moreover being emboldned by the love which he bare her, she every day upbraided him, with that which he had done unto Hircanus her Unkle, and unto her Brother Aristobulus. For Herod spared him not, although he was a child; but after he had made him High-Priest in the seventeenth year of his age, he presently put him to death, after he had so honoured him: who, when he came to the Altar clothed in sacred attire upon a Festival day, all the people wept: and the same night was he sent to Jericho, E and drowned in a Lake by the Galatians, who had received commission to perform the murther. These things did Mariamme daily cast in Herods teeth, and upbraided both his Mother, and Sister, with very sharp and reproachful words: yet he so loved her, that notwithstanding all this, he held his peace. But the women were set on fire: and that they might the rather move Herod against her, they accused her of adultery, and of many other things which bare a shew of truth: objecting against her, that she had sent her portraiture into Egypt unto Antonius; and that through immoderate lust she did what she could to make her self known unto him, who doted upon womens love, and was of sufficient power to do what wrong he pleased.

Herods Mother and Sister do false accuse Mariamme to him.

Hereat Herod was sore moved, especially for that he was jealous of her whom he loved, bethinking himself upon the cruelty of Cleopatra, for whose sake King Lysanias, and Malichus King of Arabia were put to death; and now he measured not the danger by the loss of F his wife, but by his own death which he feared: For which cause being drawn by his affairs into the Countrey, he gave secret commandment unto Joseph, his Sister Salomes husband (whom he knew to be trusty, and one who for affinity was his well-willer) to kill his wife Mariamme, if so be Antonius should have killed him. But Joseph not maliciously, but simply to shew her how greatly the King loved her, disclosed that secret unto her: and she when Herod was returned, and amongst other talk with many Oaths sware, that he never loved woman but her; indeed (quoth he) it may well be known how greatly you love me by the commandment you gave to Joseph, whom you charged to kill me. Herod hearing this which he thought to be secret, was like a mad man, and presently perswaded himself, that Joseph would never have disclosed that commandment of his, except he had abused her; so that hereupon he became furious, and leaping out of his bed, he walked up and down the Palace: whereupon his Sister Salome having fit opportunity, confirmed his suspition of Joseph. For which cause Herod growing now raging mad with jealousie, commanded both of them to be killed. Which done, his wrath was seconded by repentance; and after his anger ceased, the affection of love was presently renewed: yea, so great was the power of his affection, that he would not believe she was dead, but spake unto her as though she were alive, until in process of time being ascertained of her funeral, he equalled the affection he bare her during her life, by the vehemency of his passion for her death. Mariammes Sons succeeded their Mother in her wrath, and recogitating what an impious act it was, they accounted their Father as a mortal enemy, both before, and after they went to study at Rome, and especially after they came again into Judæa. For as they increased in years, so did the violence of their mind increase. And they bing now marriageable, one of them married the daughter of their Aunt Salome, who accused their Mother; the other married the daughter of Archelaus King of Cappadocia. And now to their hatred was there joyned a liberty to speak more freely against them, and by this occasion of their boldness many were animated to calumniate them: so that some did openly tell the King, that both his Sons sought to work treason against him, and that the one of them prepared an Army to help the other, to revenge the death of their Mother; and that the other (to wit, he that was Son in-law to Archelaus) purposed to flie, and accuse Herod before Cæsar. Herod giving ear unto those calumniations, sent for Antipater whom he had by Doris, to the end he might defend him against his two Sons, and sought to advance him above them. But they thought this alteration intollerable; seeing one, whose Mother was but a private woman, so preferred: and they moved with their own nobleness of Birth, could not contain their indignation, but upon every occasion shewed themselves offended; yet were they every day less accounted of. As for Antipater, he wrought himself into favour: for he knew how to flatter his Father, and raised many slanders on his two Brethren, partly invented by himself, partly divulged by some of his Favourites, whom he set awork about the matter, till at last he put his Brethren out of all hope of having the Kingdom. For he was now by the Kings will and Testament declared King, so that he was sent as a King unto Cæsar, in a Kingly habit and pomp, only he wore no Crown: and in time he so prevailed, that he wrought his Mother into Mariammes stead; and with flatteries and calumniations so moved the King, that he began to deliberate about the putting to death of his Sons. For which cause, he conducted his Son Alexander with him to Rome, and accused him before Cæsar, that he had given him poyson. But he with much ado, having obtained liberty to plead his own cause, and that before an unskilful Judg, yet more wise than Herod or Antipater, he modestly held his peace in all things that his Father had offended in: and first of all he purged his Brother from danger of that crime, and taking the whole matter upon himself, he in very good sort acquitted himself thereof. And afterwards he inveighed against Antipaters subtilty, and complained of those injuries, which had been offered him, having beside the equity of his cause, sufficient eloquence to acquit himself, for he was a vehement Orator, and knew well how to perswade. Last of all, he objected that his Father having a desire to put both him, and his Brother to death, had laid an accusation upon him; whereat the whole audience wept, and Cæsar was so moved, that not regarding the accusations that were laid upon them, he presently made Herod and them friends, upon these conditions, that they in all things should be obedient unto their father; and that their father should leave the Kingdom unto whom he pleased.

Hereupon Herod returned from Rome, and though he seemed to have forgiven his Sons; yet laid he not his jealousie and suspition aside. For Antipater still urged his argument to make Herod hate his other two Sons, though for fear of him that reconciled them, he durst not openly shew himself an enemy unto them. Afterward Herod sailed by Cilicia, and arrived at Eleusa, where Archelaus received him very courteously, thanking him for the safety of his Son in-law, and very joyful for that they were made friends: for he wrote unto his friends at Rome with all speed possible; that they should be favourable unto Alexander, when he came to plead his cause. And after this entertainment, he conducted Herod unto Zephyrius, giving him gifts to the value of thirty talents, and so took his leave of him. Herod as soon as he came to Jerusalem, assembled the people together, and being assisted by his three Sons, he shewed unto them the cause of his going to Rome, and blessed God, and thanked Cæsar,

For Cæsar appointed me King, and gave me leave to chuse whom I pleased for my "Successor, for the which I give him hearty thanks. And now I here constitute all three of "my Sons Kings: which purpose of mine, first I beseech Almighty God, and secondly you to "favour: for the one of them for his years, the other for their Nobility of birth, have right "to the Crown and Kingdom: which is so large, that it may suffice many; so that you for "your parts reverence them whom Cæsar conjoyned, and I their father ordained, giving them "not unfit, nor unlike honours, but such as they have deserved. For a man cannot do a grea-"ter pleasure unto him whom he honoureth above his years, than he shall give discontent "unto him whom he dishonoureth. For which cause, I will constitute to every one of them "such friends and well-willers, as with whom they be most conversant, and of them I will "require pledges of a concord and unity amongst them. For I know that discords and con-"tentions arise by malice of those who are conversant with Princes; and that if they be well "disposed, they will increase friendship. And I request not only these, but also all such as "bear rule in my Army, that they hope in me only for the present: for I give not my Sons "the Kingdom, but the honour and dignity thereof; and they shall have pleasure as though "they were Kings themselves, yet I my self will bear sway, although I am unwilling to do it. "Let every one of you consider my age, my course of life, and piety: for I am not so old that "any one may quickly despair of me, nor I have not accustomed my self to such kind of plea-"sure, as is wont to shorten young mens days; and we have been so religious, that we are in "great hope of long life. But if any one despise me, and seek to please my Sons, such a one "will I punish. I do not forbid them to be honored, whom my self have begotten, for that I "envy them: but because I know well that such applauses nourish pride and arrogance in the "fierce mindes of young men. Wherefore if all they that apply themselves in their service, "consider that I will be ready to reward the good; and that those who are seditious, shall "find their malice to have an unprofitable event at their hands, whom they so flatter: I "easily perswade my self that all men will be of my mind, that are of my Sons mind. For it "is good for them that I reign; and that I am friends with my Sons. And you O my good "Sons, retain in your minds that sacred nature, which maketh the very bruit beasts to enter-"tain natural affection: then reverence Cæsar who reconciled us: and last of all obey me "who request, and entreat that at your hands, which I might command, namely, that you "remain brethren. And I will now give you both Kingly attire and honour, and I pray God "that if you will continue and remain friends, I may continue in this mind.

Herod giveth not the Kingdom to his Sons, but the honours of the Kingdom.

Herod converteth his speech to his Sons.

After he had thus spoken, he saluted them very lovingly, and dismissed the people, some praying that it might be as he had said: others (who desired alteration) made as though they had heard nothing. Yet for all this, the dissention amongst the brethren was not appeased, but each of them mistrusting worser events, departed from one another. For Alexander and Aristobulus stomacked the matter, that Antipater had his desert confirmed, and Antipater was grieved that his brethren should have the second place after him; yet he could so craftily carry himself, that no man could perceive his hatred towards them. And they derived of a noble race spake all they thought, and many endeavoured to set them on; and others as friends insinuated themselves into their company, to learn what news: so that Alexander could not speak a word, but presently it was carried to Antipater; and from him to Herod with an addition; so that when Alexander spake any thing simply, meaning no harm, it was presently interpreted in the worst sense possible: and if he chanced at any time to speak freely of any matter, presently it was made a great thing. Antipater suborned men to set him on, that so his lies might be shadowed with colour of truth; and that if he could prove any one thing true, all lies and tales else divulged, might thereby be justified to be true. Now all Antipaters familiars were either naturally secret, or else he stopped their mouthes with bribes, lest they should disclose his intents: so that one might justly have termed his life a secrecy of malice. All Alexanders friends were either corrupted by money, or flattering speeches, wherewith Antipater overcame all, and made them thieves and proditors of such things as were either done or spoken against him: and himself doing all things, he dealt so warily, that at last those calumniations came to Herods ear: and he counterfeited his brothers person, and suborned other tale-carriers, telling what they could against Alexander; and pretending good will towards his brother, at first fainedly reproved them, and afterwards seriously alleadged their sayings as accusations: so that hereby Herod was very wroth, but turned all as though Alexander went about treason, and sought to kill his father: and nothing made so much credit be given to these calumniations, as that Antipater colourably colourably excuſed his brother. Herod incenſed hereat, every day withdrew his affection more and more from the two brethren, and daily encreaſed his love towards Antipater. The Nobility alſo were inclined after the ſame manner: partly of their own accord, and partly for that they were ſo commanded: ſo did Ptolomæus the chiefeſt of all the Nobility, and the Kings brethren, and all his kindred; for all mens expectation was upon Antipater. And that which grieved Alexander the more, was, that all theſe miſchiefs, wrought to his overthrow, were done by the counſel of Antipaters mother: for ſhe being a ſtep-mother, was cruel, and hated them being born of a Queen, far more than a ſtep-mother doth her ſons-in-law. And although all men followed Antipater for the hope which they had of him, yet were they alſo compelled thereunto by the Kings command, who gave an eſpecial charge to their deareſt friends, that none ſhould follow Alexander or his brother, ſo that he did not only terrifie thoſe of his own Kingdom, but alſo thoſe of other forreign Nations. For Cæſar had given him ſuch authority: for he gave him licence to take any one that was a fugitive from him, out of any City, although it were not under his Dominions. And the young men were ignorant of the offences laid unto their charge, and ſo were more eaſily entrapped being unaware of them: for their father did not openly tell them of any matter, but they every day perceived their fathers good will towards them to decay, which ſo much the more encreaſed their grief. In like manner Antipater by little and little moved Pheroras their uncle, and Salome their Aunt againſt them, dayly conſulting with his wife, whom he ſhould incite againſt them.

Glaphyra Alexanders wife increaſed his conceived ſuſpition by her words.

Now Glaphyra, Alexanders wife, encreaſed their malice every day, recounting her own Nobility, and bearing her ſelf above all that were in the whole Kingdom: for ſhe derived her pedigree by the fathers ſide, from Timenus; by the mothers ſide, from Hyſtaſpis his ſon, called Darius: inveighing very much againſt the baſeneſs of Herods wives, and his ſiſter, who were choſen for their beauty, and not for their nobility of birth. For Herod (as we have ſaid) had many wives, both for that it was lawful by the cuſtome of their Countrey, and becauſe Herod delighted in many; and all of them hated Alexander, for Glaphyras pride and contumelious ſpeeches. And Ariſtobulus made Salome his enemy, although ſhe was his wives mother: for ſhe was before moved by Glaphyras ſpeeches, and he often upbraided his wife with her baſe birth, ſtill telling her that he had married a private woman, and his brother Alexander a Queen. And his wife often with weeping tears told this to her mother: adding moreover, that Alexander and Ariſtobulus threatned, that if they got the Kingdom, they would make their other brethrens mothers weave with their maids: and that they would make them Notaries of Villages, deriding them that they applied themſelves to learning. Salome moved hereat, could not contain her ſelf, but told all to Herod, who eaſily believed her, becauſe ſhe ſpake againſt her ſon-in-law. Moreover, another accuſation was laid to their charge, whereat the King was greatly moved: for he was informed that Alexander and Ariſtobulus did often bewail their mother, and lament her hard hap with ſighs, and curſed him: and that often when he beſtowed ſome of Mariammes clothes upon his latter wives, they threatned that in a ſhort time, inſtead of Princely attire, they ſhould wear a black habit. Wherupon Herod, though he feared the conſtant minds of the young men, yet becauſe he would not take away all hope of amendment, he called them unto him (for he was to ſail to Rome) and as a King threatned them in few words, and like a father gave them many admonitions, and requeſted them to love their brethren, promiſing them forgiveneſs of their former offences, ſo that hereafter they amended all. But they beſeeching him not to believe accuſations forged againſt them upon malice, and anſwering that the effect of matters would eaſily acquit them, requeſted him not ſo eaſily to believe tales, but refuſe to give malignant people opportunity and recourſe unto him: for that there would always be ſome, that would malitiouſlly invent tales to tell, whileſt there was any one that would give them the hearing and believing thereof. For they knew that Salome was their enemy, and Pheroras their uncle, and both of them bare cruel minds, and were hard-hearted; and eſpecially Pheroras, who was fellow with his brother of all, ſaving only the Crown, and had his own revenues amounting to an hundred talents a year, & received all fruits of the whole Country beyond Jordan, which was given him by his brother. Herod alſo had obtained of Cæſar, to make him Tetrarch, and had beſtowed upon him a Princeſs for his wife, eſpouſing unto him his wives ſiſter, after whoſe deceaſe he eſpouſed unto him his eldeſt daughter, and gave him three hundred Talents with her for a dowry. But Pheroras fell in love with his maid, and forſook a Princeſs: whereat Herod being angry, married his daughter unto his brothers ſon, who was afterwards ſlain by the Parthians, but Herod preſently pardoned Pheroras offence. Divers before this time were of opinion that in the life time of the Queen, he would have poyſoned Herod;

Alexander and Ariſtobulus oftentimes bewail their mother, and by that means provoke their father.

The two brothers excuſe themſelves before their father Herod.

A Herod; and Herod although he loved his Brother very well; yet becauſe many who had acceſs unto him, told him ſo, he began to miſdoubt: and ſo examining many that were ſuſpected, laſtly he came to Pheroras friends, and none of them confeſſed it: yet they confeſſed that he was determined to flie unto the Parthians with her whom he was ſo in love withal; and that Coſtabarus, Salomes husband was privy thereunto, unto whom the King married her, after her firſt husband for ſuſpicion of adultery was put to death. Salome her ſelf was not free from accuſation: for Pheroras accuſed her that ſhe had contracted Matrimony with Syllæus, who was Procurator to Oboda, King of Arabia, who was a great enemy of the Kings: and ſhe being convicted both of this, and all things elſe, whereof her Brother Pheroras accuſed her, yet obtained pardon, as likewiſe Pheroras did: ſo that the whole tempeſt of all their family was turned againſt Alexander, and light upon his head.

The year of the world, 3976. before Chriſts Nativity, 8.

B The King had three Eunuches whom he loved dearly, and every one known by their Offices: for one of them was his Butler; the other was his Cook; and the third got him to bed, and lay with him; theſe three Alexander with great gifts overcame. Which the King underſtanding, by torments forced them to confeſs it, and declared with what promiſes they were thereto by Alexander induced, and how he had deceived them; affirming that there was no truſting to Herod who was a ſhameleſs old man; and that he died his hair, to make himſelf to ſeem young: and that he in deſpite of him would be his Succeſſour, and then he would be revenged upon his enemies, and make his friends happy, and eſpecially them: and that the whole Nobility did ſecretly obey him, and the Captains of the Army and Governours did privily come unto him. Hereat Herod was ſo terrified, that he durſt not preſently C divulge their Confeſſions, but night and day he ſent ſpies to learn what was ſaid or done; and whom he ſuſpected, them he preſently killed; ſo that his whole Kingdom was full of iniquity. For every one as his malice moved him, fained calumniations, and many deſirous of blood-ſhed, abuſed the Kings wrath as they pleaſed againſt their enemies, and credit was given to every lie, and no man was ſo ſoon accuſed, but preſently he was puniſhed; and he who preſently before accuſed others, was now accuſed himſelf, and carried to be puniſhed with him whom he accuſed. For the Kings perils ſhortned the time of trial for their lives, and he became ſo tyrannous, ſo that he afforded not a good look unto them that were not accuſed, and ſhewed himſelf moſt fierce and violent even to his deareſt friends: that he baniſhed many out of his Kingdom, and railed againſt ſuch as he had no D power over. Antipater increaſed this miſchief more and more, and gathering together a great company of his friends, he omitted no kind of calumniation. The King likewiſe was terrified by the rumours and tales of pick-thanks, that he thought always that he ſaw Alexander before him with a drawn ſword. For which cauſe he ſuddenly took him and caſt him in priſon, and tortured his friends, many of which died in torments, becauſe they would not confeſs more than in conſcience was true: others not able to endure the torments, were forced to confeſs, that Alexander and his Brother Ariſtobulus thought to have wrought treaſon againſt their father, and that they expected their time till he went a hunting; reſolving in themſelves that having killed him, they would preſently flie to Rome. Although theſe E and ſuch like calumniations were no ways probable, yet extremity of pain forced men ex tempore to invent them, and the King willingly believed them, as it were comforting himſelf thereby, in that he might not be thought to have impriſoned his Son unjuſtly. Alexander perceiving that it was impoſſible for him to aboliſh his Fathers ſuſpicion, thought it be better to yeeld himſelf guilty: and ſo wrote four Books againſt his adverſaries, and confeſſed the treaſon: affirming that he had many partakers therein, namely, Pheroras and Salome, who were the chief; avouching that before that time he had had the uſe of her body in the night time: and how though himſelf was unwilling, yet ſhe forced him thereunto. Now the Books came unto Herods hands, which charged the greateſt amongſt the Nobility with moſt heinous matters. Archelaus fearing his Son-in-law and Daughter to be in great danger, ſpeedily came into Judæa, and ingeniouſly appeaſed the Kings wrath: for ſo ſoon as F he came unto Herod, he cried, "Where is that wicked Son-in-law of mine, or where may I "ſee the face of that wretch that goeth about to murther his Father, that I may tear him in "pieces with mine own hands, and marry my daughter anew to a better Husband? For al"though ſhe be not privy to his counſel, yet ſhe is defiled, for that ſhe was wife to ſuch a "man; Nay, I admire thy patience, who art in ſuch danger, and ſuffereſt Alexander yet to live: for I came thus haſtily out of Cappadocia, thinking he had been put to death, to talk with thee concerning my daughter, whom I married to him for thy ſake and honour. Wherefore now let us take counſel what to do with them both: and ſeeing thou art too father-like, and not able to puniſh thy Son, thy treacherous Son; let us change rooms, and let me me be in thy place to revenge thee: with such like invectives he deceived Herod, (though otherwise firm in his purpose.) Then Herod shewed him the Books that Alexander had writ: and reading every Chapter with deliberation, Archelaus took occasion fit for his purpose; and by little and little laid all the fault on Pheroras, and those that were accused in the Book. And perceiving the King to give ear unto him: "Let us (quoth he) consider whether the young man was not circumvented by the treachery of so many lewd persons, and not thou by the young man: for there appears no cause why he should fall into such wickedness, who now enjoyed the Kingdom, and hoped to succeed thee therein, and he not been perswaded thereto by other men, who seeing him a young man, enticed him unto such naughtiness. For we see, that through such men, not only young men, but also old men, and most noble Families, yea, and whole Kingdoms are ruinated. Herod upon these speeches began somewhat to relent, so that he appeased his wrath toward Alexander, and encreased it towards Pheroras; for he was as it were the subject of the whole Book. Who perceiving the King so to trust to Archelaus friendship, that he was led by him to do what he pleased; leaving Alexander, he in humble manner came to Archelaus, seeking impudently for succour at his hands; of whom he had not deserved any favour. "Archelaus answered him "that he knew no ways to obtain his pardon, who was guilty of so hainous crimes, and convicted manifestly to have practised High treason against the Kings own person, and to be "the cause of all these miseries that had now befallen the young man, except that he would "lay aside all subtle dealing, and denying of his fact, and confess the crimes whereof he was "accused; and so in humble wise go unto his Brother who loved him dearly, and crave pardon; promising him that if he would so do, he would do him what good he could. Hereupon Pheroras obeyed Archelaus his counsel, and putting on a black attire, he in a pitiful manner, and with tears prostrated himself at Herods feet, and craving pardon obtained it, confessing himself to be a most wicked and vile person, and to be guilty of all that which was objected against him, and that the cause which moved him to do all these things, was the frantick and mad fits he fell into, for the love of that woman. Now when Pheroras became his own accuser, and a witness against himself, then Archelaus endeavoured to mitigate Herods wrath towards him, and excuse his faults with fit examples: for he alleadged that his Brother attempted greater matters against him, whom notwithstanding for natures cause he pardoned: adding that in every Kingdom as in mighty bodies, always some part began to swell, which notwithstanding was not presently to be cut off, but to be cured by easie means.

Herod is incensed against his Brother Pheroras.

Pheroras attired in a mourning garment, with tears falleth before Herods feet and craveth pardon.

Pheroras by Archelaus means pacifieth Herod.

Archelaus using many speeches unto Herod to this purpose, at last quite appeased his wrath toward Pheroras, still counterfeiting himself to be angry with Alexander, affirming that he would take his daughter away with him, till at last he forced Herod of his own accord to entreat for the young man, requesting him again to despouse his daughter unto him. Archelaus after much entreaty answered, that he was willing that the King should bestow his daughter upon any, save Alexander, for he greatly esteemed the law of affinity. Herod replied, that if he did not divorce his daughter from Alexander, he should think that he bestowed his Son upon him: for they had no children, and his Daughter was dearly loved of the young man; so that if he would permit her to stay still there, for her sake he would pardon all Alexanders offences. Hereto Archelaus with much ado agreed, and so was reconciled unto his Son in-law, and he unto his Father. Yet Herod affirmed that he must needs be sent to Rome to speak with Cæsar, for he had written the whole matter unto Cæsar. Thus Archelaus craftily delivered his Son in-law from danger, and after his reconciliation was made, they spent the time in feasting and mirth. Upon Archelaus departure, Herod gave him seventy talents, and a Throne of pure gold, adorned with precious stones, and Eunuchs, and a concubine named Panichis; and rewarded every one of his friends according to their deserts. And all the Kings kindred by the Kings appointment and consent, bestowed rich gifts upon Archelaus, and both he and all his Nobility accompanied him to Antiochia.

Herod dismisseth Archelaus and his friends with great presents, Ant. l. 16. c. 11.

Not long after, there came one into Judæa far more subtile than Archelaus, who both disanulled the reconciliation made for Alexander, and caused his death also. This man was a Lacedemonian born, named Eurycles, who by Money sought to have obtained the Kingdom. This man brought unto Herod rich gifts, as it were for a bait of that he intended; he had so behaved himself in Greece, that it could no longer tolerate his excess: and Herod again rewarded him with far greater gifts, than those were that he gave him: but he esteemed his liberality as nothing, except he bought it with the blood of Princes. For which cause he circumvented the King, partly by flattering him, partly by praising him feinedly, and especially by his own craft and subtilty: and quickly perceiving his inclination, he both in word and deed sought to please him; so that the King accounted him among his chiefest friends.

Eurycles the Lacedemonian secretly accuseth Alexander to his father, and is the cause of his death.

friends. For both the King and all the Nobility honoured him the more for his Countrey-ſake, in that he was a Lacedemonian. But he very eaſily perceiving the feeble ſtay of Herods houſe, and the hatred between the Brethren, and how the King was affected towards every one of them, he firſt of all entertained himſelf at Antipaters houſe, making a ſhew in the mean while of good will towards Alexander, pretending and proteſting, that in times paſt he had been Archelaus companion; and by this means he quickly crept into favour with him, as an approved friend: which was the cauſe that he was ſuddenly entertained for a faithful man; He preſently likewiſe brought him into friendſhip with Ariſtobulus, and having ſounded every mans diſpoſition, he accommodated himſelf to all humors: and to begin withal, he became Antipaters penſioner, and a traytor to Alexander. And he often uſed hot words to Antipater, as it were chiding him, that he being eldeſt of the Brethren, ſo ſlenderly looked after them, who pretended to put him beſides the Crown, which was his right. He many times likewiſe uſed the like words to Alexander, admiring him who was born of a Queen, and huſband to a Queen, and yet would permit ſuch an one who was deſcended of a private woman, to ſucceed in the Kingdom, eſpecially ſeeing he had ſuch occaſion and opportunity to effect the contrary: for he might aſſure himſelf of Archelaus his help in any thing. Alexander ſuppoſed he had ſpoke as he thought, becauſe he counterfeited friendſhip with Archelaus: ſo that he miſdoubting nothing, diſcloſed unto him all his mind concerning Antipater, ſaying, that it was no wonder though Herod diſinherited them of the Kingdom, ſith beforetime he had ſlain their Mother.

Eurycles, counterfeiting himſelf both to pity them, and to be ſorrowful for their miſchance, enticed Ariſtobulus to ſpeak the like: and having animated them both to complain in this ſort againſt their Father, he preſently went to Antipater, and diſcloſed to him all their ſecrets, forging alſo the treachery which thoſe two brethren intended againſt him, which was to diſpatch him with their ſwords. For this cauſe Antipater gave him a great ſum of money, and commended him to his Father, and being hired to effect the death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus, he himſelf became their accuſer: Whereupon he came to Herod, and told him how in regard of thoſe benefits he had received at his hand, he would now beſtow his life upon him, and the light of this world for recompence of his hoſpitality; affirming that Alexander had lately ſtretched out his hand with his ſword drawn to kill him, and he only was the cauſe that he performed it not, ſtaying his hand, and promiſing him to aſſiſt him in the matter: adding that Alexander uſed theſe ſpeeches; that Herod was not contented to enjoy a Kingdom which was another mans right, nor yet as it were to diſmember his Kingdom after Mariammes death, but he would alſo leave the Kingdom belonging unto their anceſtors, unto a pernicious baſtard, Antipater: and for that cauſe he would revenge Hircanus and Mariammes death: And that it was not convenient to receive the Kingdom, from ſuch a Father without blood; and every day he had occaſion given him ſo to do: for he could ſpeak nothing without calumniation. For if any mention were made at any time of any ones Nobility, preſently he was upbraided without cauſe, for his Father would preſently ſay, There is none Noble but Alexander, whoſe fathers baſe birth is a ſhame and diſcredit unto him. And that going a hunting, if he held his peace, his father was offended; if he praiſed, then it was ſaid, he mocked: ſo that in every thing, he found his fathers affection turned from him, and that he was only favourable to Antipater: ſo that he would die with all his heart, if he failed of his purpoſe; if he kill'd him, his father-in-law Archelaus would work his ſafety, to whom he might eaſily flee. And after, he would go to Cæſar (who as yet knew not Herods manners) for he would not ſtand before him then, as he did before, being terrified becauſe his Father was preſent, neither would he only ſpeak of his own wrongs, but of the wrongs of the whole Nation, who were oppreſſed by exactions even unto death. And then he would lay open in what pleaſure, and after what ſort, the money gotten with blood was conſumed: and who, and what kind of men they were, that were thereby enriched; and what was the cauſe of the affliction of the City: and that there he would bewail the death of his Unkle, and his Mother, and unfold all Herods wickedneſs: which being once made manifeſt unto the world, no man would account him a murtherer of his Father. Eurycles having falſly reported this of Alexander, fell preſently to praiſe, and extol Antipater, affirming that he only loved his father, and hindred ſuch practices.

Eurycles by feined friendſhip deceiveth Alexander.

The King, yet not throughly appeaſed for that which had paſt, grew into an exceeding agony, and Antipater once again ſuborned other falſe witneſſes againſt him, who affirmed that they were wont to have ſecret talk with Jucundus and Tyrannus, who ſometime were Generals of the Kings Horſmen, who were then diſplaced for ſome offence they had committed.

that they were ignorant of all that which was laid to their charge. But there was found and brought to the King a Letter, as though it had been written by Alexander, unto the Governour of the Castle of Alexandrium, requesting him, that he would receive him and his brother Aristobulus into the Castle, when he had killed his father, and to assist them both with weapons and other necessaries. Alexander affirmed that this Letter was counterfeited by Diophantus, the Kings Secretary, who was both bold, and could counterfeit any ones hand; and having counterfeited many, was at last for the same put to death.

Diophantus the Kings Notary, writeth feined letters in Alexanders name.

Herod caused the Governour of the Castle to be tortured, but he confessed nothing that was laid against him: and although he had no good proof of any thing, yet he commanded his two Sons to be kept in hold. He likewise called Eurycles (who was the bane of his house, H and the breeder of all the mischief) author of his safety, and one who had well deserved at his hands, and gave him fifty talents: who departing from Judæa before matters were well known, went to Archelaus, and feining that he had reconciled Alexander and Herod, he received there a piece of money. From thence he went into Achaia, and spent that he had evilly gotten, in as bad manner as he got it. Lastly, he was accused unto Cæsar, that he had caused dissension in all Achaia, and spoiled the Cities: for which cause he was banished. And this was the punishment which was inflicted upon him for Alexander and Aristobulus troubles.

Cous Evaratus.

It is not amiss here in this place, to compare Evaratus of Cous, unto this Eurycles: who I being a dear friend unto Alexander, and arriving about the same time that Eurycles did, being put to his Oath, sware that he heard the young men say nothing: yet his Oath nothing prevailed nor profited them, poor Souls. For Herod would only hear and give ear unto accusations, and he highly esteemed them that would believe them with him, and shew themselves moved thereat.

Ant. l 16. c. 12.

Moreover, Salome increased his cruelty towards his Sons: for Aristobulus minding to bring her into the same trouble with himself, who was his Mother-in-law and his Aunt, sent unto her, willing her to look to her self, as though the King was minded to put her to death. Who being now called in question for the matters whereof she was before accused, to wit, that she purposed to marry with the Kings enemy, Syllæus the Arabian, to whom she privily revealed the Kings secrets: this was the utter ruine of the young men, wherewithall they K were overthrown, as it were with a violent tempest. For presently Salome went unto the King, and told him that Aristobulus had admonished her of: and he being now outrageous, caused both his Sons to be bound and imprisoned in several places. Then sent he Volumnius, who was the General of his Army, and Olympus, one of his familiar friends, unto Cæsar, to carry the informations against his Sons in writing: who saying to Rome, after their arrival delivered the Kings Letters. And Cæsar was very sorry for the young men, yet he permitted the Father to do what he would with his Children: and so wrote unto him, that he should have licence to do what he thought good: yet he signified unto him, that he should do better to call his Nobles together, and let them make enquiry concerning the treasons: and then if he found them guilty of those things whereof they were accused, to put them to L

Hereupon Herod, according to Cæsars Letters and appointment, came unto Berytum, and there gathered an Assembly to sit in Judgment; the chief in that Judgment, were the Governours that Cæsar in his Letters appointed. Saturninus and Pedanius Embassadors, and with them Volumnius, Procurator; next, the Kings kindred, and Salome and Pheroras: and then the Nobility of Syria, Archelaus only excepted, who because he was Father-in-law to his Son, Herod suspected him to be partial. But he suffered not his Sons to come into Judgment: for he knew that the very sight of them would have moved all men to compassion. And moreover, if they were permitted to speak for themselves, that then Alexander would easily have acquitted them both: for which cause they were kept in Platan, in a Castle of Sidonia. The M
King beginning his Oration, was as vehement, as though they had been present against whom he spake; and he was half afraid to object any treason against them, for that he had no proof thereof: and therefore he prosecuted their opprobrious words, injuries and offences, which they had committed against him, the which he affirmed to be more grievous than death.

Herod accuseth his Sons in open Judgment.

At last (when no man contradicted him) he began to lament, as though by overcoming in such sort, himself was also overcome, and thereupon requested every one to give their verdict. And first of all Saturninus condemned his sons, but not to die: saying, that he had three Sons present, and he thought it not lawful to adjudge other mens Sons to death.

The

A The two Legats alſo affirmed the ſame, and many followed their advice: But Volumnius was the firſt that pronounced the ſorrowful ſentence: after whom all the reſt followed, ſome to flatter Herod, ſome for hatred they bare him, but none for any indignation againſt the young men. Then all Judæa and Syria expected an end of this Tragedy; yet no man thought Herod to be ſuch a tyrant, as that he would have put his two ſons to death. Herod cauſed his ſons to be brought to Tyre, and from thence by ſhip he conveighed them to Cæſarea, bethinking himſelf what death he ſhould put them to. In the mean time, there was an old ſouldier of the Kings, named Tiro, who had a ſon belonging to Alexander, and highly in his favour, and he himſelf greatly loved the two young men: who being very much grieved in mind at that which had paſt, went about, crying, that juſtice was troden under foot, truth oppreſt, B that nature was confounded, and the life of man full of iniquity; and whatſoever elſe, grief put into his mind, who nothing eſteemed his own life. At laſt, this Tiro came boldly to the King, and ſaid unto him: "O King thou ſeemeſt to me moſt unhappy, who doſt give credit "to wicked and vile perſons againſt thy deareſt ſons. For Pheroras and Salome thou be-"lieveſt before thine own children, whom notwithſtanding thou haſt often found to have "deſerved death; and thou perceiveſt not that they do this, to the intent to make thee want "lawful Succeſſors, and leave thee none but Antipater, whom they with their hearts would "have King, becauſe they can rule him as they liſt. But bethink thy ſelf (O King) how all "thy ſouldiers will hate him for the death of his two brethren; for there is no man that doth "not pity the two young men, and many of the Nobility are diſpleaſed hereat. After he had ſpoken this, he named them who were diſpleaſed: whereupon the King commanded them, and him, and his ſon to be laid hold on: and preſently one of the Kings Barbers, na-C med Tryphon, ſhewing himſelf to be in I know not what fury, came forth, and ſaid unto Herod: Tiro perſwaded me to kill thee with my razor, promiſing me, that if I would ſo do, Alexander would give me great rewards. Herod hearing this, cauſed Tiro, and his ſon, and the Barber to be tortured: and they denied all, and the Barber affirmed nothing more than he had already ſaid. Then he commanded Tiro to be more tormented. Whereupon his ſon, moved with compaſſion towards his father, promiſed to diſcloſe all the matter to the King, ſo that he would pardon his father: who being releaſed of his torments, preſently declared how his father, through Alexanders means and procurement, was purpoſed to have killed him. Many that were preſent thought this was a device of the young man, to free his father from torments: and yet others were perſwaded that it was true. Upon this, Herod made a D ſpeech unto the people, wherein he inveighed againſt the Governors of his Army, and Tiro, and made the people arm themſelves, and kill both them and the Barber with ſtaves and ſtones. Now he ſent his ſons unto Sebaſte, which was not far from Cæſarea, and there he cauſed them to be ſtrangled: and having quickly diſpatcht the matter, he cauſed them to be brought into the Caſtle Alexandrium, there to be buried with their mothers uncle. E Of Antipaters conſpiracy againſt Herod his father.

BUt Antipater now hoping without all controverſie to ſucceed in the Kingdom, was generally hated of the whole Nation: for it was openly known, that he by falſe calumniations had cauſed his brethrens deaths. And on the other ſide, he ſtood in no little fear of his brothers children, whom he perceived now to begin to grow to years: for Alexander had by Glaphyra two ſons, Tigranes, and Alexander; and Ariſtobulus had by Bernice, daughter to Salome, five children; to wit, three ſons, Herod, Agrippa, and Ariſtobulus, and two daughters, Herodias and Mariamme. Herod after he had put Alexander to death, ſent away Glaphyra with her dowry into Cappadocia; and married Bernice, Ariſtobulus his wife, unto Antipaters uncle: for Antipater deviſed this match to become friends F with Salome, whom he before-time hated and envied. He alſo by his great gifts ſought to get Pheroras favour, and the friendſhip of ſuch as were friends unto Cæſar, ſending to that end great ſums of money unto Rome. He gave Saturninus and all the reſt great riches in Syria. But the more he gave, the more he was hated of all men; for every one judged that he did not conſume ſuch wealth, for that he was liberal, but that he laviſhed it out for fear, ſo that he got not the love of them, upon whom he beſtowed it; and they to whom he gave nothing, were ſo much the more his enemies. Yet he became every day more bountiful, ſeeing, againſt his expectation, Herod made much of their children, whoſe parents he had ſlain. Intending to ſhew how much he repented their deaths, by the pity and compaſſion compassion he took upon their children. For assembling together his friends, he caused the children to be placed by him, and the tears standing in his eyes, he said, Hard, Cruel, and Sinister fortune took away from me the fathers of these children: but I pity to see them orphans, and natural affection commendeth them unto me. Wherefore I will endeavour, that seeing I have been an unfortunate father, I may be a wiser and happier grand-father, and leave them who are most dear unto me, to Reign after me. Wherefore brother Pheroras, I betroth thy daughter unto Alexanders eldest son, that for that cause thou maist be careful to provide for him, and assist him: and unto thy son Antipater I assure the daughter of Aristobulus, that so thou maist be a father to her who wants a father; and my son Herod, whose mothers uncle was High Priest, shall marry with her sister. And this is my will and pleasure touching this matter, and let no man who loveth me seek to alter this. And I beseech Almighty God, for the good of my Countrey, and of these my Nephews, to prosper these marriages, and to look upon these children with a more favourable eye then he did upon their fathers. Having thus spoken, he wept, and joyned the childrens hands, and courteously saluting every one, he dismissed the Counsel..

Herod grievously bemoaneth his sons, expressing the same by his commiseration toward their children.

Herod betrotheth his Nephews.

Upon this, Antipater was amazed, and all the Orphans well perceived how sorrowful he was. For now he thought himself dishonoured by his father, and that his good fortune was endangered, seeing that Alexanders son was like to have both Archelaus and Pheroras the Tetrarch to assist him. Moreover, he considered how he was hated, and how the people did compassionate the children for that they were fatherless; and affected them, remembring their fathers who were dead, and were terrified at his wickedness. Wherefore he attempted all means possible to break off the marriages, yet he feared to insinuate any thing to his father cunningly, who was now very severe, and wary, and mistrustful. And therefore went openly unto him to make his humble sute, and request him, that he would not leave him without honour, nor deprive him of that dignity, which before time he had judged him worthy of, giving him only the bare Title of a King, and leaving the substance of the Kingdom in other mens powers. For it would be impossible for him to obtain the Kingdom, if Alexanders son (beside Archelaus his favour) were by marriage made son-in-law unto Pheroras, Wherefore he earnestly besought him, that seeing he had a great many daughters, to change the marriages: for the King had nine wives, and by seven of them he had children; Antipater by Doris, Herod by Mariamme, daughter of the High Priest, and Antipas, and Archelaus by Malthace, the Samaritane, and his daughter Olympias, whom his brother Joseph married: and by Cleopatra of Jerusalem, Herod and Philip; and by Pallas, Phasælus: he had two other daughters also, Roxane and Salome: one of them by Phædra, and the other by Elpis. He had likewise two wives, by whom he had no issue, his cousin, and his neece; and beside these he had two daughters by Mariamme, sisters to Alexander and Aristobulus. Wherefore Antipater seeing his father had such choice of daughters, he requested the marriages to be altered.

Herods children by his seven wives.

The King, well perceiving his mind and purpose towards the Orphans, was very angry: and calling to remembrance the misfortune of his sons, whom he had put to death, he greatly feared, lest Antipater by some false accusations should overthrow them, and so with sharp words did drive him off for that time; yet afterward, he so flattered Herod, that he got the marriages to be altered. And first of all, he joyned Aristobulus daughter with Antipater himself, and his son to Pheroras daughter. Here one may see what Antipater could do by flattering speeches: for Salome in the like matter could not speed, although she was his sister, and procured many times Julius Cæsars wife, to speak for her, that she might marry with Syllæus the Arabian, yet was she not permitted so to do. But Herod sware that he would account her as an utter enemy, except she would desist from that purpose, and afterward against her Will he married her unto one Alexas, a friend of his: and one of her daughters to Alexanders son, and the other to Antipaters uncle.

Herod is perswaded by Antipaters flatteries to break off the marriages.

As for Mariammes daughters, one of them was married to Antipater, his sisters son, the other unto Phasælus, his brothers son. When Antipater had quite overthrown the hope of the Orphans, and joyned affinity as he thought good, he now held himself on a sure ground: and adding confidence to his malice, he became intollerable to all men. And seeing he could not avoid their hatred, he now fought by fear to work his own safety; and so much the more, because Pheroras now assisted him, as one that was confirmed, and established for King. Also the women in the Court fell at variance, and raised a new broil: for Pheroras wife with her mother and her sister, and the mother of Antipater did use themselves very insolently in many things, abusing also two of the Kings daughters very contumeliously; to which matter she was chiefly set on by Antipater, who hated them, having the others at his command, only only Salome hindred their agreement: who went unto the King, and told him that their meetings were not for his profit.

The women understanding how she had informed the King, and that Herod was offended thereat; they came no more together openly, and abstained from their wonted familiarity, and in the Kings hearing, feined themselves to fall out one with another. Antipater also made the same shew, so that he stuck not openly to offend Pheroras: notwithstanding, they had meetings and Banquets in the night, and the unity was the more confirmed, because they perceived themselves to be noted; for Salome knew all this, and told it to the King. The King was very angry, and especially against Pheroras wife, whom chiefly Salome blamed: and having called together his kindred and friends, he laid many accusations against her before them; and told them how contumeliously she had behaved her self toward his daughter, and that she hired the Pharisees against him, and that by her poyson, she had made his Brother his enemy. And turning himself unto Pheroras, he asked him whether he had rather have him for his Brother, or have his wife. And he answering, that he had rather die than lose his wife; Herod doubtful what to do; turned him to Antipater, and commanded him never to talk with Pheroras, nor his wife, nor any one belonging to them after that time. But he obeyed his fathers command openly in shew, but secretly lay in their house: and fearing that Salome should perceive it, he by his friends in Italy caused himself to make a voyage to Rome, by Letters brought to Herod, wherein it was commanded, that shortly after the receit thereof, Antipater should be sent to Rome unto Cæsar. Wherefore Herod using no delay, sent him presently, furnishing him with all things necessary, and a great sum of money; giving him likewise his last Will and Testament to carry with him to Cæsar; wherein was written, that Antipater should be King, and after him Herod, the Son of Mariamme, daughter of the High Priest. But Syllæus the Arabian, neglecting Cæsars commandment, at the same time sailed to Rome, there to contend with Antipater, about matters which were before in controversie between him and Nicholaus. He had also a great contention with Aretas his King, whose friends he had slain, and also Sohemus, the most potent in all the Town of Petra: and seeing Fabatus, Cæsars Procurator, he used his favour also against Herod. But Herod giving Fabatus a great sum of money, alienated him from Syllæus, and by this means dispatched that which Cæsar commanded: and because Fabatus restored nothing to him, he accused him that he was Procurator, not for Cæsar, but for Herod: wherewith Fabatus was moved; and being as yet in great estimation with Herod, he did disclose Syllæus his secrets, and signified to the King, how that Syllæus had corrupted Corinthus one of his Guard, whom he willed to be taken and kept in hold. And the King followed his counsel: for this Corinthus, though he was always brought up in the Kings Court, yet he was born in Arabia. Wherefore he presently took him, and two other Arabians, that were found with him; one of them was Syllæus friend and the other, Phylarchus: who upon their examination, confessed that Corinthus, for a great sum of money was hired to kill the King. After this they were sent to Saturnius, Governour of Syria, and from him to Rome.

CHAP. XIX.

How Herod should have been poysoned, and how it was known.

HErod still urged Pheroras to forsake his wife: for he knew not how to punish her, having many matters against her: at last he was so moved, that he banisht his Brother and her. Pheroras taking this injury patiently, departed into his Tetrarchy, taking an Oath that his banishment should endure as long so Herod lived, and that whilest he lived, he would never come any more to him; Insomuch, as he would not come at his Brother to visit him when he was sick, notwithstanding he was often sent for, when (as he thought) he lay now on his death-bed, and would gladly impart something unto him: but contrary to all hope he recovered, and afterwards Pheroras fell sick. At which time Herod shewed his patient and humble mind: for he went unto him, and very kindly sought help for him; but he was too far spent, for a few days after he died: and although Herod loved him until his dying day, yet was it bruted abroad, that he poysoned him. Herod caused his body to be brought unto Jerusalem, and commanded all his Nation to mourn, and buried him with a sumptuous funeral. And thus one of the Murtherers of Alexander, and Aristobulus came to his end: but shortly after, the revenge of that wicked fact did fall upon Antipater, who was the chief Author thereof: it did but begin with Pheroras. For certain that belonged to Pheroras came in mournful wise unto Herod, and complained unto him, how that his Brother Pheroras was poysoned, and that one of his Wives gave him meat that was was not ſeaſoned after the accuſtomed manner: which when he had eaten, he preſently fell ſick. And that two days before his death, there came a Witch out of Arabia, who was ſent for by his Mother and Siſter, to give Pheroras a love Potion, and ſhe inſtead thereof, through Syllæus inducements, gave him Poyſon, for ſhe was of Syllæus acquaintance. A Witch of Arabia.

The King daunted with ſo many ſuſpicions, cauſed divers of Pheroras maids, and libertines to be put to torments, and one of them impatient herein, exclaimed in this wiſe: O thou God, ruler of Heaven and earth, revenge us upon Antipaters Mother, who is the cauſe of theſe our evils. When the King underſtood thus much, he ceaſed not to ſearch out the truth: and then the women diſcloſed Antipaters familiarity with Pheroras, and his women, and their ſecret meetings: and that Pheroras and Antipater, after they came from the King, uſed to drink with them all night long, not ſuffering any ſervant or maid to be in the room with them; H and one of the Libertines wives revealed this. And when every one of the maids were tortured a part, all their examinations agreed; ſo that now it was evident, wherefore Antipater had compacted to go to Rome, and Pheroras beyond the River Jordan. For they were often wont to ſay, that Herod having killed Alexander and Ariſtobulus, now he would come to them and their wives: and that it was unlike that he would ſpare any one, who ſpared not Mariamme and her Sons: and therefore it was beſt to flee as far as it was poſſible from ſuch a beaſt. And that Antipater was wont often to complain unto his Mother, that now he grew gray-haired, and his father waxed young and luſty; and that it might ſo chance, that he ſhould never live to be King; or if ever his Father died, he ſhould enjoy the pleaſure of the Kingdom but a ſhort time. And moreover, the heads of Hydra, that is to ſay, Alexanders, and Ariſtobulus Sons, began to ſpring up again: and that his father had injuriouſly cut off all hope I from his Sons, appointing none of them to ſucceed him, but the Son of Mariamme: wherein he was perſwaded that he doated, if ſo be he thought his Will ſhould be of force; for he would take ſuch an order, that he would have none of all his Progeny alive, and that Herod was the greateſt hater of his Sons of any father in the world: and was not therewithal contented, but he alſo hated his own Brethren. Furthermore, that he not long ago gave him an hundred talents, that he ſhould have no conference with Pheroras: and when Pheroras asked wherein they hurt him, Antipater anſwered, I would to God that he would take away all men elſe, and leave only us two naked, ſo that he would grant us life; but quoth he, it is impoſſible to eſcape this dangerous Beaſt, who will not ſuffer men openly to ſhew friendſhip to one another. Laſtly, though we now ſecretly meet, yet if we bear the hearts and hands of men, the time will be when we may talk and meet openly. The maids in torments K diſcloſed theſe ſpeeches, and that Pheroras was determined to flee with them into Petra. Herod believed all their ſayings, and the rather for that which was ſaid concerning the hundred talents. For he ſaid nothing of them to any one, but to Antipater.

The confeſſion of the women in their tortures.

Doris, Antipaters Mother is ſpoiled of her Jewels, and thruſt out of the Palace.

And firſt of all, he bent his fury againſt Doris, Antipaters Mother: and taking from her all the ornaments which he had beſtowed upon her, and bought with many talents, he baniſht her. When his wrath was ſomewhat appeaſed, he releaſed Pheroras maids from torments: & now he became timorous and fearful, and prone to any ſuſpition, torturing many that were innocent, for fear he ſhould let any eſcape that were guilty. Hereupon he ſet upon Antipater the Samaritane, who was Procurator for his Son Antipater; who through torments confeſſed, that his Son Antipater had procured poyſon out of Egypt to kill him, by the means of a friend of Antiphilus; which poyſon Theudion, Antipaters Unkle, took of him, and delivered to Pheroras: whom Antipater charged to diſpatch Herod whileſt he was at Rome, far from ſuſpition, and that Pheroras gave his wife the poyſon to keep. Wherefore the King calling for her, commanded her to bring forth that which was delivered unto her. And ſhe, making as though ſhe would have gone forth to fetch it, caſt her ſelf down from a houſe top, thereby to prevent the torments, which, if ſhe were convicted, they would inflict upon her. But by the providence of God (as it ſhould ſeem) it came ſo to paſs that ſhe fell not on her head, but on her ſide, and ſo eſcaped death, to the end that God might inflict puniſhment upon Antipater. And being brought unto the King, ſo ſoon as ſhe began to come to her ſelf (for M ſhe was amazed with the fall) the King demanded of her, wherefore ſhe had done ſo, and ſware unto her, that if ſhe would truly diſcloſe all, he would pardon her for all; but if ſhe told an untruth, her body ſhould be torn in pieces with torment, and not be buried. She a while held her peace, and at laſt ſaid: Wherefore ſhould I keep any thing ſecret, ſeeing Pheroras is dead, to ſave Antipater, who hath cauſed all our overthrows? Hear O King, and God be witneſs of the truth hereof, who cannot be deceived: When I ſate weeping by Pheroras as he lay a dying, he called me unto him, and ſaid: See wife, how much I am deceived concerning Pheroras wife freely confeſſeth what was become of the Poyſon.

A cerning my brothers love towards me, for I hated and ſought to kill him, who thus loveth me, and ſorroweth ſo much for me, though I am not yet dead: but truly I am juſtly rewarded for my iniquity. And now (wife) bring me hither the poyſon which was left by Antipater in thy keeping for my brother, and make it away before my face, that I carry not with me to Hell a guilty conſcience for that crime. So I brought it as he willed me, and the moſt part of the poyſon I caſt into the fire, where it was conſumed, and kept a little thereof to my ſelf, for fear of miſchances, and of thee. And having thus ſaid, ſhe brought forth a box which had in it a very little of the poyſon. And then the King tortured the brother and mother of Antiphilus, and they alſo confeſſed that Antiphilus brought a box out of Egypt, and that he received poyſon from his brother, who practiſed Phyſick at Alexandria. The ghoſts alſo B of Alexander and Ariſtobulus went all about the whole Kingdom, and became as it were ſpies, to give notice of ſuch things as were uncertain; who alſo cauſed thoſe that dwelt in the uttermoſt parts of the Kingdom, to come and give evidence of ſuch things as were ſuſpected. At laſt, it was proved that Mariamme, the daughter of the High Prieſt, was acquainted with theſe conſpiracies, for her brethren being tortured did confeſs it. Wherefore the King revenged the mothers fault upon her child: for having writ in his Will, that Herod her ſon ſhould ſucceed Antipater in the Kingdom, now for her fault, he blotted that out.

C How Antipaters malicious practiſes againſt Herod, were known and revenged.

AFter all this, Bathyllus joyned himſelf with Antipater, as it were to add the laſt hand unto all his practiſes. This Bathyllus, was one of his libertines, who brought another ſort of poyſon, to wit, of Aſpes, and the poyſon alſo of other Serpents; that if the firſt proved too weak, and took not effect, that then Pheroras and his wife ſhould make an end of the King with theſe. And beſide theſe ſhameful practices of his, againſt his father; he alſo had letters which he had counterfeited againſt his brethren. For Archelaus and Philip, two of the Kings Sons, were at that time at Rome to ſtudy, who were very toward young men: and for that Antipater feared they might be ſome hinderance to him, in D that which he expected, he haſted by all means poſſible to make them away. And the better to effect this purpoſe, he counterfeited Letters in his friends names that were at Rome, and he for money got others to write, that theſe two young men uſed in taunting wiſe to rail againſt their father, and openly to complain of the death of Alexander and Ariſtobulus: and that they took it in bad part that they were ſent for home (for their father ſent word that they ſhould come away) and thereat Antipater was moſt troubled, For he before his departure from Judæa to Rome, procured ſuch like Letters to be forged againſt them at Rome; and ſo delivering them to his father, that he might avoid all ſuſpition, ſeemed to excuſe his brethren, affirming ſomethings that were written to be lies, other things to be offences, whereunto young men were prone. At which times he gave great ſums of mo- E ney to them, in whoſe names he had counterfeited the Letters againſt his brethren: hereby as it were hiring them to be ſecret. He gave them alſo rich Apparel, and Tapiſtry of curious work: alſo ſilver and gold Cups, with many things more, to the end that by the precious gifts and rewards which he beſtowed, he might have all things kept cloſe; ſo that at his return he made his fathers account that he had ſpent two hundred Talents, the greateſt portion whereof, was conſumed in following the Law againſt Syllæus. Antipaters ſmall faults were hid by the greater; for all they that had been tortured, gave evidence againſt him, how that he practiſed his fathers death, and the Letters witneſſed how again he went about to make away other two of his brethren: and yet for all this, none of thoſe who came out of F Judæa to Rome, bare him ſo much good will as to give him intelligence what troubles were in the Court at home, although it was ſeven moneths after he was convicted, before he came to Judæa from Rome. Peradventure they who were minded to tell him all, were forced to hold their peace, by the ghoſts of them who were put to death.

Antipaters treaſons againſt Archelaus and Philip his brothers.

Antipater giveth a great ſum of money to thoſe that counterfeit letters againſt his brotherss

At laſt, he ſent Letters from Rome to his father, that now he would ſhortly return home, and that Cæſar had diſmiſſed him very honourably. The King deſired greatly that the Traytor were in his power: and fearing that if he had an inkling of any matter, that he would look to himſelf, feigned great kindneſs towards him, and ſent back again unto him very loving and familiar Letters, willing him to haſten his return: for if he made haſte, it might be he ſhould obtain pardon for his mothers offence: for Antipater underſtood that ſhe was baniſhed.

The year of the world, 3961. before Christs Nativity, 3.

About this time he received a Letter at Tarentum, whereby he understood the death of Pheroras; and greatly lamented it, which divers thought well of. Yet as far as one may conjecture, the cause of his grief was, that his treason went not forward as he wished, and he did lament Pheroras so much, as though he had lost one to effect his treachery. Moreover, he feared, lest that which had passed should come to light, and lest the poyson should be found: yet when he came to Cilicia, and there received his fathers Letters, which before we mentioned, he then made great haste homeward: yet when he came to Celenderis, he began earnestly to think upon his mothers mishap, his mind as it were, presaging some sinister fortune. And the wiser sort of his friends about him, counselled him not to go to his father, till such time as he were certain for what cause his mother was banished and divorced. For it was to be feared, that he should be accused also of the same that was laid to his mothers charge: but the unwiser sort being more desirous to see their Countrey, than to bethink themselves what was expedient for Antipater, admonished him to make haste, lest that his long delay should breed any suspition in his father, and lest thereby he should give occasion unto malignant people to raise up slanders. For (said they) if any thing had passed against you, it was in your absence, and were you in presence, no man durst do nor speak against you; and it were a very unwise part for uncertain suspicions, to deprive himself of certain felicity, and not to return speedily unto his father, and receive the Kingdom at his hands, who had him in whom only his hope was. This counsel (for fortune would have it so) Antipater followed, and so arrived in the Haven of Cæsarea passing Sebaste, where contrary to his expectation, he fell into great sorrow and admiration: for all men eschewed his company, and no man durst come near him. For, although that he was always hated of them, yet then they had liberty to shew their hatred. Many abstained from coming to him for fear of the King: and now the rumour of those things which Antipater had done was known in every City, and to every man, only Antipater himself was ignorant thereof. For there was never any man brought thither with more majesty than he, when he was to sail to Rome: nor never man more basely entertained at his return. And now understanding of the massacre at home, he craftily made himself ignorant thereof; and notwithstanding, that he was almost dead for fear, yet in his countenance he counterfeited confidence. For he could not now possibly make any escape, nor rid himself out of those present dangers: and yet he heard no certain news of matters at home, nor there: for the King by an Edict had forbidden all men to give him notice thereof. So that many times he comforted himself thus: that either all matters concerning him were yet secret, or if any thing was come to light, that he by policy and impudency could acquit himself thereof; for these two were his refuge and hope. Being thus determined, he went into the Kings Palace alone, without any of his friends and followers; which at the very first gate were most contumeliously repulsed. And by chance Varus the Ruler of Syria was there within: then he boldly going in to his father, came near unto him, as though he would have saluted him. But Herod stretching forth his hand, and shaking his head; Cried out, O thou hast attempted to murther thy father, darest thou yet presume to offer to embrace me, who art guilty of so many treacheries! God confound thee, wicked wretch, and come not near me till thou hast cleared thy self of all that which is laid against thee: for thou shalt have justice, and Varus shall be thy Judge, who is by good fortune now here. Go, and premeditate how to acquit thee against to morrow, for I will give thy subtil and crafty brain some time to do it.

Antipater hated in Cæsarea.

Hereat Antipater was astonished with fear, that he was not able to reply any thing, but so went his way. Presently his mother and his wife came unto him, and told him all the proofs of treasons against him. Then he calling his wits together, bethought himself how to answer every point. The next day the King called an assembly of his friends and kinsfolks, and to them admitted Antipaters friends: and he and Varus sitting in judgment, commanded all proofs to be brought, and witnesses to appear: amongst whom were certain of Antipaters mothers servants, lately apprehended, who had Letters from her to carry unto him, to this effect: Forasmuch as all those things are known unto thy father, beware, that thou return not unto him, before thou hast obtained some Warrant of thy safety from Cæsar. These and others being brought in, Antipater also came in with them, and prostrating himself before his fathers feet, he said, I beseech thee O father, bear no prejudicate opinion against me, and lend me an open ear, whilest I purge my self: for if thou please to give me leave, I will prove my self guiltless. But Herod with a vehement voice commanding him to hold his tongue, spake thus unto Varus: I know, Varus, that both thou, or any other just and indifferent Judge, will adjudge Antipater to have deserved death: and I fear me lest you also should disdain me for my bad fortune, and think me worthy of all calamities, who have begotten

Herods accusation against Antipater.

A gotten ſuch ſons as you ſee. And yet this ſhould move thee ſo much the more to pity me, who have been ſo merciful and careful for ſuch wicked caitifs. For I had already appointed thoſe young men that are dead to be Kings, and brought them up at Rome, and gotten them Cæſars favour: but they whom I had ſo much honoured, and exalted unto the Crown, became traytors againſt mine own life, whoſe death was much available to Antipater. "For "his ſecurity, I ſought therein, becauſe he was a young man, and the next that ſhould ſucceed "me: but this cruel beaſt, being more than full gorged with my ſufferance and patience, hath "emptied his ſtomach even upon my ſelf, and thinketh my life too long, and is grieved that I "live to be old, and hath attempted to make himſelf King, not any other way, but by mur- "thering his father. And for what cauſe did this come to paſs? for that I recalled him out of "the field, where he was contemptible; and caſting them off whom I had begotten of a "Queen, appointed this to be heir of my Kingdom. I confeſs unto thee Varus mine error: for B "I incited them againſt me, becauſe that for Antipaters ſake, I deprived them of their right. "For wherein had I ſo well deſerved of them, as at this mans hands? unto whom, being yet "alive, I committed the ſway and rule of my Kingdom, and openly in my Will and Teſta- "ment declared him to be my heir and ſucceſſor, whoſe charges I with mine own money have "ſtill ſupported, notwithſtanding, that I have beſtowed upon him the yearly revenues of fifty "Talents. And lately when he was to ſail to Rome, I gave him three hundred Talents, and "commended him unto Cæſar, as the only man of all my houſe, who had preſerved his fathers "life. And what was their offence, if it be compared with Antipaters? and what proof was "there of that, for which they ſuffered? none but that which this man creacherouſly in- C "vented. Nay, I may boldly ſay ſo of him, who hath attempted to murther his father, and "now doth hope to colour all again with craft and deceit: Beware Varus, that he deceive not "thee: for I know this beaſt, and I even now ſee by his feined tears, how probable a tale he "will tell. This fellow once warned me, that whileſt Alexander lived, I ſhould beware of "him, and not put every one in truſt with my perſon. This is he who was wont to go before "me in my bed-chamber, and look about in every corner, leſt ſome ſhould have lien in wait "to have affected any treaſon againſt me. This is he who was wont to go before me in my "bed-chamber, and look about in every corner, leſt ſome ſhould have lien in wait to have "effected any treaſon againſt me. This is he who watched me in my ſleep, and through whom "I thought my ſelf ſecure: who comforted me when I mourned for them that were put to D "death. This is he who cenſured the good will of his brethren when they were alive. This "was my defender and champion. O Varus, when I remember his crafts and ſubtilties, and "all his counterfeitings, I ſcarcely think my ſelf alive, admiring how I eſcaped the hand of "ſuch a traitor: and ſeeing that fortune ſtirreth up thoſe of mine own houſe againſt me, and "that thoſe whom I moſt eſteem of, are my greateſt enemies, I will bewail mine own for- "tune, and alone lament mine own deſolation; and not one that have thirſted after my "bloud ſhall eſcape, although proof be brought againſt every one of my children. And thus his heart being ſurcharged with ſorrow, he was forced to break off his ſpeech: and preſent- ly he commanded Nicholaus, one of his friends, to ſhew all the proofs and evidences.

Herods kind- neſs towards his children.

Herod loved Antipater above the reſt, and beſtowed many benefits on him.

All this while Antipater lay proſtrate at his fathers feet, and lifting up his head, he cried E aloud: "Thou thy ſelf, O father, ſufficiently purgeſt me. For how ſhould I be one who "ſought to murther thee, when thy ſelf doſt confeſs, that I always have preſerved thee from "all dangers? Or if, as thou ſaieſt, I did it feinedly, was it probable that I would be ſo cir- "cumſpect in other affairs, and at other times, and now in ſo weighty a matter, play the part "of a fooliſh and ſenſeleſs man? Nay, I might well think, that although ſuch a thonght might "have been kept ſecret from men, yet it could not be hidden from God, who ſeeth all things. "Was I ignorant what befel my brethren, whom God ſo puniſht for their wicked intents "towards thee? Or what ſhould cauſe me to envy at thy life? The hope of the Kingdom? "Why? I had the Kingdom. Or a ſuſpition of thy hatred towards me? I knew thou lovedſt "me. Or any fear which I had of thee? Nay, in obeying thee, I was feared of others. Perhaps F "want might cauſe me thereto? Much leſs, For who might ſpend more than I? Truly if I had "been the wickedſt perſon in the World, or the cruelleſt beaſt upon the earth, yet ſhould I "have relented, being overcome by the benefits of ſo loving a father; ſeeing, as thy ſelf haſt "ſaid, thou didſt recal and prefer me before ſo many ſons. And thou yet alive, didſt proclaim "me King, and made me a ſpectacle to all men for to emulate, through the benefits thou "beſtowdſt upon me. O wretch that I am! O unhappy time of my abſence out of my Coun- "trey! what a head did I give to envy, and what opportunity to malicious and deceitful "people? Yet, O father, it was for thy ſake, and about thy affairs that I went to Rome, that "Syllæus might not triumph over thy old age. Rome can witneſs my piety, and Cæſar the "Prince of the whole World, who often called me a lover of my father. Receive here, O G

"father, his Letter, far truer than these feined calumniations against me: let these plead my "cause, let these shew my affection towards thee: remember how unwilling I was to sail to "Rome, knowing I had here in thy Countrey many secret enemies. Thou like an unwise "father hast cast me away: thou forcedst me to give envy time to frame accusation against "me: but now I will come to the proofs of these matters. Behold here I am, who notwith"standing a murtherer of my father, yet did I never suffer any misfortune by sea, nor land:
"Is not this, O father, a sufficient argument of my innocency? For I know, father, that before "God and thee, I am condemned; and being condemned, I beseech thee, give not credit to "reports extracted by torments: let me be burned, inflict all torments upon me, spare not my "wicked body: For if I be a murtherer of my father, I must not die without torments: crying H "out a loud after this manner, and weeping, he moved all that were present, and Varus also
"to compassion; but Herod only abstained from tears, for his anger gave attention to the "truth. And presently Nicholaus at the Kings commandment making a long speech of Anti- "paters craft and subtilty took away all hope of mercy, and began a very bitter accusation,
"ascribing all mischief which had befallen that Kingdom unto him, and especially the death
"of two brethren, who through his calumniations were made away: affirming also that he "used treacherous practices against those who are yet alive, fearing lest they should succeed
"in the Kingdom: for he who had prepared poyson for his father, would much less spare
"his brethren. And then coming to the proof of his pretence to poyson his father, he declared "in order all evidences thereof, aggravating his offence by Pheroras; as though Antipater also "were the cause, why he purposed to murther his brother, and how he had corrupted the I
"Kings dearest friends: and so filled the whole Court with wickedness. And when he had "accused him of many other things, and brought proof thereof, he ended his speech.

Nicholaus by the Kings command beginneth a most hainous and bitter accusation against Antipater.

Nicholaus peroration.

Then Varus when he had commanded Antipater to make answer unto those things, and that he said nothing more, then God is a witness of my innocency, he called for the poyson, and gave it to one that was condemned to die, who having drunk thereof, presently died: Then Varus talked secretly with Herod, and what was done there in that Councel he wrote unto Cæsar. Yet notwithstanding when Herod had sent Antipater to prison, he sent messengers unto Cæsar, to shew him his hard fortune and calamity. After this it was proved that Antipater wrought treason against Salome. For one of Antiphilus servants came from Rome, and brought Letters in the name of Acme, who was one of Julia her maids, which she writ unto the King, telling him that she found a letter of Salomes amongst Julias letters; and so for good will she had sent it him: and the letters which she affirmed to be Salomes, contained many bitter invectives against Herod, and many accusations. But these letters were written and feined by Antipater, who for money had perswaded Acme so to do, as we have said: for the Letter which she writ to Antipater evidently shewed it to be so; for she wrote as followeth.

The venome tried upon a condemned man.

Another proof against Antipater.

I have written unto thy father as you requested me, and sent also other Letters: and I assure my self he will not spare his sister, if he do but read the Letters; and you may do well, seeing I have performed all your requests, that now you would be mindful of your promise. This Letter against Salome and others, being found to be conterfeited, the King began to doubt that Alexander was made away by such counterf eited Letters; and he was very angry that he had almost put his sister to death, through Antipaters device. Wherefore he no longer delayed to punish him for all, yet he was hindred by a great sickness from accomplishing his purpose. He also sent Letters unto Cæsar concerning Acme the maid, and Salomes false accusation, and changed his Testament, and blotted out the name of Antipater, and in his room wrote Antipas, leaving out Archelaus and Philippus, who were the elder brethren, because Antipater had accused them. And he bequeathed unto Cæsar a thousand Talents, beside many other rich gifts: and to his wife, and children, and kindred, and libertines, about five hundred, and gave every one a great gift, either in ground or money, and honoured his sister Salome with most rich gifts. And thus he corrected his Will.

Herod intendeth Antipaters punishment, and therefore blotteth his name out of the Testament.

CHAP XXI.

Of the Golden Eagle, and of Antipaters and Herods death.

Ant. lib. 17. cap. 8.

Herods disease encreased, partly through age, and especially for his grief and sorrow; for he was now threescore and ten years old; and his mind was so troubled by the death of his children, that though he were in health, yet he took no pleasure in any thing; and his sickness was so much the more grievous unto him, because that Antipater was

A was yet alive; for he purposed to put him to death when he was recovered of his sickness. To encrease his calamity, there arose a tumult amongst the people. For there were in the City two Sophisters, who made a shew as though they were very skillful in their Countrey laws, and for that were renowned all over the Countrey. One of them was named Judas, who was son unto Sepphoræus: the other was called Matthias, son unto Margalus. These two were followed by a great many young men, so that when they expounded the law, they had an assembly like a great Army, all young men. These two hearing, that the King partly by grief, and partly by his disease was very like to die, spake unto their acquaintance, saying, that it was now a fit time wherein God might be revenged, and those things which were made against their Countrey laws, taken away: for it was a great offence to God to permit B the Images or shapes, or likeness of any living thing to be in the Temple. This they said, because the King had set a golden Eagle upon the chiefest porch of the Temple, which the Sophisters now willed the young men to take away, saying, that it was meritorious, although danger might ensue thereon, yea, even to die for their Countrey laws. For they that died for such a cause, should have their souls immortal, and enjoy everlasting bliss: and that many unwise men, ignorant of that doctrine, so loved their lives, that they chose rather to die by sickness, than to spend their lives in a vertuous quarrel. Whilest they said thus, there was a rumour spread that the King was now at the last cast: whereat the yong men being incouraged, about noon when many were walking in the Temple, they let themselves down from the top of the Temple with great ropes, and so with hatchets cut down the Eagle: Whereof the Captain of the Souldiers being advertised, accompanied with a great many Souldiers, C went speedily to the Temple, and took almost fourty of the young men, and carried them to the King. Who first of all asked them if they were so bold as to cut down the golden Eagle: and they confessed they had done it. Then he demanded by whose commandement? They answered, By the commandement of their Countrey Laws. After this, it was asked them, why they who were presently to die were so joyful? They answered, For that after death they hoped to enjoy many good things and eternal bliss. The King hereat greatly moved with anger, overcame his disease and went forth and made a speech to the people, wherein he inveighed against them as Church-robbers, and that under pretence and colour of their Countrey Laws and Religion; they attempted great matters, and adjudged them as impious people worthy of death. The people fearing that he would torture many to learn who D favoured that act, requested him that first the authors of that crime, and then those that were found guilty therein would receive punishment: and that he would remit the offence to all the people besides. The King with much ado entreated, caused the young men that let themselves down in cords, and the Sophisters to be burned, and the rest which were taken in that act, to be beheaded. After this, the Kings sickness spread over his whole body, and he was afflicted with most grievous pain: for he had a vehement Ague, and an Itch over all his body, which was intollerable, and a daily Collick, and his feet were swollen, as though he had the Dropsie: his belly was swollen, and privy members putrified, so that Worms bred in the putrified places. He was also short-winded, and he was grievously tormented E with difficulty of breath, and a convulsion of the whole body: so that some said that this was a punishment laid upon him for the death of the two Sophisters. Herod notwithstanding, he was afflicted with so many and grievous sicknesses, yet he was desirous to live, and sought remedy whereby he hoped for health. At last he passed over Jordan, where he used the warm waters of Calliroe which run into the Lake of Asphaltites, and are so sweet, that men use to drink of them. There the Physitians caused his body to be bathed in hot oyle, and it was therewith so dissolved that his sight failed, and he was as though he were dead: whereat those that were about him being troubled, with their cries caused him to look up, and now despairing of life, he willed fifty drachmes to be distributed to every Souldier, and great sums of money to the Captains and his friends.

As he returned, when he came to Jericho, he was in very great likelihood to die of melancholy, and there he devised a wicked fact: for he caused the chief men of every Town, and Village in all Judæa to be assembled together, and then he shut them up in a place called the Hippodrome: and calling unto him Salome his sister, and Alexas her husband; I know, quoth he, that the Jews will make Feasts for joy of my death, yet if thou wilt do my command, I shall be mourned for, and I shall have a Princely Funeral. Therefore so soon as I have given up the ghost, cause Souldiers to compass these men, whom I have here in hold, and kill them all: for that all Judæa, and every household thereof shall against their will bewail my death. As thus he commanded this to be done, the Legats came which he had sent to Rome, bringing him Letters, wherein was shewed how Acme Julia her maid, was by Cæsars command put to death, and Antipater condemned to die: yet Cæsar writ that if his father had rather banish him, he would condescend thereunto also. Herod with this news was something refreshed, yet presently with pain he was overcome: for he both was troubled with a vehement Cough, and almost pined with fasting, so that he thought to hasten his own death; and taking an apple in his hand, he called for a knife: for he was accustomed to cut the meat which he did eat; and then looking about him, lest any standing by might hinder him, he lifted up his arm to strike himself. But Achiabus his cousin ran hastily unto him, and stayed his hand: and presently there was made great lamentation throughout the Kings Palace, as though the King had been dead. Antipater having speedy news hereof, was glad, and took courage, and promised the Keepers a piece of money to let him go. But the chiefest of them did not only deny to do it, but also went presently to the King, and told him all what Antipater requested. Herod hearing this, lifted up his voice with more strength than was meet for a sick man, and commanded his guard to go and kill Antipater, and bury him in the Castle called Hircanium. And then again he altered his Testament, and writ Archelaus his eldest son, who was brother to Antipas, for King, and appointed Antipas for Tetrarche Five days after the death of his son Antipater, Herod died: having reigned thirty and four years after he slew Antigonus, and thirty seven years after the Romans had declared him King. And in all other things he was as fortunate as any man; for he being but a private person, got the Crown and kept it, and left it unto his posterity: but in his household affairs, he was most infortunate. Salome, before it was known that the King was dead, went forth with her husband, and released all those that were in hold, whom the King commanded to be slain; saying, that the Kings mind was altered, and therefore he gave them all licence to depart: and after their departure the Kings death was published to the Souldiers, who together with the other multitude were assembled in the Amphitheater at Jericho. Where Ptolomæus, Keeper of the Kings Seal, made a speech unto them, and began to say, that Herod was now happy; and comforted the multitude, and so he read unto them a Letter which the King left, wherein he earnestly requested the Souldiers to favour and love his successour. After the Epistle read, he recited the Kings Testament, wherein Philip was appointed Heir of Trachon, and the places thereunto adjoyning; Antipas designed Tetrarch; and Archelaus Kim. Him also he commanded to bear his Ring unto Cæsar, and withal notice and intelligence of the estate of the Kingdom, whereof he had been Governour, fast sealed in writing: for he appointed Cæsar to be overseer of all his Ordinances, unto whose pleasure he left the performance of his Testament.

This done, every one was busied about the Kings funeral: where Archelaus spared no cost, but buried the King with all Royal Pomp possible. The Beer whereon he was carried, was adorned with Gold and precious Stones: upon it lay a Bed wrought with Purple, whereupon was laid the dead Corps of the King covered also with Purple, with a Crown on his head, and a Diadem of pure Gold, and a Scepter in his right hand. About the Beer were his Sons and Kinsfolk: and the Guard, and Bands of Thracians, Germans, & Gauls, all went before in order, as though they had gone to Wars. The rest of the Souldiers in Warlike order, did follow their Captains and Leaders, and five hundred Servants and Libertines carried perfumes. And thus the Corps was carried the space of two hundred furlongs into the Castle named Herodion: where, as himself had appointed, it was interred. And this was the end of King Herod.

Of Herods successour Archelaus, and how he entred into the Temple, and the mutiny that arose for the revenge of those that were executed, for taking down the golden Eagle.

ARchelaus being appointed successour in the Kingdom of Herod late dead, necessity constrained him to go to Rome, which journey gave occasion of new broils. For after that for seven days space he had celebrated his fathers funeral, and largely feasted the people (for this is a custome amongst the Jews, which bringeth many of them to poverty; yet he that doth not so, is reputed impious) he went unto the Temple attired in a white garment, where he was with great joy received of the people, and he himself sitting in a Tribunal seat, and a Throne of Gold, did very courteously admit the people to his presence: and thanked them for their diligent care used in his fathers funefuneral, and for that they exhibited honour unto him, as though he were already King. Yet G he ſaid, that he would not take upon him the Authority or name of a King, till ſuch time as his ſucceſſion was approved by Cæſar, who by his fathers Teſtament was Lord and Maſter of all: and for that cauſe he withſtood the Souldiers at Jericho, when they would have crowned him. But he promiſed, that if he were confirmed King by thoſe who were in Authority, he would largely recompence both the Souldiers and the people for their good will; and that he fully purpoſed to be better unto them than his father was. The multitnde hereat greatly rejoyced, and made preſent trial of his mind and purpoſe; for ſome cried out, requeſting that the Tribute might be no more exacted. Others deſired that the yearly payment might ceaſe. Others requeſted to give all priſoners liberty. Archelaus in favour of the people granted all their requeſts: and then offering ſacrifices, he banquetted with his friends: when H ſuddenly after the noon time of the day, a great multitude deſirous of alteration (the common lamentation for the Kings death being ceaſed) began a private mourning, bewailing their miſchance whom Herod had put to death for pulling down the golden Eagle from off the Porch of the Temple. This ſorrow was not ſecret, but the whole City did reſound with laments for them, that were thought to have loſt their lives for the Temple, and their Countrey Laws. They alſo cried that revenge was to be taken upon them, whom Herod for that fact rewarded with money. And that firſt of all, he who by Herod was conſtituted High Prieſt, was to be rejected, and another more holy and devout to be put in his place.

Archelaus, although he was hereby moved to revenge, yet becauſe he was preſently to take ſuch a journey, abſtained from it, fearing leſt that if he brought the multitude into hatred of him, they might hinder him. Wherefore he ſought rather by admoniſhing them, than by I force to reclaim thoſe that were ſeditious, and ſent the Governor of the Souldiers to requeſt them to be pacified. But the authors of that ſedition ſo ſoon as he came to the Temple, before he ſpake one word, threw ſtones at him; and in like manner they uſed others ſent after him, to appeaſe them (for Archelaus diſpatched many meſſengers unto them) whom they ſpitefully intreated, making a ſhew that if they had been more in number, they would not have been appeaſed. Therefore when the Feaſt of unleavened bread drew nigh, which the Jews call Eaſter, wherein an infinite number of ſacrifices were appointed; an innumerable multitude of people came out of all Villages thereabout, for devotion ſake, to that ſolemnity:
and they who ſo lamented the death of the Sophiſters, remained in the Temple, ſeeking by all means to nouriſh their ſedition. Which Archelaus fearing, ſent a Band of Souldiers and a Tribune with them, to take the chief of the ſeditious, before ſuch time as they had drawn K unto them the multitude of the people: againſt whom the whole number being ſtirred up, ſlew a great many of them with ſtones; and the Tribune himſelf being ſore hurt, had much ado to eſcape. And when they had ſo done, they preſently went and offered ſacrifice, as though that no hurt had been done. But Archelaus perſwaded himſelf that the multitude would not be appeaſed without ſlaughter: wherefore he ſent unto them the whole Army, the Footmen into the City, and the Horſemen into the field; who invading the ſeditious people as they were ſacrificing, ſlew of them almoſt three thouſand, and ſcattered the reſidue into the mountains there adjoyning. There were alſo Criers, who followed Archelaus, and proclaimed by vertue of his command, that every one ſhould depart home to his houſe: L ſo every one, notwithſtanding the holineſs of the day, departed. But he accompanied with his mother Popla, Ptolomæus, and Nicholaus his friends, went unto the Sea-coaſt, leaving Philip for Governour of the Kingdom, and over his houſhold: with them departed Salome and her Children, and the Kings Brethren and Kindred, under pretence to aſſiſt Archelaus to the Crown, but indeed it was to inform Cæſar of that which was done in the Temple againſt the Law.

When they came to Cæſarea, they met with Sabinus Governour of Syria, who was coming toward Judæa, to take into his cuſtody Herods treaſure: whom Varus forbad to go any further, being ſent for by Archelaus, and Ptolomey requeſting him thereunto. And ſo Sabinus for the love of Varus, neither entred the Caſtles, nor ſhut up Herods treaſure from Archelaus, M but promiſed, that he would let all alone till Cæſar underſtood thereof. But ſo ſoon as one of them that hindred him was gone to Antiochia, and the other, to wit, Archelaus, to Rome; he ſtill remaining at Cæſarea, now haſted unto Jeruſalem, and took the Kings Palace: where calling for the chief of the Guard, and the Purveyors, he exacted of them an account, and ſought to take into his cuſtody the Caſtles and Strong holds. But the Captains of the Garriſon, mindful of the charge which Archelaus gave them, kept unto themſelves the cu-ſtody of all, affirming that they kept them more for Cæſar than Archelaus. At this time Antipas elected King by Herods former Teſtament ſtriveth with Archelaus for the Kingdom.

A Antipas made a claim to the Crown, alledging that Herods firſt Teſtament was of more force than the laſt, and that he in the firſt was declared King; and both Salome and many more of his kindred, who ſayled with Archelaus, promiſed him their aid. He took with him his mother, and Ptolomæus, brother unto Nicholaus, perſwading himſelf, that they for their truſtineſs and loyalty unto Herod, would ſtand him in great ſtead: for this Ptolomæus was Herods deareſt friend. He had alſo great confidence in Irenæus his Orator, becauſe he had an excellent grace in pleading, in ſo much as he refuſed the counſel of them who ſought to perſwade him to yield unto Archelaus, both for his age, and for the laſt Teſtament of his father. Now he was well beloved of all his kindred at Rome, becauſe they hated Archelaus, and eſpecially thoſe that deſired to live at liberty, and either to be governed by the Romans, or elſe to
B have Antipas for their King. And to further him the more, he uſed Sabinus letters unto Cæſar, wherein Archelaus was accuſed, and Antipas commended. Therefore Salome, and the reſt of their complices, brought the accuſations unto Cæſar. And after them Archelaus delivered all that which he had done, in writing, and withal, his fathers Ring by Ptolomæus; and the reaſons of that which he had done, he ſent incloſed unto Cæſar. Cæſar pondring with himſelf what both parties alledged, and the greatneſs of the Kingdom, and large revenues, and number of Herods children, reading alſo the Letters of Varus and Sabinus, he called the chief of
C the Romans to councel. Wherein Caius the ſon of Agrippa, and his daughter Julia, by his aſſignment, ſate in the firſt place, (this Caius was Cæſars adopted ſon) and ſo he licenſed the parties to plead their rights. Then Antipater, Salomes ſon, being the moſt eloquent of all Archelaus adverſaries; offered himſelf to be his accuſer, for that Archelaus ſeemed now in words to contend for the Kingdom, which he had already poſſeſt himſelf of: and that he did now trouble Cæſars ears with vain cavillations, whom he would not wiſh to judge of his lawful ſucceſſion. For after Herods death, he ſuborned ſome to put a Diadem upon his head: and then ſitting in a Throne of gold in Kingly manner, he partly changed, partly advanced the orders of the Souldiers, and granted unto the people their requeſts, which could not be effected but by a King. He had alſo ſet at liberty many men, who for great crimes were impriſoned by his father: and having done all this, he came now unto Cæſar, to crave the ſhadow of the Kingdom, the ſubſtance and body whereof he already occupied: ſo that herein he left nothing unto Cæſar, but a bare Title. Moreover he alledged that Archelaus did but
D counterfeit ſorrow for his fathers death, feining himſelf to mourn in the day-time, and in the night he would be drunk, and rioted. Finally, he ſaid, that the ſedition of the people came by hatred thereof. But the force and drift of his ſpeech was altogether bent to declare the multitude ſlain about the Temple: for he ſaid, that they only came againſt that feſtival day to offer ſacrifice, and that they themſelves were ſacrificed, as they were offering their ſacrifices which they brought: and that there were ſuch heaps of dead bodies in the Temple, as never by any forein wars were ſlain the like. Therefore Herod foreſeeing his cruelty, never judged him worthy of the Kingdom, till ſuch time as his memory failed him; and that now being more ſick in mind than body, he knew not whom he named his Succeſſor in his laſt
E Will, eſpecially, for that he had nothing wherein he could blame him, whom in his former Will he appointed his Succeſſor, when he was in health both of mind and body. Yet (quoth he) put the caſe Herod in his extremity knew what he did, yet (ſaid he) Archelaus hath deprived himſelf of all Kingly dignity, having committed many things againſt the Laws. For (ſaid he) what will he be after he hath received authority from Cæſar, who before he received any, hath murthered ſo many? Antipater having ſpoken much to this effect, and at every accuſation taking witneſs of his kindred that ſtood by, ended his ſpeech.

Then Nicholaus ſtood up, and firſt of all he ſhewed, that the ſlaughter of them in the Temple was neceſſary. For they, for whoſe death Archelaus was now accuſed, were not only
F enemies of the Kingdom, but alſo of Cæſar: and for other crimes objected, he ſhewed how that they were done even by the counſel and perſwaſion of the adverſaries. He alſo requeſted, that the ſecond Teſtament might be of force, for that therein Herod requeſted Cæſar to be a confirmer of his Succeſſor. For he who had ſuch remembrance, as to leave the performance of his Will, to the diſcretion of him who is Lord of all: did neither miſtake himſelf in appointing his Heir: nor yet was deprived of his ſenſes, ſeeing he knew by whom he ſhould be eſtabliſhed. When Nicholaus had ended his ſpeech, and declared all that he thought might make for Archelaus, Archelaus coming into the midſt of the Councel, proſtrated himſelf at Cæſars feet: whom Cæſar courteouſly taking from the ground, ſhewed that he was worthy to ſucceed his father. Yet did he not pronounce a definitive Sentence: but the ſame day, the Councel being diſmiſſed, he deliberated with himſelf, according to the

CHAP. II.

Of the fight and massacre at Jerusalem, between the Jews and the Sabinians.

Ant. l. 17. c. 14. Sedition in Jerusalem.

BEfore such time as Cæsar determined any thing concerning this matter, Malthace the mother of Archelaus fell sick and died; and many Letters came out of Syria, signifying that the Jews had rebelled. Which Varus fore-seeing after the departure of Archelaus from thence, went unto Jerusalem to repress and resist the Authors of that sedition: and because the multitude would not be quiet, he left one Legion of the three which he brought out of Syria, in the City, and so he returned unto Antiochia. But Sabinus coming afterward to Jerusalem, was the cause that the Jews began a new broyl. For one while he forced the Garrisons to render to him the Castles, another while he rigorously made search for the Kings Treasure: and he was not only assisted by those that Varus left there, but also he had a great multitude of his own servants all armed, to further his avarice. And in the feast of Pentecost (so called, because of the number of seven Weeks) the People assembled themselves together, not for Religion sake, but for anger and hatred: so that there was an infinite multitude of people which came out of Galilee, and Idumæa, and Jericho, and the Countreys beyond Jordan. Yet the Jews which were Inhabitants of the City, surpassed the rest both in number and courage: and they therefore parted themselves into three Bands, and made three Camps: one upon the North part of the Temple; the other on the South part, near unto the Castle called Hippodromus; the third on the West part near the Palace, and so they besieged the Romans on every side. Sabinus greatly fearing them, both for their multitude and for their courage, sent many Letters unto Varus, earnestly requesting him with all speed to bring succour: for if he did not, the whole Legion would be extinguished. He himself got him into the highest Tower of the Castle Phasælus, which is so called by the name of Herods brother, whom the Parthians killed; and from thence he gave a sign unto the Souldiers to issue out suddenly upon their enemies: for himself was in such a fear, that he durst not come down to the Souldiers of whom he was Governor. The Souldiers obeying his command, issued into the Temple, and there fought a sore battle with the Jews; who having no body to assist them, being unexperienced in Warlike affairs, were soon conquered by them that were skilful. At last, many Jews got upon the Porches, and cast darts at them from the top thereof, so that they killed many: but the other could not revenge themselves of them, who fought against them from so high a place; neither could they sustain the force of them who joyned battle with them; till at last they fired the Porches, which for greatness, and curious work were admirable. And so, many were either destroyed with the sudden fire, or else leaping down amidst their enemies, were by them slain; others going backward, were cast head-long from the wall; others despairing of life, killed themselves with their own swords, and they who privily came down the walls, and assaulted the Romans, being astonished with fear, were easily overcome: till at last, all being either put to the sword, or cast down through fear, the Treasure dedicated to God, was left destitute of Keepers; so that the Souldiers took away thereof about four hundred Talents, and that which they left, Sabinus got.

But this loss of men and money stirred up many more Jews, and those more Warlike than the first against the Romans; who besieging the Kings Palace, threatned all their destructions, unless they would presently depart from thence: promising Sabinus and the Legion leave to depart if he so liked. Part of the Kings Souldiers, who of their own accord fled unto them, did assist them. But the most Warlike and valiant amongst them were three thousand of Sebaste, whose Rulers were Rufus and Gratus; one, Leader of the Footmen, and the other of the Horsemen; both which, although they had had no Souldiers with them, for their Valour of body, and Counsel, might yet have been a great help unto the Romans in those Wars. The Jews earnestly continued the Siege, and assaulted the Castle walls, crying upon Sabinus to depart, and not to hinder them now after so long time to have their Countreys Liberty. Sabinus though with all his heart he wished himself away, yet durst he not trust them; but he suspected that their courtesie, was but a plot to entrap him: and on the other side

A side hoping that Varus would come and help him, ſtill indured the danger of the Siege. At the ſame time there were tumults in many places of Judæa, and many through opportunity of the time aſpired to the Kingdom. For in Idumæa two thouſand old Souldiers, who had born Arms under Herod, gathering together, and having armed themſelves, came and fought with the Kings forces, whom Achiabus the Kings couſin reſiſted in the ſtrongeſt Villages; always eſchewing to fight in the open field. At Sephoris alſo a Town of Galilee, Judas the ſon of Ezechias, the Captain of the Thieves, who before was taken by King Herod, and had waſted that Country, gathered together a great multitude, and brake into the Kings Armory, and armed all his company, and fought againſt them who affected the Royal dignity. Alſo beyond the River, Simon, one of the Kings ſervants, bein fair and of a huge ſtature, put a B Crown upon his own head, and gathering together a company of Thieves, went about with them unto Jericho, and burned the Kings Palace, and many fair and ſumptuous houſes there, and ſo got a great prey by burning the houſes: and he had ſurely fired all buildings of account, had not Gratus, Captain of the Kings footmen, made haſte to meet him with the bowmen of Trachon, and the moſt warlike men of Sebaſte, where many footmen were ſlain. But Simon though he fled into a ſtreight Valley, yet he overtook him, and cut him overthwart the neck, and ſo he fell down. In like manner other of the Kings Palaces near Jordan by Bethara were burned, by a multitude of others gathered together in bands from beyond the River. At this time a ſhepherd, named Athrongæus preſumed to uſurp the Crown: he was thereuto induced by the courage he bare, and the diſdain of death. With this reſolution he armed his four brethren, and every one of them had a Company armed, and they were as C his Captains and Champions to make incurſions: and he like a King medled only with great affairs, and then he put a Crown upon his head; and thus he continued a long time waſting the Countrey, and killing eſpecially the Romans, and alſo the Kings Souldiers; ſo that none of the Jews eſcaped if they were in hope to gain by them. They alſo preſumed to meet a Company of the Romans at Ammaus, who carried Corn and Armour unto the Legion, where they killed with darts one Arius a Centurion, and fourty of the moſt valiant amongſt them: and the reſt, being in like danger, through the help of Gratus with the Souldiers of Sebaſte eſcaped. When they had done many things in this manner againſt the inhabitants and ſtrangers, at laſt three of them were taken: the eldeſt by Archelaus, and the two other who were eldeſt after him, fell into the hands of Gratus and Ptolomæus; and the fourth D yielded himſelf unto Archelaus upon compoſition: And thus at laſt they came to their end. And all Judæa by their example was filled with Thieves.

Of Varus his deeds, concerning the Jews that were crucified.

WHen Varus had received the Letters of Sabinus, and of the Nobles with him, fearing the whole Legion, he haſted to ſuccour them: Wherefore he came to Ptolemais with two other Legions, and four Corners of Horſe-men, where he willed the Kings forces and the Nobles to meet him. Moreover, as he paſſed by Berytum, they accompanied him with fifteen hundred armed men. Aretas alſo the King of Arabia, for the hatred he bare to Herod, was come with a great number of Horſemen and Footmen. Aſſoon as the Hoſt was aſſembled, Varus incontinently directed part of his Army into Galilee, adjoyning thereto, and appointed a friend of his, the ſon of Caius: for their Governor, who preſently put them all to flight againſt whom he was ſent; and having taken the Caſtle of Sephoris, he fired it, and made the inhabitants thereof bond-ſlaves. Varus with the reſt of the Army went into Samaria and took it; yet he did the City no harm, becauſe he found that amidſt all thoſe tumults they had been quiet. When he had pitched his Tents at a Village called Aun, which was in the poſſeſſion of Ptolomæus, the Arabians ſacked it, for they F hated them who loved Herod. From thence they went to Sappho, another ſtrong Borough, which they in like manner ſacked and deſtroyed, with all the fruits, and revenues they found there. All which was filled with the ſlaughter and fires which the Arabians made, there was no end nor hinderance of their avarice. Alſo Varus commanded Ammaus to be burned, being angry for the death of Arius, and the reſt that were ſlain there: and the inhabitants thereof were ſcattered, every one by flight ſeeking to ſave himſelf. From thence he went to Jeruſalem, and at the ſight of him the Jews fled and ſcattered themſelves, ſome here, ſome there, all about the Countrey: they that remained in the City excuſed themſelves, that they were not conſenting to that tumult, but that for the Celebration of

of the feasts sake, they permitted them to come into the City, affirming that they had rather G been besieged together with the Romans, than to have conspired with those of the sedition: and so they laid the cause of that tumult upon others. But first Josephus, Archelaus his cousin, with Gratus and Rufus came to meet him, leading the Kings Army, and the Sebastians, and the Roman Souldiers adorned in their accustomed apparel. Sabinus durst not be seen of Varus, and therefore got him out of the Town before, and went unto the Sea-coast. Varus divided his Army, and sent it into the fields against the authors of that tumult: and those that were brought unto him who were in less fault, he committed to prison, and those who were the chiefest, he crucified to the number of two thousand.

Varus crucified two thousand of the seditious.

And understanding that in Idumæa there yet remained ten thousand of armed men, he presently sent the Arabians home, because he perceived that they did not War as those H that came to help him, but as they themselves pleased, wasting the Countrey against his will: and so accompanied with his own Army, he hastned against the enemies. But they without any fight, through Achiabus counsel, yielded themselves to Varus. And he pardoned the common Souldiers, and sent the Captains to Cæsar to answer the matter. Who pardoning most of them, yet punished some that were the Kings kinsmen, (for some of them were a kin to Herod) because they altogether rebelled against their King. Varus having thus quieted the estate of Judæa and Jerusalem, leaving the same Legion that was there before, departed to Antiochia.

How the Jews had an Ethnarcha constituted over them.

Ant. l. 17. c. 17. Ethnarcha, Ruler or Governor.

NOw Archelaus had a new process at Rome against the Jews, who before the sedition with the leave of Varus, were gone to Rome to crave the liberty of their Countrey. These who came as Embassadours in their Countreys behalf, were fifty in number, and they were assisted by more than eight thousand Jews that lived at Rome. Wherefore Cæsar called a Councel of the Nobility of Rome in the Temple of Apollo, which was scituate upon Mount Palatine, and joyned to Cæsars private Palace, which was most sumptuously adorned: and the multitude of the Jews appeared with the Legats against Archelaus, and his friend, Archelaus kindred neither came with him, nor with the rest of the Jews: with him they would not joyn, for envy, and with the Jews they durst not, for shame. Amongst them also was Philip, the brother of Archelaus, whom Varus sent in courteous manner to assist his brother; or if that it pleased Cæsar to divide Herods Kingdom amongst his children, that then he might have a part. The adversaries were commanded to shew what Herod had committed contrary to the Laws: First of all they answered; that they found him not a King, but the most cruel Tyrant that ever was, and that he murthered many; and those whom he left alive endured such misery, as they thought themselves far unhappier than those that were so butchered. "For (said they) he was not only contented to tear his "subjects bodies with torments, but also defacing and ruinating the Cities of his own Coun- C "trey he adorned and re-edified the Cities of strangers: and permitted foreiners to massacre "the Jews without revenge. And in stead of their antient and wonted happiness, and their "laws inviolated, their Country was by him made so poor, and so filled with iniquity that "within those few years that Herod reigned, they had sustained more murders and massacres "then all their ancestors had, from the time of their departure out of Babylon, until the be- "ginning of his reign: being then provoked to take arms when Xerxes was King of Persia. Yet "they by enduring such misery, being now accustomed thereunto, would willingly be subject "to such a successor of his, as they knew would make them live in most bitter servitude: for "they when Herod his father was dead, presently called Archelaus King, notwithstanding, he "was the son of such a tyrant, & with him mourn'd for the death of Herod, & offer'd sacrifice M "for the prosperity of his successor. But he to shew himself Herods son, began his reign with the "slaughter of 3000 citizens, and because he had so well deserved the Kingdom, he offered so "many men to God for sacrifice; and on a festival day filled the Temple with so many dead "bodies. Wherefore they who had escaped that massacre, had just occasion to consider their "calamity, and after the law of arms, to turn their faces to them who wounded them, and be- "seech the Romans, that they would think the remnant of the Jews worthy of compassion "and not to abandon and expose the residue of their Nation as a prey to them, by whom they "should be most cruelly butchered: but that it might please them to adjoyn their Coun- "trey to the borders of Syria, and to let them be ruled by the Romans, and so they should find

After this, Nicholaus stood up against them, and first of all acquitted the Kings of the crimes laid to their charge: and then reproved his Countreymen, for that they would not be easily Governed, and by their own nature would not, except they were forced, obey their King: and he also blamed the Kinsman of Archelaus, who joyned with his accusers. Cæsar having heard what both parts could say, dismissed the Assembly. And within few days after he gave Archelaus half of the Kingdom, under the title of an Ethnarch, promising him moreover to make him King, if he behaved himself well: the other half he divided into two Tetrarchies, and gave them to the rest of Herods Sons: one unto Philip; the other unto Antipas, who contended with Archelaus for the Crown. Antipas his part lay from Galilee B beyond the river Jordan; the revenues whereof was two hundred talents a year. And Philip had Batanæa and Trachon, and Auranitis, and part of Zeno his house near Jamnia, the revenues whereof amounted to one hundred talents a year. Archelaus had in his Ethnarchy Idumæa and all Judæa and Samaria, which was freed from the fourth part of their tribute because they rebelled not with the rest. And these Cities were given him, over which he was Lord, Stratons Tower, Sebaste, Joppe and Jerusalem. The rest, Gaza, and Gadara, and Hippon, Cæsar took from the Kingdom, and joyned them to Syria. Archelaus yearly revenues amounted to four hundred talents a year. Cæsar also (beside that which Herod left her) made Salome Lady of Jamnia, Azotus and Phasælis, and the Palace at Ascalon, all which amounted to threescore talents a year. But Cæsar made her house subject unto Archelaus his C Ethnarchy. And having distributed unto the rest of Herods kindred that which in his Testament he left them, he gave his two daughters that were Virgins, over and above, five hundred thousand drachmes of silver, and married them unto Pheroras Sons: and having divided Herods patrimony amongst them, he also distributed that which Herod bequeathed unto him, amounting unto a thousand talents, leaving himself only some Jewels of small value, which he reserved in honour and remembrance of the dead.

Of the false supposed Alexander, and how he was taken.

AT the same time, a certain young man, a Jew born, brought up by a Libertine of Rome in the Town of Sidonia, being very like unto Alexander whom Herod put to death, went to Rome, having one of his Countreymen for his Companion, who knew very well the estate of the Kingdom: by whom he receiving instructions, affirmed, that they who should have put him and Aristobulus to death, being moved to compassion, let them go, and took two others in their room like them. With this tale he deceived many Jews living in Creet, where he was honourably received, and from thence he sailed to Melos, where he was yet entertained with greater pomp: and enriching himself, he used such means, that he got his Hosts (which gave him entertainment) to sail with him to Rome, and after arriving at Dicæarchia, he received all manner of rich gifts of the Jews which dwelled there, and there by his fathers friends was honoured as a King. For he was so like unto Alexander, that they that had seen Alexander, and knew him well, would have sworn he had been Alexander. Wherefore all the Jews at Rome desired to see him, so that an infinite multitude followed him whithersoever he went in the streets, and they so doted upon him, that they carried him in a horse-litter, and at their own proper cost and charges prepared for him a Royal train.

Who no sooner beheld him, but forthwith he perceived the difference betwixt them: and especially when he felt his hard flesh and servile shape, he presently understood the whole matter. But he was greatly moved with his bold speeches: for when they demanded of him what was become of Aristobulus, he answered, that he was alive; yet he upon purpose tarried behind, and lived in Cyprus, fearing some treason: for they being asunder could not so easily be entrapped. Celadus taking him apart from the rest of the Company, told him that Cæsar would save his life, if he did truly confess, by whose counsel he feigned himself to be Alexander. He accepting of this offer, followed him to Cæsar, and declared himself to be a Jew, who for lucre sake (being very like him) counterfeited himself to be Alexander: affirming that he had received such great gifts of the Cities by which he passed, that he thought if Alexander had been alive, he should not have received the like. Cæsar laught at this jest, and made false Alexander (for the ability of his body) a Galley-slave, and put him to death who induced him thereto. And as for the Jews of Milo, he thought that they had punishment sufficient, if they lost all that which they had laid out, and bestowed upon him.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Banishment and Death of Archelaus.

Ant.l.17.c.19. Archelaus banished for his tyranny, and his goods confiscated.

Archelaus being now made Prince, remembred the discord past, and in revenge thereof he tyrannized not only over the Jews, but also over the Samaritanes: and in the ninth year of his reign, the Jews and Samaritanes sent Ambassadours against him unto Cæsar: and finally he was banished and sent to Vienna, a City of Gallia, and all hi Patrimony was confiscate to Cæsar. Before he was summoned to appear before Cæsar, he reported that he had a marvellous Dream: for he saw nine great ears full of Corn devoured by Oxen; and presently sending for Prophets and Chaldæans, he demanded what that dream betokened. Some interpreted it one way, and some another: but one Simon an Essean told him, that the ears of Corn betokened years, and the Oxen signified the changes and mutations of this world, for as much as in labouring the land, they turned up and altered it: and therefore he was to reign so many years as there were ears of Corn in number; and then, after he had bidden many mutations, he should die. Five days after this interpretation, Archelaus was sent for to Rome, to answer that before Augustus, whereof he was accused. I also thought it worth rehearsing, to set down the dream of his wife Glaphyra, daughter to Archelaus King of Cappadocia, who was first married unto Alexander Brother unto this man, and Son to King Herod, by whom he was put to death, as we have said before: after whose death she was married to Juba King of Lybia, and he being dead, she returned home to her father: and living in her widowhood at home with her father, Archelaus the Ethnarch beholding her, was so inflamed with her love, that presently being divorced from his wife Mariamme, he married her. Who shortly after she came into Judæa dreamed that she saw Alexander her first husband standing before her, and saying unto her, It had been enough for thee to have married the King of Lybia: but thou not contented therewith, comest again to my house, greedy of a third husband; and which is worst of all, now married to mine own brother. I will not conceal nor dissemble this injury which thou dost me, but I will recover you against your will. And she scarcely lived two days after she had recounted this Dream.

CHAP. VII.

Of Simon the Galilean, and the three Sects amongst the Jews.

Ant.l.18.c.1. The year of the world, 3973. after Christs Nativity, 11.

After that Archelaus his Dominions were made a Province, a certain Roman Knight called Coponius was made Governour thereof, receiving authority from Cæsar to punish and put to death, in his time a Galilean named Simon, who incited his Countreymen to revolt, reproving them for paying tribute to the Romans, and for being subject to any mortal men, but God. This Simon was a Sophister, having a Sect of his own devising, nothing like other Sects. For there are three Sects of Philosophers amongst the Jews: one is that which the Pharisees do follow, another which the Sadduces do follow; the third is that which the Esseans follow, which is the most famous of the three. The Esseans are Jews born, but they are most friendly to one another, who beside all other pleasures do eschew witchcraft; neither do they suffer themselves to be led with their own affections, but account it a great vertue to abstain from all vices, and to keep chastity. For they refuse marriage, and account other mens children, put to them to be taught whilest they be young, as their Kinsmen, whom they do diligently instruct in their manners and opinions; not for that they condemn marriage and propagation of mankind, but for that they think men should avoid womens intemperance, for they think that none of them keep themselves truly to one man. Also they contemn riches, and all things with them are common, and no man amongst them is richer than other. And they have a Law amongst themselves, that whosoever will follow their Sect, he must make his goods common common to them all: for ſo neither any amongſt them ſhall ſeem abject for poverty, nor any great for riches ſake, but they have as it were all equal patrimonies like brethren. They account it a ſhame to uſe oyl: and if any man againſt his will be anointed therewith, they uſe all diligence to wipe it away: for they account homelineſs beſt, and all their cloths are white. They have amongſt them Procurators, to overſee and uſe all things for their common benefit, and every one ſeeketh the good of all, who are choſen from amongſt them by a common conſent. They have not one certain City, but are in many Cities: and if any of their Sect come unto them from another place, they give him any thing they have, as if he himſelf were owner thereof. And in brief, they go boldly in to thoſe, whom they never in their lives did ſee before, as though they were familiarly acquainted with them: and therefore when they take a journey they only arm themſelves againſt Thieves, and carry nothing with them elſe. In every City there is one of them appointed, whoſe office is to have a care of the gueſts, and ſee that they neither want cloaths nor any thing elſe neceſſary for them. All children under government, brought up by them, go apparelled alike, and they never change their apparel nor ſhoes, except they have clean worn their firſt apparel, or that by reaſon of long wearing they will do no more ſervice. They among themſelves neither buy nor ſell: but every man that hath any thing that another wanteth, giveth him it, and taketh that of him which himſelf needeth: yet every one of them may take any thing he hath need of from whom he pleaſeth, without any change. Above all, towards God they are very religious: for before the Sun riſe they have no prophane talk, but they make certain Vows and Prayers after the cuſtome of their Countrey, as it were praying that it may riſe upon them. After this, every one is diſmiſſed to practice the art he knoweth: and when every one hath diligently laboured till five of the clock, they all gather themſelves together again, and being covered with linen clothes, ſo they waſh their bodies with cold water: and having thus purged themſelves, they have a ſecret aſſembly, unto the which no man that is not of their Sect is admitted: and ſo they come into the Refectory, as into a holy Temple, all ſitting down with ſilence, and the Baker ſetteth every man in order a loaf, and the Cook every man a meſs of pottage of one ſort: then before meat the Prieſt giveth thanks, and no man may taſte any meat before they have made their Prayers unto God. Likewiſe when dinner is ended they pray again: for both before and after they give thanks unto God the giver of all, and then putting off that apparel as ſacred, they apply themſelves unto their work till evening. This done, they do as before, cauſing their gueſts to ſup with them, if by fortune any come. Their houſe is never troubled with cries or tumults, for every one is appointed to ſpeak in his turn: ſo that they who are without the houſe, eſteem their ſilence as ſome ſecret miſtery. The cauſe hereof is their continual ſobriety, and that every one is limited how much he ſhould eat or drink. And although that in all other matters they are ruled by their Governour, yet in theſe two, to wit, compaſſionating and helping, they may do as they think good: for every one may when he pleaſeth, help thoſe whom he thinketh deſerve help: and when they pleaſe, give meat to them that are in need. Yet may not they give any thing to their kindred without the leave of their Governour. Theſe men give not place to anger, but refrain from wrath, keep their promiſe, and maintain peace, and account every word they ſpeak of more force, than if they had bound it with an oath; and they ſhun oaths worſe than perjury: for they eſteem him condemned for a lier, who is not believed without he call God to witneſs. They ſtudy diligently antient Writers, chiefly gathering out of their writings, what is moſt convenient for the ſoul and the body. Out of them they learn remedies for diſeaſes, and medicinable herbs, and what is the proper effect of every ſtone. Thoſe who are deſirous to be of their Order, do not ſtreightway converſe with them, but for a year before, they live out of their Colledge, and have the ſame diet, giving them alſo a little hatchet, and ſuch a girdle, as is before ſpoken of, and a white garment. But at the years end, if they perceive him to be continent, then they take him into their Refectory, and he is made partaker of purer waters (to the end he may continue chaſt) yet is he not admitted in common amongſt them: for two years after this his trial, they obſerve his life and manners: and at laſt, when he is thought worthy, then he is admitted to their common company. And before he be received to the common table, firſt he proteſteth with great and ſolemn Oaths, that he will worſhip God, and obſerve juſtice and fidelity towards all men, and neither willingly hurt any man, nor injure any one for another mans command, but that he will always hate the wicked, and aſſiſt the good, and ever keep his faith to all, but eſpecially to his ſuperiours. For no man can obtain the power of principality without the will and good pleaſure of God: and that if he be put in authority over others, he never will abuſe it to the prejudice of thoſe that are under him, and neither exceed ceed the reſt in apparel, nor in any other ambitious pomp: that he will always love the truth, and ever endeavour to confute liars: and that he will keep his hands from ſtealing, and his ſoul pure from all unjuſt gain: and that he will not conceal any myſteries, or ſecrets from his companions, nor reveal them to any ſtrangers, although he ſhould be thereto compelled by death. Adding moreover, that they will never deliver any doctrine, ſave that which they have received; and that they will avoid theft, and diligently keep the Books of their doctrine, and the names of Angels. And with theſe Oaths they try, and as it were arm thoſe who enter into their Order. Thoſe of their Congregation, who ſhall be condemned, they thruſt out of their company: and whoſoever is ſo puniſhed, for the moſt part dieth a miſerable death; for having once taken his Oath, it is not lawful for him to take meat of any ſtranger; ſo that feeding on graſs like beaſts, at laſt he periſheth through famine. For which cauſe often-times they moved with compaſſion, receive many into their Order again, even ready by famine to yield up the ghoſt; judging them to have endured penance enough for their offences, who with famine were almoſt brought unto deaths door. They are very ſevere, and juſt in their judgment; and to decide any matter, there is never fewer of them than an hundred, and that which is by them agreed upon, is an irrevocable ſentence. Next after God they reverence the lawmaker, inſomuch as if one revile him, they forthwith condemn him to death. They greatly reverence old men, and a multitude: ſo that if ten of them ſit together, no man of them muſt ſpeak without he be licenſed thereto by nine of the company. They alſo muſt not ſpit in the midſt of the aſſembly, nor on the right hand. And they are more ſevere than any other Jews in obſerving the Sabbaths: and they do not only abſtain from dreſſing meat that day, but alſo they may not remove any veſſel out of his place, nor go to the privy. Upon other days they dig a pit a foot deep into the ground with the hatchet, which (as we before ſaid) every one at his entrance into their Order hath given him, and then covering themſelves diligently with their garment, leſt they ſhould do injury to the light of Heaven, in that pit they eaſe themſelves; and then cover their ordure with the earth they took out of the pit: and this they do in moſt ſecret places.

And although this purging of their bodies be natural, yet do they by waſhing purifie themſelves after it, as after great uncleanneſs. Furthermore they amongſt themſelves are divided into four orders, according to the times which they have taken to follow this exerciſe of life; and they who are juniors, are ſo far different from the ſeniors, that if they do but touch one of them, they preſently purifie themſelves, as though they had been profaned by a ſtranger. They are long lived, ſo that moſt of them live an hundred years, which I judg is by reaſon of their well ordered diet and their temperancy. They contemn adverſity, and by counſel and diſcretion overcome torments. They prefer an honourable death before life. And the Wars which the Jews made againſt the Romans, ſhewed what courage and hardineſs they have in all things. For being then compelled by breaking of the members of their bodies, and fiery torments, and all kind of tortures which were laid upon them, to revile their lawmaker, and to eat any meat forbidden: yet could they not be forced to any of theſe, neither would they intreat the torturers, nor ſhew any ſorrow amidſt their torments. Nay, in the very midſt of their griefs and pains they ſcoffed at their tormenters; and laughing, joyfully yielded up their ſouls, as though they hoped to receive them again. For it is an opinion amongſt them, that the body is corruptible, and that the matter thereof is not perpetual: but yet the ſouls remain for ever immortal; who paſſing out of a moſt pure and ſubtile air, wrap themſelves in bodies as in priſons, being as it were drawn thereunto by a natural inclination. And when they are delivered out of theſe carnal bonds, then preſently as freed from a long bondage, they joyfully mount a loft. And of the good ſouls they ſay, as did the Grecians, that they lived beyond the Ocean Seas in a place of pleaſure, where they are never moleſted with rain, nor ſnow, nor heat, but have always a ſweet and pleaſant Air coming out of the Ocean. But the wicked ſouls (as they ſay) go into a place very tempeſtuous, where there is always as it were winter weather, always full of lamentations of thoſe who for ever are to be puniſhed. But I judge that the Greeks are of this opinion, when they ſay there is an Iſle for the vertuous, whom they call Heroes and half-gods: and that the ſouls of the wicked go to a place in Hell, where it is feigned, ſome to be tormented, as Syſiphus, Tantalus, Ixion, and Titius. Which they did firſt invent for this purpoſe, becauſe thoſe who are of good diſpoſition, are made better in this life, by hope of ſome reward in the life to come: and the wicked are (as they thought) hereby reſtrained for fear of eternal torments, which if they continue in wickedneſs they ſhall endure. This is the Eſſeans Philoſophy touching the immortality of the ſoul: wherein they propoſe an inevitable allurement to thoſe who have once taſted of their Philoſophy. There is another Colledg of theſe Eſſeans, agreeing with the former, both in apparel, meat, and kind of life; and obſerve the ſame Laws and Ordinances; only they differ in the opinion of Marriage, affirming that they who abſtain from marriage, do cut off the greateſt part of mans life; to wit, ſucceſſion of mankind. For (ſay they) if all men ſhould follow that opinion, preſently all mankind would periſh: yet notwithſtanding theſe people are ſo continent, that for three years ſpace they make trial of the women they are to marry; and when they have proved them fit to bear children, then they marry them. None of them muſt lie with their wives when they are with child, to ſhew that they do not marry to ſatisfie luſt, but B for to have children. When their wives waſh themſelves, they are covered with a garment as the men are: and this is the manner and cuſtome of this Sect. Of the two former Sects, the Phariſees are ſaid to be moſt skilful in Interpreting the Law, and are of opinion that all things are to be attributed to God, and Fate, and that every man may of his own power do good or ill, yet (ſay they) deſtiny helpeth in every action: and that the ſouls of men are all incorruptible, but only the ſouls of good men go into other bodies, & the ſouls of wicked men are ſent into everlaſting pain. But the Sadduces deny Fate and Deſtiny, and affirm that God is the author of no evil, avowing likewiſe that a man hath free will to do well or ill, and every man may chuſe whether he will be good, or bad: and they generally deny, both pains and rewards for the ſouls after this life. The Phariſees are ſociable and loving one to ano- C ther; but the Sadduces are at diſcord among themſelves, living like ſavage beaſts, and as uncourteous to their own Sect, as to ſtrangers. Of the Cities which Philip and Herod builded, and of Pilates Government.

Archelaus his Ethnarchy being now made a Province, the reſt of his Brethren, to wit, Philip and Herod, who was ſirnamed Antipas, governed their Tetrarchies. And Salome dying, left unto Julia by her Teſtament the Toparchy which ſhe ruled, as alſo D Jamnia, and a ground ſet with Palm-trees in Phaſælis. When Tiberius Cæſar after the death of Auguſtus was made Emperour of Rome, after that he had reigned ſeven and fifty years, ſix moneths, and two days, Herod and Philip remaining in their Tetrarchies; Philip builded a City near unto the head of Jordan in the Countrey of Paneade, and called it Cæſarea; and another he built in the lower part of Gaulanitis, and named it Julias: Herod in Galilee built the City called Tiberias, and another in Peræa on this ſide Iordan, which alſo he named Iulias. Pilate being ſent by Tiberius to be Governour over the Iews, cauſed in the night time, the Statua of Cæſar to be brought into Ieruſalem covered: which thing, within three days after cauſed a great tumult among the Iews: for they who beheld it, were aſtoniſh- E ed and moved, as though now the Law of their Countrey were prophaned: for they hold it not lawful, for any Picture or Image to be brought into the City. At their lamentation who were in the City, there was gathered together a great multitude out of the fields adjoyning, and they went preſently to Pilate then at Cæſarea, beſeeching him earneſtly that the Images might be taken away out of Ieruſalem, and that the Laws of their Countrey might remain inviolated. When Pilate denied their ſuit, they proſtrated themſelves before his houſe, and there remained lying upon their faces, for five days and nights never moving. Afterward Pilate ſitting in his Tribunal ſeat, was very careful to call all the Iews together before him, as though there he would have given them an anſwer: when upon the ſudden a F company of armed Souldiers (for ſo it was provided) compaſſed the Iews about with a triple rank: the Iews were hereat amazed, ſeeing that which they expected not. Then Pilate told them, that except they would receive the Images of Cæſar he would kill them all: and to that end made a ſign unto the Souldiers to draw their ſwords. The Iews, as though they had agreed thereto, fell all down at once, and offered their naked necks to the ſtroke of the ſword, crying out that they would rather loſe their lives, than ſuffer their Religion to be prophaned. Then Pilate admiring the conſtancie of the people in their Religion, preſently commanded the Statues to be taken out of the City of Ieruſalem.

After this, he cauſed another tumult amongſt them, for they have a ſacred Treaſure called Corban, which Pilate uſed to bring water in unto the City; four hundred furlongs off: for this cauſe the people murmured; ſo that when Pilate came to Jeruſalem, they flocked about his Tribunal, crying and exclaiming. Pilate foreſeeing that tumult, cauſed Souldiers ſecretly armed to mingle themſelves amongſt the people in private apparel, and commanded them not to uſe their ſwords, but to beat thoſe with clubs, whom they ſaw make ſuch clamors. And when he had thus plotted the matter, ſitting in his Tribunal, he gave a ſign unto the Souldiers; and preſently the Jews were beaten; and many of them, partly with blows, and partly trodden upon by the multitude, died miſerably. The multitude amazed at the calamity of thoſe that were ſlain, held their tongues. For this cauſe Agrippa ſon to Herod the Tetrarch, whoſe father Ariſtobulus, Herod the King put to death, went to Rome, & accuſed him to Cæſar. Tiberius not admitting his accuſation, he remained ſtill at Rome, and ſought the favour of other Potentates there, and eſpecially he reverenced Caius the Son of Germanicus, he being yet a private perſon: and upon a certain day being with him at a Banquet, he ſtretcht forth his hands, and openly began to beſeech Almighty God that Tiberius Cæſar might quickly die, that he might ſee him Lord of all the world. Tiberius having notice hereof by one of his familiar friends, cauſed Agrippa to be impriſoned; where he endured hard and ſtraight impriſonment, until the death of Tiberius, which was ſix moneths after. After he was dead (having reigned two and twenty years, ſix moneths, and three days) Caius Cæſar, who ſucceeded him in the Empire, freed him from priſon, and gave him the Tetrarchy of Philip, who was now deceaſed, and the Title of a King. When Agrippa came into his Kingdom, Herod the Tetrach began to envy his eſtate; and Herodias his wife ſtill urged him forward to hope that he ſhould be made a King: for (ſaid ſhe) thou wanteſt that dignity only for ſlothfulneſs, becauſe thou wouldeſt not go to Cæſar: for if Agrippa be made a King, being before but a private man, how canſt thou doubt to be made a King, who art already a Tetrach? Herod herewith perſwaded, went unto Caius Cæſar, who greatly reproved his avarice, inſomuch as he fled into Spain; for Agrippa followed him to Rome to accuſe him before Cæſar: and Caius gave unto him Herods Tetrarchy. Of the pride of Caius, and of Petronius the Preſident.

Ant. l. 18. c. 15. Caius Cæſar calleth and reputeth himſelf a God. The fear the Jews had of Petronius Army.

Caius Cæſar ſo abuſed himſelf and his Authority, that he would bethought to be a god, and be ſo called. Alſo he put many Noble men of his Countrey to death. He likewiſe extended his impiety even unto Judæa: for he ſent Petronius with an Army to Ieruſalem, commanding him to ſet his Statues in the Temple; and if the Iews refuſed to receive them, that thoſe who withſtood him, he ſhould put to the ſword, and lead the reſt away captive. Almighty God did otherwiſe diſpoſe this proud commandment. But Petronius accompanied with three Legions, and many aſſiſtants out of Syria, came with all ſpeed from Antiochia to Iudæa: many of the Iews would not believe any War towards, notwithſtanding that they heard a general report thereof: and they that believed it, could not bethink themſelves of any means to reſiſt. Suddenly all were in a great fear: for the Army was now come to Ptolemais, which City, is ſcituate by the Sea-ſhore in Galilee, in a fair field, and on the Eaſt-ſide it is compaſſed about with mountains, diſtant from it threeſcore furlongs, which appertain unto Galilee; on the South-ſide it is incloſed with the Mount Carmel, which is an hundred and twenty furlongs off from it: on the North-ſide it is invironed with an exceeding high Mountain, which the Inhabitants call the Tyrians ladder: this mountain is an hundred paces diſtant from the City. Two miles from this City there is a River running by, called Beleus, a very little one, neer unto which is the Sepulchre of Memnon, having adjoyning unto it a place of the compaſs of an hundred cubits, worthy of admiration. This place is as it were a round valley covered with ſand like glaſs, which when many ſhips coming together, take away for Ballaſt, ſo that they empty the place of it, that place is preſently after covered with the like ſand again. For there are winds, which as it were upon purpoſe, carry this ſand from the higher places round about it thither, and whatſoever is within the mine of Metal there, it is preſently changed into Chryſtal or Glaſs. And that which in my mind is more to be wondred at, is, that the ſand being turned into Glaſs, if afterward any part thereof be caſt upon the brink of this place, it is again turned into ordinary ſand. And this is the nature of that place.

Now the Iews with their wives and children gathered themſelves together in the field, where the City Ptolemais is ſcituate, and humbly beſought Petronius, firſt not to violate their Countrey

A Countrey laws; and next, to be good unto them. Petronius seeing the multitude of them who humbly sued unto him, and how earnestly they besought his favour, left his Army and Cæsars statues at Ptolemais, and himself went from thence to Galilee, and at Tiberias called all the Jews, and the Nobility together, recounting to them the force of the Roman Army, and Cæsars threatnings; adding moreover, that the Jews supplication was indeed a contumely, seeing all Nations under the dominion of the Romans (the Jews only excepted) had already placed Cæsars statues in their Temples among the rest of their gods: and herein they did as it were revolt from the Empire, and injure the President. They answered, it was a-
B gainst their Laws, and customs of their Countrey: for it was not lawful for them to have the Image of God, much less of a man; and that they were not only forbidden by the Law to have an Image in the Temple, but also to have it in any other prophane place. Petronius suddenly answered: Well, I must do my Lords command; for if I do not, but spare you, I shall be justly punished: and not I, but he that sent me, will fight against you. For I my self, as well as you, must do what I am commanded. At these words the whole multitude cried out at once that before they would see their Religion violated, they would willingly suffer themselves to be destroyed. When the noise of the people was ceased, Petronius said; Are ye then prepared and minded to fight against Cæsar? The Jews answered, We every day offer sacrifices for Cæsar and the Romans. But if Cæsar would needs place his Image in their Temple, he must first offer their whole Nation for sacrifice: for they would willingly with their wives and children offer themselves to any that would kill them. Hereat Petronius greatly marvelled, being moved to compassion when he beheld the constancy of the Jews in their
C Religion, and so great a multitude prepared to die for it. And for that time they departed, nothing being done. The next day following he assembled only the Nobility of the Jews, one by one, compelling them to accord to Cæsars command, and spake publikely to the people, sometime admonishing them, otherwhile threatning them, and putting them in mind of the power of the Romans, and Cæsars indignation, and that he must of necessity do as he was commanded. But they were moved by none of these. And Petronius fearing the ground would be left untilled, (for it was now seed time, and all the people had remained idle in the City for fifty days space) calling them together, he said, that he would go about a thing which might greatly endanger himself. For (said he) I will either (God working with me) appease Cæsars wrath, or else I will lose mine own life to save such a multitude as you are.
D And dismissing the people, who made daily prayers to God for him he led the Army from Ptolemais unto Antiochia, from whence he presently sent unto Cæsar in all haste, recounting unto him, with how great an Army he went into Judæa, and that all the whole Nation made supplication unto him: whose request and humble suit, if he denied, he must utterly destroy the men and their Countrey; for they had constantly remained in their Countrey Religion, and vehemently resisted any new Law. Caius writ an answer of these Letters unto Petronius, threatning that it should cost him his life, because he made no more haste to execute his command. The messengers that brought these Letters, were tossed in a tempest upon the Sea three whole moneths together, and others coming after them to bring news of Caius his E death, had a prosperous wind: so Petronius received the Letters of Caius Cæsars death twenty and seven days, before the other threatning Letters came.

Of the Empire of Claudius, and of the Reign and Death of Agrippa.

Caius Cæsar being slain by treason, when he had reigned three years and six moneths, Claudius was made Emperour by the Army which was at Rome. The Senate by the instigation of the Consuls Sentius Saturnius, and Pomponius the second, commanded three Legions of Souldiers to keep the City, during the Councel holden in the Capitol:
F and for Caius Cæsars crucky they determined to fight against Claudius, intending to reduce the Empire to the ancient Government; that as before-time, so for ever after, those should rule that the Senate judged worthy. It chanced that at this time Agrippa came to Rome, and the Senate sent unto him, requesting him to come and be one of their Councel. Claudius also desired him to take part with the Army, intending to use his help where need required. Agrippa perceiving that Claudius was already as it were Emperour for his power, he took part with him: who presently sent him as Embassadour to the Senate, to tell them his purpose; how that first of all, the Souldiers, whether he would or no, set him in that dignity, and it had been in him an undiscreet part, to have forsaken such an an offer at the Souldiers hands, who did it for good will: nay, if he had refuſed it, his life ſhould be in continual danger, for it was ſufficient cauſe of envy, that he had been elected Emperour. Moreover, he purpoſed to rule, not as a Tyrant, but as a moſt mild Prince: for he would be contented only with the Title of an Emperour, and do nothing without the common conſent of them all. And although he was not naturally inclined to modeſt and courteous behaviour, ye he had a ſufficient example to beware, that he abuſed not his authority, by Caius Cæſars death. Agrippa bare his meſſage to the Senate, who anſwered, (as though they truſted to their Souldiers and learned Councel) that they would not thruſt themſelves into willful bondage. Claudius receiving this anſwer, ſent Agrippa again to tell them, that nothing could cauſe him to betray them, by whom he was made Emperour: and that he was forced to make War againſt them, with whom he was very loath to ſtrive, and therefore willed them to chuſe a place out of the City for the battel to be fought in: for it ſtood with no reaſon to deface the City with civil Wars and maſſacres, for the obſtinacy of ſome few. Agrippa did alſo this meſſage to the Senate, and one of the Souldiers that were for the Senate drew his ſword, and ſaid; Fellow Souldiers, what ſhould move us to maſſacre our friends, and kindred, and parents, who follow Claudius? eſpecially, ſeeing we have an Emperour with whom we can find no fault, unto whom we ſhould rather go forth with Intreaties, than with Arms. When he had ſaid this, he paſſed thorow the midſt of the Court, and all the Souldiers followed him.

The Senates anſwer to Agrippa.

The Senate, being thus left deſolate, and the Lords abandoned of their forces, began to be in great fear: and ſeeing it was no ſtanding out for them, they followed the Souldiers, and went to Claudius. Before the City walls there met them ſome that endeavoured to ſhew themſelves dutiful to Claudius for his fortune ſake; having their ſwords drawn, and they almoſt killed five, before Cæſar underſtood the outrage of the Souldiers: and they had done it, had not Agrippa ran and told him of the matter, ſaying, That if he did not preſently appeaſe the Souldiers fury, now raging againſt the Citizens, all his Nobility would preſently be extinguiſhed, and he ſhould be left an Emperour of a deſolate place. When Claudius heard this, he repreſſed the Souldiers fury, and very honourably received the Senate into his Camp, and went forth preſently with them, and offered ſacrifice to God (as the manner is) for the good eſtate of the Empire. Alſo, he preſently made Agrippa King of all his fathers Dominions, giving him likewiſe that which Auguſtus gave Herod, to wit, Trachonite and Auranite, and beſide them another Kingdom, called the Kingdom of Lyſania, and publiſhed this his gift, by an Edict unto the people, and commanded the Senate to engrave that Donation in brazen Tables, and to place it in the Capitol. Moreover, he rewarded his brother Herod, who was his kinſman, with the Kingdom of Chalcis, and married him to the Queen Bernice. Agrippa received greater revenues of his Kingdom than he could deſire, which he ſpent not vainly, but in building ſuch a wall about Jeruſalem, as, had he finiſhed it, the Romans could never have taken it: but before he could end that work, he died in Cæſarea, having reigned three years with the Title of a King, and other three years before, in the ſtate of a Tetrarch. He left behind him three daughters, which he had by Cypris, Bernice, Mariamme, and Druſilla, and one ſon by the ſame wife, named Agrippa; who, becauſe he was very young, Claudius reduced the Kingdom into a Province, and made Ceſtius Feſtus Governour thereof. But after him, Tiberius Alexander, who nothing violating the Laws of the Nation, ruled them in peace. After this, Herod King of Chalcis departed; leaving behind him two Sons, which he had by his brothers daughter Bernice, to wit, Bernicianus and Hircanus: and by his firſt wife Mariamme, Ariſtobulus. His other brother alſo Ariſtobulus, died a private perſon, leaving one daughter, Jotapata. And theſe were the poſterity of Ariſtobulus, King Herods ſon, and Herod had Alexander and Ariſtobulus by Mariamme, whom he put to death: but Alexanders poſterity reigned in the greater Armenia.

Of divers tumults, in Judæa and Samaria.

The year of the world, 4011. after Chriſts Nativity, 49.

After the death of Herod, who reigned in Chalcis, Claudius created Agrippa the Son of the former Agrippa, King of Chalcis in his Uncles Kingdom: and Cumenus was made Ruler of the other Province after Alexander, under whom there were many tumults, and new calamities, which befel the Jews. For when they were aſſembled together at the Feaſt of Unleavened bread in Jeruſalem, the Roman Souldiers

A diers ſtanding in the Porch of the Temple (for always armed men kept that place upon Feſtival days, leſt the people gathered together ſhould make any tumult) one of the Souldiers taking up his coat, turned his bare buttocks againſt the Jews faces, ſpeaking words as unſeemly as was his geſture. Whereat the whole multitude began to murmur; ſo that they flocked about Cumanus, requeſting him to puniſh the Souldier for this miſdeamenour: and ſome of them, raſh young men, and as it were prone to ſedition, began to revile the Souldiers, and threw ſtones at them. Then Cumanus, fearing that the whole multitude of the Jews would violently ruſh upon him, called unto him many armed Souldiers, and ſent them into the Porch of the Temple. The Jews being in great fear fled and left the Temple, and there was ſuch a throng, that as they ruſhed out to flee, above ten thouſand people were preſt and
B trodden to death: ſo that this Feſtival day was turned into woful lamentations and mournings in every place. This calamity was increaſed afterward by a company of Thieves: for near Bethoron one Stephanus, ſervant unto Cæſar, carried ſome houſhold ſtuff, which the Thieves took from him in the high way. But Cumanus, ſending for thoſe in the Villages next adjoyning, to make enquiry of theſe Thieves, commanded them to be bound and brought unto him, becauſe they had not taken the Thieves: in one of which Villages a certain Souldier finding the Book of the Holy Scripture, cut it in pieces and burnt it. Hereupon the Jews gathered themſelves together from all places, as though their Religion were now violated: and drawn by the force of their ſuperſtition as with an engine, all of them at one call went
C to Cæſarea to Cumanus, there beſeeching him, that the Sonldier, who had blaſphemed God and their Law, might not eſcape unpuniſhed. But Cumanus perceived, the Jews would not be appeaſed without ſome ſatisfaction: wherefore he condemned the Souldier to death, and ſent him to execution before their faces; which done, they all departed.

The Souldier executed, that burned the Bible.

At laſt there aroſe a tumult between the Galileans and Samaritans; for at a Village called Geman, ſcituate in the great field of Samaria, a certain Galilean, of the number of the Jews that came to the Feaſt, was ſlain: for which fact many Galileans ran to fight with the Samaritans: and the Nobility of the Countrey went unto Cumanus, requeſting him, before any more harm were done, to go into Galilee, and puniſh the authors of this evil. But Cumanus being buſied in greater affairs, ſent them away without granting their requeſt. When this murther was known in Jeruſalem, all the multitude left the Solemnity of the day, and went
D into Samaria without any guide, refuſing to be reſtrained by the Nobility. Of this their tumult and ſedition the ſon of Dinæus, called Eleazar, and one Alexander, were Captains; who with violence entring the borders of the Countrey of Acrebatena, killed man, woman, and child, ſparing no age, and burning the Towns. When Cumanus heard this, he took a Cornet of horſemen, called the Sebaſtians, to come and help them that were thus oppreſſed, and ſo took and killed many of them who took part with Eleazar. Now the Nobles of Jeruſalem came out to the reſt of that multitude, which ſo waſted Samaria, clothed in ſack-cloth and aſhes upon their heads, beſeeching them not to ſeek revenge upon the Samaritans, as thereby to move the Romans to deſtroy Jeruſalem, and to be merciful to their Countrey, the Temple, their Wives and Children, and not at once hazard all, and overthrow their
E whole Countrey and Nation in revenging the death of one Galilean. The Jews hereby were pacified, and departed. At the ſame time many conſpired together to rob and ſteal (as moſt commonly people by long peace grow inſolent) ſo that they robbed in every part of the Countrey, and they that were moſt ſtrong and able offered violence to thoſe that were weaker. Then the Princes of Samaria went to Tyre, beſeeching Numidius Quadratus, being Governour of Syria, to revenge them of thoſe that ſo robbed and ſpoiled their Countrey. There was alſo the Nobility of the Jews, and Jonathas, the ſon of Ananus, who was High Prieſt who defended the Jews againſt the Samaritans accuſation; affirming, the Samaritans to have been cauſe of that tumult in killing the Galilean: and after, that Cumanus was cauſe
F of the reſt of their calamities, who refuſed to puniſh the murtherers. Quadratus for that time ſent away both parties, promiſing them that when he came into their Countreys, he would diligently enquire of the matter: and coming from thence to Cæſarea, he crucified all thoſe whom Cumanus took alive. And departing from thence to Lydda, he heard the Samaritans complaints, and ſent for eighteen men whom he underſtood for certain to have been in that broil, and beheaded them, and ſent the two High Prieſts, Jonathas and Ananias, and his ſon Ananus, with ſome of the Nobility of the Jews to Cæſar, and alſo the chief of the Samaritans. He likewiſe commanded Cumanus and Celer the Tribune to go to Rome, and yield account unto Claudius for that which they had done in that Countrey.

This done, he sent Fœlix, brother to Pallas, to rule Judæa, Samaria, and Galilea. And he preferred Agrippa from Chalcis to a greater Kingdom, making him King of that Province whereof Philip had been Ruler, to wit, Trachon, Batanæa, and Gaulanitis, adding thereunto Lysanias Kingdom, and the Tetrarchy whereof Varus was Governour: And having reigned thirteen years, eight moneths, and thirty days, Claudius departed this life, leaving Nero to succeed him, whom by the perswasions of his wife Agrippina he adopted to the Empire, having a lawful begotten son of his own, named Britannicus, by his former wife Messalina, and a daughter called Octavia, whom he married to Nero: he had also another daughter by Agrippina named Antonia. Of the tumult in Judæa under Fœlix.

The year of the world, 4018. after Christs Nativity, 56.

Ant. l. 20. c. 11. Fœlix surprizeth Eleazar the Captain of the Thieves, & many others, and sends them bound to Rome.

WHerefore I will begin to recount what Nero did against the Jews. He made Aristobulus, Herods son, King of the lesser Armenia, and joyned unto Agrippas Kingdom four Cities, and the ground belonging unto them: two of them, Abila and Julias, were in the Country of Peræa; the other, Tarichæa and Tiberias, were in Galilee: and he made Fœlix Governour over the rest of Judæa. This Fœlix took Eleazar, Captain of the Thieves, after he had robbed and spoiled the Countrey twenty years, and many more with him, and sent them bound to Cæsar: and he crucified a great number of them, who either were Thieves, and his confederates, or else such as assisted him. The Countrey was no sooner cleansed from these, but presently another sort of Thieves arose in Jerusalem, called Sicarii, with short swords, who at high noon in the midst of the City killed many in every place: and especially at the celebrating of holy Feasts they mixt themselves with the multitude, having short swords under their coats, and therewithal killed those to whom they bare any grudge: and when men fell down dead, they among the rest complained of this wickedness. By this deceitful means they were a long time unsuspected and unknown. And first of all, they killed Jonathan the High Priest, and after him every day some were slain; and the City was put in a fear worse than death it self: for each man every moment expected death, as though it had been amidst open Wars: likewise every one cast a diligent eye upon those that came near him; also no man trusted his familiar friends: and yet were they murthered, whilest they were looking about them to escape danger. So cunningly did these Thieves cover and conceal their actions. Moreover, there arose another sort of mischievous people, who did not so much harm with their hands as the first, but with their impious counsel more, and did no less trouble the quiet estate of the City than did the Thieves. These people being vagabonds and juglers, desiring alteration under pretence of Religion, made the people as it were mad: for they went into the wilderness, affirming, that there God would shew them tokens of their liberty. Fœlix perceiving that their action tended to Rebellion, sent an Army of horse and foot against these people, and killed a great many of them.

But a certain Egyptian, a false Prophet, caused a far greater Massacre among the Jews than that was: for being a Magician, he came into the Countrey; and calling himself a Prophet, he gathered unto him almost thirty thousand Jews, who were by his Magick arts seduced: and leading them from the wilderness to mount Olivet, he determined from thence to go to Jerusalem, and to drive back the forces of the Romans, and to use his authority over the people. He had for his guard those that came to follow him. Fœlix foreseeing his intent, met him with his Legions of armed Romans: whom the other Jews assisting, and fighting against him, the Egyptian with a few fled, and many that were with him were taken and committed to prison, and the rest of the multitude dispersed themselves every one into his Countrey. These being thus repressed, the other part (as it hapneth in a sick body) began to rise: for some of the Magicians, and the Thieves being gathered together, they brought many unto misery, and as it were exhorted them to liberty, threatning present death to those that

At this time aroſe another tumult at Cæſarea, by a ſedition raiſed between the Jews that dwelt there, and the Syrians. The Jews challenged the City to be theirs, becauſe it was founded by Herod, who was a Iew. But the Syrians denying not but that the builder of the City was a Iew, yet they affirmed that it belonged to the Gentiles: for (ſaid they) it had not been lawful for the Founder to have placed in it ſhrines and Statues, if he had meant that it ſhould have belonged to the Iews. So that hereupon there aroſe a great controverſie among the Iews and Syrians, inſomuch as the one fought againſt the other, and every day thoſe that B were the hardieſt of both parts fought together. For the eldeſt ſort of the Iews could not reſtrain thoſe of their Nation from being ſeditious: and the Greeks ſcorned to give place to the Iews. The Iews overcame them in riches and ſtrength of body, and the Græcians overcame the Iews by help of Souldiers: for a great company of the Roman Army came thither out of Syria, and they were ready to aſſiſt the Syrians, becauſe they were as it were of their kinred and conſanguinity. The Captains of the Souldiers endeavoured to appeaſe the tumult, and took thoſe that were moſt ſeditious on both parts, and beat them, and caſt them in priſon. But the puniſhment of thoſe that were apprehended, terrified not the reſt: nay, they were hereby made more ſeditious. When Fælix ſaw this, by a ſtreight Edict he baniſht thoſe who were moſt ſeditious, out of the City: and thoſe that obeyed not, he ſent Souldiers and ſlew them, ſuffering their goods to be taken by the Souldiers. The ſedition being ſtill on foot, he ſent the C Nobility on either part to Nero, to plead their right and title. Feſtus ſucceeded Fælix, who diligently perſecuted them that troubled the Countrey, and deſtroyed many thieves.

But Albinus, who ſucceeded Feſtus, followed not his ſteps: for there was no iniquity D ſo great wherein he was not plunged. Furthermore, he did not only take away by force mens goods from them under colour of Iuſtice, and at his own pleaſure exact a greater Tribute, but alſo freed and let looſe any one whom either the Souldiers of the City took, or his Predeceſſours had left in Priſon, ſo that their friends would give a piece of money, and they only who were not able to give money, were impriſoned as moſt hainous offenders. At this time, they in Ieruſalem that deſired alteration, began to take courage, and thoſe that were rich among them fee'd Albinus with money, to permit them to be ſeditious, and the common people that could not be in quiet, joyned themſelves with Albinus favourites: and each of them had a Troop of Thieves after him. But Albinus himſelf was over them all as a Tyrant, and a Prince of Thieves; and he uſed the help of his Guard to rob the meaner ſort: ſo they, whoſe houſes were ſackt and ſpoiled, were glad to hold their peace; E and they, who yet had eſcaped, were glad to be very officious towards thoſe who deſerved death, for fear they ſhould ſuffer the like. In general, no man could truſt one another: there were than many tyrants, and from that time the ſeeds of captivity, which after befel, began to take root.

Notwithſtanding that Albinus was of ſuch behaviour, yet Geſſius Florus, who ſucceeded him, ſo behaved himſelf, that in compariſon of him, Albinus might have been thought a good Governour. For Albinus did all things ſecretly and craftily, but Geſſius committed any iniquity how great ſoever, ſo openly, as though he gloried in his impiety; and behaved himſelf not as a ruler of the Countrey, but as a hangman ſent to execute malefactors; omitting no manner of theft, nor any means whereby he might afflict the people. Where he ought to F have ſhewed pity, there was he a tyrant; and where he ought to have been aſhamed, there he ſhewed himſelf ſhameleſs. No man ever could invent more means to obſcure truth, and deviſe more ways to do harm than he: for it ſufficed him not, for his own gain to abuſe men one by one at his pleaſure, but he waſted and ſpoiled whole Cities at once, and deſtroyed the people in great multitude. Nay, he was not aſhamed by the publick voice of a Crier, to proclaim it thorow the whole Country lawful for any one that would, to rob and ſteal, ſo that they would bring him a part of their booty. In brief, his cruelty was ſuch, that the Countrey was almoſt left deſolate, people forſaking their own native home, and fleeing into ſtrange lands. And all the time that Ceſtius Gallus was Governour of Syria, no man durſt

Yet Florus was so impudent, that being with Gallus, and hearing these cries against him he was no whit moved thereat, but laughed at it. Cestius for that time appeased the people, promising that hereafter he would make Florus more gentle unto them, and so returned to Antiochia. Florus conducted him to Cæsarea to stop his mouth with lies, devising with himself how to make the Jews rebel, and that he thought was the safest means to cloak his villanies: for if they continued in peace and obedience, he feared, that some of them would accuse him before Cæsar: marry, if he could make them revolt, then he hoped that their great fault would shadow his impieties. Wherefore to bring about his purpose, he every day oppressed them with new calamities, forcing them hereby to rebel against the Romans. At this time the Gentiles of Cæsarea got the victory over the Jews, and brought Letters to testifie that decree before Nero. This was the beginning of the Wars of the Jews, in the twelfth year of Nero his Empire, and the seventeenth of Agrippas reign, in the moneth of May.

Of Florus his cruelty against the Jews of Cæsarea and Jerusalem.

Ant. Chr. 65. The causes of the War of the Jews.

The year of the world, 4030. after Christs Nativity, 68.

Florus perjury and deceit toward the Jews.

Florus had no just cause for any of these calamities which he inflicted upon the Jews. The Jews dwelling at Cæsarea, had a Synagogue near a piece of ground that belonged to a Gentile dwelling in Cæsarea. The Jews often sought to compound with him for that piece of ground, offering him far more than it was worth: but the Landlord of the soil did not only contemn their request, but also to their great grief in that place built Taverns: so that he left them a very streight and narrow passage to go to their Synagogue. Some young men among the Jews, being very zealous resisted the workmen, and would not suffer them to build. Florus, hearing this, commanded the Jews to let the workmen go forward in their work. The Jews not knowing what to do, especially one John, a Publican, offered Florus eight talents to hinder the building: he promised for that money to fulfil their request: and now having it, he present departed from Cæsarea, and went to Sebaste without performing any thing, giving as it were occasion of sedition, and as though he had received money of the Nobility of the Jews to permit them to fight a certain time. The next day, which was the Jews Sabbath, when they were all assembled to go to the Synagogue, one of Cæsarea, a seditious person, took a great earthen vessel, and set it even at the entry into the Synagogue, and upon it did offer birds. This fact so moved the Jews, that they would not be pacified, because it was done in contempt of their Religion, and thereby the place was profaned. One part of the Jews that was most modest and wisest, counselled the Jews to complain to them that were in Authority: but those who for heat of youth were prone to sedition, began contumeliously to revile their adversaries. For the most seditious of the people of Cæsarea were also prepared to fight with them, and had caused that to be done before the Synagogue, only to pick a quarrel, and so they fought together. Jucundus, General of the Horsmen, that was left to keep all in quiet, presently came with Souldiers, and commanded that vessel to be taken away, and so endeavoured to appease the tumult: but not being able to do it through the violence of them of Cæsarea; the Jews took the Books of their Law, and retired themselves to a place called Narbata, belonging to them, which was distant from Cæsarea threescore furlongs. Twelve of the chief of them, together with John the Publican, went unto Florus, being at Sebaste, to complain of the injury done unto them, requesting him to assist them, and modestly put him in mind of the eight Talents they gave him. But he presently commanded them to be bound and imprisoned, because they had presumed to take and carry their law from Cæsarea. Hereat those of Jerusalem were grealy moved, yet they shewed it not. Florus, as upon set purpose giving occasion of rebellion, sent for seventeen Talents out of the Sacred Treasury, pretending that it was to be imployed in Cæsars affairs. At this the people was much troubled, calling and crying upon the name of Cæsar, praying that he would deliver them from Florus his tyranny. Some of them being seditious, began to curse Florus bitterly, and took a basket, and carried it about, and begged an Alms for Florus, which they did in derision, as who should say, he were as miserable as beggars that have nothing. Florus for all this, left not his avarice, but was more earnest to rob the Inhabitants of their goods. So that when he should

Another cause of War raised by Florus.

A ſhould have gone to Cæſarea to have quieted the ſedition, and removed the cauſe of tumults, as alſo he had received money ſo to do; taking an army of horſe and foot, he came to Jeruſalem, that with the help of the Romane Souldiers he might effect his pleaſure, and terrifie the whole City. The year of the World, 4030. after Chriſts Nativity, 68.

The people to pacifie his wrath, went out in courteous ſort to meet the army, ſhewing themſelves ready to give them the beſt entertainment they could, and to receive Florus with all honour and reverence. Florus underſtanding of them, ſent before him one Capito a Centurion, with fifty horſemen; commanding them to depart, and not to mock him with a pretence of honour, whom they had ſo hainouſly abuſed. And that if they were as good as their words, they ſhould flout and reproach him to his face; and not onely in words; but in B deeds ſhew, that they deſired liberty. Herewithall the multitude being terrified, and alſo that the horſemen that came with Capito aſſaulted them with violence; every one fled before they ſaluted Florus, or did their accuſtomed duty unto the army: and going every one unto his houſe, they paſt the watchfull night in fear and ſorrow. Florus for that night lodged in the Kings palace. The next day he cauſed a tribunal openly to be placed, and the high Prieſt and all the chief of the Jews reſorted thither and ſtood before the tribunal. Then Florus ſitting in the tribunal ſeat, commanded them to bring forth preſently all thoſe, that had uſed any opprobrious words againſt him, threatning to be revenged on them except they did it. The Jews made anſwer, that the people intended nothing but peace and quietneſs, requeſting that they that had offended in words, might obtain pardon. For it was no marvel C in ſo great a multitude, if there were ſome raſh and fooliſh young men: and that it was unpoſſible to diſcern all that offended, ſeeing every one was now penitent for that which was done, and at leaſt for fear would deny it; and that if he were carefull to conſerve and maintain the quietneſs of the nation, and preſerve the City ſtill to obey the Romanes, he then muſt rather pardon a few ſeditious for ſo many good mens ſake; then to revenge himſelf of a few wicked perſons, to hurt and moleſt ſo many that thought no harm. Hereat Florus wrath was increaſed, and preſently he commanded the Souldiers to ſack the market place (which was the higher part of the City) where things were ſold, and put all they met or found unto the ſword. The Souldiers who were deſirous of gain, having now authority from their Ruler, did not onely ſack the place they were ſent unto, but alſo all houſes, and murthered the in- D habitants. All ſtreets and gates were filled with them that ſought to flie, and the dead bodies of them that did light into the Souldiers hands: no ſort of ſpoyling was omitted. They alſo apprehended many of the Nobility, and brought them to Florus: and he cauſing them to be whipt, afterward hanged them up. And there were ſlain that day, of men, women and children (for they ſpared not infants) ſix hundred and thirty. Which did not afflict the Jews ſo much, as to ſee the ſudden cruelty and tyranny of the Romanes; Florus then doing that none before durſt ever preſume to do: for he cauſed Knights before the tribunal ſeat to be whipped, and after hanged them up, who though they were Jews born, yet received they that dignity from the Romanes.

Of another oppreſsion of the Citizens of Jeruſalem, by Florus his means.

AT the ſame time King Agrippa was gone to Alexandria, to entertain Alexander, whom Nero ſent to be Ruler over Egypt; his ſiſter Bernice in the mean while remained in Jeruſalem, who ſeeing the cruelty of the Souldiers, was much grieved: and often ſent the Lieutenants of her horſemen and her own guard unto Florus, requeſting him to abſtain from the ſlaughter of the Citizens. But he neither regarding the multitude of them that were ſlain, nor the dignity of her that intreated, but F onely his private gain, and what he could gather by oppreſſion and rapine, denied her requeſt: ſo that the rage of the Souldiers extended it ſelf alſo againſt the Queen. For they did not onely before her face beat and kill all that came in their way, but they had alſo killed her, had ſhe not fled into the palace, where ſhe watcht all night, keeping a truſty guard about her, fearing that the Souldiers would break in upon her. She came to Jeruſalem to fulfill her vow to God: for it is the cuſtome, that if any be afflicted with grievous ſickneſs, or be in any other diſtreſs, they muſt abide in prayer thirty dayes before they offer ſacrifice, and abſtain from wine, and ſhave their hair; which cuſtome Queen Bernice then obſerving, ſtood alſo barefoot before Florus his tribunal ſeat, to entreat him: whom he not onely contemned, but alſo put her in danger of her life. This was done the 16. day of May. The day after, the multitude gathered together in the upper part of the City in the Market place, and with great cries murmured that ſo many were ſlain, and eſpecially uſed contumelious words againſt Florus: which the Nobility and high Prieſts (fearing their deaths) apprehended, beſeeching them to abſtain from ſuch words as had already cauſed that calamity in the City, and not to provoke Florus unto greater indignation. And ſo the multitude was pacified for their ſakes who entreated, and hoped that hereafter Florus would deſiſt from ſuch cruelty. Florus, when he ſaw the multitude quieted, was ſorry: and that he might again provoke them, he aſſembled together the Nobility and high Prieſts, telling them that it would be an argument that the people did not ſeek alteration any more, if they would go in courteous wiſe and meet the Souldiers which were coming from Cæſarea, whereof were two legions. Having thus aſſembled the Jews together to go meet the Souldiers; he alſo ſent and commanded the Centurions not to ſalute the Jews, who came to meet them: and if therefore the Jews were offended, and gave any hard ſpeeches, they ſhould fall upon them with their weapons. The high Prieſts aſſembling the Jews together in the Temple, beſought them to go, and ſolemnly to meet and entertain the Souldiers, for fear of a greater inconvenience. Notwithſtanding their counſel, thoſe that were ſeditious, refuſed to do as they were requeſted: and others for grief of them that were ſlain, took part with the ſeditious.

The exhortation of the Prieſts and Princes to the people.

Then all the Prieſts and Levites brought forth the holy veſſels and ornaments of the Temple, and with Harps, ſongs, and muſicall inſtruments came before the multitude, beſeeching them to endeavour, that the honour and pomp of the Temple might ſtill remain, and not to incite the Romanes through contumuleous words to ſack the Temple. There might you ſee the chief of the high Prieſts with aſhes upon their heads, and clothes rent, ſo that their naked breaſts were perceived; and calling every Nobleman by his name, and ſpeaking to all the multitude, requeſted them not for a ſmall offence, to betray their whole Countrey to them, who ſtill gaped after the deſtruction thereof. For what commodity ſhould the Romanes reap by the Jews ſalutation, and what amendment of their miſeries could they expect, if they did not go to meet them? Contrariwiſe, if they would go to them in ſolemn ſort, then they took from Florus all occaſion of perſecution, and ſaved their Countrey from ruine, and themſelves from further calamities. Adding that it was a great ſhame that ſuch a multitude ſhould be led away with a few ſeditious perſons, and that it was more fit that ſo many ſhould force thoſe few ſeditious people to obey them, and joyn with them in opinion.

With theſe perſwaſions they did mollifie the malice of the Jews, and alſo perſwade many of the ſeditious people, ſome with threats, and ſome with reverence of themſelves to be pacified. And ſo they going before, all the people followed, and went out to meet the Romane Souldiers. And coming near them they ſaluted them: who anſwering nothing again, thoſe of the Jews that were ſeditious, began to rail againſt Florus, by whoſe conſent this was done: and preſently the ſouldiers apprehending them, did beat them with clubs; and the reſt flying, the Romane horſemen purſued them, and trode upon them with their horſes. Many were ſlain, by the Romanes, and more were killed in the throng, one of them tumbling upon another. There was a great throng in the gates of the City: for every one haſting and ſtriving to get in, hindred themſelves and others. Many died moſt miſerably in that throng, and ſome were ſtifled, and ſome preſt to death being trodden upon; ſo that their neighbours coming to bury them, could not know them. The Souldiers alſo cruelly aſſaulted them, killing all that they could come unto, and forced the people to go in by the entrance called Bezetha, who deſired to recover the Temple and the Caſtle called Antonia.

The event ſheweth Florus intent and counſel.

The ſlaughter of the Jews.

Florus taking the Souldiers with him, purſued them thither, ſtriviug to get the Caſtle; yet did he not prevail: for the people made reſiſtance, and threw down ſtones from the houſe top, and killed many of the Romanes: who being overcome with darts caſt from aloft, and could not reſiſt the people, who on every ſide came againſt them, retired themſelves unto the reſt of the army at the Kings palace. Thoſe that were ſeditious, fearing that Florus would again aſſault them, and by the Caſtle Antonia make an entrance into the Temple, they got upon the galleries that reached from the porch of the Temple unto Antonia, and beat them down, hereby to repreſs the covetouſneſs of Florus, who greedily gaped after the ſacred treaſure, and ſtrived to enter by Antonia into the Temple to take them: but ſeeing the porches beaten down, he offered no more violence. And calling together the high Prieſts and Nobility, he ſaid that he was content to depart out of the City, but he would leave them as great a garriſon as they would requeſt. Whereunto they anſwered, that nothing ſhould be altred, if he would leave one company to keep all quiet: ſo he left not that, which a while before did fight againſt the people, becauſe that the people would not eaſily brook them, for that which they had ſuffered at their hands. So Florus as he requeſted, changing the garriſon with the reſt of the army departed to Cæſarea.

The ſeditious for fear leſt Florus ſhould ſeize their ſpoyles, flye to the Temple. Florus taketh the ſpoyles, and entreth the Temple. Florus ſeeing the Jews inexpugnable in the Temple, ſurceaſeth his violence, and leaving a band behinde him, goeth to Cæſarea.

CHAP. XVI.

Of Politianus the Tribune, and how Agrippa made a ſpeech unto the Jews, exhorting them to obey the Romanes.

The year of the World, 4030. after Chriſts Nativity, 68.

Ceſtius Gallus, Preſident of Syria conſulteth with the Princes what were beſt to be done. Politianus is ſent to Jeruſalem, and meets with Agrippa.

Florus yet deviſed another way to ſtirre the Jews to rebellion: for he reported unto Ceſtius that the Jews were revolted, impudently belying them to have committed that which indeed they endured at his hands. The nobles of Jeruſalem and Bernice certified Ceſtius of all that Florus had done: he receiving letters from both parties, deliberated with his nobles what to do. Some counſelled Ceſtius to go into Judæa with an army, and puniſh the Jews, if they were revolted; and if they were not, then to confirme them in their obedience. Yet it pleaſed him better to ſend ſome about him thither before, to bring him true news of their eſtate, and what had hapned. So he ſent Politianus the tribune, who in his way met with Agrippa about Jamnia as he returned from Alexandria, and told him all, for what, and from whom he was ſent. Where alſo were preſent the Prieſts and the chief of the Jews, to welcome Agrippa; and having ſaluted him as courteouſly as they could, they preſently bewayled the miſery which had befalne their nation, and the cruelty of Florus. Which although Agrippa diſallowed, yet made as if he were angry with the Jews whom he greatly pitied; purpoſing hereby to bridle their affections; that they perſwaded that they had had no injury, might abſtain from revenge. So that all the better ſort, who for their lands and livings deſired quietneſs, well perceived that the Kings reprehenſion was not of malice, but for their good.

The multitude of the people go out to meet Agrippa and Politianus.

The people of Jeruſalem went out to meet them threeſcore furlongs off, and received Agrippa and Politianus very courteouſly, yet the Women lamented the death of their huſbands ſlaine, and with their teares moved the whole multitude to ſorrow, who beſought Agrippa to have compaſſion on their nation; entreating alſo Politianus to go into the City, and behold what Florus had done: And ſo they ſhewed him the market place deſart, and the houſes deſtroyed, and by the means of Agrippa perſwaded Politianus to go round about the City as far as Siloa, onely with one man, and behold with his eyes what Florus had done, and that they were obedient to the Romanes in all things, and onely were enemies unto Florus who had uſed them ſo cruelly. Politianus having gone about the whole City, aſcended into the Temple, well perceiving many arguments of the Jews fidelity towards the Romanes: and calling the people there together, he praiſed their loyalty, and exhorted them ſtill to continue in like obedience, and worſhipped God and his rites, as far as the law permitted him: and ſo he returned unto Ceſtius. The multitude of the Jews came to Agrippa and the high Prieſts, requeſting them to ſend Embaſſadours againſt Florus unto Nero, and not to give an argument of rebellion by not complaining of ſuch murthers: for Florus would make him believe that they had rebelled, except they went unto him to ſhew that Florus gave firſt occaſion; and it was certaine that the multitude would not be quieted, if any one hindered that Embaſſage. Hereupon Agrippa thought that it would be an hatefull matter to ſend Embaſſadours to Rome to accuſe Florus; and on the other part he perceived, that it was to no purpoſe to contradict the Jews, who were ready now to rebell: wherefore calling the people together he made a ſpeech unto them, and ſeated his ſiſter Bernice in an eminent place in the houſe of the Aſmonæans. The porch wherein he called them together, was in ſuch a place that it overlookt all the higher part of the City, for there was onely a bridge between it and the temple, which joyned the Temple and it together, and there ſpake he unto the Politianus aſſembleth the people, and inciteth them to peace, and after returns to Ceſtius.

The Jews require the King, that there might be ſome Embaſſadours ſent to Rome to complain of Florus to Nero.

Agrippas Oration to the Jews.

„ Jews in manner following: If I had perceived that you were bent to fight againſt the Ro-„ manes, or that the better part of the people were not inclined to peace, neither would I have „ come unto you nor have preſumed to have counſelled you in any thing. For it is in vaine to „ give counſel of ſuch things as are expedient, where all the auditors are already determined „ to follow that, which is contrary to the counſel given them. But for that ſome are ignorant
„ what miſery warres induce, becauſe by reaſon of their young years they have not known it, „ others are moved with a raſh and unadviſed deſire of their liberty, others are drawn by ava„ rice and hope of gaine in that hurliburly, I thought it good to aſſemble you all together, and „ declare unto you what meanes is to be uſed to reſtraine ſuch people, and that the good may
„ the better know how to reſiſt and overcome the practices of the wicked. But let no man „ frowne if he heare that which diſpleaſeth him, and I will tell you nothing but that which „ ſeemeth expedient for you. For they that are ſo bent to rebellion, that they will not be re„ called, may for all my words continue in the ſame mind ſtill. And I will ſpeak nothing at all, „ except you will all keep ſilence. I know that many do ſeek to aggravate the injuries that are „ done by the rulers of the countrey, and do highly commend and extoll liberty: yet before I

Agrippa ſtriveth to make the common ſort flexible & attentive.

The yeer of the World, 4030. after Christs Nativity, 68.

„ begin to declare unto you who you are, and against whom ye purpose to beare armes, I will G
„ first divide and separate such causes as you think inseparable. For if you seek onely to re„ venge your selves upon those that have injured you, why do you then so extoll liberty? or if „ you think it not tolerable to obey any other; why then, these complaints against your rulers
„ are superfluous. For although they were never so milde, still would subjection be intolerable.
„ Call all things to minde, and consider what a small cause of War is given you. And first of all

It behoveth to honour the Magistrate, & not to provoke him by injury.

„ weigh with your selves the crimes and offences of your Rulers: for you ought to shew your „ selves humble, and dutifull to them that are in authority, and not exasperate, and provoke „ them to wrath by reproachfull speeches. For in reviling them for small offences; you do in„ cite them against you whom you so revile: and that whereas before they did onely do you a „ little injury, and that secretly, now being moved through bad speeches, they openly set upon H
„ you and destroy you. And there is nothing that so restraineth cruelty as patience; so that „ oft-times the patience of them who have suffered injury, makes them that did the injury „ ashamed thereof. Be it so, that they, which are sent into the Provinces and appointed by the „ Romanes for your Governours, are irksome to you: yet all the Romanes do not oppress you, Agrippa excuseth Cæsar and the Romanes.

„ nor Cæsar, against whom you would take armes. For they command no cruel Governors to „ come to you, nor can they who are in the furtheſt part of the West, easily know what is done „ in the East, nor heare thereof. And truly it is a thing most against reason to take armes for so „ small a cause, especially, when they against whom you take armes, know nothing of the mat„ ter. It is an easie way quickly to have redress for these matters you now complaine of. For Depulsion of the Jews liberty, which they so vehemently seek for.

„ there will not be alwayes the same Governour; and it is credible, that they who succeed this, I „ will be more gentle & courteous. But if you once begin to make war, it is not easie to end it,
„ or sustaine it without great calamities. And let them who so thirst after liberty, diligently „ advise themselves, that they do not bring upon their backs a greater bondage. For slavery
„ is a cruel thing, and it seemeth a lawfull cause to make War, lest you be brought into it, „ yet he that is already in bondage and revolteth, is rather a perverse slave, then one who de-„ sireth liberty. You should therefore have endeavoured to have resisted the Romanes, when „ first Pompeius entred into this Land: but then our ancestors and their Kings far exceeding „ you in riches, strength of body, and courage, were not able to withstand a small part of the „ Romane forces; and do you think who are their successours, and far weaker then they, „ having succeeded them in subjection, that you are able to resist all the whole power of the K „ Romanes?

The example of the Athenians, and others, who obey the Romane Empire. The Lacedemonians. The Macedonians.

„ The Athenians, who sometime to conserve the liberty of Greece, set their own City on „ fire, and pursued that proud Xerxes, whom they forced to flie with one ship (which Xerxes
„ made the earth navigable, and the sea firme land, who had such a navy that the seas had not „ roome for one ship to saile by another, nor all Europe able to receive his army) who also had „ such a victory over Asia, near the little Ile of Salamina, yet now are subject unto the Ro-„ manes, and that kingly City is now ruled at the Romanes beck. The Lacedemonians also „ having gotten such a victorie upon the Thermopyles, and under the General Agesilaus „ sacked Asia, acknowledge now the Romanes for their Lords. The Macedonians also who „ still imagine they see Philip and Alexander promising them the Empire of the whole world; L „ now patiently bear this change, and obey them whom fortune have made their masters, „ Many other nations, who for their power and strength have far more cause then you to

The comparison of the Romanes force with the Jews weakness. The Romanes have brought the whole world under their government, and have sought another world beyond the Ocean sea.

„ seeke their liberty, yet patiently endure to serve the Romanes. But you onely think it a dis„ grace to obey them, who are Lords of the whole world. And where are the armies and „ armes that you trust in, or your navy to scowre the Romane seas? Where are your treasures
„ to effect that you intend? Think you that you are to warre against the Egyptians or Arabi-„ ans? And do you not consider the bounds of the Romane Empire? Do you not consider „ your own inability? Know ye not that your neighbour nations have often by force taken
„ your City? and that the forces of the Romanes have passed thorow the whole world uncon„ quered, and as it were searching for some thing greater then the world? Whose dominion M „ towards the East is extended beyond Euphrates, and towards the North beyond Ister, and „ towards the South beyond the Wilderness of Lybia, and towards the West beyond Gades, „ having found another World beyond the Ocean, and with an army entred Britaine which is „ England and Scotland, where never any came before. Are you richer then the Frenchmen, „ stronger then the Germanes, wiser then the Greekes, and are you more in number then the „ whole world beside? What hope can you have that may incite you against the Romanes? But „ some of you will say, that bondage is a grievous thing. But how much more then you „ should the Greekes think so, that were thought to be the noblest nation under heaven,
„ and had such large dominions, and now obey the Romane governours? as also the Macedonians

„ nians do, who have greater cauſe then you to ſeek their liberty? What ſhall I ſay of the fifty „ Cities of Aſia? do they not all obey one ruler, and the authority of the Conſul, without any „ garriſon? What ſhall I ſpeak of the Eniochians, Colchians, the people of Taurus, the inhabi„ tants of Helleſpontus, and Pontus, and about Mæotis, who in times paſt had no ruler of „ their own nation, whom now three thouſand Souldiers keep in aw, and fourty long Gallies
„ keep now peaceably thoſe ſeas, never ſailed on before? What think you, the Bythinians, „ Cappadocians, and thoſe of Pamphilia, Lydia, and Cilicia, could ſay for their liberty, who „ notwithſtanding now peaceably pay tribute unto the Romanes? What of the Thracians?
„ whoſe countrey is five dayes journey in breadth, and ſeven in length, far more hard and „ ſtronger then your countrey, where froſt would hinder them that ſhould aſſault them, yet
„ do they obey two thouſand Romanes, who are in garriſon. After them the Illyrians, whoſe „ countrey reacheth unto Dalmatia, and Iſther, are kept in obedience onely by two legions, „ with help of whom they alſo reſiſt the Dacians. The Dalmatians themſelves, who having „ ſo often attempted their own liberty, being oftentimes conquered, and ſtill as their wealth „ increaſed, rebelling, are now in peace under one legion of the Romanes. Nay, if any one
„ have cauſe to rebell, it is the Frenchmen, whoſe countrey is by nature of the place ſtrong, „ being on the Eaſt ſide compaſſed with the Alpes, on the North with the River of Rhene,
„ on the South with the Pyrenæan mountains, on the Weſt with the Ocean. Who notwith-
„ ſtanding, having amongſt them three hundred and five nations, who have amongſt them
„ as it were the very fountain of felicity, and with their goods and commodities inrich the „ whole World: yet do they pay tribute unto the Romanes, and account their happineſs to „ be builded upon the felicity of the Romanes, and that neither for want of courage nor „ nobility of blood, who fourſcore years long fought for their liberty, admiring the „ Romanes and fearing them, who ſtill gained more by fortune, then they did by Warres:
„ and now obey a thouſand and two hundred Souldiers, having almoſt againſt every Souldier
„ a City.

The year of the world, 4030. after Chriſts Nativity, 28.

Fifty Cities of Aſia obey the Romanes.

The defence of France.

„ Neither could the Spaniards, though gold grew in their countrey, keep themſelves from „ being ſubject to the Romanes. Nor the Portugales and the warlike Cantabrians, for all the „ diſtance of ſea and land between them and Rome. The Ocean, whoſe waves beating againſt
„ the ſhoar, terrifieth the inhabitants adjoyning, could not ſtay them but they paſt it: and car„ ried an army beyond the pillars of Hercules, and paſſed the tops of the Pyrenæan mountains, „ which reach unto the clouds, and ſo made all thoſe people ſubject unto them: and for all
„ that they were ſo warlike a nation, and ſo far from Rome, they left onely one legion for „ garriſon. Which of you have not heard of the multitude of the Germanes? whoſe vertue „ and mighty bodies I think you have often ſeen. For in every countrey the Romanes have „ them for captives: yet they whoſe countrey is ſo large, having hearts far bigger then their „ bodies, and ſouls that contemne death, who are more cruel then brute beaſts; yet are they „ now limited by the river Rhene, and kept in ſubjection by eight legions of Romanes: and „ thoſe that were taken were made ſlaves, and the reſt choſe rather to ſave themſelves by „ flight then fight. And you who have ſuch confidence in the walls of Jeruſalem, conſider the „ walls of Britaine; whoſe countrey though compaſſed with the Ocean, and almoſt as great „ as our whole world, the Romanes ſayling into it, have conquered, and four legions keep that „ Iſland ſo populous. What ſhould I ſay more, when the Parthians, a moſt warlike people, who „ lately reigned over ſo many nations, and abound in ſo much wealth, are now compelled to „ ſend pledges to Rome? Nay, you may ſee all the Nobility of the Eaſt, at Rome, who with „ peace ſhadow their captivity; and almoſt all the nations under the Sun trembling and „ dreading the Romane puiſſance: and will you onely warre againſt them? Do you not con-
„ ſider what befell the Carthaginians, who boaſting themſelves of that great Hannibal, ſprung „ from the noble race of the Phœnicians, at laſt were deſtroyed by Scipio? Neither could the „ Cyrenæans, who took their beginning from the Lacedemonians, nor all the race of the Mar„ maridans, which extended as far as the Deſarts (which are very ſcarce of Waters) nor the „ Syrtes, nor the Naſomonians, nor the Moors, nor the innumerable multitude of the Numi„ dians, have been able to reſiſt the power of the Romanes; who by force of arms have con„ quered the third part of the world, the nations whereof can hardly be numbred, which from „ the Sea Atlantick and Hercules pillars unto the Red ſea, containeth an infinite company of „ Æthiopians, and innumerable habitations of them: who beſides that they pay ſo much fruits
„ and corn unto the Romanes, as for eight moneths in every year will keep and ſuſtain all the „ people of Rome, do alſo pay tribute; and moreover aſſiſt them any way they can, and never „ murmure at it, as you do; and there is onely one legion left to keep them in obedience. But „ what ſhould I need to tell you of forrain examples, to ſignifie unto you the power of the Ro-

„ unto Æthiopia and rich Arabia, and bordering upon India, having under it seven hundred „ and fifty millions of people, besides the inhabitants of Alexandria (which is easie to be „ counted, by the tribute which is paid of every person by the Poul) living in their countrey, „ yet disdain not to live under the dominion of the Romanes; notwithstanding, that they have „ a great enticement to rebell, to wit, Alexandria, which is both populous and very rich, in „ length thirty furlongs, in breadth ten, and payes more tribute in a moneth, then you do in a „ whole year; and, besides their money, find all Rome with corn four moneths in the year:
„ and it is on every side compassed about either with a waste Wilderness, by which none can „ pass; or the fierce sea, which is boundless; or with great and strong rivers, or muddy and „ durty quagmires, and marish-grounds: all which little availed them to withstand the force H
„ of the Romanes. For two legions onely placed in the City, keep all the great Countrey „ Egypt, and the Nobility of Macedon in awe.

Alexandria acknowledgeth the power of the Romanes.

„ What associates will you have from some Countrey not inhabited, to aid you against the „ Romanes? For all those that at this day dwell in any place of the VVorld, that is inhabited, „ obey the Romanes. Except peradventure some of you hope for help from beyond Euphra„ tes, thinking that your countrey-men of Adiabena will help you: but they will not entangle „ themselves in these dangerous VVarres, for an unreasonable cause; or if they would consent „ to so dishoneſt a deed, the Parthians will not suffer them. For they are carefull to maintain „ their league with the Romanes, and would think it violated, if any under their dominions
„ should warre against them. It remaineth then, that you must onely trust that God will help I C
„ you; but God doth assist the Romanes: for it is unpossible that such an Empire should con„ tinue without the help of God. Consider that this contempt of religion, although you were „ to warre against far weaker then your selves, yet were it hard to be dispensed withall; and „ it may so come to pass, that that whereby you hope to make God your partaker, thereby
„ you may make him your enemy: for if you observe the custome of Sabbaths, and in them do „ nothing, it will not be hard to conquer you. For so your ancestors have made experience by „ Pompeius, who ever deferred all his enterprizes untill that day, wherein his enemies were „ idle, and made no resistance. Now if in War ye transgress your Countrey Laws, I know not „ then for what you should rebell. For truly all of you at this time are of that minde, that your „ countrey-laws will not be changed. And I pray you how will you request help at Gods hands, D
„ if wilfully ye break his Laws? All that begin War, either trust in humane riches, or divine „ succour: and they that warre, having no probability to hope for any of those, wilfully lead „ themselves into open captivity. What letteth you, every man with his own hands to butcher
„ his wife and children, and from consuming this goodly Countrey with fire? for so you shall „ gain this, not to abide the shame of a conquest. It is good, O friends, it is good, whilest yet
„ the ship is in the Haven, to foresee and provide for future tempests; and not then begin to „ fear, when you are amidst the waves and surges of the sea. They who fall into misery not „ fore-seen, are worthy to receive compassion: but they that run into wilfull calamity, de„ serve no pity, but reproach. Unless perhaps ye think that the Romanes will fight with „ you, as you will condition; and that if they overcome you they will not use you hardly, nor E „ fire and destroy this sacred City, and all the whole nation as they have done others. If ye be „ overcome, whoso escapeth unkilled can have no place of refuge: for all nations either are „ already subject unto the Romanes, or fear that they shall be shortly. So that not onely you „ shall be in danger, but also all Cities wherein any Jews remain. For there is no nation nor „ people in the whole VVorld, among whom some of your Countrey are not, who all shall be „ most cruelly put to death, if you rebell: and for the wicked counsel of a few men, all Cities „ shall flow with blood of the Jews; and no man shall be punished for killing Jews, because of „ your offence. And if the Romanes do not execute all this outrage after your rebellion, then „ think how impious a thing it is, to rebell against so milde Governours. Take compassion, if „ not of your children, and wives, yet at the least of this City, which is the mother City of all F
„ your nation. Spare these holy walls, and sacred Temple, and keep unto your selves the Law
„ and sacred things of the Temple: assure your selves that if the Romanes again overcome
„ you, they will not spare these things, seeing you were no more gratefull unto them, for pre„ serving them before. I protest before God, your holy Temple, and all the Angels of Heaven,
„ and our whole Countrey, that I have kept back no counsel, which I think profitable for you.
„ Now if you consider of those things which are profitable for you, ye shall live with me in „ peace: but if you follow your private affections, I will not be partaker of the miseries, and „ dangers, you thrust your selves into. When he had thus spoken, he wept, his sister Bernice standing by him, and by his tears mitigated a great part of their fury. Then they cried that they

Gods favour towards the Romanes.

The last argument that proveth the Jews destitute of Gods and mans help, and unapt to make War. Whilest the ship is yet in the Port, it is good to prevent the future tempest.

Agrippas prophecy of the Jews future misery.

Agrippa protesteth that he had omitted no counsel that he thought expedient for the Jews.

The year of the world, 4030. after Christs Nativity, 68.

A they meant not to bear arms againſt the Romanes and Cæſar, but againſt Florus, for the in„ jury he had done them. To this, Agrippa anſwered, But your deeds ſhew that you fight „ againſt the Romanes: for you have not paid your tribute to Cæſar, and you have burned the „ porches belonging unto Antonia; now if you would hide your rebellion, repai with ſpeed the porches, and pay your tribute: for this ſort belongeth not to Florus, nor the money.
Herewith the people were content: and aſcending into the Temple with Agrippa and Ber- nice, they began to re-edifie the porches, and the Nobility and Captains gathered the tribute in every village, and quickly brought fourty talents (for ſo much money was behinde.) And thus Agrippa appeaſed the beginning of theſe Wars. After this, he began to perſwade the people to obey Florus, till ſuch time as another were ſent to ſupply his place. Herewith the B multitude was ſo moved, that they contumelioufly reviled the King, and threw ſtones at him, and drave him out of the City. The King ſeeing that their ſedition would not be quieted, complaining of the injury done unto him, ſent the Nobility and all the Potentates to Florus, who was at Cæſarea, that he might chuſe whom he would amongſt them to gather the tribute thorow the whole Countrey. And ſo he departed into his own Kingdome.

Agrippa the King is by the people driven out of the City with ſtones.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the rebellion of the Jews begun againſt the Romanes.

C AT this time, ſome of the chiefeſt rebels, aſſembled together, ſuddenly aſſault a Caſtle called Maſſada, which at unawares they took, and killed all the Romans, and in their places put a guard of their own company. In the Temple alſo, Eleazar, ſon of the high Prieſt Ananias, a bold and deſperate young man, Captain of the Souldiers, perſwaded them who offered ſacrifices, not to offer any, but thoſe that were given by the Jews. And this was the ground and cauſe of the Warrs that enſued. For they rejected Cæſars ſacrifices, that were wont to be offered for the good of the Romanes. And although the high Prieſts and people of account requeſted them not to omit that cuſtome of ſacrificing for their Kings and Governours, yet they refuſed ſo to do, truſting greatly to their faction: all the ſtrength of the City that deſired alteration, were of D their mindes, and eſpecially Eleazar, who at that time was General as is before ſaid. Wherefore all the Potentates, high Prieſts, and chiefeſt of the Phariſees aſſembled themſelves; and perceiving into how great dangers thoſe rebels brought the City, they determined to make trial of the courage of the ſeditious people: wherefore they aſſembled them together before the brazen gate, which was in the inner part of the Temple towards the Eaſt.
„ And firſt of all, they greatly complained of their raſh and unadviſed rebellion, and that they „ ſought to ſtirre up ſo great Warrs againſt their Countrey, inveighing againſt the cauſe that „ moved them thereto, as being without reaſon: telling them that their anceſtors for the „ moſt part, adorned the Temple with the gifts of Gentiles; never refuſing the offerings of „ ſtrangers: and not onely not to have refuſed their offerings (for that were an impious fact)
E „ but alſo placed in the Temple the gift that they ſent, which were yet to be ſeen. And that „ now onely to provoke the Romanes to warre, and denounce it againſt them, they began to „ alter Religion: and beſide other dangers alſo, to make the City ſeem guilty of impiety;
„ as though it were ſuch a one, wherein none might offer ſacrifice but Jews, nor any but they, a„ dore God. If we ſhould make ſuch a Law againſt any private Perſon, he had juſt cauſe to ac-„ cuſe us of inhumanity. But now the Romanes were deſpiſed, and Cæſar himſelf accounted „ prophane: and it was to be feared, that if the Jews diſdained to accept of Cæſars offerings, Cæ-
„ ſar would hinder them from offering any: And that the City of Jeruſalem would preſently
„ be accounted as an enemy to the Empire, unleſs they preſently accepted Cæſars ſacri„ fice; and before ſuch time as they heard theſe news againſt whom this outrage was attem-
F „ pted. And having thus ſpoken, they brought forth the moſt learned amongſt the Prieſts, to recount from time to time how their anceſtors had alwaies accepted of the ſacrifices of ſtrangers.

The Jews refuſe Cæſars ſacrifices for the proſperity of the Romanes.

Againſt thoſe who refuſe forrain ſacrifice.

But none of the rebels gave eare unto any thing that was ſaid, and the Levites came not to ſerve at the Altar; as now preparing for War. When the Nobility ſaw that they could not appeaſe this ſedition, and that they themſelves ſhould firſt feele the Romanes power, they deviſed all means to pacifie the tumult, and ſend ſome as Embaſſadours unto Florus:
the chief whereof was Simon, the ſon of Ananias: other ſome were ſent to Agrippa, of which the nobleſt was Saulus, Antipas and Coſtobarus, who were alſo akinne unto the King, requeſting them both to come with an army into the City, and ſuppreſs the ſedition which was was raiſed, before it went further. Florus was glad of theſe tidings, and deſiring nothing more then War, gave no anſwer to the Embaſſadours. But Agrippa willing to ſpare both parts, as well the good as the rebels, and to preſerve the Jews for the Romanes, and the Temple for the Jews, conſidering it not meet for him to buſie himſelf in ſuch affairs, ſent 3000. horſemen to aide the people againſt the rebels. Which horſemen were of Auranitis, Batanæa and Trachon, and made Darius their Captain, and Philip, ſon of Ioachim, General of all the army. Theſe coming into the City, the Nobility, with the high Prieſts and the reſt of the people that deſired peace, received this ſuccour in good part; and occupied the higher part of the City; for the rebels kept the lower part, and the Temple: ſo that they inſtantly fought with darts and ſlings, and ſhooting of arrows; and ſometime one ruſhing upon another, ſuddenly they skirmiſhed together. The ſeditious were more valiant, but the Kings Souldiers were more skilfull in Warres; who chiefly endeavoured to get the Temple, and expell out of it thoſe who prophaned it. And the rebels with Eleazar endeavoured, beſide that which they had already, to get alſo into their hands the higher part of the City. Wherefore, during the ſpace of ſeven dayes, there continued a great conflict betwixt them, and either part kept that they had. When the celebration of the feaſt came, called Xylophoria, wherein every one carrieth Wood to the Temple, to keep a fire continually upon the Altar; the rebels would not ſuffer their enemies to do their devotion.

Xylophoria a feaſt.

Now many of the theeves, who carried Poyniards under their Coats, went amongſt the weaker multitude, & boldly followed their old practice. The Kings ſouldiers were overcome, and forced to leave the higher part of the City: and the rebels preſently coming in, ſet the Palaces of Ananias, Agrippa, and Bernice on fire, and forthwith went to the place where all charters were kept, purpoſing there to burn all bonds and obligations of debters; thereby to defraud the creditors, and ſo to joyn all the debters with their faction, and ſtir up all the poor people againſt the rich. But the keepers of theſe publike Writings fleeing, the ſeditious perſons ſet all on fire: and ſo having deſtroyed as it were the ſtrength of the City, they addreſſed themſelves againſt ſuch as reſiſted their proceedings. Some of the high Prieſts and Nobles hid themſelves in vaults; others fleeing with the Kings Souldiers into the higher Palace of the King, ſoon lockt up the doors after them, amongſt whom was Ananias the high Prieſt, and Ezechias his brother, and they who (as is before ſpoken) were ſent Embaſſadours to Agrippa: and ſo the ſeditious were ſatisfied that day with the victory, and firing of the houſes aforeſaid.

The Kings ſouldiers are overcome.

The Jews take Antonia and burn it.

The next day, which was the fifteenth of Auguſt, they aſſaulted the Caſtle Antonia: and beſieging it two dayes, they took all that guarded it and killed them; and placed in it a Garriſon of their own company. This done, they went unto the Kings Palace, whither Agrippas Souldiers were fled: and dividing their company into foure parts, they began to caſt down the walls: none of them that were within durſt come out for fear of the multitude, but went up to the turrets of the Palace, and killed all thoſe that offered to come up, and many of the theeves under the walls, with things that they caſt down. This conflict continued day and night; for the rebels thought that thoſe which were within could not hold out for want of victuals: and they within thought that the ſeditious being wearied would ſoon give over. In the mean ſeaſon, one Manahemus, the ſon of Judas of Galilæa (that moſt crafty ſubtill ſophiſter, who reviled the Jews in Cyrenius time for paying tribute, and would be ſubject to any but to God) taking with him certain Nobles, went unto Maſſada, where King Herods armory was, and breaking into it, he armed the common people and other theeves; and having them for his guard, he returned again to Jeruſalem as King: and when he was made Prince of that ſedition, he diſpoſed of the battery of the fortreſſes. But they wanted engines, neither could they openly undermine the Walls of the adverſaries, who continually caſt down darts: wherefore, they began a myne a great way off, till it came under one of the Towers which was ſupported by poſts of wood, and they ſet fire on the Wood ſupporting it, and went their way: ſo the ſupporters being conſumed with fire, the Tower preſently fell down, and there appeared a very high wall within. For thoſe within, perceiving their adverſaries intent, perhaps by the ſhaking of that Tower, preſently builded this wall to keep out the rebels between them and it. The ſeditious, verily thinking that with the fall of the Tower they ſhould be victors, when they ſaw another wall were amazed. And the Kings Souldiers were ſent unto Manahemus, and others that were chief of the rebels, requeſting them to have licence to depart. Which Manahemus onely granted to the Kings Souldiers, and thoſe of his own countrey, who preſently accepting thereof, departed, and ſo left the Romanes in great feare. For they were not able to reſiſt ſo great a multitude, and they thought it a ſhame to intreat that they might depart, thinking that it were dangerous for them, although it were granted. Wherefore leaving the lower place which was called Stratopedon, becauſe it might eaſily easily be taken, they fled into the Kings Towers, whereof one was called Hippicos, the other Phaſelus, the third Mariamme. The rebels that were with Manahemus brake preſently into the lower part that the Romanes had forſaken, and killed all that they found there, and when they had ſackt it, they ſet it on fire: And this was done the fixth day of September.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the death of Ananias the high Prieſt, Manahemus and the Romane Souldiers.

THe next day following, Ananias the high Prieſt was taken in one of the Water Conduits of the Kings Palace, where he hid himſelf, and was there kill'd with his brother Ezechias by theſe theeves: and the Rebels beſieged all the Towers round about, and kept diligent watch, leſt any of the Romanes ſhould eſcape. But Manahemus, both for his good ſucceſs in deſtroying the ſtrong holds, as alſo with the death of Ananias the high Prieſt, became proud and cruel: and thinking none ſo wiſe as himſelf, in thoſe affairs, became an intolerable tyrant. Now two of Eleazars companions roſe up and communed together, that it did not become them that rebelled againſt the Romanes (onely to recover their liberty) that they ſhould be traitors thereof to their own companions, who were of the ſame condition, and that they ſhould indure a King or Lord over them, who although he be no ſevere man, yet he was of more abject and baſe condition then they. If it were ſo, that it were expedient to have one Ruler over all the reſt, they had rather have any one then Manahemus: and being thus agreed, they ſet upon him in the Temple, where he was praying with great pompe, apparelled like a King, and having about him a guard of his friends in armour. Now when Eleazar his followers ſet upon Manahemus, the people did alſo throw ſtones at him, and ſo ſtoned him, hoping that by his death the ſedition would be extinguiſhed. The guard of Manahemus at firſt made ſome reſiſtance; but when they perceive the whole multitude againſt them, every one ſhifted for himſelf as he could, and thoſe that were taken were put to death, and they that eſcaped were afterward ſought for: onely a few of them fled to Maſſada, amongſt whom was Eleazar, the ſon of Iairus, the ſon of Manahemus kinſman, and afterward in Maſſada became a tyrant. But Manahemus fled into a place called Ophias, where he baſely hid himſelf: and being taken, he was drawn out from thence, and after many torments put to death, and with him all the Nobility that had aſſiſted him, as alſo Abſalomon, who was his onely helper. And in this matter (as I have ſaid) the people greatly helped, hoping hereby to have ſome end of that ſedition. But the Rebels did not kill Manahemus, to the end to extinguiſh ſedition, but to the intent to rob and ſpoile more freely.

The people with many intreaties beſought them to let the Romanes alone, whom they did beſiege, but they were ſo much the more earneſt againſt them: till they being no longer able to make reſiſtance, with the conſent of Metilius their Captain, and ſome other of more authority, ſent unto Eleazar, requeſting him to give them licence to depart with their lives, and leave their munition to the Jews. Who accepting their petition, ſent unto them Gorion, the ſon of Nicodemus, and Ananias the Saducee, and Judas the ſon of Jonathas, to confirme the promiſe of their lives. Which done, Metilius led away the Souldiers: and whileſt the Romanes had their weapons, none of the Rebels durſt attempt any of their treachery againſt them: but ſo ſoon as every one according to covenant laid down their ſhields and ſwords, and ſo departed miſtruſting nothing, Eleazars guard ſet upon them, and kill'd them, who neither made reſiſtance, nor any entreaty for their lives, onely putting them in minde of their promiſe and oath. So they were all ſlain ſave only Metilius, who greatly intreated for his life; and promiſing that he would become a Jew in religion, and be circumciſed, they ſpared him. Yet was this a ſmall loſs to the Romanes, who onely had then but a very few ſlain of their great and almoſt infinite army: and this ſeemed the very beginning of the Jews captivity.

When they ſaw themſelves to have given ſufficient cauſe of Wars, and too great, and that the City was now ſo filled with iniquity, that the wrath of God did hang over it, though there had been no fear of any harme to them by the Romanes, yet the whole City mourned, and was ſorrowfull, and quietly minded, lamenting as though they themſelves ſhould anſwer for the ſeditious, for that murther which was committed on the Sabbath, when it is not lawfull for the Jews to do any good work.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the great massacre of the Jews at Cæsarea, and in all Syria.

AT the same houre on the self-same day, it hapned, as it were by Gods providence, that the inhabitants of Cæsarea did massacre the Jews that dwelt among them; so that at one time above 20000. were slain, and not one Jew lett alive in all Cæsarea. For those that escaped, Florus took, and brought them forth bound unto the people. After this massacre done at Cæsarea, the whole nation of the Jews waxed mad: and dividing themselves into companies, they wasted and destroyed in short time all the borders of Syria, and the Cities thereabout, to wit, Philadelphia and Gebonitis, Gerasa, Pella and Scythopolis, and then they made incursion into Gadara, Hippon and Gaulanitis, pulling down some places, and firing othersome. And from thence they marched towards Cedasa, a City of the Tyrians, and Ptolemais, Gaba and Cæsarea: and neither Sebaste, neither Ascalon could resist them, but they also were consumed with fire. Likewise they destroyed Anthedon, with Gaza, and most places adjoyning to these Cities were sacked, to wit, the fields and villages, and a mighty slaughter was made of them that were taken in these places. The Syrians made as great a massacre of the Jews as this among them: for all the Jews inhabiting among them were murthered, not onely for an old grudge, but also for the avoiding of imminent danger. And all Syria was troubled in most grievous manner, and every City was dividing into two parts, and either parts safety consisted in this, to prevent the other in murthering them first: the daies were spent in bloudshed, and the nights in fear, worse then death it self. For though they onely pretended to destroy the Jews, yet were they drawn to suspect other nations, that followed the Jews religion; and because they were as it were neuters, the Syrians thought it not good to destroy them: and again, for their agreeing in religion with the Jews, they were constrained to hold them as enemies. Many of the contrary part, who before seemed modest, were now through avarice incited to meddle in this murther, for every one took the goods of them that were slain, and carried them to other places as conquerours. And he was most renowned that had stolen most, as having also kill'd most. There might you see in every part of the City the dead bodies of all ages unburied, old men and children, and women lying in most shamefull manner, their secret parts being uncovered. Briefly, all the Countrey was filled with exceeding great calamity, and the fear of misery to come was unspeakable.

The Jews spoile the villages, and burn the Cities of Syria.

All Syria full of miserable calamities.

And these were the conflicts between the Jews and strangers. But afterwards making incursion upon the borders of Scythopolis, the Jews there dwelling were their enemies. For the conspiring with the Citizens of Scythopolis, and preferring their own commodity and security before their kinred and consanguinity, joyned with the Gentiles against the Jews, who for all that, were suspected for their forwardness. Finally, the Scythopolites fearing that they would assault the City by night, and excuse their revolting by their great misery, they commanded all the Jews, that if they would shew themselves trusty unto the Gentiles, they with all their children should go into a wood hard by: who forthwith did as they were will'd, suspecting nothing, and the Scythopolites were quiet for two dayes after, and did nothing: But the third night they sent forth scouts to see what they were doing: who finding some of them asleep, and others not resisting, they surprized them in a moment, and killed them all, who were in number thirteen thousand, and afterward took their goods. I think it not amiss to speak of the death of Simon, who was the Son of Saul, a man of regard: he was a man of great courage, and strength of body, both which he used to the great hurt of his own nation: for he daily killed many Jews, who dwelt near unto Scythopolis, and he alone often scattered divers companies, and put whole armies to flight, who had an end worthy of his deeds, and murthering of his countrey-men. For when the Scythopolites had compassed the wood about, so that none could escape their hands, they killed the Jews in every part thereof. Simon drawing his Sword, made no resistance to any of his enemies: for he saw that it was bootless to strive against such a multitude. Then pitifully crying out, I receive, O Scythopolites, a worthy reward for that which I have done, who to shew my fidelity towards you, have kill'd so many of mine own countrey-men: and it is a just plague that a strange nation should be false to us, who impiously forsook our own brethren. I will do therefore as a prophane person, killing my self with my own hands, and this death will be a sufficient punishment for my offences, and a full argument of my magnanimity, that none of my enemies may boast of my death, nor insult over me. When he had thus said, he beheld all his family

When he had ſlain all his kindred, himſelf remaining alive, he ſtretcht forth his arme that they might ſee what he would do, and thruſt his ſword into his own body up to the hilts. A young man, who for his magnanimity and ſtrength of body, was worthy to be pitied, had yet a juſt and deſerved end for truſting forrain nations.

CHAP. XX.

Of another grievous Slaughter of the Jews.

After this ſo great a maſſacre of the Jews in Scythopolis, other Cities alſo did riſe againſt them, where they inhabited, and 2000. and 500. were ſlain at Aſcalon, and 2000. at Ptolomais, and the Tyrians kill'd divers, and kept many in priſon: Likewiſe, they of Gadara and Hippon ſlew the moſt valiant, and thoſe of leaſt courage they caſt into priſon. Alſo all other Cities, who either feared or hated the Jews roſe up againſt them. Onely they of Antiochia, Sidonia and Apamia, ſpared them that dwelt with them, and neither kill'd nor impriſoned any of them: perhaps they ſtood in no fear of them if they ſhould have riſen, becauſe their City was ſo populous: yet I think they ſpared them onely for pity ſake, becauſe they ſaw they were quiet, and not ſeditious. The inhabitants alſo of Geraſa did no harme to the Jews amongſt them; but when they deſired to depart, they conducted them ſafely to the end of their borders. In the Kingdome alſo of Agrippa much cruelty was ſhewed againſt the Jews; for he being gone to Ceſtius Gallus at Antiochia, left the rule of his Conntrey to one of his friends named Varus, kinſman to King Sohemus; and there came unto him 70 of the chief Nobility of the countrey Batanæa, requeſting a garriſon to repreſs thoſe that ſhould attempt rebellion amongſt them. Varus ſent certain of the Kings Souldiers armed, and kill'd them all as they were coming to him. But he did this impiety without Agrippa his conſent, onely for avarice: and as it were emboldned by this fact, he ruinated the whole Realme, ſtill continuing ſuch cruelty and impiety againſt his nation, till ſuch time as Agrippa underſtood thereof, who, for Sohemus ſake, durſt not put him to death, but diſpoſſeſſed him of his place. In the mean while the Rebels took the fort called Cyprus, which is ſituate above Jericho, and after they had kill'd the garriſon, they deſtroyed the fortreſs. At the ſame time a multitude of Jews laid ſiege before the Caſtle of Maheron, and perſwaded the Souldiers left in garriſon, to yeeld the Caſtle: who, fearing that if they denied they ſhould be compelled thereto, delivered it unto them; upon condition, that they might quietly depart: and they of Macherunt placed a ſtrong guard within it.

CHAP. XXI.

How the Jews were ſlain at Alexandria.

The Citizens of Alexandria had alwayes a quarrel againſt the Jews that lived with them, ſince the time that that famous Alexander uſed their help againſt the Ægyptians, and therefore permitted them to inhabit in Alexandria, and to have the ſame priviledges that the reſt of the Citizens had. And this honour was alſo continued with them unto the time of the ſucceſſors and heirs of Alexander: who alſo gave them a certain place in the City to dwell in, that there they might live more commodiouſly. The Gentiles having nothing to do among them, permitted them alſo to call themſelves Macedonions. And afterward, when Egypt was brought under the rule of the Romanes, neither Cæſar, nor any one elſe, did diminiſh the Jews dignity in that place which Alexander had given them. So that now there were daily conflicts between them and the Greeks: and although the Judges on both parts ſtill puniſht them that were in fault, yet the ſedition more and more encreaſed; and when all Cities elſe were filled with troubles, there the tumult was more vehement. For when the Alexandrians had called together the people to determine of an Embaſſage to Nero, certain Jews mingled themſelves amongſt the Greeks, and ſo went into the Amphitheater: who being eſpied by their adverſaries, the Greeks cried out, that the Jews were enemies, and came as ſpies, and ſo laid violent hands upon them. Some of them fled, onely three of them were taken by the Greeks, whom they drew to a place to burn them alive. All the Jews of the City came to ſuccour them, and firſt they threw ſtones at them, and then taking fire-brands, they ran in a rage into the Amphitheater, theater, and threatned to burn all the people there assembled: which they had done, if Tiberius Alexander Governor of the city had not appeased their fury; who did not at first use force of arms against them, but sent their nobility to perswade them to cease, and not to incite the Romane army against them. But the seditious Jews refused this admonition, and mocked Tiberius: who seeing that they would not otherwise be appeased, sent two legions of armed Romanes against them which were in the City, and with them 5000. other Souldiers, who by chance came out of Lybia to this massacre of the Jews: and Tiberius gave them charge not onely to kill them, but also to fire their houses, and take their goods. The Souldiers presently went into the place called Delta (for there the Jews were gathered together) and did as they were commanded, and not without bloudy victory. For the Jews, gathering themselves together, put those amongst them that were best armed in the forefront, who held out for a long time; but when they began to flee, they were massacred like beasts, and some of them were killed in the field, some were burned in their houses, the Romanes first taking what they found, neither sparing infants nor old men, but killing all ages. So that all that place flowed with bloud, for there were slain 50000. Jews: and all the rest had been extinguished, had not Alexander (moved to compassion by their intreaties) commanded the Souldiers to leave off; who being obedient unto him, presently departed: but the people of Alexandria were hardly withdrawn from that massacre, because of the hatred which they had conceived against the Jews: and with much adoe were withheld from tyrannizing over the dead bodies. And this befell the Jews of Alexandria.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the massacre of the Jews by Cestius Gallus.

Huge companies of the Romanes.

Cestius Gallus now thought it time to bestirre himself, for as much as the Jews were now hated every where: and taking with him the twelve whole legions out of Antiochia, 2000. chosen footmen, and foure companies of horsemen out of every one of the other legions: and with them the Kings forces that came to help him, to wit, 2000. horsemen of Antiochia, 3000. foot all bowmen, and 3000. footmen sent by Agrippa, a thousand horse, and 4000. which Sohemus brought, whereof the third part were horse, the rest foot, and for the most part bowmen; he went towards Ptolemais: and many joyned themselves to them out of every City, who, though they were not so skilfull in Warre as the Romanes, yet their hatred was more then theirs. Agrippa himself was there with Cestius, being ruler of those he brought. There Cestius taking a part of the army, went to Zabulon (which is the strongest City of Galilæa, called also Andron, and parts the borders of the Jews from Ptolomais) and when he found it desolate (for the inhabitants thereof fled into the mountains) who left it full of all riches; giving licence to the Souldiers to sack it, he afterwards set it on fire, although he admired the beauty thereof (for it was built like Tyre and Sidon, and Berytum) and after spoiled all the territories about it. Likewise, when he had burnt all the villages thereabout, he returned to Ptolemais. The Syrians, and especially those of Beryth, staid still behind to get booties: which when the Jews understood, and that Cestius departed, they took courage, and came and set upon them, and kill'd of them 2000. In the mean while Cestius departed from Ptolemais, and went to Cæsarea, and sent part of his army to Joppe, commanding them to keep the Town, if they could get it: and if the Townsmen made any resistance, that then they should stay till he came with the rest of the army. Some of them went by sea, some by land, by which means they did easily take Joppe: so that the people thereof had neither time to flee, nor to prepare themselves to fight; and setting on them, they killed all men with their families: and thus sacking the Town, they set it on fire, and there were slain 8000. and 40. In like manner he sent part of his horsemen to Narbatena in the Toparchy near Samaria, who spoiled the Countrey, kill'd a great number of the inhabitants, rob'd and burnt the villages, and carried away a great booty with them.

Of Cestius his battel against Jerusalem.

Sephoris and other cities of Galilee do friendly entertain the Romanes.

HE sent also Cæsennius Gallus, General of the twelfth legion, into Galilee, and gave him as great an army as he thought sufficient to conquer that nation, whom the strongest City of Galilee called Sephoris courteously entertained, and other Cities followed their example.

example. They that were ſeditious and gave themſelves to robbing, fled into the Mountain which is ſituate in the midſt of Galilee againſt Sephoris, called Aſamon: theſe Gallus encountred with his Army; who, ſo long as they kept the higher part of the Mountain, eaſily reſiſted the Romans, and killed above 200 of them: but when they ſaw the Romans had occupied a higher place then that wherein they kept, they eaſily were overcome: for not being Armed, they could not ſtand out, and if they ſhould have fled, they could not have eſcaped the Horſmen, ſo that only a few hid themſelves in difficult places, and above 2000 of them were ſlain. Gallus perceiving all Galilee in peace, and not minded to revolt, returned with his Companies unto Cæſarea, and Ceſtius with his whole Army went to Antipatris: where underſtanding that a great Company of Jews were gathered together in the Tower called Aphec, he ſent ſome before to ſkirmiſh with them: but the Jews would not abide battel, and the Souldiers burned their Tents, and the Villages adjoyning. Ceſtius went from thence to Lydda, and found the City deſolate, for all the people were gone unto Jeruſalem, becauſe of the feaſt of Tabernacles: and when he had killed fifty perſons whom he found there, he fired the Town, and went no further: and going by Bethoron, he pitched his Tent in Gabaus, which is fifty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem. When the Jews ſaw themſelves in danger, they left the ſolemnity, and prepared themſelves for War: and having a great multitude, they went to fight, obſerving no order, altogether with indiſcreet Cries, not regarding the Sabbath, which they hold in great eſtimation: and the ſame fury that made them leave their devotion, made them alſo victorious in that battel; for they aſſaulted the Romans with ſuch a courage, that they brake their battel array: and killing all that reſiſted, they preſſed into the midſt thereof: and if a freſh ſupply both of Horſe and Foot had not come in time, all Ceſtius Army had been in great danger. So that there were ſlain five hundred and fifty Roman Souldiers, and four hundred of them were Foot, and the reſt were Horſmen, but of the Jews but two and twenty. The moſt valiant in this Combat were Monobazus and Cenedæus Kinſmen to King Monobazus of Adiabena, and next to them Paraides Niger, and Silas a Babylonian, who fled unto the Jews from King Agrippa, whom he had lately ſerved: and ſo the Jews being repulſed, returned into Jeruſalem; and Simon the Son of Giora invaded the Romans, as they were returning towards Bethoron, and ſlew many of the Rereward, and took many Carts, and much Baggage withal, which he brought into the City. Ceſtius ſtaied three Days in the Field, and the Jews kept the high places, eſpying which way he went, purpoſing not to be quiet if the Romans departed.

Of the Siege of Jeruſalem by Ceſtius, and of the Maſſacre.

Agrippa perceiving the Romans to be in a greater danger, for that all the Mountains were covered with infinite numbers of the Jews, he purpoſed to try, if through few words he could perſwade them to deſiſt from War; or if any refuſed, to receive thoſe that were willing. Wherefore he ſent unto them Borcæus and Phœbus, whom they well knew, aſſuring and promiſing them pardon from Ceſtius, and from the Romans, of all that they had already done, if they would now lay down their Arms, and join with them. But the Rebels fearing that all the multitude, in hope of ſafety, would join with Agrippa, determined to kill the Legats, and ſlew Phœbus before he ſpake any word, and Borcæus being wounded, eſcaped. But the people were angry hereat, and with Stones and Clubs drave them into the Town that were the Authors of this fact. Ceſtius perceiving them at odds amongſt themſelves, thought that he had now a fit opportunity to aſſault them, and ſo came upon them with his whole Army: and putting them to flight he purſued them unto Jeruſalem. And when he had pitched his Tents in the place called Scopus, he departed ſeven furlongs from the City, and did nothing againſt the City for three daies ſpace; perhaps hoping that they within would relent: and then ſending a great many Souldiers into the Villages adjoyning to fetch Corn, the fourth day, which was the thirteenth of October, he came againſt the City with his Army in battel array. The people of the Jews were kept in awe by the Rebels, who terrified by the Roman Diſcipline, forſook the outmoſt parts of the City, and fled into the innermoſt part of the Temple. Ceſtius paſſing Bethezа, burned Cænopolis, and the new Market-place, and coming unto the higher part of the City, he pitched his Tent neer the King's Palace: and if at that time he had violently iſſued in at the Walls, he had taken the City, and ended the Wars. Jews. In the mean time many of the chiefeſt among the Jews, and Ananus the Son of Jonathas, called Ceſtius, as though they would have opened him the Gates: but he was angry and ſcarce truſted them, till at laſt they delaied the time ſo long, that the Rebels perceived this Treaſon, and caſt Ananus down the Wall, and with ſtones drave his complices into their houſes. Which done, they retired themſelves into the Towers, from whence they beat back thoſe that ſcaled the Walls. The Romans for five dayes ſpace aſſaulted the Walls on every ſide, but all in vain; and the ſixth day, Ceſtius with many choſen Souldiers and Bowmen aſſaulted the Temple on the North ſide. The Jews valiantly made reſiſtance out of the porches, and often repulſed the Romans approaching the Walls: yet at laſt they, with the multitude of their adverſaries darts, were forced to give back. Then the Romans that went before, having their ſhields upon their heads, leaned againſt the Wall, and they in the ſecond place held their ſhields againſt theirs in the firſt, and ſo in order until the laſt, thereby making as it were a covering as the Romans call it, or defence, that all their ſhot and darts could do them no harm; ſo that the Souldiers did ſafely undermine the Walls, and attempted to fire the Gates of the Temple.

Divers Jews call for Ceſtius as if they intended to open their Gates unto him.

The Romans cover themſelves with their Shields, and undermine the Walls, and burn the Temple-Gates.

Now the ſeditious people were hereat greatly amazed, and many fled out of the City, as though it would preſently be taken. And the good were hereby encouraged, as much as the Rebels were diſmaied, and came unto the Gates to open unto Ceſtius, who had well deſerved at their hands. And truly if he had but a little longer continued the ſiege, he had taken the City. But I think that God being angry with the wicked, would not ſuffer the Wars to be ended at that time: for Ceſtius neither regarding the good will of the people, nor the deſperation of the Rebels, removed his Army from thence; and having received no loſs, very unadviſedly departed from the City: at whoſe unlooked for flight, the Rebels took heart; and making after him, they killed the Horſmen and Footmen that came laſt. And then Ceſtius went to the Tents which he had fortified in Scopion. The next day he went further into the Countrey; whereby he more encouraged the Rebels, who following him, killed many of his Rereward. Afterward, either end of the Army being well ſtrengthned, the Jews aſſaulted them that were behind, and the laſt durſt not caſt any darts againſt them, who wounded them on their backs, thinking that an infinite multitude had followed them: and they were not able to reſiſt them that aſſaulted them on each ſide, being as it were heavy, and not daring to break their order; on the contrary ſeeing the Jews ſo active, and apt to ſkip to and fro: ſo that the Romans endured much harm at the hands of their Enemies, and did them none; and thus were they beaten all the way along, and many of them killed, amongſt whom was Priſcus Captain of the ſixth Legion, and Longinus the Tribune, and Aemelius Jucundus Captain of a Troop of Horſmen. And ſo with much ado, they came unto Gabio; where they firſt pitcht their Tents, caſting away much of their baggage, which might any way hinder them. Ceſtius ſtaied there two days, doubtful what to do: the third day he perceived his Enemies to be encreaſed, and all places about to be filled with Jews: whereby he ſaw that his ſlow haſt was to his diſadvantage, and the number of his Enemies would ſtill increaſe, if he made any longer abode there. Wherefore that he might flie ſpeedily, he cauſed the Souldiers to caſt away all thoſe things that might any ways be a hindrance unto them, and killed their Mules and Aſſes, and Cattel, ſaving only thoſe that bare munition: fearing that if he ſhould not deſtroy them, the Jews might make uſe of them againſt him, and ſo he led the Army toward Bethoron. The Jews in large paſſages little moleſted his Army: but when they were to paſs a ſtreight, then they killed them of the Rereward, and thruſt otherſome down into the Valley, and all the army of the Jews were ſpred upon the eminent places, whereby the army was to paſs, expecting to welcom them with their Arrows. Where the Footmen amazed, and bethinking how to help themſelves, the Horſmen were brought into great danger: for they could not keep their ranks for darts and arrows, neither could they go to hurt their enemies, the aſcent unto the top of the Mountains was ſo ſteep: and they were compaſſed on each ſide with Rocks and deep Vallies, ſo that if any went out of the way, he fell down and was killed, inſomuch as there was no way to flie nor to reſiſt. Now not knowing what to do, they began to weep, and cry out as men in deſperation: and the Jews anſwered them with an encouraging one another to play the men, being glad of their enemies adverſity, and cruelly bent againſt them: and all the Army of Ceſtius had there periſhed, had not the night come on and helped them, which by her darkneſs gave leaſure to the Romans to flie into Bethoron. In the mean-while, the Jews kept all the places thereabouts beſieged, and guarded the paſſages. Ceſtius ſeeing it not poſſible to march openly, thought it beſt to flie, and choſe almoſt 400 of his ſtrongeſt Souldiers, and ſet them in very eminent places, commanding them that when they were aloft, they ſhould cry as they did before, that the Jews might think that the

In the morning the Jews perceiving the Romans to be fled, aſſaulted the 400. whereby they were deceived, and preſently killing them with Darts, forthwith they followed Ceſtius: who having fled a great way in the night, made more haſt the next day, ſo that the Souldiers for fear, left their Arms and Inſtruments to beat down the Walls, and Slings, and much other munition; which the Jews taking, after uſed againſt them. And thus they followed the Romans unto Antipatris: and ſeeing they could not overtake them, they returned, bringing with them the Warlike Inſtruments, and rifling thoſe that were ſlain, and taking whatſoever the Romans had left behind; and ſo ſinging Songs of Victory, they returned unto B Jeruſalem, having loſt very few of their Company, and ſlain 5000 and 300 and 80 of the Footmen of the Romans, and their helpers; and 900 and 80 Horſemen. And this was done upon the eighth day of October, and in the twelfth year of the Reign of Nero.

CHAP. XXV.

Of the Cruelty of thoſe of Damaſcus againſt the Jews, and of Joſephs affairs in Galilee.

C INcontinently after Ceſtius adverſe Fortune, many of the chiefeſt amongſt the Jews daily fled and forſook the City, as a ſhip preſently ready to ſink. Coſtobarus and Saul two Brethren, and Philip the Son of Joachim General of Agrippas Army, fled out of the City and yielded themſelves unto Ceſtius. As for Antipas, who was alſo beſieged with them in the Kings Palace, he would not flie with the reſt, and ſo was killed by the Rebels. But Ceſtius ſent Saul, and the reſt of his Company into Achaia unto Nero, to let him underſtand the cauſe of their flight, and to ſhew how Florus had cauſed all theſe Wars: for ſo he hoped that Nero would bend his wrath againſt Florus, and quit him from danger. Then the people of Damaſcus underſtanding the death of the Romans, deviſed how to deſtroy the Jews which inhabited amongſt them: and they thought it was eaſie to be accompliſhed, for that the Jews were already aſſembled in the Common Baths, for fear of ſome ſuch matD ter: yet they miſtruſted their Women, who all, except a few, were Jews in Religion. Wherefore they took great heed to conceal their intent from them: and ſo aſſaulting the Jews altogether in a narrow place, and having nothing to defend them, they put them all to the Sword, who were in number ten thouſand. The Rebels that ſo purſued Ceſtius, returned into Jeruſalem, and ceaſed not to joyn all unto them that favoured the Romans, either by force or by flattery; and aſſembling themſelves in the Temple, they determined to chooſe a greater number of Captains. Wherefore Joſeph the Son of Gorion, and Ananus the high Prieſt, were appointed Rulers of the City, and eſpecially to ſee the Walls thereof repaired: Eleazar the Son of Simon was put in no Authority, notwithſtanding that he had in his Cuſtody all preys and ſpoils taken from the Romans, and Ceſtius his money, and a great
E part of the publick treaſure, becauſe they perceived him through Authority to wax proud, and his attendants become ſtately. Yet in time Eleazar by money and craft perſwaded the people to obey him in all things. And they requeſted other Captains to be ſent into Idumæa, who were Jeſus the Son of Sapphas, and Eleazar the Son of the new high Prieſt: and they commanded Niger who was Born beyond Jordan, to obey theſe Captains, who was therefore called Peraides, and was then Governour of Idumæa. And they neglected not to do the like by other Regions: for Joſeph the Son of Simon was ſent to Jericho and Manaſſes beyond the River, and John the Eſſean to Tamna, every one to Rule the Government of his Countrey as a Toparchy; Lydda, Joppe, and Amaus, were annexed to John the Eſſean, and John F the Son of Ananias was appointed Governour of Gophnitis and Acrabatena. And Joſeph the Son of Matthias was made Ruler over both Galilees, unto which was joyned Gamala the ſtrongeſt City in that Coaſt.

As for other Governours, every one diſcharged his place according to his wiſdom and dexterity. When Joſeph came to Galilee, which was committed to his protection, his firſt care was to get the good will of the Inhabitants, knowing that it might much profit him, although in other matters he had offended. Then conſidering that he ſhould have moſt mighty and aſſured Friends, if he made them partakers of his Authority; and likewiſe get the love of the common people, if he did eſteem of thoſe things which they ſhould think well of; He choſe ſeventy of the moſt ancient wiſe men amongſt them, and made them Rulers over all Galilee, and elected ſeven Judges over the leſſer Towns to judge inferiour matters: for he reſerved all great affairs and Criminal Cauſes to his own hearing. Moreover, having ordained a form of justice that those seventy should follow, he took counsel how to work their outward security: And being assured that the Romans would come into Galilee, he compassed those places with strong Walls that were fit for his purpose, to wit, Jotapata, Bersabea, Selamis, Pereccho, Japha, and Sigoph, with the Mountain Itaburium, Tarichea, and Tiberias: Moreover, he fortified the Caves near the Lake Genesar, which is in lower Galilee, and in high Galilee Petra, which is also called Acheberon, and Seph, Jamnith, and Mero; in Gaulanites, also Seleucia, and Soganes, and Gamala; he only permitted them of Sephoris to build their own Walls, because he perceived them to be rich and prone to War of themselves. Likewise John the Son of Levias, at Josephs command, built the Wall of Giscala himself alone; but in all other places that were fortified, Joseph put to his helping hand, & told how they should be done. He levied also an Army of an hundred thousand, who were all young men, whom he Armed with old Armour, which he gathered from all parts of the Countrey: and considering that the Roman Army was invincible, for that they were all obedient unto their rulers, and expert in War, he could not instruct them in martial discipline, other occasions forcing him to the contrary: but calling to mind that the multitude of Rulers made obedience, he ordained many Captains, and constituted divers sorts of Souldiers, as the Romans used to do; making some Governours of ten, other some over a hundred, and others over a thousand; and appointed likewise Rulers over them. He taught them also how to give the sign of War, and how to sound the trumpet, both to call them to combate, and to retire: how to march in length, and cast in a ring, and alwayes to succour them that were most in danger: and to be short, he taught them whatsoever might either encourage them, or make them active: but especially he exercised them in feats of Arms, imitating in particular the order of the Romanes, often telling them that they were to fight with men, who for strength of body and courage passed all nations of the World. Also he told them that hereby he should perceive whether they would be obedient in War, if now they abstained from such things as were usual to Souldiers, to wit, robbing and spoiling their Country-men, and crafty and deceitful dealing; nor think the spoil of those with whom they conversed, to be their own gain: for those Wars had alwaies best success, where the Souldiers carried good Consciences; and they that were bad, should not only have men, but God also for their Enemy. And after this manner he daily exhorted them, and now he had appointed how many were to fight. For 60000 Footmen, and 200 and 50 Horsmen, and beside these 4000 and 500 whom he hired, were alwayes in readiness, and 600 chosen men to guard his own person. And the hirelings only excepted, the rest of the Souldiers were provided for, by the Cities: for every City before mentioned, sent one half of their men for Souldiers; and the other half they kept to provide Victuals for them, that one part being employed in War, the other might do such business as the City required.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of Josephs danger and escape, and of the malice of John of Giscala.

John a notable dissembler, and a thirsty murtherer under hope of gain.

WHilest Joseph thus ordered the Estate of Galilee, there arose a Traitor Born in Giscala, the Son of Levias, whose name was John, a most subtle and deceitful Treacher, who by vile means was now become the richest man in that Countrey, being before very poor; whereby for a while he was hindred from putting his Villanies in practice: who could lye at his pleasure, and easily give credit unto lies; who thought deceit to be a vertue, which he used even towards his dearest Friends; and a great Counterfeiter of humanity: yet for the hope of gain became a cruel Murtherer. He alwayes aimed at high matters, with an aspiring mind, and at first nourished his hope with small Villanies. For first he was a Thief after his own manner, and lived in woods and solitary places; at last he got him a Company of audacious people like to himself, at first small, but afterward he greatly increased it. He also had a great care to choose no idle persons, but such as were strong of body, valiant of mind, and skillful in martial affairs: of these he gathered four hundred, the most of them out of Tyre, and the Villages thereabout: and with them he wasted all Galilee, and put many in mind of the miserable Wars to come. This man a long time before desired to be Governour of the Army, and aspired to greater matters, only the want of money hindred him; and perceiving that Joseph took delight in his industry, he perswaded him to suffer him to build the Walls of that place where he was Born, which was now desolate; and to accomplish this, he gathered great sums of money of the richer sort. Then he devised another shift; for having perswaded the Jews that were dispersed over all Syria, that

A that they ſhould uſe no Oyl, ſave only that which was made by their own nation, he cauſed divers Veſſels of Oyl to be brought unto the confines of Galilee, and buying four Barrels for a piece of Tyrian money (which amounted unto four Attique groats) he ſold them again unto the Syrian Jews, the half of one Barrel, for as much as all four coſt him. And for that Galilee abounded with Oyls, and eſpecially at that time, he conveighed it to ſuch places where there was great want, and none was brought but by himſelf. By this means he gathered an infinite maſs of money, which preſently he turned to his prejudice, who had given him licence ſo to get it. And thinking that if he could depoſe Joſeph, that then he might come to be Ruler over Galilee, he commanded his followers to rob and ſpoil more then B they did before, and ſo to trouble the Countrey, that he might either kill the Governour, if he ſought to redreſs it at unawares; or if he let all alone, to accuſe him of cowardize to the people for ſo doing. Moreover, he had already given out ſpeeches, that Joſeph went about to betray Galilee to the Romans, and deviſed many things to this effect to work Joſephs overthrow. It hapned that at that time, ſome of the village of Dabarita, who watched in the field, ſet upon Ptolomæus, who was factor for Agrippa, and his ſiſter Bernice, and ſpoiled them of all Carriage, wherein was much coſtly Apparel, and many ſilver Cups, and ſix hundred pieces of Gold. And for that they could not do this ſecretly, they brought all the whole booty to Joſeph at Tarichea: who reproving them for offering violence unto the Kings Servants, commanded the things to be kept at the houſe of Æneas, who was one of the richeſt C men in the town, who ſhould reſtore them to the owner when time ſerved: wherein thinking to do himſelf great good, he wrought himſelf much danger. For the thieves being offended that they received no part thereof, and ſeeing that Joſeph would reſtore to Agrippa and his ſiſter Bernice that which they had laboured to get, they went round about the Villages in the night, and ſpred this falſe report in every place, that Joſeph was a Traitor to his Countrey, and with the ſame rumour filled the Cities thereabout. So that early in the next Morning, 10000 Armed men came againſt Joſeph. Finally, the multitude aſſembling themſelves together in the Theater at Tarichea, the greateſt part cried out in their choler and fury, that the Traitor might be deſpoſed, otherſome that he might be burned, and John himſelf incited many, and with him one Jeſus the Son of Sapphias, who at that time was GoD vernour of Tiberias. All the Friends of Joſeph and his guard being terrified with ſuch a multitude, fled, four only excepted. But Joſeph in the mean while was aſleep: and had he ſlept a little longer, they had ſet his houſe on fire. Whereupon he aroſe, and the four that remained with him, counſelled him to flie: but he not diſmaied in that he was left alone, nor for that ſo great a multitude came againſt him, went boldly towards them with his Garment all torn, and aſhes upon his head, holding his hands behind him, and his Sword upon his neck. Whereat they that bare him good will, eſpecially the people of Tarichea, were moved to compaſſion: but the Countrey people and they whom he overlaid with taxes and tributes, curſed him; and bad him bring forth the publick treaſure, and confeſs his Treaſon: for becauſe of the attire and habit he came in, they thought he would not have denied any thing E whereof he was accuſed, and that he came ſo to move them to compaſſion, and ſo to obtain pardon for his offence. This his humility ſtood him in good ſtead, for hereby thoſe that before were inraged againſt him, now began one to fall out with another in his behalf, when he promiſed to confeſs the whole matter: and then obtaining licence to ſpeak, he ſaid: "I was never minded to ſend back that money to Agrippa, nor to keep it unto my "private uſe. For (God forbid) that I ſhould ever hold him for my friend, who is your "open Enemy, or that I ſhould ſo ſeek mine own profit, that I ſhould thereby damnifie "you all. But (O ye men of Tarichea) for as much as I perceived that your City eſpeci- "ally had greateſt need to be fortified, and that you were not able to build the Walls, and "for that I feared the people of Tiberias, and others adjoyning, who ſtill gaped after this "prey, and wealth that was taken from Agrippa; I determined to get thoſe ſpoils for you "to re-edifie your Walls. If ye miſlike this, I will bring out the treaſure, and give it to be "divided amongſt you: but if you like thereof, then it appeareth how you moleſt him "who is your Benefactor.

This ſpeech of his well pleaſed the people of Tarichea, and diſpleaſed them of Tiberias; ſo that they breathed out threatnings againſt him. Thus they both left Joſeph, and fought one againſt another. He now having many partakers (for the people of Tarichea were almoſt fourty thouſand) ſpake more boldly unto the multitude, and rebuked their temerity; affirming that it was neceſſary to ſtrengthen Tarichea with that preſent money, and that he would alſo provide to ſtrengthen other Cities, and that they ſhould not want money, if they would agree and conſpire together againſt them, from whom they ſhould take it; and not to offer violence unto him, who would endeavour to get it. So the reſt of the multitude being deceived, though they were angry, yet departed; and 2000 armed men offered to ſet upon him: but he being already retired into his houſe, they ſtood without, threatning him. Wherefore Joſeph uſed another device likewiſe to repreſs theſe: and getting up into the top of the houſe, he beckned unto them with his hand to keep ſilence; and then ſaid, that he was ignorant what they requeſted at his hands: for he could not hear one for another, becauſe their voices were confounded through the multitude; but if they would ſend ſome into the houſe to talk friendly with him, he would do whatſoever they requeſted. The nobles and magiſtrates hearing this, preſently went into the houſe: whom, when he had led into the innermoſt part of the houſe, having ſhut the doors, he cauſed to be beaten, ſo long till that all their bowels appeared: the doors in the mean time being made faſt, the people ſtaied before the houſe, thinking that the cauſe of their long tarrying was, to alledge reaſons to and fro; and preſently Joſeph opening the doors, put them forth amongſt the people all bloudy as they were: whereat they were ſo terrified, that leaving their weapons behind them they ran away. Hereat John took occaſion to encreaſe his envy; and having ill ſucceſs in this policy, he ſtill attempted other plots to bring Joſeph in danger: and counterfeiting himſelf ſick, he requeſted Joſeph to permit him to go to Tiberias, and uſe the hot baths for to recover his health. But Joſeph not having yet perceived his treaſon, wrote letters in his behalf to the governour of the town, willing him to be Johns Hoſt, and to let him want nothing that he needed: which he had in good ſort. And two daies after his arrival there, he went about the buſineſs which he came to effect, and enticed ſome with money, others with flatteries, to revolt from Joſeph. Silas whom Joſeph had made governour of the City underſtanding this, he preſently by letters gave notice thereof to Joſeph: who receiving them in the night, went to Tiberias, and was there early in the morning, and the reſt of the multitude came out to meet him: but John notwithſtanding he judged that he came againſt him, yet ſtill he counterfeited himſelf ſick in bed, and ſent a man of his acquaintance to excuſe his abſence for not coming to meet Joſeph. Then Joſeph aſſembled the Tiberians together in a place to ſpeak unto them, concerning that which was written unto him: and John ſent armed men thither with commandment to kill Joſeph. The people perceiving them to draw their ſwords, cried out: and Joſeph at their cry looking about him, and perceiving their ſwords even almoſt at his throat, he leapt down a little hill upon the ſhore, which was ſix cubits high, upon which he ſtood to ſpeak unto the people: and going into a boat with two of his guard which he found there, he went into the midſt of the lake, and preſently his guard taking their weapons aſſaulted the traitors. Joſeph fearing that a great conflict would enſue, and ſo the whole City for a few mens fault be deſtroyed, ſent to his Souldiers, charging them only to work their own ſafety and no more, and to kill none, nor reprove any for that wicked fact: who forthwith obeying his command, ceaſed from fight.

But they that inhabited about the City, and heard of the treaſon, and by whom it was attempted, armed themſelves and came againſt John: but he before they came, fled to Giſcala where he was born. In the mean while, all Galilee came and joined with Joſeph, and there were many thouſands of armed men gathered together, affirming that they came againſt John, and to fire that City which had received him. Joſeph thanked them for their good will, ſaying that he had rather conquer his enemies by policy, then by fire and ſword; and therefore requeſted them to be content. He alſo publiſhed an edict, wherein he declared that all thoſe that had rebelled with John, and did not forſake him within 5 daies next following, ſhould loſe all their livings, and their manſions ſhould be ſacked, and their houſes and family ſet on fire. Hereupon three thouſand preſently forſook John, and came and caſt down their weapons before Joſephs feet, proſtrating themſelves before him: ſo that there only remained with John but one thouſand of fugitive Syrians. By whom John being aſſiſted, again went ſecretly to work, having ſo ill ſucceſs by plain dealing: and ſo privily ſent meſſengers to Jeruſalem, who told that Joſeph had gathered a great army, and that except he were quickly prevented, he would come and uſurp the dominion over that mother City. But the people underſtanding before of Johns hatred, did not regard it: yet divers rich men and magiſtrates who envied Joſeph, ſecretly ſent money unto John, to hire Souldiers that were ſtrangers, that he might war againſt Joſeph; and determined amongſt them, to diſplace him: and thinking that their decree was not ſufficient to effect it, they ſent moreover five hundred and four thouſand armed men, and four of their principal nobility amongſt them, to wit Joazar the Lawyer, and Ananias the Sadducee, and Simon and Judas the Sons of Jonathas, all very eloquent and learned men, to withdraw the peoples minds from Joſeph; giving them charge, that if he of his own accord came unto them, that then they ſhould permit him to ſpeak

Tiberias and Sephoris were recovered by Joſeph.

NOw John, for fear of Joſeph, kept himſelf within the Walls of Giſcala: and a few dayes after Tiberias revolted again, the inhabitants calling in Agrippa, who came not at the day appointed, and yet a few Roman Souldiers ſhewing themſelves, they revolted from Joſeph. Joſeph underſtanding this at Tarichea, having ſent his Souldiers to fetch Corn, thought it not good to go alone againſt the Rebels, neither did he think it beſt to delay the time any longer, fearing that whileſt he delayed, King Agrippa would come and poſſeſs the town; for the next day, becauſe it was the Sabbath, he could do nothing.

Tiberias is recovered by Joſeph, and ſaved by a Stratagem.

C Wherefore he thought to overcome the Rebels by policy, and ſo he commanded the Gates of Tarichea to be kept ſhut, that his intent might not be revealed unto them of Tiberias. Then taking all the Boats that were in the Lake, in number two hundred and thirty, and in every one of them four Saylers, he haſtily ſailed to Tiberias: and when he came near the City, yet ſo far off, that the Inhabitants thereof could not eaſily deſcry him, he left all the Boats upon the water empty, and taking only ſeven of his guard with him, unarmed, he went near unto the City, that they might ſee him. When the Rebels perceived him, and thought that the Boats had been full of Armed men, they caſt down their Weapons, and held up their hands to him, beſeeching him to ſpare the City. Joſeph, after many threatning and bitter ſpeeches, firſt, for that having undertaken wars againſt the Romans, they Joſeph with ſeven Souldiers cometh to Tiberias, and terrifieth his Enemies.

D with Civil Wars conſumed their own Forces: Secondly, for that they had ſought his life, who had wrought their ſafety, and that they were not aſhamed to ſhut the Gates againſt him, who had builded the City Walls; yet (ſaid he) if any would come and talk with him, and confirm a league of their fidelity unto him, he would not refuſe them. So ten of the chiefeſt among them came unto him, whom he carried away in a Fiſher-Boat far from the City, and ſent for fifty Senators, as though he requeſted their promiſe alſo. And deviſing new cauſes, he ſtill under pretence of agreement ſent firſt for one, and then for another, as he thought good, till he had loaded all the Boats: which done, he commanded all the Boatmen with all ſpeed poſſible to go to Tarichea, and put them in Priſon, ſo that he carried away all the councel, which were in number ſix hundred and two thouſand people, all whom he brought

But they which remained in the City, cryed with one voice, that one Clitus was cauſe of that revolt, and therefore beſought Joſeph to puniſh him for all. Joſeph told them that he would put none of them to death, but commanded one of his guard called Levia, to come and cut off Clitus his hands: but he fearing to truſt himſelf amongſt all his enemies, refuſed to do execution. Clitus perceiving that Joſeph was angry, and ready to come out of his own Boat to do it himſelf, beſought him to grant him one of his hands: which Joſeph did upon condition, that he ſhould cut off the other himſelf. So Clitus drawing out his Sword with his right hand, cut off his left, being afraid of Joſeph; and after this, he returned to Tiberias to bring it again under his ſubjection: and within a few dayes after, he took Giſcala, and Sephoris, which were revolted, having given the ſpoils thereof to

How the people of Jeruſalem prepared themſelves to War, and of the Tyranny of Simon Giora.

UNtil this time, there were broils in Galilee: and now ceaſing from civil diſſention, they prepared themſelves againſt the Romans. And the Potentates of Jeruſalem, and Ananus the high Prieſt, with all ſpeed renewed and repaired the Walls, and made all sorts of Instruments for War, Arrows and other weapons; so that all the City was busied herein, and trained their men in warlike discipline. All places were filled with tumults; but the graver sort were very pensive, and many as it were foreseeing the calamity that after ensued, burst out into tears: they that desired peace, received no comfort in any thing: all things were done at their beck, who were cause of all this War. And the Estate of the City even then before the Romans came, was like a City to be destroyed. Now Ananus omitted that which was necessary for War, and laboured to reconcile the seditious faction of them that were called Zelous: but how he was overcome, and what his end was, we will declare hereafter. Now one Simon the Son of Giora in the Toparchie of Acrabatena, having gathered together a multitude of seditious people, robbed and spoiled all; and not only brake into rich mens houses, but also did beat them grievously, openly exercising his Tyranny. But when Ananus and the rest sent an army against him, he fled unto his fellow-thieves of Massada, and there he stayed till Ananus, and the rest of his Enemies were slain: and then he wasted Idumæa with the rest, so that the Governours of that place were fain to put a Garrison in every Village: so great was the number of them that were slain by these Thieves. And thus stood the affairs of the Jews.

CHAP. I.

Of Veſpaſians coming into Judæa, and of the Maſſacre of the Jews.

The year of the World, 4031. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 69.

AFter that Nero underſtood of his evil ſucceſs againſt the Jews, he was ſeized with fear and aſtoniſhment; yet he diſſembled it as much as neceſſity would permit him. In the mean-while he ſet a good face on the matter, and made as though he were of more courage, ſaying, that that which hapned, was rather by the fault of his General, then by the valour of their adverſaries: thinking that it behoved him, who was Emperour, not to ſhew himſelf moved with a little bad news: and the greatneſs of his Empire ſhewed he had a mind which yielded to no misfortune. Yet it appeared by the vexation of his ſpirit that he was much moved, and in great care unto whom he ſhould commit the charge of the Eaſt, which rebelled, who both would conquer the Jews, and chaſtiſe the inhabitants about them, that bare the ſame mind as they did. At laſt, he found Veſpaſian, whom he thought only meet for that purpoſe; a man who from his infancy had been trained up in Wars, even until he was gray-headed, who had appeaſed the people of the Weſt, and helped them being troubled by the Germans, and recovered it for the Romans: as alſo he did Britany, which was unknown before; and for that cauſe made his Father Claudius triumph, without taking any pains for it. Nero conſidered all theſe, and his prudence grounded in old Age with his Experience, who alſo had Sons in the flower of their Age, to be pledges for his fidelity, and that repreſented their Fathers Wiſdom; God, as it ſhould ſeem, even then diſpoſing ſomething of the whole Common-wealth, Nero ſent him to govern the Armies in Syria, greatly encouraging him with fair ſpeeches and promiſes, as at that time need required.

Nero is amazed and afraid at the valiant acts of the Jews.

Nero ſendeth Veſpaſian to govern in Syria and direct his War.

Thus he departed out of Achaia, where he was with Nero: and he commanded Titus his Son to lead the fifth and tenth Legions from Alexandria, and he himſelf croſſing over to Helleſpont, went after by land into Syria, where he aſſembled all the Roman Forces, and all the help of the Kings adjoyning that were confederates. But the Jews after Ceſtius unfortunate ſucceſs, became proud of their Victory, and could not contain themſelves; but like men toſſed at Fortunes pleaſure, they ſtill gave more occaſion of War: and gathering all their Warlike Forces together, they went to Aſcalon, which is an old City ſeven hundred and twenty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem, which the Jews alwayes hated, for which cauſe alſo they firſt aſſaulted it. The Governours in this expedition, were three men excellent above the reſt for ſtrength and wiſdom, to wit, Niger of Pærea, Silas the Babylonian, and John the Eſſean. Now the City of Aſcalon had very ſtrong Walls, but few men to defend it; for it had only one Company of Footmen, and one band of Horſmen, whom Antonius governed. The Jews made ſuch haſt, as though they had dwelt hard by. Antonius perſwading himſelf that they would aſſault him, cauſed his Horſmen to iſſue forth of the City: and neither fearing the multitude, nor the malice of his adverſaries, he valiantly abode the firſt aſſault of the Enemies, and beat them back that attempted to aſſault the Wall. So the Jews who were unſkilful, having to do with them that were expert; and they being on foot fighting againſt Horſmen; without order, againſt thoſe that were in good order; being lightly armed, againſt their adverſaries who were well provided, were eaſily repulſed.

Veſpaſian and Titus gather great Forces againſt the Jews.

The Jews beſiege Aſcalon.

Anthony fighteth with the Jews.

Finally, they were more led by rage and wrath, then by good Counſel; and they againſt whom they fought were obedient, and would do nothing without the commandment of their Leader. For their firſt ranks being broken, they were forced by the Horſmen to turn their backs; and turning themſelves to their own Company, who turned toward the Wall, became as it were Enemies to themſelves. So that every one ſeeking to avoid the Horſmen, they were all diſperſed about the field, which was in every place for the advantage of the Horſmen. This greatly helped the Romans to kill ſo many Jews: for they that fled were eaſily overtaken by the Romans, and killed; and others compaſſing divers of the Jews about, ſlew them with Darts; ſo that the Jews were in a great deſperation for all their huge multitude, as if they had been alone. The Jews endeavouring to overcome their misfortunes, were aſhamed to flie, and ſo fled not haſtily, hoping that fortune would change. But the Romans not wearied in that which they did with great dexterity, continued the fight the moſt part of the day; ſo that there were ſlain of the Jews ten thouſand, and two of their Leaders, John and Silas. The reſt, many being wounded, followed their General Niger, who fled into a little Town of Idumæa, named Salis: many of the Romans alſo were wounded in that fight.

The Romans overcome the Jews, and make a great ſlaughter of them.

Ten thouſand Jews ſlain.

But

The year of the World, 4031. after the Nativity of Christ, 69.

But the Jews were not daunted with this misfortune, but the grief thereof much increaſed their Courage: neither were they diſmayed with the former loſs of ſo many men within ſo ſhort time; but rather calling to mind their great Victory they had before, were drawn to undergo yet another miſhap. Shortly after, before the mens wounds were healed, they gathered together all their Forces, and went again to Aſcalon in greater number and fury, but with the ſame ſucceſs and ſkill in warlike affairs which they had before. For Antonius having warning which way they meant to come, placed an ambuſh in the way, and the Horſmen ſetting upon them at unawares, they killed above eight thouſand of them, before they could prepare themſelves to fight: and all the reſt fled, and Niger with them, ſhewing as he fled many arguments of a valiant mind: and for that the Enemies purſued them, they fled into the ſaſeſt Tower of a Town called Bezedel. Antonius knowing it to be in vain to ſtay about the Tower that was invincible, yet loth to let the General of their adverſaries to eſcape, ſet fire on the Walls; and ſo departing, triumphed, thinking that Niger had been burned. But he leapt into a deep Vault in the Caſtle, and ſo eſcaped, and three days after he ſhewed himſelf unto his Souldiers, who ſought for him weeping, that they might have his body, for they thought him dead: whom againſt all expectation, ſeeing alive, they were very glad, as though by Gods providence he eſcaped to be ſtill their Leader.

Eight thouſand Jews ſlain at Aſcalon.

Veſpaſian with his whole Army cometh to Ptolemais.

Veſpaſian came to Antiochia, which is the mother City of Syria, and brought his Army with him, which for greatneſs, and happy ſucceſs, doubtleſs was the third in the whole world; and finding that King Agrippa did expect his coming, he haſted with all his Forces from thence to Ptolemais. At this place there came unto him the Citizens of Sephoris a City of Galilee, who had no thought at all of Rebellion: theſe both provident for their own ſafety, and well knowing the Forces of the Romans, before Veſpaſian came, ſubmitted themſelves unto Ceſtius Gallus, and received from him a Garriſon of Souldiers; and now alſo courteouſly entertaining Veſpaſian, offered their help againſt their Countrey-men. To whom Veſpaſian at their requeſt gave a guard of Horſe and Foot, ſo great as he thought was able to reſiſt the force of their Enemies, if the Jews ſhould attempt any thing againſt them. For he thought it would be a great help unto him in his War to come, to have Sephoris the greateſt City of Galilee. ſcituate in a ſtrong place, on his ſide, which otherwiſe might be a ſafeguard to the whole Nation.

The Sephorites do courteouſly entertain the Romans.

The Deſcription and Scituation of the higher Galilee.

THere are two places named Galilæa, and one is called high Galilæa, and the other, low Galilee: and they are both compaſſed with Phœnicia and Syria. On the Weſt Ptolemais, with the limits of his Territory doth part his Borders, and the Mount Carmel, which in time paſt belonged unto Galilee, but now unto the Tyrians. Unto which adjoyneth Gabaa, which ſignifieth the Horſmens City: ſo called for, becauſe King Herods Horſmen were ſent thither to inhabit. On the South part it joineth to the Samaritanes, and Scythopolitanes unto Jordan. On the Eaſt part it bordereth upon Hippene, and Gadaris, Gaulanitis, which are the Borders of King Agrippa his Countrey. On the North it bordereth upon Tyria. The length of lower Galilee reacheth from Tiberias unto Zabulon; near which is Ptolemais by the Sea Coaſt. In breadth it reacheth from the Village Xaloth, ſcituate in a great field, unto Berſabe, where alſo begins the breadth of high Galilee, and reacheth unto the Village called Baca, bordering upon the Tyrians; and the length thereof is from a Village near Jordan named Thella, unto Meroth. And being of ſuch bigneſs, and environed with ſo many Nations, yet did they alwaies reſiſt Forreign Forces. For the Galileans are from their Childhood Warlike, and never are daunted by fear or penury; for their Countrey is moſt fruitful, ſet with all manner of Trees, and very fertile, notwithſtanding the Inhabitants take ſmall pains in tilling the ground. All parts thereof are tilled by the Inhabitants, and there is no waſt part.

The fertility of Galilee.

There are many Cities, and in every place there are Villages populous and rich: ſo that the leaſt Village there, hath in it above fifteen thouſand Inhabitants. And although Galilee be leſs in compaſs then the Region beyond the River, yet it is more populous, fertiler and richer then the ſame: for it is all tilled, and all beareth fruit. But that beyond the water, though it be bigger, yet it is not all inhabited, for there are many deſarts, and barren places, and one beareth wild fruits. Peræa hath a good ſoil and large field, beſet with divers trees, eſpecially Olives, Vines, and Palm-trees: and it is abundantly watered with Brooks running from the

The length of this place is from Macherunt to Pella; the breadth from Philadelphia to Jordan. This town Pella before-mentioned, lieth on the North part, and Jordan on the Weſt, and the Country of the Moabites bordereth on the South, and on the Eaſt Arabia, Silbonitis, Philadelphia, and Geraſis. Samaria is ſeated between Judæa and Galilee, beginning at a Town ſituate in a place called Ginæa, and endeth in the Toparchy of Acrabatena, nothing differing in nature from Judæa. For both of them are full of Mountains and fields, and good for tillage; full of trees abounding both with wild Apples and others: for they are of their nature dry, but have rain enough, and have paſſing ſweet waters, and abun-
B dance of good graſs, and great ſtore of milch Beaſts, and, which is a great argument of wealth, both places are very populous. The confines of theſe Countries is Anauth, a Village otherwiſe called Borceos, which lieth on the North part of Judæa. The South part of Judæa, if you meaſure the length, is extended unto the Village of the Arabians, called Jordan: the breadth reacheth from Jordan unto Joppe: in the midſt thereof is ſituate Jeruſalem; ſo that ſome call that City the navel of the Countrey. Judæa alſo bordereth on the Sea-coaſt, even unto Ptolemais. It is divided into eleven portions: the firſt is Jeruſalem, head and chief of all, being above all the reſt, as the head is above the body: and the reſt are Toparchies. Gophna is the ſecond, after that Acrabatena, then Thamna, afterward Lydda, alſo Ammaus, Pella, and Idumæa, and Engadda, and Herodium, and Jericho; beſides theſe
C Jamnia, and Joppe command the places adjoining. Moreover, there is Gamala, and Gaulanitis, and Batanea, and Trachonitis, which are portions belonging to King Agrippa his Kingdome. This Countrey beginneth at Mount Libanus, and the Fountains of Jordan, and reacheth in breadth unto the Lake near Tiberias. And in length it reacheth from Julias, to Arphas, and the Inhabitants are partly Jews, and partly Syrians.

CHAP. III.

How aid was ſent unto the people of Sephoris, and of the military Diſcipline of the Romans.

D I Have already ſpoken of Judæa as briefly as might be, and with what Countrey it is environed. Now Veſpaſian ſent help unto the Inhabitants of Sephoris, to wit, one thouſand Horſmen, and ſix thouſand foot, Placidus the Tribune being their Governour: the Horſmen divided themſelves into two Companies, lodged in a great Plain, and the Footmen were in Garriſon in the City for to defend it, but the Horſmen ſtayed without. Theſe Horſemen made excurſions on every ſide, and greatly moleſted Joſeph, who was quietly bent, and alſo ſpoiled all that was without the Cities, and always repulſed the Inhabitants, if at any time they took courage to revenge themſelves. Notwithſtanding, Joſeph aſſaulted the City Sephoris, hoping to take it: which he, before ſuch time as it revolted unto the Romans, had compaſſed with ſo ſtrong Walls, that the Romans themſelves could not have
E taken it; ſo his hope was fruſtrate: for neither by force nor fair means would the Sephorites yield unto him. Hereat the Romans being angry, troubled the Countrey more then before: who now neither night nor day ceaſed from deſtroying it, but robbed and ſpoiled all they found, and all men able to bear Arms they ſlew, and made the reſt their ſlaves; Thus all Galilee was filled with fire and ſword, and no man eſcaped that calamity; only they ſaved themſelves, that fled into the Cities that Joſeph had walled.

Veſpaſian ſendeth help to the Sephorites, but filleth Galilee with ſword and fire.

Titus came to Alexandria being Winter, ſooner then he was expected; and ſo received there the Souldiers that he was ſent for: and having a proſperous journey, he quickly came to Ptolemais; and finding his father there with two of the chiefeſt Legions; to wit, the fifth and
F tenth, he alſo adjoyned that fifteenth Legion that he brought with him. And there followed them eighteen Companies; five out of Cæſarea, one Troop of Horſmen, and five Companies of Horſmen out of Syria: ten of theſe Companies of Foot had in every one of them a thouſand Men, the reſt only ſix hundred and thirteen, and in every Troop of Horſmen, were an hundred and twenty. The Kings alſo brought great aid: for Antiochus, Agrippa, and Sohemus, brought each of them two thouſand Bowmen, and a thouſand Horſmen: and Malchus King of Arabia, brought five thouſand Foot, and one thouſand Horſe, and the moſt of his Footmen were Archers; ſo that the whole Army, together with the Kings aid, amounted unto the number of threeſcore thouſand Horſe and Foot together; beſides them that followed the camp, who were a great multitude, and not inferiour unto the Souldiers in warlike diſcipline: ſo that one may admire the Romans, who ſo train up their ſervants in time of peace, that they are very fit for Wars. So that whoſoever well beholdeth their Military Diſcipline, he ſhall

Titus bringeth a mighty Army into Judæa.

The year of the World, 4031. after the Nativity of Christ, 69.

ſhall perceive that they gained not this their goodly Empire by chance and fortune, but by G vertue: for they do not only then begin to uſe weapons when they come to fight, but they practiſe military diſcipline before they need: and they are not idle in time of peace, but alwayes practiſe themſelves therein without ceaſing. Their exerciſes are like War it ſelf, and every Souldier is every day exerciſed in every ſort of Weapons, even as though they were fighting againſt the enemy; ſo that hereby they eaſily indure the burthen and travel of Wars. For their diſorder doth not make them forget what to do, neither doth fear diſmay them, nor continuance of fight and War weary and tire them. So that whoſoever they fight againſt, who are not ſo well provided in theſe affairs, as they are, they always overcome them: and one may well call their practices amongſt themſelves, conflicts without blood-ſhed: and H their wars indeed, conflicts with blood-ſhed. They are not eaſily overcome at unawares: for in what Enemy-countrey ſoever they come, they fight not before they have fortified their Camp about, which they do not raſhly, neither do they pitch their Tents in mariſh or high places, after a diſordered manner, for if the place be unequal, they make it plain. And they proportion their Camp four-ſquare: for they have many Smiths, and all kind of Workmen needful, which do ſtill follow the Army, to accompliſh ſuch buſineſs. And in the innermoſt part of the Camp they make Tabernacles, whoſe outſide reſembleth a Wall, with Towers equally diſtant one from another, and between them Engines of War to caſt Stones, and ſuch like, that all kind of ſhot may be in readineſs. They alſo build four Gates large and wide, both for their Cattel eaſily to come in at, and alſo for themſelves if need require, to enter I in or iſſue out ſpeedily.

The diligence and labour of the Romans in providing things neceſſary for the Wars.

The induſtry of the Romans.

The order of the Romans in their Camp.

Within the camp, there are ſtreets divided into certain ſpaces: in the midſt their rulers, and amongſt them all, the Generals tent like a Temple; ſo that it ſeemeth a city, and a market full of ſhops made in an inſtant. There are alſo ſeats builded for the Governours to judge of controverſies, if any ariſe between the Souldiers and others. All this place and all things belonging thereto are made in an inſtant, partly by reaſon of the multitude, partly by the induſtry of ſuch as work: and if need require, they compaſs it with a trench four Cubits deep, and as many broad. Thus the Souldiers encloſed with Arms, do live quietly in their tents, without diſorder, and all things are done with good advice and order, whether they need water, or corn, or wood, for they muſt all go to dinner at the time appointed, and all ſleep at once, K and a trumpet giveth notice when to watch and guard, and nothing is done that is not commanded. In the morning, all the Souldiers come unto their Captains to ſalute them, the Captains to the Tribunes, and they all to the General, and he giveth them a watch-word, and telleth them what he thinketh good, and how they ſhall behave themſelves towards thoſe that are under them, whereby in fight they may demean themſelves, and well know when to aſſault, and when to retire. When they go forth of the camp, a trumpet ſoundeth, and no man is idle, but at the firſt beck taketh away his tabernacle, & maketh all ready for their departure. Then the trumpet ſoundeth again, warning them to be ready: and having loden their beaſts, with their baggage, they expect the ſound again, as though they were to run a race, and at their departure they burn their Camp, becauſe it is eaſie to build the like again, and alſo leſt L afterwards it may advantage their Enemies. When the trumpet hath ſounded the third time, which is a ſign to ſet forward, then they haſten thoſe that are ſlow, leſt they forſake their order. And a Crier ſtandeth on the right hand of their General, aſking thrice if they be prepared to fight, and they as often anſwer that they are, holding up their right hands with a lofty courage: and ſo they march on eaſily, every man keeping his rank, as though they were ready to give Battel. The Footmen have a head-piece, a breſt-plate, and a ſword on the left ſide, and on the right ſide a dagger. The Footmen guarding the General, have a Javelin and a Shield: the reſt armed every one with Bucklers and Pikes. Moreover, they carry a ſaw, a baſket, a fardle, a hatchet, alſo a cord, a ſythe, a chain, and victuals for three days; ſo that the Footmen are as much loaden as the Cattel. The Horſmen carry at their M right ſide a long ſword, in the left hand a dart, & a long ſhield hanging againſt the horſe ſide, and a quiver with three darts, with broad edges, which are as big as a ſpear: they have alſo helmets and breſt-plates like the footmen. And the Generals horſmen that guard his body, do nothing differ from the reſt. That company always leadeth, that the lot falleth unto. And theſe are the faſhions of the Romans concerning their warlike diſcipline. They never do any thing unadviſedly in Battel, but manage all things according to counſel; ſo that they either do not erre, or if they do, their fault is eaſily amended. For they think that bad ſucceſs after deliberation, is better then good fortune without it; and they think that therein fortune did but flatter them, to work them ſome great deſpight, by reaſon they have not deliberated: but that which is premeditated, although it have evil ſucceſs, yet it maketh them them wary againſt another time. And none of them accounts that good ſucceſs, which cometh by chance, and yet every one is comforted in their misfortune, for that they take good advice. By the military exerciſes they do not only make the bodies of their ſouldiers ſtrong, but their minds alſo more hardy: and their diligence is the greater by their fear. For their laws are capital, not only for them that forſake their order, but alſo for them that commit the leaſt enormity or negligence; and their Generals are more ſevere then their laws: who only by rewarding the good, purchaſe favour, leſt they ſeem cruel in puniſhing the wicked. Moreover, they are ſo obedient to the Rulers, that in peace they honour them, and in war the whole Army ſeemeth one body united together: they ſo keep order, and are ſo ready to turn here or there, and ſo attentive to any command, and alſo diligent to note ſigns made unto them, and ſo quick to labour with their hands, that they are always apt to do any thing, but ſlow to endure. Inſomuch that they know no place, where they have been overcome, either by number, or courage, or councel, or by the difficulty of the place, nor by fortune it ſelf: For they think victory more certain then fortune. Therefore ſeeing that their deeds are ruled by advice and councel, and their commandments ſo well fulfilled by the Army, what marvel is it if their Empire in the Eaſt reach unto Euphrates, in the Weſt unto the Ocean, in the South unto Africk, in the North unto Rhene and Danubius? ſeeing that one may juſtly affirm the poſſeſſion leſs then the poſſeſſors. This I have ſpoken, not to praiſe the Romans, but to comfort the conquered, and to terrifie thoſe that deſire alteration: and perhaps it may teach them who want good diſcipline, and are ignorant of the manners and cuſtoms of the Romans in their military affairs.

CHAP. IV.

How Placidus aſſaulted Jotapata.

IN the mean time Veſpaſian living at Ptolemais with his ſon Titus, prepared his Army. But Placidus was already entred into Galilee and run throw it, where he ſlew almoſt all he found who were of the weaker ſort of people and cowards: and ſeeing that thoſe of courage always fled into the Cities that Joſeph had fortified, he turned his forces againſt Jotapata, which was the ſtrongeſt of them, thinking it might eaſily be taken by a ſudden aſſault, and that he thereby ſhould get great glory, and that by taking it great profit might enſue, in that the people ſeeing the ſtrongeſt City ſurprized, they would not flie to any again. But it fell not out as he expected; for the people of Jotapata underſtanding of his coming, met him near the town, and ſuddenly encountring the Romans, being a great multitude and well diſpoſed to fight, as thoſe that bare arms for the general ſafety of the Country, and the lives of their wives and children, they put the Romans to flight, wounding many, only ſeven being ſlain: for the Romans in flying, kept their ranks: and being armed round about, they were not dangerouſly wounded; but the Jews being unarmed, rather truſted to their Darts and Arrows then to handy blows. There were three Jews ſlain, and a few wounded: and ſo Placidus when he ſaw himſelf repulſed from the town, he fled.

Placidus draweth his forces againſt Jotapata, and being repulſed flies.

CHAP. V.

How Veſpaſian invaded Galilee, and how at the very ſight of him the ſeditious fled.

VEſpaſian deſirous to take Galilee himſelf, departed from Ptolemais, making ſuch journies as ſouldiers ought to keep, which the Romans are wont to follow. And he commanded thoſe that came to help him, and the bowmen, becauſe they were lighter armed, to go before and repreſs the enemies incurſions, and ſearch the Wood and Forreſt fit for ambuſhes, whereby they were to paſs: after them followed part of the Roman footmen and horſemen: and after them there marched ten by ten out of every hundreth; bearing with them their Armour, and the meaſures of their Camp. After them, followed men, whoſe office it was to mend the ways, where they were bad, and to cut down the Woods that were in the way, leſt with bad way the Army ſhould tire. After them he ſent his baggage, and the baggage of the Rulers under him, and withal horſemen to guard it. And after them he himſelf followed, leading an Army of choſen footmen and horſemen, accompanied with his own guard of horſemen, and he had out of every legion ſix ſcore men for his own guard. After followed they that carried the Engines to batter the Walls of the Cities, and other inſtruments, and with the Prefects and Tribunes, guarded with their choſen ſouldiers. After them other Enſigns, and the Eagle, the which the Romans hold for chief of all, because it is the King of all Birds, and is most valiant and strong; wherefore they think it a sign of dominion and victory, over all them against whom they bear it. After these sacred Ensigns followed the Trumpets sounding in warlike manner; and after them the Army marching six in a rank; and as the custom is, a Centurion went by them to keep order: the servants were all with the footmen and baggage. After the last company who were hired, followed armed footmen and horsmen in great number. And thus Vespasian with his whole Army came unto the borders of Galilee: and there pitching his tents, he stayed the souldiers who were very eager to fight; as it were boasting and shewing his Army to terrifie his adversaries, and giving them time to repent, if any one would alter his mind before the war began, yet did he prepare to besiege the walls and fortresses. The only sight of him made many rebels flye, and daunted the most of them. For Josephs souldiers who had pitched his tents a little from Sephoris, when they knew that war grew on, and that they were presently to fight with the Romans, they did not only flye before they fought; but also before they saw their enemies. Joseph being left with a very few, knowing he was not able to abide his enemies; and that the Jews were discomfited, and that if he put any trust in them, they would for the most part revolt unto the enemies; for that time abstained from all war, and thought to get himself out of Danger: and so accompanied with them that remained with him, he went to Tiberias.

The Eagle by the Romans is held the Ensign of the Empire, and a sign of Victory.

CHAP. VI.

How Gadara was besieged and taken.

Vespasian went unto Gadara, and took it at the first assault; for all able men fit for war were fled out of the City; and entring the City, he put all to death. For the Romans had no mercy, partly for the hatred they conceived against the Jews, and partly in revenge of that which had befaln Cestius. And they burned the City, and all Towns and Villages adjoining: some of them being already desolate, and the inhabitants of the rest were made slaves. Joseph fled into the City which he made choice of for his safeguard, and filled it with fear. For the people of Tiberias thought he would never have fled, if there had been any hope of withstanding the Romans: wherein they judged not amiss: for he did foresee what event those wars would have, and that their only safety consisted in changing their rebellious mind. He himself, though he hoped to obtain pardon of the Romans, yet had he far more rather have died, then to have lived pleasantly with them, against whom he was sent, and so become a traytor unto his Country committed to his charge. Wherefore, he determined faithfully to write all his estate, and the state of the Country unto the Nobility at Jerusalem, and not to extol the enemies forces too much, lest they should say he was a Coward; nor yet putting them in any comfort, lest perhaps they now penitent for that they had done, again by his letters should be incited to go forward in their rebellious course: willing them presently to write an answer, whether they thought it good to enter the league with the Romans; or if they would make war, then they should send a sufficient Army against the Romans: and having written to this effect, he presently sent men away to Jerusalem, to bear these letters.

Joseph is afraid of the Romans and writeth to Jerusalem.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Seige of Jotapata.

Vespasian was very desirous to take Jotapata, for that he knew many of his enemies were fled thither, and for that this was the strongest refuge they had. So he sent before, footmen and horsemen, to plain the ways which were full of ragged stones, so that it was hard for footmen to pass, and altogether unpossible for horsemen: who within four days effected that which they were commanded, and made a large way for the Army to pass: And the fifth day, which was the one and twentieth of March, Joseph before they came, entred into the City, coming thither from Tiberias to encourage the Jews who were dismayed. A certain run-away told Vespasian that Joseph was come thither, willing him to hasten thither, for if he could take Joseph, he might easily take all Judea. Hereat Vespasian was very glad, and took it as good fortune, that the most prudent and potent of his enemies, should (God at that time so working) put himself as it were in hold; and so presently he sent Placidus before with a thousand horsemen, and with him Captain Ebutius, a man both strong, valiant and prudent, and commanded them to compass the City with a siege, lest Jotapata besieged.

A leſt Joſeph ſhould privily eſcape from thence. The day after he himſelf followed with the whole Army, and about noon came to Jotapata, and leading his Army unto the North ſide of the Town, he pitched his Tents upon a hill ſeven ſtounds diſtant from the City: Upon purpoſe placing himſelf within the view of his Enemies, that the very ſight of his Army might terrifie them: which he alſo did; for preſently every one was in ſuch a fear, that none durſt go out of the City. The Romans being wearied all that day, would not aſſault the City: wherefore they invironed the Town with two Squadrons, and the third, that conſiſted in Horſmen, was placed without to intercept all paſſage, that none of the Jews could paſs any whither. Hereby the Jews now in deſperation took heart; for in War nothing is more forcible then neceſſity. The next day began the battery, and every Jew kept his quarter, and kept themſelves in order, and reſiſted the Romans before their Walls. But when Veſpaſian ſent all the Bowmen, and thoſe who caſt Darts and other things to beat them off from the Walls, and he himſelf with Footmen aſſaulted the Walls in another place where they might eaſily be entred: then Joſeph fearing the City, accompanied with all the people iſſued out of the Town, and aſſaulted the Romans fiercely, and did drive them from the Walls, ſhewing courage and ſtrength: and they themſelves ſuffered as much harm as they did unto their Enemies. For as they were encouraged with deſperation, ſo were the Romans with ſhame, who were Armed with Military knowledge and ſtrength, and the Jews only with anger. And the fight continued all day even until night; wherein many Romans were wounded, and only thirteen ſlain: and of the Jews there were ſix hundred wounded, and ſeventeen ſlain. The next day alſo they met the Romans, and reſiſted them more ſtoutly then before, taking courage for that they the day before had reſiſted them contrary to their expectation: and all the Romans fought more valiantly, aſhamed as it were of themſelves, in ſuffering the Jews to reſiſt them; thinking withal that they themſelves were overcome, if they did not quickly ſuppreſs their Enemies. Wherefore the Romans for five days together ceaſed not to aſſault the Town, and the Jews ſtrongly repelled them: and now neither the Jews feared their Enemies, nor the Romans were diſmayed with the difficulty of taking the Town. Jotapata is almoſt all ſituate upon a Rock, and compaſſed about with deep Valleys, which deſcend ſtraight down like a Wall, ſo that one can ſcarcely ſee the bottom. There is only acceſs unto it on the North part, where it is ſeated upon a Mountain going overthwart; which Joſeph incloſed with a Wall, to the end it might be no paſſage for the Enemies: all the reſt of the City is environed with high Mountains, ſo that it cannot be diſcerned by any before they be hard by it. And Jotapata was thus ſtrengthened.

The year of the World, 4031. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 69.

Nothing is more effectual in War or more deſperate then neceſſity.

A fight between the Romans and the Jews continued a whole day, and broken off by night.

The ſituation of Jotapata.

Veſpaſian determined both to ſtrive againſt the nature of the place, and hardineſs of the Jews; and therefore called all his Captains together, and conſulted with them to begin a hot ſiege: at laſt they reſolved to rear a Mount in that place where the City was eaſieſt to be entred. He ſent his whole Army to provide wood to do it, who cut down the Mountains neer unto the Town: and great ſtore of wood and ſtone being brought, ſetting hurdles before them to bear off the Darts and Arrows, he began to raiſe a Mount; ſo that they received little or no harm by darts caſt from off the walls: others brought earth from places thereabout, and no man was idle. The Jews caſt continually great ſtones and all kind of darts upon that which defended them; which though they pierced not thorow, yet they made a great noiſe and terrified the Workmen. Which Veſpaſian ſeeing, cauſed all Engines that did caſt ſtones, and darts, which were in number an hundred and threeſcore, to be placed againſt the walls, to beat the Jews from thence. And ſo they caſt ſtones, and darts, and fire, and arrows in great abundance: ſo that they did not only beat the Jews from off the walls, but alſo out of the reach of their ſhot; for both the Arabian Archers, and thoſe that uſed ſlings and darts, and all the Engines continually played upon them. For all this the Jews reſted not, but running out in companies as thieves, they took away that which defended the workmen, and then aſſaulted them having no defence: and when they had beaten them away, deſtroyed and fired all that the Romans had wrought for their own defence and ſafeguard. At laſt Veſpaſian perceived that theſe damages hapned, for that there was ſpace left between all theſe works, whereby the Enemies had acceſs to do them ſuch harms: wherefore he united them together, and ſo hindred the privy excurſions of the Jews. When the Mount was almoſt made, and the towers upon it finiſhed, Joſeph afraid to do nothing for the ſafeguard of the town, called all workmen neceſſary together, and commanded them to make the wall there higher; but they ſaid, it was impoſſible for them to work, for the number of ſhot in that place. Then Joſeph made this device to defend them: he fixed ſtakes in the ground, and faſtned unto them hides of Kine and Oxen new ſlain, by which they were defended from ſhot, and fire; ſo that they labouring night and day raiſed the wall twenty cubits high, erecting alſo upon it many towers:

and by this means made it a ſtrong defence. Whereat the Romans, who before thought themſelves ſure of the Town, were now greatly diſmayed both by this device of Joſephs, and alſo by the hardineſs of the Jews.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Siege of Jotapata by Veſpaſian, and the diligence that Joſeph uſed, and how the Jews made excurſions againſt the Romans.

THis Stratagem and the Carriage of the Jews greatly moved Veſpaſian: for now they receiving courage in that defence, made aſſaults upon the Romans of their own accord, and every day skirmiſhed, running out in Companies, and like Thieves, taking away whatſoever they lighted upon; and what they could not carry away, they ſet on fire. At laſt, Veſpaſian would not permit his Souldiers to fight any longer, but determined now to beſiege it, and take it by want of Victuals, purpoſing either to make them come and yield themſelves for lack of Food, or if they held out, to famiſh them: and that it would be more eaſie to take it by force, if ceaſing a while from aſſaulting it, he afterward ſet upon it, they being in anguiſh for the danger they were in. Wherefore he commanded all paſſages to be kept, that none could go out of the City; but they had great ſtore of Corn, and of all other things elſe, except Salt and Water, whereof they ſtood in great want: for there is never a Fountain in the City, and they have little rain in Summer-time, ſo that the Inhabitants were in great diſtreſs; for now there was hardly any water left in the City. Joſeph perceiving there was abundance of all things elſe, and that the Citizens were valiant, as alſo the Siege like to continue long, he gave to every one water in meaſure: with which they were not contented, thinking it as good to want altogether, as to have it in that manner; and now they began to faint, as though they had ſuffered extream drought. The Romans perceiving this, being upon a high hill, over againſt the place whither all the Jews came together to receive water, they with their ſhot killed many that came thither, inſomuch that Veſpaſian hoped that within ſhort time their water would be ſpent, and they conſtrained to yield. But Joſeph to fruſtrate this hope, commanded a great many Garments to be laid in water and hanged upon the Walls, ſo that the water might run down on every ſide. When the Romans ſaw this, they were much grieved and afraid, for that they waſted ſo much water in mockery, and before had thought that they had wanted water to drink. And now Veſpaſian ſcorning to win the City by Siege, purpoſed to aſſault it again by force. The Jews were very glad of this: and the City being in danger, rather wiſhed to be ſlain then periſh through hunger or thirſt. Joſeph deviſed alſo another way to get ſuch neceſſaries as he wanted, out of the Countrey: for there was a Valley out of the way, and therefore not regarded by the Romans: wherefore Joſeph ſent men into the Countrey to his Friends, for ſuch things as the City wanted, by this way, commanding them when they came neer the watchmen to hide and cover themſelves with hairy Skins, that the Watchmen might think them to be Dogs: and this he uſed a good ſpace, till at laſt the Watchmen perceived it, and ſo ſet a guard there to ſtop the paſſage. When Joſeph perceived the City could not hold out long, and fearing his own life, if ſtill he continued there, he treated with the chief of the City that he might flie. But the people perceiving his intent, flocked about him, and beſought him to take pity upon them, and not forſake them, who had no hope but in him, affirming, that for his ſake they were all couragious and bold to fight; and if they were taken, yet he would be a comfort unto them, telling him that it did not become him to flie from his Enemies, nor to forſake his Friends, neither as it were, to leap out of a Ship ſhaken with a Tempeſt, into the which he came when the Seas were calm, for ſo by this means he would ſoon overthrow the City; and once gone, no man afterward could or durſt reſiſt their Enmies, for in him was all their hope.

Joſeph delivereth his Souldiers water by meaſure.

Joſeph's Stratagem.

Another Policy of Joſephs.

The people beſeech Joſeph that he would not forſake them.

Joſeph's Prudence.

Joſeph kept it to himſelf, that his purpoſe was to work his own ſafety: for he told them, the thing which he intended was for their good, affirming, that though he ſtayed ſtill in the City, yet he could do them little good: and if the City ſhould chance to be taken, then he and they were like to periſh; but if he were abroad and not beſieged, he could do them great good; for he would preſently aſſemble all the people of Galilee, and come againſt the Romans, and ſo raiſe their Siege; whereas now in ſtaying with them, he ſaw not wherein he did them any good, but rather incited the Romans againſt them, making them more earneſt to take the Town then they would be, only becauſe he was there, that they might take him; but if they knew once that he were fled, they would not then be ſo earneſt in the Siege.

Joſeph

Joseph herewith could not perſwade the people, but they flocked faſter about him, and both young and old of all ſorts came and proſtrated themſelves at his feet, weeping, and beſeeching him to take ſuch hap as ſhould befall them, whether it were good or bad; not for that they envied his eſcape, but for that they hoped they ſhould receive no harm if he remained with them. The year of the World, 4031. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 69.

He then bethought himſelf that if he ſtayed with them, he fulfilled their requeſt; and if he denied, he feared they would force him. Wherefore being partly moved by compaſſion, he determined to ſtay; and being now, as all the City was, deſperate, he told them that now it was time to fight, ſeeing there was no hope of ſafety: and that it was a goodly matter to ſpend their lives renownedly, and do ſome noble act to leave a remembrance unto their poſterity of their valour: and went about it. And ſo iſſuing out of the City with the moſt valiant among them, when he had killed the Watchmen, at the firſt encounter he came even unto the Romans Tents, and tore the ſkins that their Tents were made of, and fired others, and their Engines: and ſo he did the ſecond and third day, and for certain daies and nights afterward never ceaſed. When Veſpaſian perceived the Romans greatly endamaged by ſuch incurſions, and very loth to flie for ſhame, and not able to follow them being ſo loaden with their Armour, and that the Jews always did ſome exploit before they retired themſelves into the City, he gave commandment unto his Souldiers to leave their aſſault, and not to fight againſt men who deſired to dy, affirming, that no men were ſtronger then thoſe in deſperation, and that if they found none to aſſail, their courage would ſoon be laid; like unto a flame of fire, when the matter that nouriſheth it is conſumed. Moreover, the Romans muſt ſeek victory more warily, for that they fought not for neceſſity, but only to increaſe their Dominions: and after that, oftentimes they beat the Jews by the Arabian Archers, and with ſlings and darts, and other ſhot which never ceaſed, and ſo the Jews by this means were repreſſed. But ſo ſoon as they were without the danger of the ſhot, they more furiouſly aſſailed the Romans, ſparing neither body nor mind, but continually fought by turns, and every one of the City aſſiſted them that ſo laboured.

CHAP. IX.

How Veſpaſian did beat the Walls of Jotapata with a Ram, and other Warlike Engines.

Veſpaſian thinking himſelf as it were beſieged, both for the long time which he had continued the Siege, and alſo for the divers aſſaults and privy excurſions of the Jews; having now almoſt raiſed the Rampiers as high as the Walls of the City, determined to batter them with a Ram. A Ram is a huge beam like the Maſt of a Ship, whoſe end is armed with a ſtrong maſſie Iron, and made in the form of a Rams-head: whereupon it takes his name, becauſe he butteth with his head. It hangeth on another beam with Ropes, like the beam of a pair of Ballances: the beam it hangeth on lying acroſs, is held up with two props, which being drawn back by force of many men, and then jointly with all their Forces ſhooved forward, it ſtriketh the wall with the head of Iron: And there is no wall nor tower ſo ſtrong, but though it abide the firſt ſtroke of the Engine, yet can it not hold out long. The General of the Romans thought good to uſe this means to take the City by force, for that the ſiege was dangerous, by reaſon that the Jews never reſted; ſo the Romans with all kind of ſhot, endeavoured to beat the Jews from off the Walls that made any reſiſtance: and the Archers and they who uſed ſlings, were hard by: and when they ſaw that none of the Jews durſt come upon the Walls, they applied the Ram unto them; and covered it aloft with Hurdles and Skins, both for to defend themſelves and the Engine, and at the firſt aſſault the Walls were ſhaken, ſo that the Citizens cried, as though the Town had been already taken. Joſeph ſeeing them ſtill beat one place, and that preſently the Wall would fall, deviſed a way to reſiſt the force of the Ram, and ſo he filled ſacks with chaff, and let them down off the Wall juſt againſt that place, where the Ram ſtrook ordinarily, and ſo brake the force of the blows, the looſeneſs of the chaff making no reſiſtance; and ſo drowning or abating the violence of the ſtroke. By this means the Romans were hindred: for whitherſoever they brought the Ram, thither did they upon the walls alſo remove the ſacks of chaff, & brake the force thereof: till at laſt the Romans alſo deviſed a way to cut the ſacks, taking long Poles, and binding Sithes unto the end of them, and ſo cut theſe ſacks of chaff. And the Ram ſhook the Wall, and the wall newly built was not ſtrong enough to reſiſt. Then Joſeph and his Souldiers ſought to help themſelves by fire-works, and ſo they fired all that was made of dry wood in three ſe-veral places, and withal the Engines, and Forts, and Mounts of the Romans, who now had much ado to defend themselves: first, because that they were terrified with the valour of the Jews: and secondly, because every one had work enough to defend himself against the fire, which seizing upon dry matter with Brimstone and Pitch wonderfully increased, so that in one hours space, it consumed all the works that the Romans had made with so great labour. There was a Jew the Son of Samæus called Eleazar, who deserved eternal memory: this man was born at Saab in Galilee. This Eleazar took up a great stone, and cast it down with such force upon the Ram, that he brake off the head thereof; and nothing fearing, leapt down amongst the midst of his Enemies, and brought it away into the City: at the last being unarmed, and as it were a mark for his enemies to shoot at, he received in his body five arrows; and as though he had not felt them, so soon as he had gotten up the wall where all might see him, he boldly stood still, and so through grief of his wounds having the head of the Ram in his arms fell down. Next unto him two brethren of Ramath in Galilee shewed themselves valiant, named Netiras and Philip, who assaulted the tenth legion of the Romans with such violence, that they brake their ranks, and put all to flight that sought to withstand them: which Joseph and those that were with him perceiving, took fire and burnt the Engines, works and defences of the fifth and tenth legions that were fled, and those that followed destroyed all Engines, and other matter that was left. In the evening the Romans erected the Ram against that part of the City which before they had beaten: and one of the Jews shot an arrow from the Wall, and wounded Vespasian in the sole of the foot, yet the wound was not great, for that the force of the arrow was spent before it came to him, having come a great way off.

Vespasian wounded in the sole of the Foot by an Arrow.

This fact greatly troubled the Romans, who seeing Vespasian bleed, presently spread this news through the whole Army, and almost all of them came running to see their General, and especially Titus, who feared his fathers death: so that the whole Army, partly for the love of their General, and partly for the fear of Titus his Son, were greatly troubled: but Vespasian presently freed the Army from all perturbation, and his Son Titus from fear. For the grief of the wound being past, he shewed himself to all that were sorrowful for him, and incited them to fight against the Jews more earnestly then before; and now every one as it were to revenge their General, despised all danger, and assaulted the walls, one exhorting another. Joseph and his associates, notwithstanding that many of them were killed with shot, darts and arrows; yet they forsook not the walls, but with fire and sword, and stones fiercely assaulted them, that being defended with hurdles, battered the walls with the Ram, but to little purpose: for they were continually killed, being in sight of their Enemies, and for that they could not see them, presently were stricken down, for their fire did make such a light, as though it had been day, so that the Romans easily perceived whither to direct their shot: And for that their Engines were not perceived afar off, the Jews could not defend themselves from the Arrows and Stones that were shot against them, by which means many of them were slain, and the tops and corners of the Towers beaten down. And there was no man so well guarded, but he was slain by force of those stones; so that any man may know of what force that Engine is, by that which hapned that night. For one that stood neer Joseph upon the Wall, was stricken with a Stone, and his head carried from his body by violence of that blow three furlongs, as though it had been cast out of a sling: and the next day a Woman great with Child was stricken on the belly with one of those stones, and the Child carried forth of her from the place where she was stricken three furlongs; so great was the force of this Engine: Therefore the violence of the Engines was more terrible, and likewise the noise of Darts, Arrows and other shot. And many were slain on every side, and the bodies of those that were killed, stricken against the Wall made a noise; and within the City was heard a pitiful lamentation, and weeping amongst the Women; and without, a heavy mourning and cry of them, that were wounded to death; and all that part of the Wall where the fight was, flowed with blood: so that now the multitude of dead bodies had so filled the ditch before the Wall, that the Romans might easily pass over into the City, and the Mountains about did Eccho with the cries of the Citizens: and all that night long nothing wanted, that either might by the Eye or Ear move terrour. And many stoutly fighting for Jotapata died most valiantly, many also were sore wounded: and notwithstanding the Wall was continually battered, yet it was almost Morning before it fell, being all night long beaten with the Ram. And then they of Jotapata repaired the breach with their Bodies and Armour, before the Romans could set Bridges to enter it.

How Jotapata was again assaulted.

The year of the World, 4031. after the Nativity of Christ, 69.

IN the Morning Vespasian brought his Army to enter the breach, having given them but little rest after their whole nights labour: and desirous to make the Jews that defended the breach, to forsake their place, before such time as he entred, he took the most valiant of his Horsmen, and unhorsed them, being armed from the head to the foot, and placed B them in three ranks; that they being so armed, might besiege round that part of the Wall that was battered, and so take long pikes in their hands, so that as soon as the bridges were set, they should first enter the breach. After them he placed the strongest of his footmen: the rest of his Horsmen he set round about the City upon the Mountain, to the end that none might escape thereabout: after the Footmen, he commanded Archers to follow with their arrows ready in their hands, and them that used slings also, and other Engines for shot. And he caused other to scale the Walls, where they were not battered, to the intent that the Townsmen, busied in resisting them, might leave the breach unmanned; and the rest being wearied and oppresst with the thickness of the shot, should of force forsake their standing. But Joseph, perceiving his intent, placed old men and children, and those that were already wearied, upon C those parts of the Walls that were not battered: and himself with the stoutest of the City went to defend the breach, and placed six men before them, whom he chose out, himself being one of them to sustain the first brunt of their enemies assault: commanding them likewise to stop their Ears, to the end that they might not be terrified with the cries of the Army. He willed them also to defend themselves with shields against the darts & arrows, and gave back a little, till such time as the Archers quivers were emptied: and if so be that the Romans should offer to make bridges, that then they with their instruments should resist; and that every one should now fight, not to defend his countrey, but as it were to recover it, being in a manner already lost; and imagine, that they now did see their aged men slain with their Children and their Wives almost taken with their Enemies, and now to revenge themselves D upon those that hereafter would massacre their whole City: and thus he appointed men in both places. The weaker multitude, Women and Children, seeing the City compassed about with three ranks of Horsmen, and that the Romans with their swords drawn pressed against the breach, that all the Mountains about did shine and glitter with their weapons that were placed there, and certain Arabians to serve the Archers with Arrows: they cried out as though the City were now taken, so that a man would have judged them already amidst their Enemies swords, and not only in danger to fall into their hands. Wherefore Joseph commanded the women to their houses, lest their cries should effeminate his souldiers minds; willing them likewise to keep silence, and threatned them if they did not: and so he marched to the breach, which place fell to his lot, and gave no need to them that sought to scale E the Walls, but only beheld afar off the force of the Arrows.

Joseph's subtil Policie.

The cries of Women and Children in the Battel.

When all the Trumpets began to sound, and the Air to be obscured with the multitude of Arrows; Josephs Companions remembring the charge given them, stopped their Ears, and armed their bodies against the shot of arrows: And so soon as the bridges were set against the wall, presently they ran; and before the Romans could enter upon them, they got them into their hands, and resisted them that sought to come upon them, shewing great prowess and strength, and themselves no way inferiour unto the Romans, though they were in extream danger, and the Romans in none: and did not give one foot back, till either they did kill, or were killed. But the Jews had not any fresh men to second them that were tired; and the Romans, still as they were wearied, sent fresh supply, and joyning together their long F shields, exhorting one another, they became as it were a wall or defence invincible; and the whole Army like one body, did beat back the Jews, and so set foot on the Walls. Then Joseph, in this desperate case, devised some way to repel this present calamity: wherefore he commanded the Jews to fetch scalding Oyl, which they had ready, and pour it upon the Romans yet seething, who also cast the Pans upon them. This device brake the ranks of the Romans, so that with great pain and grief they fell from the wall, and tumbled down: for the Scalding Oyl easily got between their flesh and Armour, and scorched them like fire, being easily heated, and long continuing hot by reason of the fatness; and the Romans being loaden with Helmets and Brest-plates, could not flee: so that some leapt down off the bridge, and others for grief died; others would fain have retired themselves, but could not, because their Enemies followed them so hard. But neither the Romans wanted vertue and valour in adverſe fortune, nor the Jews prudence and good advice. For the Romans, notwithſtanding they were in intolerable pain, being ſcalded with hot oyl, yet did they freſhly aſſault them that hurt them, and every one did thruſt him forward that was before him, as it were deſirous to ſhew their courage. Then the Jews uſed another device to make them retire: for they poured boyled Fenigreek upon the bridge, ſo that they ſlid down: and neither they that would have fled, nor they who did ſtrive to aſſault the Jews, could ſtand upon their feet, it was ſo ſlippery; and many falling down upon the bridge, were by their own company trodden to death; others did ſlide down upon the Rampier; and always as they fell, the Jews ſtruck them: and ſeeing that the Romans were retired from the place, ſo that now they were not forced to handy blows, they had leiſure to ſhoot arrows and darts againſt them. When Veſpaſian ſaw that his men in that fight endured much miſery, towards evening he cauſed them to retire, many being ſlain, and more wounded, and 6 men of Jotapata were ſlain, and above 300 wounded: this fight was upon the 20. day of June. But after that Veſpaſian had comforted his Souldiers for that which had hapned, and perceiving that they were angry, and deſired to fight to revenge themſelvs, ſo that they needed no exhortation; he raiſed the Rampier higher, and erected three Towers 50 foot high, covering them aloft with Iron, that ſo by reaſon of their weight they might ſtand ſtedfaſt, and not be conſumed by fire; and theſe he placed upon the Rampier, and in them Archers, and men that caſt darts and ſuch like: who not being perceived of them that were upon the Walls, by reaſon of the highneſs of the Towers, and the covering thereof, eaſily wounded them who were placed thereon. So the Jews when they could not avoid the arrows, nor be revenged upon them whom they could not ſee, nor yet fire the Towers being covered with plates of Iron, forſook the walls; yet always encountred with them who ſought to enter. And the people of Jotapata thus reſiſted, notwithſtanding, that many every day were ſlain, and that they did their Enemies no harm without great danger to themſelves.

How Japha was taken by Trajanus and Titus.

AT this time Veſpaſian underſtood that Japha, a City neer Jotapata, minded to rebel, encouraged ſo to do; for that they underſtood how they of Jotapata had held out contrary to all expectation: wherefore he ſent thither Trajanus, Governour of the tenth Legion, and with him 2000 Footmen, and a thouſand Horſe: who perceiving the Town able to reſiſt, and the Inhabitants prepared for to fight, and come out to meet him, (for the Town being for the ſituation ſtrong enough, it was alſo compaſſed with a double wall) ſeeing this, he fought with them, and after a while put them to flight, and the Romans following them, brake in with them at the firſt Gate: which the Citizens perceiving, ſhut the ſecond Gate, not ſuffering their own Citizens to enter in, for fear that the Enemies alſo ſhould ruſh in with them, as they had done into the firſt Gate. Truly, God gave that Victory unto the Romans, whoſe will it was, that all the Warlike men of the City ſhould have their own Gates ſhut upon them, and ſo fall into their Enemies hands, who were moſt greedy to deſtroy them. For many came to the Gates, and called thoſe that kept them by their names, pitifully intreating that they might come in: which whileſt they did, they were butchered like Sheep, being incloſed between two Walls: their own Citizens having ſhut one Gate upon them, and the Romans the other: and many thus encloſed periſhed by their fellows ſwords, and an infinite number by the rage of the Romans, having no courage to reſiſt and revenge themſelves. For the Treaſon of their own Citizens, and the terrour of their Enemies together, utterly diſcouraged them, and ſo they died all in number 12000, not curſing the Romans, but the Jews their own Countrey-men. Trajane, thinking that the City was now deſtitute of fighting men, or if any were within, that they durſt not reſiſt being thus terrified, reſerved the taking of the City for the General, and ſent Meſſengers unto him, requeſting him to ſend his Son Titus to make an end of the Victory. Veſpaſian fearing that yet there would be ſome reſiſtance, ſent Titus with 500 Horſmen and 1000 Foot, who haſtening thither, placed Trajanus on the left ſide of the Town, and himſelf on the right: ſo the Romans on every ſide ſcaled the Walls, and the Galileans having a while reſiſted, preſently left them. Then Titus and his followers leaping down, preſently got into the City, and began a vehement fight with them that were aſſembled therein, ſome valiantly iſſuing out of the Narrow ſtreets, and aſſaulting them, and the Women caſting ſuch things as they could get, upon the Romans, from the tops of their houſes, and thus they held battel ſix hours. How Cærealis conquered the Samaritans.

B THe Samaritans alſo were partakers of his Calamity, who aſſembled themſelves together in Mount Garizin, which they accounted a ſacred place. But both their aſſembly and their courage did portend their Wars: and not warned by their neighbours harms, nor with any advice or judgment, conſidering their own infirmity, and the Romans power, began to be tumultuous. Veſpaſian foreſeeing this, thought it good to prevent them: and although all the Region of Samaria had Garriſons in it, yet for all the great multitude aſſembled, it was thought that the Garriſons were able to keep them under. Wherefore, he ſent thither Cærealis, the Tribune of the fifth Legion, with ſix hundred Horſemen, and three thouſand Footmen. Cærealis thought it not the beſt way to go unto the Mountain, C and fight with the whole multitude, becauſe a great many of their Enemies were upon it: wherefore he commanded his Souldiers to beleaguer the Mountain about, at the Foot thereof, and to keep them there all the whole day. There hapned at that time a vehement heat, and the Samaritanes wanted water: for it was then Summer, and the people had not provided themſelves of Victuals, ſo that many in one day only for want of drink died of thirſt, the reſt preferred death before the miſery they endured, and ſo fled to the Romans: of whom Cærealis learned that thoſe that yet remained on the Mount, were even diſmayed by the miſery they endured. Wherefore he aſcended the Mountain, and compaſſing about the Enemies with his Army, he firſt exhorted them to yield, willing them to ſave themſelves, promiſing them all their lives, if they would caſt down their weapons: D but nothing prevailing with them, he ſet upon them, and kill'd them all, in number 11000. and 600. and this was done the 27. day of June. How Jotapata was taken.

THe Citizens of Jotapata endured this hard ſiege contrary to all expectation, and in the ſeven and fourtieth day, the Romans Mounts were raiſed higher then their Walls: E on the ſame day one of the City fled unto Veſpaſian, and told him in what caſe the City ſtood, and how few Citizens were left, and that with daily watchings and fighting they were far ſpent, whereby they were not able to reſiſt any more, and that they might be taken by policy if they were followed: for in the laſt part of the night, being weary, they ceaſed from their labour, and ſlept until the Morning: wherefore he perſwaded Veſpaſian to aſſault them at that time. But Veſpaſian knowing how faithful the Jews were one unto another, and how they contemned all puniſhment, gave little credit to this Run-away: for a little before, one of Jotapata being taken, could not by any torments be compelled to confeſs, or diſcloſe the Eſtate of the City, whom the fire nothing moved, and ſo at laſt he was crucified, laughing and ſcorning death: yet a probable conjecture which he had, per- F ſwaded him to give credit ſomewhat to this Traitors words: and for that he knew no great harm could befal him, if he ſo aſſaulted the City as the Traitor willed, he commanded the man to be kept, and made all his Army in readineſs to aſſault the Town. So at the hour appointed, he made towards the Wall with ſilence; Titus being the firſt, accompanied with one Domitius Sabinus, a Tribune, and a few of the 15. Legion: who killing the watchmen, entred into the City, and after them Sextus Cærealis and Placidus, with their companies; ſo the Caſtle was taken, and the Enemies were in the midſt of the Town, and it was fair day-light, and yet the Townſmen knew nothing, being now faſt aſleep after their great labours and watchings: and they that did watch could ſee nothing, there was ſo thick a miſt by chance that Morning, and the reſt never wakned till death was at their door, and that they perceived their Calamity and Deſtruction. of the ſiege, did neither ſpare nor pity any one: but driving the people out of the higher G part of the City into the lower part thereof, they maſſacred them all, where they that would, could not fight for the narrowneſs of the place: ſo being cumbred for want of room, and ſliding down the banks for haſte, their Enemies ſtill purſuing them, they were eaſily ſlain. Many of Joſephs Guard ſeeing this, that they could not fight, gathered themſelves together in a corner of the City, and ſlew themſelves, that the Romans might not kill them. But ſome of the Watchmen, who firſt perceived the City to be taken, fled into a Tower, and reſiſted a while (this Tower was ſituate in the North ſide of the City) and at laſt, being invironed with their Enemies, towards Evening yielded, and offered themſelves to be ſlain. And the Romans might have boaſted that that Victory had been without blood-ſhed on their part, H had not Antonius a Centurion been ſlain treacherouſly. For one of them who fled into the Caves (as many did) requeſted Antonius to give him his hand, in token that he might come out ſafe and without danger: which he doing unadviſedly, ſtraightway the Jew with a ſpear ſmote him in the flank, whereof he preſently died. The Romans that day ſlew all the people that they found, and the days following they ſearcht all the ſecret places, and drew thoſe out of the Caves and Dens that had fled thither, and ſlew all but Women and Infants: ſo that they took away 1000 and 200 Captives; and the number of them who were ſlain during the ſiege, and at ſuch time as the City was taken, amounted to 40000. And Veſpaſian commanded the City to be deſtroyed, and the Caſtles to be burnt, and ſo Jotapata was taken the 13. yeer of Nero's Reign, on the firſt of July. I

How Joſeph was taken, and how he redeemed his life with deeds and words.

BUt eſpecially, above all others, the Romans made diligent ſearch for Joſeph, both for the hatred they bare him, and alſo becauſe Veſpaſian greatly deſired to get him, for that he being taken, the greateſt part of the Wars were then ended; ſo they ſought him among the dead, and amongſt thoſe that were hid; but he, (Fortune favouring him) when the City was taken, eſcaped from the midſt of his Enemies, and lept into a deep Well, which K had a large Cave on the one ſide, the which they above could not perceive; where he found fourty principal men, who had proviſion for many days. The Enemies being in every place, he in the day-time lay hid, and in the night he went forth to ſee if he could eſcape; and perceiving that all places about were diligently watcht for to take him, he returned again into the Cave, and lay there two days; the third day, a certain woman that had been with them in the Cave was taken, and ſo he was deſcried. Then Veſpaſian ſent two Tribunes to him, to promiſe him ſafety, and bring him before him; the Tribunes names were Paulinus and Gallicanus: But Joſeph would not accept their offer, fearing that becauſe he had been the Author of all the Evils that the Romans had endured, that therefore they ſought him out to puniſh him; till Veſpaſian ſent unto Joſeph, Nicanor, the third Tribune, one of L Joſephs acquaintance. Nicanor recounted unto him how mild the Romans were towards them whom they had conquered, and that the Roman Captains rather admired him for his Virtue, then hated him. Moreover, that his General intended not to puniſh him (which if he pleaſed, he might do, whether he yield himſelf or no) but to ſave him, who was ſo valiant a man: adding alſo, that if Veſpaſian meant ill, he would never have imployed his friend in ſuch a meſſage, to uſe friendſhip (ſo noble a vertue) to ſo evil a purpoſe as to work Treaſon; and that he, though Veſpaſian had been ſo minded, would never have conſented to have betrayed his friend Joſeph. After Nicanors words, he began to ſtudy, as doubtful what beſt to do. Whereat the Souldiers being angry, began to caſt fire into the Cave; but Veſpaſian hindred them, being deſirous to take Joſeph alive. Nicanor ceaſed not to intreat him; M and he perceiving how his Enemies began to wax angry, and calling to mind the dreams he had in the night, wherein God foretold him of all the Jews calamities, and what ſhould betide the Roman Princes (for he could interpret dreams, and whatſoever God obſcurely ſhewed, being inſtructed in the Holy Books of the Prophets, and himſelf a Prieſt as his Parents were.) So at that time being as it were filled with the Spirit of God, and recording the dreams and horrible Viſions which he ſaw in his ſleep, he prayed ſecretly to God after this manner; O Creatour (quoth he) Seeing that it pleaſeth Thee to ruinate the Nation of the Jews, and that all good Fortune is gone unto the Romans, and that thou haſt choſen my Soul to foretell future events, I yield unto the Romans to ſave my life, proteſting, that I mean not to go to them to play the Traitor unto my Countrey, but as thy Miniſter: And having thus ſpoken, spoken, he yielded himself unto Nicanor. But they who fled into the Cave where Joseph was, perceiving that Joseph yielded unto the Romans, flocked all about him, and cryed out, How are our Countrey Laws violated? Where are those promises of God made to the Jews? Where are those gallant minds that contemn and despise death? Art thou, O Joseph, desirous to live, and see thy self to become a vile bond-slave? How soon hast thou forgotten thy self? How many hast thou perswaded to embrace death for their liberty sake? Truely, thou hast but a shadow of valour and prudence in thee, if thou dost hope that they will save thy life, against whom thou hast so behaved thy self: or if they would save thee to desire life at their hands. But seeing the Romans offer hath made thee forget thy self; yet we, to preserve the honour and credit of our Countrey, will lend thee our arms and swords, and so if thou be willing to die, die like the General of the Jews: which if thou refuse to do, thou shalt whether thou wilt or no, die like a Traitor to thy Country. When they had thus said, they all threatned to kill him with their swords, if he did yield to the Romans. Joseph feared their violence, and perswaded himself, if he died before he had put them in mind of Gods Commandments, that then he should die a Traytor to God: wherefore he began to make a Philosophical discourse unto them concerning this present estate what was to be done.

The year of the World, 4031. after the Nativity of Christ, 69.

The Jews violence and expostulation against Joseph.

Wherefore (O my Friends quoth he) are we become murderers of our selves? Wherefore do we make War between things so united, as are the soul and the body? Will any man say that my mind is changed? Why the Romans know that it is a thing most honourable to die in Wars, not any way, but according to the law of arms, to wit, by the Conquerors hand. If I intreat the Romans to spare my life, then am I worthy to perish with mine own sword and hand: But if they think good to spare their enemies, should we not think it good likewise to spare our own selves? Truly, it is meer folly to do that to our own selves, for the which we fight against them. I confess, it is a commendable thing to die for ones liberty; but yet to die in fight, and by their hands who took away that liberty: but now, neither do they war against us, nor kill us. He is not only to be judged a Coward, who refuseth to die when need requireth, but also he who will die when no need urgeth. Moreover, what with-holdeth us from offering our selves to the Romans? Truely, fear of death. Shall we therefore make that certain our selves, which we fear at the Romans hands? But some will say, how if not? then we are made Captives: consider what liberty we have now.

Josephs oration to his countreymen.

It is a goodly matter to die for liberty, but yet to die fighting.

You will say, it is the part of him that is valiant to kill himself: Nay truly, it is the part of a very Coward. For I think him to be a very timerous Sea-man, who perceiving a Tempest coming, before it fall, sinketh the Ship wherein he is. Moreover, it is against the Law of Nature, and the nature of all creatures to kill themselves, and thereby we should commit a hainous crime against God. There is no living creature that of his own seeking would willingly die: for every one feeleth in himself the strong and forcible law of Nature, whereby they desire to live: and for this cause we judge them for our enemies, that seek to take it from us; and punish them that do take it indeed: And do you think it is not a greater contempt for a man to despise his gift? For we of him receive our first being, and from him let us expect our ending. The body is mortal, framed of corruptible matter; but our souls are immortal, and there is a little part of God, placed in our bodies. If any one abuse that which another man putteth him in trust with, presently we think him a perfidious and wicked man: and shall we think that if we cast away out of our bodies that which God hath put us in trust withal, and placed in the same, that he shall not know of it, whom we have so abused? We hold those slaves worthy to be punished that run away from bad masters: and shall not we then be held for impious, who flee from so good a Master as God is? Do ye not know that they, who according to the law of Nature depart out of this life, and render that to God which they received of him, when he who gave it requires it, shall leave behind them a perpetual name to their Posterity and Family? And that unto those souls who are obedient unto their Creator when he calls them, he gives a holy and sacred mansion in heaven, and from thence after a revolution of the heavens, departing, are again commanded to dwell in chaste bodies? And that they who have wrought their own death, go unto dark hell? and that God punisheth this their offence upon all their posterity? Hence it is that God is displeased therewith, and it is forbidden by our most wise Law-maker: For if any amongst us kill themselves, it is decreed that till the Sun go down they shall be unburied, yet we hold it lawful to bury our Enemies.

The similitude of a Sayler. It is against the common course of Nature for a man to kill himself; yea, and a hainous sin against God.

The soul is immortal, and a portion of God placed in our bodies.

God revengeth him on the author of injuries.

Other Nations cause their right hands to be cut off, who have killed themselves: judging, that as the soul thereby was made a stranger to the body, even so by that fact was the hand made a stranger unto it. Wherefore, O companions, think on that which is decent, and not adde to our humane misery, impiety against God who created us. If we desire to be saved, let us save our selves:

The custom of the antient Jews, and how they dealt with those that slew themselves.

Josephs peroration.

The year of the World, 4031. after the Nativity of Christ, 67.

for it is no disgrace to receive our lives at their hands, who are witnesses of so many valiant deeds of ours. If we desire to die, let us die by their hands who have overcome us. I will not go into my enemies Camp, to be a Traytor against my self. For I bear not their mind who forsake their own company to flee to their enemies: for they flee unto them to save their lives, but I go unto them to work mine own death, even the death of my self. And I would to God that the Romans would break promise with me; for if they kill me after they have promised to save my life, I shall willingly die, and with great courage, having their breach of promise and perjury for a comfort of the last victory.

Joseph is in great danger to be slain.

Joseph spake much to this effect, to disswade his companions from killing themselves: But they stopping their ears with desperation, wherewith they had armed themselves to die, came furiously towards him with their swords drawn, upbraiding him that he was a coward, and every one was ready to strike him. Then Joseph calling one by his name, and looking upon another with a countenance like a Governour, holding anothers hand, and intreating the rest distracted in such danger, at last escaped from being killed at that instant: for still as one came near unto him to strike him, he turned his face upon him like some cruel beast, and some of them who remembred he had been their Captain in their extremity, with reverence of his personage trembled, so that their swords fell out of their hands: and many lifting up their arms to strike him, of their own accord let their weapons fall. Joseph, notwithstanding his desperate estate, yet was he not void of counsel, but assisted by Gods providence, he hazarded his life, and spake unto them as followeth: Seeing (quoth he) that ye are all determined to die, let us cast lots who shall kill one another; and he, to whom the lot falleth, shall be kill'd by him who next ensueth, and so the lot shall be cast upon every one of us, so that none of us shall be forced to kill our selves. For it were injustice, that when some of us be slain: the rest should repent themselves, and so escape. They all liked well of this, and always he upon whom the lot fell, was slain by him that followed, as though they were now to die with their Captain: for, death was more acceptable, because they thought Joseph should die with them. Now it hapned by the providence of God, that Joseph remained alive only with one other, and then perswaded him who was left alive, to live, and not to seek death, for fear the lot should fall upon himself: and for that if he survived, he should be polluted with the murder and slaughter of his own Nation. Thus Joseph, delivered both from the Wars of the Romans, and also of his own Nation, went with Nicanor unto Vespasian.

Another policy of Joseph.

Josephs fellows dye by lots, and Joseph and another are reserved.

Joseph resorteth to Vespasian with Nicanor.

All the Romans came about him to see him, and pressing about their General, they made a great noise, some rejoycing that he was taken, others crying out to punish him, others striving to come near to behold him better: & they who were afar off, cried out to kill their enemy: but those who were near him and beheld him, remembring his prowess, were astonished to see that change. And there was no Captain or Ruler, but although before they were all moved against them, yet now beholding him, they all begin to pity him: and especially Titus, who being of a gentle disposition, admired Josephs valour, his constancy in adversity, and his age, and thereby was moved to take compassion upon him, remembring what a manner of man he had been during the wars, and what he now was, being fallen into his enemies hands: calling also to mind the power and force of Fortune, and how small a stay the chance of war had, and that no humane affairs had any stay or hold in them; wherefore he drew many mens minds to pity him, so that Titus was the chief author of Josephs life: yet Vespasian caused him to be carefully kept, as though he meant to send him to Cæsar. Which Joseph hearing, requested that he might speak a word or two with him alone. Then all but his son Titus departing, and two of his friends.

An example of Titus grace and mercy towards Joseph.

Joseph hath private conference with Vespasian.

Joseph foretelleth Vespasian of his future honours.

Thou O Vespasian (quoth he) thinkest only that thou hast Joseph for thy captive, but I am a messenger unto thee of great matters from God, otherwise, I knew my country laws, and how it behoved the Generals of our nation to die, and not to be taken alive by their enemies. Wilt thou send me to Nero? Wherefore? As though Nero should live still, and thou not succeed him? Thou O Vespasian art Cæsar, and the Emperor of Rome, and Titus also thy son; and keep me in bonds with thee, for thou art not only my Lord, but Lord of all the world, and sea, and land, and all mankind. And if I now fain these things in this state that I am, of mine own mind against God, let me be reserved unto a greater punishment. After he had thus spoken, Vespasian gave small credit to his words, and only thought that Joseph fained these things of himself to save his life: yet by little and little he began to give credit unto him, because God put it in his mind to hope for the Empire: and fore-telling his reign by many signs and tokens, he also found Joseph to tell the truth in other matters. For one of Vespasians friends answered, that it was a marvel that he knowing that, could not propheſie of the event of the wars against Jotapata, and what was like

So he commanded Joſeph to be kept Priſoner, yet did he give him apparel and divers other things in moſt kind manner: and Titus did greatly honour him. The fourth day of July, Veſpaſian returned unto Ptolemais, and from thence he came into the Sea-coaſt unto Cæſarea, which is the greateſt City of Judæa, whoſe Inhabitants are for the moſt part Greeks; ſo the Inhabitants received the Army and B the General with all friendſhip poſſible, both for that they loved the Romans, as eſpecially alſo for that they hated them who were deſtroyed; ſo that many intreated Veſpaſian to put Joſeph to death. How Joppe was taken again.

IN the mean time, a great multitude being gathered together, who either were ſeditious perſons, or thieves, or ſuch as had eſcaped out of the ruinated Cities, began to re-edifie Joppe for their refuge, which Ceſtius formerly had deſtroyed: and ſeeing that they could not rob nor ſpoil the Countrey which was already waſted, and left deſolate by Wars, they purpoſed to become Pirates: and ſo building ſhips for that purpoſe, they robbed the Phœnicians, Syrians, and Ægyptians, not ſuffering any to paſs thoſe Seas without danger. Veſpaſian underſtanding their intent, ſent Horſmen and Footmen thither: who finding the City not guarded, got into it in the night time: which the Inhabitants perceiving were ſo D afraid, that they durſt not make any reſiſtance to expel the Romans, but they all retired themſelves unto their Ships, and there ſtayed all night, a flight-ſhot from the ſhore. Joppe is naturally no road for ſhips (for it is ſituated upon a turbulent ſhore) and on every ſide hath very high and eminent rocks, which trouble the Seas, and make huge waves: in this place (if we may believe the fable) one may ſee the ſigns of Andromeda's Chains. When the North wind blows, it ſtriketh the waves againſt the Rocks, and ſo cauſeth a dangerous Sea, that it were far more ſafe to be in the midſt of the Seas, then at that ſhore when the ſame wind bloweth. The Inhabitants of Joppe rode there all night, and by break of day the North wind began to blow fiercely, and drave ſome of the ſhips one againſt another, and others againſt the Rocks: and many ſtriving againſt wind and weather, and ſeeking E to get into the midſt of the Sea for fear of the rocky ſhore, and their Enemies there, were drowned; and they that eſcaped, neither had any place of refuge, nor hope of ſafety; for the tempeſt did drive them from the Sea, and the Romans from the City, ſo that the air was filled with cries of the people expecting to be drowned, and with the noiſe and ſound of the ſhips beating one againſt another. So ſome of the Inhabitants of Joppe were ſwallowed by the waves, others ſuffered ſhipwrack, ſome killed themſelves rather then to be drowned: many with the waves were ſtricken againſt the rocks, ſo that the Sea was bloody, and all the ſhore was covered with dead bodies: and whoſoever eſcaped the Sea and got to ſhore, the Roman Souldiers there ready ſtanding, killed them. There were four thouſand and two hundred dead bodies caſt upon the ſhore. So the Romans having without any fight F taken the City, they deſtroyed it: and thus was Joppe taken, and twice deſtroyed by the Romans in a ſhort time. Veſpaſian builded there a Caſtle, and placed in it ſome few Horſemen and Footmen, to the end that none of the Jews ſhould come thither again to play the Pirates, and that the Footmen might keep the Caſtle, and in the mean time the Horſemen might go forth, and ſpoil all the Towns and Villages, and Territories belonging to Joppe: which alſo they did. When the news of the deſtruction of Jotapata was brought unto Jeruſalem, many gave ſmall credit to it, partly for the greatneſs of that calamity, partly for that no one man could ſay, that he had ſeen the deſtruction of the City: for none eſcaped that maſſacre to bring news, but only report thereof was ſpread abroad; but at the laſt it was verified to be true by thoſe that dwelt near unto that place, and then they believed it: Many things alſo which were falſe, were reported as true. It was likewiſe bruited, that Joſeph was slain in the destruction of the City, for whose death all Jerusalem sorrowed, and every one G mourned for their lost Kindred; all bewailed the supposed death of the General, and some of their Sons, others of their brethren and Kinsfolk, and others of their acquaintance. They all mourned for Joseph thirty days, and hired many Musicians to sing Funeral Songs for him. At last, truth discovered it self, and the true news of the destruction of Jotapata with the accidents there: also how Joseph was not slain, but lived with the Romans, and that the Romans honoured him with more then a Captive could expect. Then the Jews began as much to hate him now living, as before they mourned for him when they supposed him dead. And some said he was a Coward, others that he was a Traitour unto his Countrey, and the whole City breathed out reproachful speeches against him. These heavy tydings H encreased their rage, and this their adversity (which unto wise men had been a warning to provide lest the like befel them) made them more outragious; so that always the end of one mischief was the beginning of another. To be short, now they were more incensed against the Romans then before, as it were that they might also be revenged of Joseph. And this was the Estate of the Citizens of Jerusalem.

How Tiberias was yielded.

Vespasian cometh unto Agrippas Kingdom, and recreateth himself there, and feasteth twenty days.

Vespasian was desirous to see the Kingdom of Agrippa (for the King had intreated him I to go thither, partly to feast him and his whole Army, partly to repress some troubles arising in his Kingdom, in the time of his absence) and so departed from Cæsarea upon the Sea-cost and went unto Cæsarea Philippi, where he stayed, and refreshed his Souldiers 20 days; and himself also feasted, giving God thanks for his prosperous success in the Wars. This done he had Intelligence that Tiberias and Tarichea were revolted (both which Cities belonged unto Agrippa his Kingdom) and fully determining utterly to destroy the Jews which inhabited thereabouts, he thought it good to lead his Army against these two places, especially that he might reward Agrippa for his good entertainment, by surrendring these Cities unto him. Wherefore he sent his Son Titus to Cæsarea to bring the Souldiers there unto Scythopolis, which was the greatest of all the ten Cities, which also is near unto Tiberias; whither himself being come, he expected his Sons coming: and departing from thence with three Legions, he pitched his tent in a place called Enabris, where the seditious people of Tiberias might behold his Army; this place was thirty Furlongs from Tiberias: from thence he sent Valerianus the Decadarch to entreat a peace with them, and sent fifty Horsmen to accompany him: for he understood that the people desired peace, and against their will were forced to War, by some of the seditious amongst them. Valerianus coming near the City Walls, lighted from his Horse, commanding all his Company to do the like, that they of Tiberias might not think that they came to fight, but in peaceable manner: but before he spake any one word, the boldest and strongest of the seditious persons, came armed against him, having one Jesus the Son of Tobias, who had been a Captain of Thieves, for their L Governour and Leader. Valerianus not presuming to fight without Authority from his General, although he had been certain of the Victory; again considering that it was great danger for so few to fight against a whole multitude, and withal terrified with the boldness of the Jews, contrary to his expectation, he fled on foot, accompanied only with five other, leaving his horse and the rest behind him, whom Jesus and his followers took, and brought into the City, rejoycing as though they had taken them in fight, and not by treason. But the Senators and chief of the City, fearing what might ensue of this fact, went unto the Romans, and together with King Agrippa came unto Vespasian, and prostrated themselves at his feet, beseeching him not to despise them, and not to think that the whole City were partakers with those few wicked persons, that so had merited his displeasure; requesting him M to spare the people who always had honoured the Romans, but rather that he should punish the Authors of that revolt and misdemeanour: who also had with-held the whole City, even until now, to yield it self unto the Romans; Vespasian moved by their entreaties, pardoned the City, though he was incited against them all for taking of Valerianus his horse; in that he perceived Agrippa was sorrowful, for fear that the City should be destroyed, and so by them Vespasian promised the Townsmen pardon. Then Jesus and his associates thinking it not safe for them to abide there, fled unto Tarichea. The next day, Vespasian sent before him Trajanus with certain Horsmen into the Castle, to see if all the multitude desired peace: and finding the people to bear peaceable minds, he with his whole Army came unto the City. And the Inhabitants opening the Gates of the City, went to meet him

The Gates of the City were narrow, ſo that the Army could not quickly enter in: wherefore Veſpaſian commanded a part of the Wall on the Southſide to be pulled down, and ſo entred in: yet did he not ſack the City, nor ruine the Walls, for Agrippa's ſake, who promiſed that from thenceforth the Citizens would be quiet. And ſo he pacified the City greatly troubled with ſedition.

CHAP. XVII.

How Tarichea was beſieged.

B VEſpaſian departed from Tiberias, and pitched his Tents betwixt it and Tarichea, and encamped himſelf: foreſeeing that there he ſhould have ſome trouble and long abode: for all Rebels that deſired War came thither, truſting both to the ſtrength of the City, and the Lake adjoining unto it called Geneſar. For this City was ſituate like Tiberias, under the Mountains: and Joſeph had incloſed it with a Wall on every ſide, where it was not compaſſed by the Lake. But the Wall though it were ſtrong, yet was it not ſo ſtrong as that of Tiberias: for Joſeph builded that in the beginning of the Rebellion, having men and money at will; but that of Tarichea was built only by the remainder of his liberality. The Taricheans had great ſtore of ſhips in the Lake adjoyning, to the end that if they were Covercome by land, they might flie by water: and therefore they had prepared their Ships for Battel by water if need ſhould be. Whileſt the Romans entrenched themſelves, Jeſus and his followers not diſmaied either with the multitude or military Diſcipline of his Enemies, iſſued out of the City, and ſlew the workmen, and deſtroyed a part of the work: and perceiving the Romans armed and aſſembled together againſt him, he fled again unto his Company without any loſs or harm received. But the Romans purſued them ſo faſt, that they forced them to take their Ships: and ſo being gone as far from the ſhore, as that yet they might eaſily reach them with the ſhot of an Arrow, they caſt Anchor and diſpoſed their Ships in Warlike manner, and fought againſt the Romans who were on ſhore, Veſpaſian underſtood that a great multitude of them were gathered together in a place neer unto D the City: wherefore he ſent his Son Titus againſt them with 600 Horſmen, who finding the number of his Enemies to be infinite, certified his Father, that he needed more Forces: and perceiving many of thoſe Horſmen of good courage, before any more aid came, and yet that ſome of them were afraid of the Jews; he ſtood in a high place where all might heat him, and ſaid, 'O ye Romans, I will firſt put you in mind who you are, and of what Na- 'tion, that ſo you conſidering what your ſelves are, may alſo conſider who they are with 'whom we are to fight; never yet was there any Enemy in any part of the World that could 'eſcape our hands. The Jews themſelves though already overcome, yet do they endure and 'manfully bear out their miſery: if therefore they conſtantly endure Wars, and fight va- 'liantly being in adverſity; what ſhould we do who are in proſperity? I rejoyce to ſee E 'you ſhew good Countenance, yet I fear leſt ſo huge a multitude of our Enemies diſcourage 'ſome of you: let every one therefore once again conſider, who himſelf is, and with whom 'he is to fight: and that although the Jews be bold and valiant enough, yet they obſerve no 'warlike order, and are unarmed, and ſo are more fitly termed a multitude then an army. I 'need not ſpeak of your knowledg and ſkill in wars: nay for this only cauſe are we train- 'ed up in warlike diſcipline in the time of peace, to the end that our number ſhould anſwer to 'the number of our enemies when we are to join battel: for what fruit ſhall we ſhew of this 'our perpetual warlike order and diſcipline, if we dare only fight with a rude multitude that 'are no more in number then our ſelves? I think that you being armed are to fight with un- 'armed, and being Horſmen are to fight with Footmen, and being guided by the advice of a F 'Captain, with them who have no Head nor Ruler: and that theſe things conſidered, do ſup- 'ply in us the want of more men, and the contrary in our Enemies doth as it were much di- 'miniſh their number. Victory doth not only conſiſt in the multitude of men, be they ne- 'ver ſo warlike, but alſo in a few, if they be valiant: for as they are few, ſo are they eaſily guid- 'ed, and may eaſily come to help one another, not being peſtered; whereas huge multi- 'tudes do more hinder one another then do good, and do themſelves more harm then their 'Enemies. So the Jews are led with deſperation, rage and fury, which indeed in proſperous 'ſucceſs are of ſome force, but in a deſperate fortune they are quickly daunted: but we are 'led by vertue, and obedience, and fortitude, which both are of force in proſperity, and al- 'ſo are good in adverſity. Moreover we have greater occaſion to fight then the Jews have: 'for they fight only for their Country and Liberty, but we fight for Renown and Empire;

'that we have already gained the Empire of the whole World, it might not be thought that our Enemies the Jews were adversaries able to match us. Consider moreover, that ye need not fear any great danger, for we have many to help us, and that hard by: let us therefore atchieve the Victory before any more succour come unto us; so shall our credit be greater, and our Victory more famous. I verily think that now trial is made of me, my Father, and you; to discern if he be my Father, I his Son, and you my Souldiers: for he is wont to be victorious, and shall I return unto him being conquered? and are you not ashamed to be dismaied, seeing that I your Captain will offer my self, and undergo the greatest perils? My self will bear the brunt of the Enemies, and first encounter with them, and let none of you depart from me: perswade your selves that God will assist my force, and boldly presume that we can do much more being in the midst of our Enemies, then if we should only fight without and not be amongst them.

It becometh Souldiers to obey their Captain.

Vespasian sendeth new supplies to Titus.

Titus having thus spoken, as it were by Gods providence, all his Souldiers took heart and courage, so that now they were sorry to see Trajanus come with 400 Horsmen more before the fight was begun, as though their Victory should be less renowned, because he came to help them. Vespasian also sent Antonius and Silo with 2000 Archers, to take the Mountain that was just opposite unto the Town, and to beat them that defended the City off from the Walls: and they did as they were commanded. Then Titus with all force possible, rushed with his horse upon the Enemies: and all followed him with an huge cry, scattering themselves in such order as they occupied as much ground as the Jews, and so appeared more then they were. The Jews, though terrified by their discipline, yet they withstood the first assault: but in the end dismaied, and put out of order with their Lances, and killed with Horsmen, every one fled as fast as he could into the City. And Titus killed some as they fled, others as he met them, and those he overtook, and many one for haste tumbling one upon another; and he prevented all that fled unto the Walls, and drave them back again into the field, till at last the multitude prevailed, and so they got into the City. Now at their return into the City, there befel a great dissention: for the Inhabitants considering their own Estate, and the event of all former Wars, and especially of this last fight, misliked of War, and desired peace: but the strangers that had fled from other places thither, and were in great multitudes, would needs contend therein; and so one part began a mutiny against the other, as though they would presently one have taken Arms against the other. Titus being not far from the Wall, heard these tumults within the City, and cried out unto the Romans; 'This is the hour (fellow Souldiers) wherein God hath given the Jews into our hands: why do we defer the time any longer? why do we not take the Victory offered? do you not hear the cryes within? they who escaped our hands, are at variance amongst themselves: the City is ours, if we make haste; and making haste, take courage: for nothing worth renown can be atchieved without danger: and let us not only prevent our Enemies concord which necessity will soon effect, but also our own Forces before any fresh aid come unto us; that besides the Victory we have, being so few over so huge a multitude, we may also divide the spoil of the City among us. No sooner had he thus spoken, but presently he mounted upon his Horse, and rode into the Lake, and so passed into the City, and all the Souldiers followed him. They that defended the Walls, were amazed at his boldness, so that none made resistance against him as he came: but Jesus with his followers leaving his quarter which was his to defend, fled into the fields, others flying towards the Lake, fell into their Enemies hands, who came that way against him, and so were massacred even as they were getting into their ships: othersome were slain as they did swim to overtake the ships that were new lancht from the shore: and there was a great slaughter of men all over the City. For the strangers that fled not, made resistance, and the Towns-men did not offer to defend themselves; for they abstained from fight, hoping for pardon, in that they were not against those proceedings: till at last Titus having slain the wicked, took compassion upon the Towns-men, and saved their lives, and caused the slaughter to cease. They who fled into the Lake, seeing the City even taken, ran away as far as they could from their Enemies. Titus sent Horsmen to let his Father understand what he had done. Whereof he having intelligence, being very glad for his Sons valour and magnanimity, and for the atchieving of such a Victory, whereby a great part of those Wars was ended, he commanded the City to be Guarded presently round about, to the intent that none might scape away alive. And the next day he came down unto the Lake, and commanded Ships to be built to pursue those that had escaped by it: and having many workmen and great store of matter to build them withal, his command was presently effected.

Of the Lake of Genezar, and the Fountain of Jordan.

THe Lake of Genezar taketh its name from the Country adjoyning unto it, the breadth thereof is fourty furlongs, the length a hundred. The water of this Lake is ſweet and good to drink, and is more ſubtil then ordinarily pure water of mariſh places is, and it is very clear near the ſhoar, and more temperate to drink, then either that of the River or Fountain, but it is always more cold then one would judge ſuch a Lake to be of that largeneſs: for the water being ſet in the Sun, doth not loſe its coldneſs: which the Inhabitants have uſed to do in Summer Evenings, to allay the natural coldneſs thereof. There are here many ſorts of Fiſhes, nothing like to Fiſhes of other places, either in ſhape or taſt. The River Jordan paſſeth thorow the midſt of it. It is thought that Panium is the head and Fountain of Jordan, but in truth it hath its Original from Phiala, and from thence paſſeth under the ground: this place is a hundred and thirty Furlongs from Cæſarea, towards that way which leads unto Trachon on the right hand. This water is called Phiala, by reaſon of its roundneſs: for it is as round as a Wheel, and the water ſtill keepeth within the brink of Phiala, never encreaſing nor diminiſhing; and no man knew that this was the head of Jordan, till Philip the Tetrarch of Trachon found it to be ſo; for he caſting ſtraws into Phiala, found them afterward carried unto Panium, which before that time was thought to be the Fountain of Jordan. Panium, though it be naturally beautified, yet by Agrippa his coſt and charges it was much more adorned. Jordan beginneth with a deep River out of this Den, and paſſeth along the Mariſh places, and dirty Lake of Semechonitis, and from thence 120. Furlongs unto the City of Julia, and in the way divideth the Lake Genezar, and paſſing a great way further into the wilderneſs, at laſt it endeth in the Lake called Aſphalites. Upon the Lake Genezar there bordereth a Countrey of the ſame name, naturally beautiful and admirable; for there is no kind of plant which groweth not there, and the Inhabitants have repleniſhed it with Plants and Trees of all ſorts, and the temperature of the Air well agreeth with ſo diverſe trees; for there are an infinite Company of Nut-trees, which of all Trees eſpecially require a cold ſoil: there are alſo abundance of Palms, which deſire great heat: likewiſe great ſtore of Figs and Olives, which require a temperate Air: ſo that one may juſtly ſay, that through the bounty of Nature, ſo different and oppoſite qualities are here in one united; and at one time, as it were, all difference of ſeaſons of the year conjoyned for good purpoſe. And it doth not only nouriſh theſe Fruits, but alſo conſerveth them for ten whole Months: there grow Figs and Grapes, which two one may well call the Kings of Fruits; all other fruits continue all the year long. For beſides the temperature of the Air, it is alſo watered by a fertile Fountain called Capernaum: many think it to be an Arm of Nilus, becauſe it hath Fiſhes like a Corbe bred in a Lake near Alexandria. The length of this Countrey along the Lake bearing the ſame name, is thirty Furlongs, and the breadth twenty. And this is the name of the Lake Genezar, and the Countrey about it.

How the Taricheans were deſtroyed.

Veſpaſian having finiſhed his ſhips, and furniſht them with as many men as he thought ſufficed againſt them whom he was to purſue, he embarqued upon the Lake, and himſelf alſo went againſt them. The Taricheans could not poſſibly make any eſcape by Land, although they would, and were not able to fight hand to hand with the Romans, for their ſmall Pyrate Boats were not able to withſtand their Enemies great Veſſels; and beſides that, they were not ſufficiently manned, ſo that they feared to encounter with the Romans who preſſed all together upon them: yet notwithſtanding ſometime they came about the Roman Ships, and caſt Stones at the Romans afar off, and ſometime alſo came neer, and Skirmiſhed with them: yet they themſelves always had more harm then the Romans; for their Stones which they caſt did only rattle againſt the Romans Armour, but hurt them not, and they were killed by the Romans Arrows: and if at any time they were ſo bold as to come near the Romans, they were ſlain before that they could do them any harm, or elſe drowned with their Boats. And as many as attempted to wound the Romans, were ſlain with Javelins, and other with Swords, the Romans leaping into their Boats; and many were taken with their Boats, the Ships meeting one another. They that were in the water and did lift up their heads to swim, were prevented with Arrows, or overtaken with Roman Boats: and if in desperation they came swimming towards their Enemies, their hands or heads were presently cut off. And thus some perished one way, some another, till at last they fled, and arrived upon the shore, their ships being compassed round about. So the Romans kill'd many upon the Lake, and many upon the Land, and one might then have seen all the Lake stained with blood full of dead bodies, for not one escaped alive. A few days after in that Countrey there was a very odious stink, and a horrible spectacle: for the shores were all full of Boats that had suffered shipwrack, and dead bodies swollen in the water: and those dead bodies taking heat, did putrifie and so corrupt the Air all about, that not only the whole Countrey and Inhabitants thought it a miserable affliction, but also the Romans who were the Authors thereof. And this was the end of that War by water. And the number of them that were slain here in the City, was 6500. The fight being ended, Vespasian sat in a Tribunal Seat, and separated the strangers from the Inhabitants, for that they seemed to be the Authors of that War: yet he deliberated with the Captains and Governours, whether he should likewise pardon them: but they told him that their lives might endamage him; for said they, if thou send those men away and let them live, they cannot live peaceably, because they want abiding places, and are able to disturb and disquiet those to whom they shall flie. Vespasian for this cause judged them unworthy to live; assuredly knowing that if they were let go, they would fight against them who pardoned their lives, yet he deliberated what death to put them to. But he thought with himself, the Inhabitants would not patiently abide so many to be massacred, who had fled unto them for succour, wherefore he sought to use no violence unto them, because he had promised them security. But at last he was overcome by the perswasion of his friends, who told him that all things against the Jews were lawful, and that profit was to be preferred before honesty, seeing both could not be had: so Licence being granted unto them to depart, they suspecting nothing, were commanded to take only that way that leadeth unto Tiberias: and they fearing nothing, willingly obeyed that which was commanded them, not misdoubting the safety of their goods or money: but the Romans had placed themselves on every side the way even unto Tiberias, to the intent that none might escape, and so shut them all in the City. Presently after came Vespasian and enclosed them all in an Amphitheater, and so killed 1200 of them, who were all old men or young, and unable for service: of the rest that were all strong young men, he sent 6000 unto Nero at Isthmos, neer Corinth. The rest of the multitude he sold, in number 30400, beside others that he gave unto Agrippa: for he permitted him to do what he would with those sorts that were of his Kingdome: But Agrippa sold also those that were given him. The rest of them were fugitives and seditious persons of Trachon, Gaulanitis, and Hippenis, and many of Gadara, whose contempt of peace justly procured these Wars. They were taken the sixth of the Ides of September.

How Gamala was beſieged.

The year of the World, 4031. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 69.

The Victory of the Romans againſt the Jews.

AFter that Tarichea was Conquered, all thoſe that from the time that Jotapata was ſurprized till this Inſtant, had revolted from the Romans, did now again unite themſelves unto them: ſo that the Romans had now gotten into their hands all Caſtles and Towns, Giſcala only excepted, and Itaburium, a Mountain ſo called. With theſe two rebelled Gamala, a Town over againſt Tarichea, and ſituate upon the Lake, belonging to the Kingdom of Agrippa, and alſo Sagane, and Seleucia: and theſe two laſt were both belonging to Gaulanitis, and Sagane appertained to the higher part called Gaulana, and Gamala unto the lower, Seleucia unto the Lake Semechonitis, which is thirty furlongs in breadth, and threeſcore large, whoſe Mariſhes reach even unto Daphne, which Countrey is very pleaſant of it ſelf, and famous for that it entertaineth the ſtream called little Jordan, and at the foot of the Golden Mountain doth drive it into the great Jordan. Agrippa in the beginning of the Rebellion, united Sagane and Seleucia unto himſelf: but Gamala, by reaſon of the ſituation apt to reſiſt, did not yield unto him, for it is far ſtronger then Jotapata. For, from an exceeding high Mountain, there deſcended a Hill very difficult for any to paſs, riſing high in the midſt, and then deſcended lower and lower, both before and behind, ſo that it repreſenteth the figure of a Camel, which the Hebrews call Gamal, and ſo thereof it took the name, though the Inhabitants do not keep the exact ſignification. Before it, and on either ſide are deep Vallies, into the which a man can hardly deſcend, only it may be taken and aſſaulted on that ſide where it joyneth unto the Mountain, which alſo the Inhabitants have made inacceſſible, by cutting out there a deep Ditch. In that place the City was very well inhabited on the deſcent of the Hill, and towards the South part it ſtood on ſo ſteep a Hill, that it ſeemed as if it would have faln every hour, and the South Hill ſerved the Inhabitants inſtead of a Caſtle, being unwalled: for it was an exceeding high Rock, and reached down even to the bottom of the Valley in the Town, and at the Walls thereof there was a Fountain. Although this City were of its own nature invincible, yet Joſeph compaſſing it with a Wall, and with Ditches and Mynes made it ſtronger. Wherefore the Inhabitants of this place put far more confidence in their Walls, then they of Jotapata did, yet were they fewer in number, and not ſo Warlike people as they; but for the ſituation of the City, they eſteemed themſelves more then their Enemies: for the City was full of men that fled thither by reaſon of the ſtrength of the place: ſo that for ſeven Months they reſiſted them that were ſent by Agrippa to beſiege them. Veſpaſian departed from Ammaus, and pitched his Tents before Tiberias, and ſo went unto Gamala, (Ammaus is interpreted hot waters, for there is a Fountain of hot water which cureth many Diſeaſes) and the City was ſo ſituate, that he could not beſiege it round about: wherefore he placed men to keep watch in ſuch places as it was paſſable, and obtained the higheſt Mountain, where his Souldiers pitching their Tents, laſtly entrenched themſelves. On the Eaſt part of the City in the moſt eminent place there was a Caſtle, where the fifteenth, and fifth Legions laboured againſt the Town, and the tenth Legion filled up the Ditches and Vallies. King Agrippa went unto the Walls, and ſpake unto them that defended them, willing them to yield to the Romans; but one of them with a ſling ſtruck him on the right Arm, and hurt him, and his familiar Friends came about him to defend him. Then the Romans, for anger that the King was hurt, and for fear of ſuch miſchances to themſelves, now became earneſt to aſſault the Town, perſwading themſelves that they would uſe ſtrangers and their Enemies hardly, if it lay in their lot, ſeeing they had ſo evil intreated one of their own Nation, for perſwading them unto what was profitable for them.

Having quickly entrenched themſelves by reaſon of the multitude that laboured in that buſineſs, and by reaſon that they were accuſtomed to ſuch like work, they began to place the engines againſt the town-walls. Chares and Joſeph were two of the moſt potent men in the town: they therefore animated and armed their Citizens, and brought them unto the walls, who trembled for fear. And although they well perceived that the City could not long hold out, ſeeing they wanted water, and many other things neceſſary to withſtand a ſiege; yet notwithſtanding, they exhorted the Townſmen to be valiant, and ſo brought them unto the walls, and a while they reſiſted, notwithſtanding the ſhot: but at laſt, they were therewith ſo terrified, that leaving the Walls, they fled into the City. Then the Romans did batter the Walls with Rams in three ſeveral places, and where the Wall fell, there they iſſued in with Trumpets

Trumpets and a great noiſe, and cryes, and fought with the Townſmen, who in the firſt conflict ſo valiantly reſiſted them, that they permitted them not to enter any further into the Town. At laſt being overcome both in ſtrength and number, they all fled into the higheſt part of the City, and from thence they turned again upon the Romans, who purſued them, and drave them down into the Vallies, and killed many, and divers in that ſtraight paſſage were trodden to death by their fellows. The Romans, ſeeing that they neither could flee, nor reſiſt their Enemies above their heads, fled into their houſes, which adjoyned unto the Plain, and ſo filled them, that being overcharged, they fell down, and lighted upon other houſes beneath them, which did beat them down alſo, and they likewiſe others ſituated beneath them. Many of the Romans this way periſhed; for being amazed, and not knowing what to do, they fled into their houſes, notwithſtanding they did ſee them ſhake and totter: and many ſeeking to eſcape, were maimed by ſome part of the ruines that fell upon their bodies, and many were choaked in the duſt. The Citizens of Gamala rejoyced thereat, thinking that this aid was ſent from God: and not regarding their private commodities, they ceaſed not to compel the Romans into their houſes; and if any were in the narrow ſtreets, them they ſlew with Darts from above out of the high places. Thus the ruines afforded them Stones enough, and their ſlain Enemies Swords and Armour, which they took from them, being now half dead, and uſed them againſt themſelves: many died, who caſt themſelves headlong from off the houſes being ready to fall, and thoſe that ſought to flee could not eaſily eſcape; for being ignorant of the ways, and there being ſuch a duſt that one could not ſee another, one of them killed another: and ſo with much ado finding paſſage, they went out of the City.

The Romans fall down with the ruins of the Jews houſes.

Many Romans ſlain and ſpoiled.

Veſpaſians fortitude and warlike valour.

Veſpaſian, who was always among the midſt of theſe hurly burlies, was greatly moved to ſee the Buildings fall ſo upon his Souldiers; and forgetting his own ſafety, he ſecretly retired himſelf with only a few into the higher part of the City, where he was left in great danger, having very few about him (for Titus his Son was not there, being before this time ſent unto Mutianus in Syria) and now he could not flee ſafely, nor yet had it been for his honour, if he could. Wherefore remembring all that he had done even from his Child-hood, and his own vertue, he encouraged his men, and with them joyned Arms, and covered themſelves with their Shields; and ſo as it were moved with ſome divine motion, defended themſelves from all Darts, Arrows, and ſtones, which were caſt from aloft upon them, and ſo remained there, not terrified either by the number or might of his Enemies, till at laſt, they wondring at his divine virtue and courage, aſſwaged their fury. And now perceiving his Enemies to aſſault him but faintly, he retired back, till at ſuch time as he got without the City Walls.

Veſpaſians fight with the Jews.

Many Romans periſhed in that fight, and amongſt the reſt, Ebutius a Decadarch, who not only in that fight ſhewed himſelf valiant, but alſo in many Wars before, and had done the Jews much harm. Alſo in that fight a certain Centurion, named Gallus, accompanied with ten Souldiers, hid themſelves in a houſe, and at ſupper-time he heard the people of that houſe talk, what the Citizens of Gamala were purpoſed to do againſt the Romans (this Gallus and they with him were Syrians) and in the night time he ſlew them all, and after he eſcaped ſafe unto the Romans. Veſpaſian perceived all his Army ſorrowful for that miſchance, and ſo much the more, for that they never as yet had ſo bad a breakfaſt, and eſpecially, for that they had forſaken their General, and left him in danger and diſtreſs; wherefore he thought it good to comfort them, nothing ſpeaking concerning himſelf, leſt he ſhould ſeem to find fault with ſome in the beginning of his ſpeech. Wherefore he told them, that it behoved them patiently to abide that which was common to all men, affirming that there was no victory without bloodſhed, & that fortune was mutable: and that he had already ſlain many thouſand Jews, and now had payed a ſmall bribe for his happy ſucceſs unto adverſe fortune. And that as it did not become any but vain-glorious people to boaſt in their proſperity, ſo it behoved none but cowards to fear and tremble in adverſity: For, ſaid he, 'Fortune is very 'mutable both to the good and bad, and he is a valiant man that is not moved by adverſity: 'for he, having all his wits about him, can even in the midſt of his troubles ſee where any 'fault is, and amend it. Yet (quoth he) this hath not befaln us through the weakneſs of our 'courage, or the valour and proweſs of the Jews, but the difficulty of the place was the 'cauſe that they ſhould overcome us, and we be overcome. Wherefore one may well re-'prehend the too much raſhneſs of your ſpirits: for when you ſaw your Enemies flee into 'the higher places, you ſhould then have held your hands, and not have purſued them 'with ſo manifeſt danger to your ſelves, as every one might foreſee in this purſuit; ſo you 'having gained the lower part of the City, you might in time have drawn them to a ſure and

A and ſafe conflict: but you, being eager of the Victory, did not reſpect your own ſafety. It is not the manner of the Romans raſhly and unadviſedly to fight, who are wont to do all things orderly and adviſedly: for the other is fit for barbarous people, and as you ſee proper to the Jews. Wherefore, let us call our own vertues to mind, and rather be angry for this that hath hapned (and ſo incite our ſelves to revenge) then ſorrowful. And let every valiant Souldier with his own hand comfort himſelf: ſo ſhall we both revenge the death of our friends, and be revenged of them by whom they were ſlain: and I my ſelf (as alſo now I did) will expoſe my ſelf to all dangers with you, and go firſt to fight, and come laſt from fight. With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches he comforted his Souldiers.

The Roman Souldiers do all things with diſcretion.

B The people of Gamala were of great courage, and much emboldned with their proſperous ſucceſs, which notwithſtanding did not happen through their valour: but preſently perceiving that now all hope of pardon was taken away, and that there was no way to eſcape, they were very ſorrowful, and their hearts relented (for now Victuals failed them) yet they omitted not to provide for their own ſafety wherein they could; for the moſt valiant among them kept the breach, and the reſt, other ſtrong places about the Walls which were yet unbattered. The Romans again built Mounts, and attempted to aſſault the City, and many of the Citizens fled by the Vallies where no guard was, and by ſecret Vaults underneath the ground; and they who for fear leſt they ſhould be taken, remained in the City, periſhed for hunger: for all the Victuals were reſerved for them that fought, and they C ſtill continued in this calamity.

How Placidus took the Mountain Itaburium.

DUring this ſiege, Veſpaſian made another expedition againſt them that kept the Mountain Itaburium, ſituate between the great field and Scythopolis, which is thirty Furlongs high, and inacceſſible on the North ſide. In the very top of this Mountain there is a Plain twenty Furlongs over, encloſed with a Wall: all which Wall being of ſo huge a compaſs, Joſeph had built in fourty dayes, they received all neceſſary proviſion from be- D neath, for they had only rain-water. Unto this place a huge multitude were gathered, and Veſpaſian ſent Placidus againſt them with ſix hundred Horſmen, who could no ways get upon the Mountain: wherefore he exhorted many of them to peace, putting them in hope of pardon: likewiſe many of the Jews came down unto him, as it were to entrap him, and aſſault him at unawares. Placidus purpoſely gave them fair Speeches, hoping to get them down into the Plain: ſo they, as though they would have obeyed him, followed him thither, meaning when they came there, ſuddenly to aſſault him: yet Placidus his device took place. For when the Jews aſſaulted him, he fained himſelf to flee, and the Jews having purſued him a great way from the Mountain, he turned again upon them, and wounded many on the backs as they fled, and killed ſome, and hindred the reſt of the E multitude from aſcending the Mountain: ſo the reſt left Itaburium, and fled unto Jeruſalem, and the Inhabitants (now water failing them) yielded to Placidus, and delivered the Mountain unto him.

How Gamala was deſtroyed.

NOw the moſt preſumptuous among the Gamalians fled and hid themſelves, and the weaker ſort did periſh through Famine: yet the moſt courageous that were left among them, defended the Wall till the twenty ſeventh day of October. Upon which F day, three Souldiers of the fifteenth Legion, towards break of the day, undermined the higheſt Tower in their quarter, and entred into it; thoſe that kept it, neither perceiving them when they came in, nor when they went out, (for it was in the night time.) Theſe Souldiers being wary leſt any noiſe ſhould be made, removed five of the greateſt ſtones, and preſently leapt away, and incontinently the Tower fell with a hideous noiſe, and with the fall killed thoſe that kept it; and many that kept watch in thoſe quarters fled, being ſore afraid; and they who ſought to eſcape the Romans, were killed; amongſt whom one Joſeph was ſtroken with a Dart from a part of the Wall that was faln down, and there dyed. They who were within the City were terrified with the noiſe hereof, and ran up and down as though all the Enemies were already entred into it. And Chares Joſephs Companion, being ſick, yielded up the Ghoſt, fear increaſing his Diſeaſe, and helping

Then Titus, as it were vexed at the misfortune of the Romans in his abſence, accompanied with 200 Horſmen, and certain choſen Footmen, entred the City, no man reſiſting him: and he being paſſed into the ſame, the watchmen then firſt perceiving it, cryed, To Arms. Thoſe within the City fearing that Titus was entred, ſome took their Children, ſome their Wives, and fled into the Caſtle with pitiful Cries and weeping: others met Titus, and were all put to the Sword: and they that could not get into the Caſtle, not knowing what to do, fell among the Roman watchmen: then the ſkies were filled with the cries of men dying, and the lower places of the City flowed with blood. Veſpaſian led his whole Army againſt thoſe that fled into the Caſtle, which was of a huge height, and ſcarcely to be come unto, being all of ſtone, and full of ditches and deep dens, and compaſſed with ſteepy rocks: ſo the Jews did drive down the Romans, that offered to come up unto them, partly with darts, partly with ſtones, which they rowled down upon them; and they were ſo high, that the Romans Arrows could not reach them. But at laſt, as it were by Gods providence, who would have it, a whirlwind aroſe, which carried the Romans Arrows amongſt them in the Caſtle, and the Jews Arrows from the Romans, and the wind was ſo violent, that it was not poſſible for them to ſtand upon thoſe high places: and ſo not being able to ſtand, nor to ſee thoſe that came againſt them, the Romans aſcended and took the Caſtle; ſome reſiſting for their defence, others yielding themſelves. The Romans now call to mind their fellows that periſhed in the firſt aſſault, and ſo become more cruel. Many deſparing of their lives, caſt their Wives, their Children, and themſelves headlong down thoſe high places, into the deep Vallies underneath. So that the cruelty that the Romans ſhewed againſt the people of Gamala, was not ſo great as that which they uſed againſt themſelves; for there were only four thouſand that periſht by the Romans Sword; and the number of them who ſo caſt themſelves down, was found to be five thouſand; and not one eſcaped, but two Women that were Siſters, and Daughters to Philip who was Son to Joachimus, a worthy man, and Governour over all Agrippa's Army under him; and theſe two were ſaved only, becauſe at ſuch time as the City was taken, they hid themſelves: for they ſpared not Infants, but many took them and caſt them down from the Caſtle. How Titus took Giſcala.

The year of the World, 4032. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 70.

NOw all the Cities and ſtrong places of Galilee were taken, Giſcala only excepted: the Inhabitants whereof deſired peace, for that they were Husbandmen, and their riches conſiſted in the Fruits of the Earth, but there were many Thieves in the City: to which Vice alſo many of the Citizens were addicted. The people were incited to Rebel by one John, a Witch, and a deceitful perſon, Son to one Levias; who was of ſtrange manners, and bold to preſume any thing, and wonderfully atchieving all he took in hand, and he was known to all men for one that deſired War, to make himſelf mighty. This man was a Ring-leader of the ſeditious perſons in Giſcala: and for fear of them, the people, who perhaps otherwiſe would have ſent Legates to the Romans, to requeſt peace, were hindred and forced to ſtay, till the Romans came to War againſt them. Againſt theſe people Veſpaſian ſent Titus, and with him a thouſand Horſmen; and the tenth Legion toward Scythopolis: and he with the reſt went to Cæſarea, to refreſh them after their great labour, at the charge of the Towns adjoyning; judging it neceſſary to comfort their Bodies, and encourage their minds to ſuſtain manfully the Wars that were to enſue: for he foreſaw that he ſhould have much ado to win Jeruſalem, both for that it was wont to be the Kings Seat, and alſo becauſe it was the Chief and head City of all the Nation. And his care in this point was ſo much the more encreaſt, for that he perceived many out of all parts fled thither; and that it was naturally ſtrong, and alſo compaſſed with almoſt invincible Walls: and beſides this, the boldneſs and deſperate courage of the Inhabitants, who although that they had had no walls at all, yet had been ſcarcely to be conquered: and therefore he thought it neceſſary to comfort his Souldiers before the fight, like Champions who ought to enter the field and fight couragiouſly.

John a Poyſoner and a deceitful man, inforceth the Citizens of Giſcala to Rebel.

Veſpaſian foreſeeth his no ſmall trouble in the ſiege of Jeruſalem.

Titus his compaſſion towards thoſe of Giſcala.

Titus (coming on Horſeback unto Giſcala) perceived that it might eaſily be taken: yet knowing that if it were taken by force, all the people ſhould be deſtroyed by the Romans (and now he was weary of bloodſhed) he compaſſionating the well diſpoſed people, which were were otherwiſe like to periſh together with the wicked, attempted to take it by condition. Wherefore the Walls being full of people, amongſt whom were many of the ſeditious, he told them that he marvelled what help they had or expected, or by whoſe advice, all other Cities being now taken, they alone would abide the laſt brunt of the Roman Forces, eſpecially when as they had already ſeen many Towns, far ſtronger then theirs, overthrown at the firſt aſſault: and contrariwiſe, thoſe who had yielded themſelves to the Romans, lived in peace, and peaceably enjoyed all that was theirs. Which offer (ſaid he) I now alſo make unto you, and am not yet incenſed againſt you, becauſe that which you do is for your liberty: but if (quoth he) you do ſtill perſevere in this impoſſible courſe, my diſpleaſure ſhall be kindled againſt you. And if ſo be they refuſed this kind offer, they ſhould preſently perceive the Roman ſword to be ſharpned for their deſtruction, and incontinently ſhould find that their Walls were but a mockery, and no ways able to reſiſt the Roman Engines: where contrariwiſe, if they yielded themſelves, and truſted to the fidelity of the Romans, they ſhould be the moſt happy people of all Galilee. None of the Townſmen were admitted to make anſwer, nor to come unto the Walls: for the thievs were maſters of them; and a guard was placed at every gate, leſt any one ſhould go forth to ſubmit themſelves, or any Horſmen ſhould be received into the City. Then John made anſwer, that he liked well of the conditions offered, and that he would either perſwade or compel the Inhabitants to accept of them, yet he requeſted, that that day might be granted unto the Jews: for it was the ſeventh day, wherein it was not lawful for them to entreat of peace, nor make War. For (as the Romans knew) the Jews every ſeventh day ceaſt from all work: and which if they profaned, they who cauſed it to be abuſed, though it were Titus himſelf, were as great offenders as they who were forced to it. Moreover, ſo ſhort time could not prejudice the Romans, to wit, one nights ſpace: for nothing he could effect in that time to endamage them, except only by fleeing out of the City (which Titus might prevent by placing a ſtrong guard, and watch in every place thereabout) and that he thought it a great priviledge to be ſuffered to keep the cuſtom of his Countrey; and that it was his part, who offered peace and ſafety to them that expected it, and alſo to keep their Laws whoſe ſafety he granted. With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches John ſought to delude Titus, being not ſo religious about the keeping of the Sabbath, as careful for his own ſafety: for he feared that the City would preſently be taken, and he left alone, and ſo he determined in that night to flee, as the only way to ſave his life. Truly God would have it ſo, that John ſhould then eſcape, to be the overthrow of Jeruſalem, and that Titus ſhould not only grant him the time he requeſted to deliberate, but alſo that night ſhould pitch his Tents neer Cydæſſa, by the higher part of the Town, which is the ſtrongeſt Village of all that are in the heart of the Tyrian ſoil, which the Galileans always hated. In the night time John perceiving no Romans to keep watch about the town, having now opportunity, fled not only with the armed men about him, but alſo with many of the Chief of the City, and whole Families, whom he promiſed to conduct unto Jeruſalem. But John fearing captivity, and careful for his own ſafety, having carried them twenty Furlongs out of the City, forſook them: who being ſo left deſolate, began grievouſly to lament. For every one thought himſelf as near his enemies, as he was far from the City and his friends: and ſtill every ſtep they thought their enemies at hand, ready to take them, and ever they lookt back, as though their enemies heard the noiſe they made as they went, and ſo came againſt them; inſomuch that many ruſhed forwards on heaps, & many were killed in the way with the preſs of them that followed; ſo that women and infants did periſh miſerably: or if they ſpake any thing, only it was entreating their parents or their kinsfolk to ſtay for them.

But Johns Exhortation took effect, wherein he cried unto them to ſave themſelves, and haſten unto ſuch a place, where they might be ſafe, and revenge themſelves of the Romans, for the outrages which they that remained behind were like to endure: and ſo the multitude that fled, every one as he was able, diſperſed themſelves. Titus early in the morning came unto the Walls to know whether they accepted of his offer. Then the people ſet open the gates, and with their wives and children came to meet him, all crying that he was their ſafety, and worker of their welfare, and that he had delivered their City out of Captivity: alſo they certified him how John was fled, and beſought him to pardon them, and execute juſtice upon thoſe malefactors that remained in the City. And at their requeſt, he ſent certain Horſmen to purſue John, but they could not take him, for before they came, he had gotten into Jeruſalem; yet they ſlew almoſt two thouſand of them that fled with him, and brought back again 3000 women and children. Titus was angry that he ſuffered Johns deceit to eſcape unpuniſhed: yet his anger was ſomething appeaſed, for that he perceived Johns purpoſe prevented, in that ſo many of his company were ſlain, and ſo many brought back their captives.

Thus he peaceably entred the City, commanding the Souldiers to break down a little piece of the Wall, as it were to take poſſeſſion of it, and ſo puniſht the ſeditious rather with threats then torments. For he thought that many were accuſed only for private hatred, and ſo were in danger to ſuffer being innocent: and he thought it better to let the wicked live in fear, then with them to deſtroy the guiltleſs. Thinking moreover, that hereafter they would be more quiet, either for fear of puniſhment, or for ſhame of their former offence, for which they were pardoned: and that if any man ſuffered unworthily, he could not afterward complain. Then he placed there a Garriſon, both to repreſs the ſeditious, and alſo to confirm them that deſired peace. And thus was Galilee conquered after it had much toiled the Romans.

CHAP. V.

Of the beginning of the Deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

SO ſoon as John was entred into Jeruſalem, all the people flocked about him and thoſe that came with him, enquiring what calamity had befaln them without the City. Some of them being yet out of breath, and not able to ſpeak, by ſigns diſcovered their neceſſity: yet amidſt theſe their miſeries, they boaſted that it was not the Roman power that forced them to flee, but that they of their own accord fled thither to War againſt the Romans in a ſafer place, then that from whence they fled, was; for none but unadviſed and raſh-headed men would fight for ſuch a City as Giſcala and other places that were not able to reſiſt, ſeeing that it behoved them all to reſerve their vigour and ſtrength to defend their Metropolitan City. They alſo ſignified unto them how Giſcala was taken by the Romans, and that they departed in good ſort away, though ſome reported that they fled. The people of Jeruſalem hearing what theſe men reported, and how many were Captives unto the Romans, they fell into a great fear, as though that which they told did portend their ruine. But John nothing aſhamed in that he had ſo ſhamefully forſaken them of Giſcala who fled with him, went firſt to one, and then to another, inciting them all to War under a vain hope, alledging the weakneſs of the Romans, and extolling their own puiſſance, deceiving the ſimple people; and perſwading them, that though the Romans ſought to revenge, yet could they never enter the Walls of Jeruſalem, who had ſo much ado, and endured ſuch affliction in entring the little Burges and Villages of Galilee, againſt whoſe Walls they had broken all their Engines. Theſe words of his, incited many young men to ſedition: but all the wiſer ſort foreſaw what was like to enſue, and even now mourned their loſt City. And in this caſe were they of Jeruſalem: yet before this ſedition in the City, the Countrey people began to be at diſcord among themſelves. For Titus departed from Giſcala unto Cæſarea, and Veſpaſian went from Cæſarea to Jamnia and Azotus, and took them both: and leaving there Garriſons, he returned to Cæſarea, bringing with him a huge Company of them who had yielded unto him. All Cities were at Civil Wars among themſelves, ſo that when the Romans did not War upon them, one part of the Jews in every City fought againſt the other, and there was a great diſſention between thoſe that deſired peace, and the ſeditious people: and at firſt, this diſcord began only in private houſes; but in the end, every one joining with them that were of their mind, they now began in Companies to Rebel openly. Thus every place was troubled with civil diſcord: and every where raſh young men, who deſired Wars, prevailed againſt grave and wiſe old men, who foreſeeing the calamity like to enſue, deſired peace. At firſt, the Inhabitants one by one robb'd and ſpoiled what they could; but at laſt in whole Troops they joyned together, and robbed openly, and waſted all the Countrey about: and they in their robberies ſhewed ſuch cruelty, that the harm and injury they did unto their own Countrey-men, was altogether equal to the miſeries which befel them by means of the Romans; and they, who by theſe miſcreants were ſpoiled, wiſhed rather to have faln into the Romans hands. But they who kept the City, either becauſe they were loth to weary themſelves, or elſe for that they hated the Citizens or people, did nothing or very little ſuccour them that fell into theſe thieves hands. At laſt the thieves aſſembled themſelves together from all places, and joyning Companies, they brake into Jeruſalem. This City had no Governous, and according to the Cuſtom of that Countrey, received all that came thither that were their Countrey-men; and ſo much more willingly at that time, becauſe they thought that they that came thither, came of good will to help them: which only was afterward the cauſe that the City was deſtroyed, ſetting aſide the civil diſſention. For a great multitude of people unapt to fight being there, conſumed the Victuals that would have ſufficed for the fighting men: and beſide the Wars, they brought upon it Famine and civil diſſention. Then other thieves came out of the fields thereabout, and joining themſelves with thoſe that were within the City, omitted no kind of Villany: for not content to rob and ſpoil, they they alſo attempted to commit murders, not only privily, or in the night upon mean men, but even in the day time they publickly ſet upon the chiefeſt of the Nobility. For firſt of all they took Antipas, who was born of the blood Royal, a man ſo eminent amongſt them, that the publick treaſure was committed to his charge and Cuſtody, and put him in Priſon: and after him they took Sepha a worthy man, and Son to Raguel and Lævia, both of them of the Kings Houſhold, and after them all that ſeemed to bear any ſway, or were in Authority amongſt the people. Great fear fell upon the Inhabitants, and every one provided to ſave himſelf, as though the City were even now ſurprized by the Enemies. But theſe people were not content thus to have impriſoned thoſe Potentates, neither did they think it ſafety for themſelves any longer to detain ſuch men alive: for many came daily unto them to viſit them, and unto their houſes, who were able to revenge their injuries: and moreover they feared that the people would make a head againſt them, being moved with their Iniquity. Wherefore they determined to kill them: and to effect their purpoſe, they ſent one John a cruel murderer, who was the Son of Dorcas: he accompanied with ten more all having ſwords went unto the Priſon, and ſlew as many as they found there. To excuſe this cruel fact of theirs, they alledged this, to wit, that all they who were ſlain in Priſon had conference with the Romans concerning the betraying of the City into their hands, and that for this cauſe they had ſlain them, being Traitors to their Countrey: they alſo boaſted that this fact of theirs had preſerved the City, and that therefore they had well deſerved of it. The people were brought unto ſuch ſlavery and terrour, that the chuſing of the high Prieſt was in their hands, to elect whom they pleaſed: ſo much was their inſolence increaſed. Thus they not reſpecting the Families, out of which it was only lawful to chuſe the high Prieſt, they now elected ſtrangers and baſe perſons to that ſacred dignity, and ſuch as would be partakers of their Villanies and impieties: for they who not deſerving it, attained to ſuch dignity, were as it were bound unto their will in all things by whom they were ſo exalted. They alſo deviſed many lies, to make thoſe that were in Authority one at variance with another, thereby as it were to hold them occupied, who were able to reſiſt their enterprizes, till that being now ſatisfied with the blood of the Citizens, they began to commit impiety againſt God himſelf, and with prophane and unpure feet to enter into the Sanctuary. Then the people were incited againſt them by Ananus his means, who was one of the Prieſts, and the moſt ancient and wiſeſt of them all, who perhaps had ſaved the City, had he eſcaped the hands of theſe miſcreants. But they uſed the Temple as a Caſtle and defence for themſelves againſt the people, and made the ſanctuary a place for them to exerciſe Tyranny in. And that which increaſed the ſorrow of the Citizens, was, that amidſt theſe calamities, their Religion was alſo contumeliouſly abuſed: for theſe Thieves, to try of what ſtrength and courage the people were, and their own forces, did elect by lot a high Prieſt contrary to their Law: which as we have already ſaid, requireth that the high Prieſt ſhall be choſen by ſucceſſion. This deed of theirs they coloured with an ancient Cuſtom, alledging that in time paſt the high Prieſt was choſen by lot, but indeed this their fact was an abrogation of the moſt firm Cuſtom that was amongſt the people; and was only a device to get all government into their hands by eſtabliſhing Magiſtrates at their pleaſure.

Then calling one of the holy Tribes named Eniachin, they caſt lots, & it ſo fell out that the lot fell upon one, whereby their iniquity was diſcovered. This man whoſe lot it was to be high Prieſt was named Phanes, who was the Son of Samuel, a man not only unworthy of that dignity; but who had been ſo rudely brought up, that he never knew what the high Prieſt meant: this Phanes was born in a Village called Apthaſis. Him, againſt his will they fetcht out of the field, and as it had been in a Stage-Play they graced him with another mans perſon, and preſently gave him inſtructions how he ſhould behave himſelf, putting upon him the ſacred attire of the high Prieſt, as though that ſo great impiety had been but a ſport. The reſt of the Prieſts, beholding afar off the holy laws to be ſcorned, ſcarcely contained themſelves from tears, and even groaned for ſorrow, that their ſacred dignities were ſo abuſed. The people could no longer indure this their Tyranny, but now every one addreſt himſelf to depoſe theſe Tyrants. And thoſe that were moſt earneſt herein, were Gorion Joſephs Son, and Simeon the Son of Gamaliel, who went about the City to every one in private, and then in a publick aſſembly exhorted the people to be revenged upon thoſe Tyrants, who took from them their liberty; and to addreſs themſelves to purge the holy Temple from ſuch vile and unclean perſons. Likewiſe the beſt diſpoſed amongſt the Prieſts, to wit, Jeſus the Son of Gamala, and Ananus, the Son of Ananus, often in publick Sermons reprehended the people, and upbraided them with their ſloth, in that they made no more haſt to deſtroy thoſe Zealous people; for ſo thoſe wretches termed themſelves, as though they had been

Then Ananus ſtood up amongſt the midſt of them: and having often turned his Eyes to the Temple, and beheld it till the tears ran down his Cheeks; 'Oh, ſaid he, how far better 'were it for me to die, then to live, to ſee the Houſe of God thus filled with impiety, and the 'Sanctuary, wherein none ſhould come but the high Prieſt, prophaned with the wicked feet 'of impious perſons, being clothed in Prieſts apparel, and bear the name of the moſt authority amongſt all names? and do I yet live, and do I ſave my ſelf, and to be gray-headed, abſtain H 'from dying a glorious death? Nay, rather I alone will go againſt theſe murderers, and as 'though I were in a wilderneſs where there were no man beſide my ſelf, I alone will go and 'offer my ſoul for Gods ſake. For what doth it avail me to live amongſt a people, that hath 'no feeling of their own calamity, and which ſeeketh not to redreſs their own preſent miſeries? for you being robbed and ſpoiled bear all patiently, and being beaten you hold your 'peace, and there is none amongſt you that dare openly mourn for them that are moſt cruelly murdered. O tyrannous government! But why ſhould I exclaim againſt the tyrants? 'Did not you your ſelves make them great, and nouriſh their power and authority by your 'patience? Did not you, by deſpiſing thoſe who before were in authority being but a few, 'make all theſe, who are many in number, tyrants over your ſelvs? have not you keeping your 'ſelves quiet, they being armed, turned their ſwords upon your own heads? and as then it behoved you to reſiſt their enterprizes, when firſt they injured your kindred; you by ſuffering, 'have made them thieves, becauſe at firſt you made no account, when they deſtroyed houſes 'and whole families. And this was the cauſe, that at laſt the rulers and potentates themſelves 'were ſet upon, and none would ſuccour them when they were drawn thorow the midſt of 'the City, and theſe murderers butchered them in priſon whom you thus betrayed. I will not 'recount what men they were, and of what birth: but I ſay, they being neither accuſed nor 'condemned, having no man to hear them, they were moſt cruelly murdered, as we have 'ſeen any: for they were before our faces led to be ſlain, as the fatteſt amongſt the whole herd 'of beaſts, all we beholding this: and yet no man opening his mouth, nor lifting up his hand. K 'And will you alſo endure? will you ſuffer the holy Sanctuary to be prophaned before your 'Eyes? and will you, having ſo emboldned theſe miſcreants as ye ſee now, your ſelves 'ſtand in fear of them? aſſure your ſelves, they would, if they could deviſe how, commit greater impiety then this is. They keep againſt you the ſtrongeſt place in the whole 'City, called a Temple, but now indeed it is a fortreſs or Caſtle of defence. What do you 'now think, ſuch a Tyranny being eſtabliſhed over you, and your Enemies being even upon 'you; what do you deliberate to do? Do you expect the Romans to come and help you, 'to ſave the Temple and ſacred myſteries? Our City is now at that ſtay, and we have ſo 'behaved our ſelves, that our very Enemies pity us. O ye wretches! will you not ariſe, 'and as the very brute Beaſts do, will you not revenge your ſelves upon them that have L 'thus wounded you? Will not every one of you call to mind the Maſſacre of his friends, 'and what Calamity he himſelf hath ſuffered, and ſo encourage your ſelves to be revenged? For ought I can ſee, you have all loſt that ſacred, and ſweet, and natural deſire 'of liberty, and now we imbrace bondage, as though we had learned to be bondmen even 'from our Anceſtors. But they endured many and hard Wars to live in liberty, and 'yielded neither to the power of the Egyptians, nor Medes, becauſe they would not be 'at their command. What need is it to recount unto you the Wars of your Predeceſſors? 'to what end do we enterprize this War againſt the Romans (be it commodious for us, or 'to our diſadvantage) if not to obtain our liberty? And we, who cannot indure to be 'ſubject unto the Lords of the whole World, abide our own Nation to Tyrannize over us. M 'Some may account it adverſe Fortune to be once overcome by ſtrangers; but to be 'ſlaves unto the baſeſt of our own Nation, it argueth that we have no ſpark of generoſity 'in us, and that we bear baſe and ſervile minds: And ſeeing I have made mention of the 'Romans, I will not ſtick to declare unto you that which now cometh to my mind, to wit, 'that if we be taken by them (which God forbid) yet ſhall we ſuffer no greater miſery at their 'hands, then now we do under theſe baſe Tyrants. And how can you abſtain from tears, 'beholding this Temple, enriched by the gift of the Romans, robbed and ſpoiled by them 'of our own Nation, this being our mother City? and to ſee thoſe men murthered, whom 'the Romans (although they had conquered us) would not have touched? The Ro- 'mans never durſt preſume to paſs beyond the limits of prophane places, nor ever vio- 'lated

An anſwer to their contrary opinion, who object the number and boldneſs of the Enemy.

The Epilogue of Ananus Oration to the people.

Ananus thus exhorted the people againſt the Zealous, yet he knew well that it was great difficulty to overcome them, being luſty young men, many in number, of great courage, and the more deſperate for the remorſe of conſcience of the horrible crimes, and execrable deeds which they had committed; for they deſpaired of all hope of pardon for their miſdeeds. Yet Ananus thought it altogether intolerable that the Common-wealth ſhould be ſo over-ruled. After this exhortation the people cried out, that they were ready to go againſt the Thieves, and to do as they were requeſted. Whilſt that Ananus ſelected out the moſt able men for War, and ſet them in order, the Zealous came and iſſued out upon him, and (having intelligence of all his intents and proceedings by certain ſpies which they had appointed upon purpoſe) being enraged ſallied out, and in companies, ſometime all at once, other times in ambuſhes; ſparing none that they met with. Ananus quickly gathered together the people, who were more in number then the Thievs: yet were they not ſo well armed as they; but what they wanted in arms, their courage did ſupply. For the citizens were armed with fury, ſtronger then armour; and they which were gone out of the Temple, with a more deſperate boldneſs, then all the multitude how great ſoever it was. For the Citizens thought it no abiding for them in the City, except they could drive away the Zealous: and the Zealous thought that they could not eſcape torments and death it ſelf, except that they were victors. So at laſt they joyned battel, each under their Captains and Leaders, and firſt of all both parties caſt ſtones one againſt another: and if any part fled, then the Conquerours purſued them with drawn ſwords, and many were wounded and ſlain on both parts. Thoſe townſmen that were wounded, were by their friends carried into their houſes; but the Zealous that were hurt, went into the Temple, and polluted the ſacred pavements with their bloud: ſo that their Religion was prophaned by their bloud. Alwayes the thieves in making excurſions got the upper hand. Hereat the Citizens being angry, ſeeing their number every day decreaſed, reproved the cowards: ſo that if any of their company offered to flie from the Zealous, they made him ſtand and reſiſt whether he would or no, nor permitting him to paſs away: and thus they bent all their forces againſt their Enemies. At laſt, the Thieves not able to make any longer reſiſtance, by little and little retired themſelves into the Temple, and Ananus with his Company entred the Temple by force with them, and brake the rank of his Enemies. Then they in the outer Temple were in great fear and fled into the Inner Temple; and ſhut the Gates with all ſpeed. Ananus would not offer violence to the ſacred Gates, and beſide that the Enemies caſt darts from aloft: for he thought it a great offence againſt God, although he might have got the victory, to introduce the people not being purified. Wherefore he elected ſix thouſand of the chief of all his men well armed, and appointed them to keep the Porches, and others to ſucceed in their places while they took reſt. And many of the better ſort of the Citizens being by the chief of the City placed to keep watch there, hired other poor folks to watch in their ſteads. But John, who as before we have told, fled from Giſcala, wrought the ruine of all theſe. This man being full of deceit, and above all meaſure deſirous of rule, long ago intended to overthrow the Common-wealth. This man from that time counterfeited himſelf to be againſt the Thieves, and ſo day and night accompanied Ananus and the reſt, both in their conſultations, and when they went to viſit the watch; and he diſcloſed all their ſecrets unto the Zealous: and there was nothing decreed by the people, but he gave the Thieves intelligence thereof before it was put in practice; yet he ſeemed to be very dutiful unto Ananus, and the reſt of the Nobility, hereby hoping to conceal his Treachery. But it fell out contrary to his expectation; for this his too much reverence cauſed him to be ſuſpected, becauſe they noted him to play the paraſite: and for that uncalled, he daily intruded himſelf into their conſultations, he was miſdoubted to bewray their ſecrets. For Ananus perceived that the Enemies knew all their ſecrets, and Johns deeds did carry ſuſpition of treaſon, yet could they not eaſily remove him, his craft was ſuch: beſides this, he was bouſtered out by many noble men who were employed in theſe affairs. Wherefore they thought it good to requeſt of him an oath of friendſhip; which he denied not, but added moreover that he would be true unto the people, and neither diſcloſe any deed or ſecret counſel of theirs unto the Enemies, and that he with heart and hand, would truly endeavour to ſuppreſs the Rebels. So Ananus did no more miſtruſt him, becauſe of his oath, and admitted him afterward to all their counſels, nothing ſuſpecting him. Nay, they now truſted him ſo far, that they ſent him for an Ambaſſadour unto the Zealous, to perſwade them to peace: for they were very careful leſt the Temple through their deeds ſhould be defiled and prophaned, or that any of the Jews ſhould there be ſlain. But he, as though he had ſworn unto the Zealous and not unto the Citizens, entred boldly amongſt them: and ſtanding in the midſt of them, he recounted unto them that he had often for their ſakes undergone great danger, in ſuffering none of the Townſmens ſecrets to be concealed from them, but declared unto them all that ever Ananus and his confederates determined againſt them; and that even now he was like together with them to fall into extream danger, except it pleaſed God as it were miraculouſly to aſſiſt them. For, ſaid he, now Ananus without delay will ſend unto Veſpaſian, and he will ſend his Army in all haſte and take the City: and that he had appointed the next day following for purification to purifie the people, that ſo under pretence of piety he might let them into the City, or elſe they might enter in by force: and that he could not ſee how either they were able to endure a long ſiege, or to encounter with ſo huge an Army: adding moreover, that it was Gods providence that he ſhould be ſent unto them to make a peace, when Ananus purpoſed ſo ſoon as they were unarmed to ſet upon them. Wherefore if they had any care of themſelves, they ſhould either entreat the watchmen that beſieged them to be good unto them, or elſe get ſome ſuccour from ſome place without the Temple. For (ſaid he) he that amongſt you hopeth for pardon if you be overcome, doth not remember what hath paſt, and what he hath done; but let them perſwade themſelves, they that have been injured, will not forget and forgive ſo ſoon, as he that injured them is ſorry for his fact. Nay, many times the repentance of malefactors maketh them more hated then before, and the wrath of men that are injured, is increaſed by Authority, and licence to do what they pleaſe. And they might be ſure that the friends and kinsfolks of them that were ſlain, would always lay wait to requite the injuries; and that all the people were incenſed againſt them for breaking the laws: ſo that although ſome few would take pity upon them, yet the greater company being moſt in number would prevail. With theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches John terrified the Zealous, yet durſt he not openly tell them what he meant by forreign help, notwithſtanding he meant the Idumæans. And that he might more enflame the Thieves, he went unto the chiefeſt of them, and ſecretly told them that Ananus was cruelly bent againſt them, and breathed out many threatnings againſt them in particular.

CHAP. VI.

How the Idumæans came unto Jeruſalem, and what they did there.

AMongſt the Zealous there were two principal, Eleazar the Son of Simon, who above all the reſt was thought moſt fit to give counſel, and to execute that which was conſulted upon: and Zacharias the Son of Amphicalus, who both deſcended from the line of the Prieſts. Theſe two, underſtanding, that beſide the general threatnings, their deaths were eſpecially vowed, and that the faction of Ananus to get him into Authority, had ſent to call the Romans (for this John had fained Eleazer one of the Zealous cauſeth the Idumæans to be ſent for.

A fained) deliberated with themſelves what to do, having ſo ſhort time to provide. For they ſuppoſed that preſently the people would aſſault them, and they bethought themſelves that now it was too late to ſeek foreign help: for they might endure all calamity, before they could give notice hereof unto any that would help them. Yet at laſt they determined to call the Idumæans to aid them, and ſo they wrote a brief Epiſtle unto them, letting them underſtand how Ananus, having ſeduced the people, meant to betray the Mother-City of their nation unto the Romans; and that they fighting for their liberty, were by him beſieged in the Temple: that the time wherein they expected ſafety was very ſhort: and that if they did not preſently ſend ſuccour, they were like to fall into Ananus and their enemies hands, and the City to be brought in ſubjection under the Romans: and alſo committed B many things to be ſpoken by word of mouth unto the Rulers of Idumæa. For which purpoſe were choſen two principal men eloquent, and apt to perſwade; and that, which was in this caſe required, ſwift of foot: it was certain that the Idumæans would preſently aid them, it being a clowniſh rude nation, and prone to ſedition and alteration, much rejoycing therein, and by flattery eaſily entreated to wars, making as much haſte to them, as if they went to ſome feſtival ſolemnity: ſo that there only was required two ſpeedy meſſengers. Which two were ready and quick men for ſuch an exploit, and were both called by the name of Ananias. Theſe preſently came unto the Governours of Idumæa: and they reading the Epiſtle, and hearing that which the meſſengers were to ſay unto them, like mad men aſſembled all the people together in poſt haſte, and proclaiming wars; ſo the people in an inſtant gathered themſelves together, and were all armed to fight for the liberty of C their Mother-City: and twenty thouſand being aſſembled together under the government of four Captains, came with all ſpeed to Jeruſalem: the names of them were theſe, John and James, ſons of Soſa, and Simon the ſon of Cathla, and Phineas the ſon of Cloſoth. Ananus and his watchmen knew not of the going of thoſe two meſſengers, nor of the watches in the City, but they underſtood of the Idumæans coming, and ſo ſhut the gates and placed watchmen upon the walls: yet they thought it not good to go out and fight with them, but firſt with peaceable words to perſwade them to concord and peace. Wherefore Jeſus the eldeſt of the Prieſts next after Ananus, ſtood in a tower oppoſite againſt them, and ſpake in this manner:

The year of the world, 4032, after Chriſts Nativity, 70.

The Zealous require help from the Idumæans.

The nature and manners of the Idumæans.

Twenty thouſand Idumæans come to Jeruſalem.

Though many and divers tumults and troubles have moleſted this City, yet did I never D ſo much admire any of them, as to come with ſuch fury and readineſs to help theſe wicked people, againſt all expectation: for (ſaid he) you are come againſt us to help moſt vile perſons: and that ſo raſhly, as it behoved not you to have done, if your Metropolitan City had requeſted your help againſt barbarous people. If I ſhould perceive your manners like unto theirs that have requeſted your help, I would then think you had ſome reaſon to come, for nothing cauſeth firmer friendſhip then agreement or ſympathy in manners. But they if they were narrowly ſought into, have every one deſerved a thouſand deaths. For they are the baſeſt and very out-caſt of all the countrey people; who having ſpent their patrimonies riotouſly, and played the thieves in all places and Cities about them, now at laſt have got into this holy City, moſt religious of all E Cities, and have profaned the holy place by their impiety: they tremble not to be drunk even in the holy Temple, and there they conſume in banqueting the ſpoils they had gotten from them, whom they have maſſacred. And you come to help theſe men with as great an Army and Proviſion, as though that this your Mother-City had by publick conſent requeſted your help againſt forreign enemies: Is not this the injury of fortune, that your whole nation hath conſpired and bent all their forces againſt us to help theſe miſcreants? Till now I knew not what moved you ſo quickly and ſo ſuddenly to arm your ſelves to aſſiſt thieves againſt your native countreymen. What? Have you been informed of the Romans coming, and of the betraying of the City? For even now I heard ſome of you mutter, that you came to deliver your Mother-City. Is it not a wonder to ſee this device and invention of theſe malefactors? But they could deviſe no other way to incite other againſt us (who even naturally deſire liberty, and are ready F for the ſame to ſpend our deareſt blood in conflict with the enemy) but to fain us to be deſtroyers of liberty: But it behoveth you to conſider who are theſe calumniators, and againſt whom theſe calumniations are deviſed; and then to gather the verity of the matter, not from forged tales, fained at mens pleaſures, but from the thing it ſelf. What ſhould move us now to yield unto the Romans, having endured as yet nothing to conſtrain us thereunto? when if we had liked to live under their obedience, neither needed we at firſt to have rebelled; and beſide that, if we had repented our ſelves, we might have again ſubmitted our ſelves, and obtained their favour before this time that all the countrey round about us is deſtroyed. Nay, if we now would would yield, it is not eaſie for us : for the ſpoil of Galilee which they having already conquered, hath made them proud, and that we in humbling our ſelves unto them, being near unto us, ſhould incur an infamy worſe then death it ſelf. True it is, I think, peace better then wars; yet being once provoked to wars, and the fight being begun, I had rather die a glorious death then to live in Captivity. Do they inform you that we have ſecretly ſent the chief of our City to the Romans, or that by common conſent of all the people we have done it? If they ſay that we did it ſecretly; let them then tell what friends of ours were ſent, or what ſervants of ours were Miniſters to effect this treaſon. Did they take any meſſenger of ours and find letters about him? How can that be hid from all our Citizens, with whom we do every hour converſe? And is it poſſible that a few, ſhut up in the Temple, who could not come out into the City, ſhould know our ſecrets, all the whole City knowing nothing? or do they now firſt know it when they are like to be puniſhed for their impiety? never ſuſpecting any of us to be traytors, ſo long as they were in no fear. If they ſay that it was done by common conſent of all the people, why then all men were there when the ſpeech was made unto the people, to exhort them thereunto, and requeſt their good wills, and ſo the news thereof would quickly have come unto your ear: Or what need had we to ſend Embaſſadours, if we had been now already certain to come to compoſition with the Romans? Let them tell you who was appointed for that Embaſſage. Theſe are but devices and excuſes of them, who fear to have a death according to their deſerts, and a ſhift to eſcape puniſhment.

If fate had ſo decreed that our City ſhould be betrayed unto the enemy, aſſure your ſelves that they, who do thus accuſe us, would have betrayed it themſelves; who have committed already all ſort of impieties, treaſon only excepted. It is your part, ſeeing you are come hither in arms, firſt (as reaſon and juſtice requireth) to aſſiſt your mother-City againſt them who tyrannize over us, and violate our laws: who treading down our laws, make all that juſtice, which they can effect with their ſword. And firſt of all they took noble men and caſt them into priſon, drawing them from amidſt the publick aſſembly; and never being accuſed nor condemned, nothing reſpecting their entreaties, put them to death. If it pleaſe you to come in peaceable and not hoſtile manner into our City, your ſelves ſhall plainly behold evident tokens of this that I ſpeak unto you: to wit, houſes ruinated and made deſolate by their robberies, the wives and families of them that are ſlain, in mourning apparel, and howling and crying in every part of the City: for there is no one amongſt us, that hath not taſted the perſecution of theſe wretched men, who are gone ſo far, that not content to make this City their refuge (which is the chief, and a ſpectacle to all others for ſanctity, after they had robbed and ſpoiled all the Country and Villages, and Cities hereabout, now laſtly they have made the ſacred Temple a refuge and place to carry all their ſpoils unto, which they have impiouſly gotten in this City. This Temple they make their bulwark to iſſue out and to retire unto; and from thence they make incurſions upon the Citizens: and this is the place where they practiſe their villanies againſt us. And this ſacred place, which all the world, even the moſt barbarous and ſavage people thereof do reverence, is now defiled by the horrible robberies which one born amongſt us committed. And now being in deſperation, they rejoyce to ſee nation againſt nation, and City againſt City, and people againſt people, and our own Countreymen to turn themſelves againſt their own bowels: when contrariwiſe, (as I have already ſaid) it had been your parts and duties to joyn with us, and help us to exterminate theſe malefactors; and be revenged of them for this lie, in that they preſumed to call you to help them, whom they had juſt reaſon to fear as revengers of their impieties: yet if you make account of theſe mens prayers, vouchſafe (laying your weapons aſide) to come into our City like Friends, and be your ſelves judges between us and them whom you came to help. And conſider what favour we ſhew them, who permit them to plead their own cauſes before you, they being guilty of ſo hainous crimes, and having put to death perſons of ſuch account, never accuſed nor permitted to ſpeak for themſelves: yet this commodity we will grant them for your ſake. But if you continue in your anger againſt us, and refuſe this offer to be our judges: then let us entreat you that, leaving both parts, you would neither imbrue your hands in our blood, nor lend your aid unto thoſe miſcreants againſt your Mother-city. And if you ſuſpect any of us to be confederates with the Romans, you may keep all paſſages, and then ſeek to defend your Metropolis, when you have proof of any ſuch matter as is alledged againſt us; and puniſh the Authors of that Treaſon, when you have convicted them. The enemies cannot prevent you being already planted ſo near the City. If you like none of theſe, marvel not that we ſhut our gates againſt you, coming in armed and hoſtile manner. Jeſus ſpake thus unto them. But the Idumæans being angry, were not moved hereby, and ſo much the more, for that entrance into the City was denied them, and their Generals were exceeding wroth, thinking it ſlavery to lay down their arms, eſpecially at the command of another.

Then

A Then one of the Captains named Simon, the ſon of Cathla, having with much ado gotten his ſouldiers to be ſilent, he ſtood in a place where the Prieſts might hear him, and ſaid, 'That he now did not wonder that thoſe who maintained liberty, were encloſed and be-'ſieged in the Temple, ſeeing that they of the City now ſhut their gates againſt his fellows, 'the City being common and free for all men; and that perhaps they were ready to open 'the City gates for to receive the Romans. And he ſpake unto the Idumæans from a tower, 'and commanded them to caſt down their arms, which they took only for the liberty of 'the City, when they durſt not truſt their own nation to keep the ſame; yet would have 'them Judges of the diſcord: and that accuſing others for killing ſome not convicted, they 'themſelves would condemn all the whole Nation of ignominy; and that they had now B'ſhut the City gates againſt their own country-men, which was common for all ſtrangers 'to come unto for religion ſake. Did we make haſt towards you, to fight againſt our own 'nation, which came only to preſerve your liberty? But this is as true, as that they whom 'you thus beſiege have wronged you, and as the accuſation you forge againſt them. And 'you keeping in hold thoſe that are the defenders of the Common-wealth, do then ſhut the 'City gates againſt men of your own blood; laſtly, you impoſe upon us contumelious 'commands, and ſay that they do tyrannize over you, over whom indeed you do. Who can 'any longer endure this your mockery, that perceiveth how unpoſſible your allegations 'are? For who can juſtly accuſe thoſe that ye keep ſhut up in the Temple, becauſe that they 'preſumed to puniſh traytors whom you grace with the title of noble and innocent, becauſe 'they were your confederates? Only in this they are blame-worthy, that they did not be-C'gin with you, but left alive ſuch members of that conſpiracy. Except alſo you will ſay, that 'the Idumæans ſhut out of your City, you your ſelves not permitting us to come and offer 'ſacrifice. But though they were too merciful, yet we Idumæans will conſerve the houſe 'of God, and will fight for the common good of our Country, and will be revenged both 'of the enemies that are without the City, and the traytors within. And here will we 'remain before the City till either the Romans come and deliver you, or till you change 'your minds, and bethink your ſelves what a jewel it is to have liberty.

Of the Maſſacre of the Jews by the Idumæans.

ALL the whole multitude agreed with a loud cry unto theſe ſpeeches of Simon. And Jeſus departed ſorrowful, ſeeing that the Idumæans would agree to no reaſon, and that thereby their City ſhould ſuffer double wars. For the Idumæans wrath was not yet aſſwaged, who took the matter in great diſdain that they were not permitted to enter into the City, and alſo for that they thought the Zealous very ſtrong, and they themſelves Ewere aſhamed that they could not come to help them, ſo that many repented that they were come thither. Yet would they not for ſhame return, nothing being done by them: and ſo raſhly placing their Tabernacles near unto the City walls, they determined to ſtay there. But that night there fell a moſt huge tempeſt: for there was a great ſtormy wind, and an exceeding great rain mixt with fearful thunder and horrible lightning, and the Earthquake with ſtrange noiſes: whereupon all men thought that this motion of the earth, did ſignifie the death of mankind, and portend ſome great matter. The Idumæans and Townſmen were both of one mind: for they thought that God was angry with them for bearing arms againſt their Metropolis, and perſwaded themſelves that they could not eſcape death if they continued in their purpoſe. Ananus and his followers perſwaded themſelves that they had now overcome them without war, and that God had fought for them againſt the *Idu-*F*mæans*. But they were falſe prophets, and what they judged to befal their enemies, that fell upon themſelves. In the mean while the Idumæans lay as cloſe together as they could, and covered their heads with their ſhields, ſo that by this means the rain did them not ſo much harm. The Zealous were penſive for the Idumæans more then for themſelves, and deviſed which way they might ſuccour them. Then the boldeſt amongſt them adviſed the reſt, by force to oppreſs the watchmen, and ſo to go into the City, and open the gates to the Idumæans that came to help them, for it was eaſie to ſurprize the watchmen, by reaſon that many of them were unarmed, aud unfit for war, and the Citizens could not eaſily be aſſembled together, for every man becauſe of the tempeſt kept his houſe. And ſuppoſe that there

The Idumæans pitch their Tabernacles near the wals.

there were danger, yet were it better to endure all miſchiefs that might enſue, then to permit ſuch an army ſhamefully to periſh, who came at their requeſt to help them. But the wiſer ſort diſſwaded the reſt from this, ſeeing both a ſtronger watch placed to keep them in, and the City walls diligently guarded becauſe of the Idumæans: and moreover, perſwading themſelves that Ananus ceaſed not, but went up and down, firſt from one watch, and then to another; yet that night he did not ſo, not for ſlothfulneſs, but becauſe that the deſtinies had ſo decreed that thereby both he and the watchmen ſhould periſh. For about mid-night the ſtorm increaſing, the watchmen fell into a ſound ſleep.

The watchmen are oppreſſed with ſleep.

Then the Zealous determined to file the bars and bolts of the gates in ſunder; to effect this, they took the inſtruments which were conſecrated to the Temple, and this attempt was much furthered by the huge wind and thunder, which made ſuch a noiſe that they could not be heard: ſo iſſuing out of the Temple, they went privily to the wals, and opened that gate near unto which the Idumæans lay, and ſuſpecting that Ananus would make ſome reſiſtance, they firſt of all drew their ſwords, and then together with the Idumæans came in: & if at that time they had aſſaulted the city, they had without any lett or hindrance deſtroyed all the people therein; ſo great was their rage at that time. But firſt of all they haſtned to aſſiſt their fellows, whom they left beſieged, and requeſted the Idumæans not to leave them in danger, for whoſe ſuccour they were come, nor permit them to incur greater damage: for having firſt ſurprized the watch-men, it would be more eaſie for them to aſſault the City, which if they did not, but firſt ſet upon the Citizens, they would preſently aſſemble together, and oppoſe themſelves againſt them, and not permit them to aſcend up into the Temple. The Idumæans conſented unto this, and ſo they paſſed thorow the City into the Temple. And the Zealous remaining in the Temple, carefully expected their coming; at whoſe arrival they took courage, and joyning with the Idumæans, came out of the inner Temple, and ſet upon the watch: and ſome being ſlain who were faſt aſleep, the reſt were awaked by the cries of others, and ſo betook themſelves to their arms to defend themſelves, being yet amazed. And at firſt, thinking that they were only the Zealous that gave the aſſault, hoped only by their multitude to ſuppreſs them; but ſeeing others without the Temple alſo aſſailing them, they perceived the Idumæans were broken in: ſo the greater part of them being diſmayed laid down their weapons, and cryed: and only a few of them, young men well armed, and of good courage, encountred with the Idumæans, and for a good ſpace defended their idle fellows; others went and advertiſed the inhabitants what was done, yet none durſt come to help them, becauſe they now knew that the Idumæans were got in, but every one lamented their hard fortune: and the women made great lamentation, when any of the watch-men fell into danger. The Zealous alſo anſwered their cries with the like, and then the tempeſt and thunder made all more dreadful. The Idumæans ſpared none, becauſe that they were naturally cruel and fierce to ſhed blood: and angry that they were ſo beaten with the tempeſt, they uſed them moſt cruelly, by whoſe means they were ſhut out of the City, ſparing neither thoſe who requeſted favour, nor them who made reſiſtance, for they ſlew many even as they were entreating them to remember that they were of their own blood, and requeſting them to ſpare them for reverence of their temple. There was no way to flie, nor any hope of eſcape: being driven up in a narrow room, they hurt themſelves more then the Enemies did, by crowding and treading one upon another, for there was no place to flie, nor their Enemies ceaſed not to kill them. Being in this deſperate eſtate, not knowing how to do, they caſt themſelves headlong down into the City, and ſo died a more miſerable death (in my mind) than they that died by the Enemies ſword. The next day there was found ſlain eight thouſand and five hundred, and all the outer Temple flowed with blood. Yet this maſſacre ſufficed not the Idumæans rage, but turning themſelves againſt the city, they robbed and ſpoiled all houſes, and killed all they met, making no account of the death of the reſt of the multitude. They made diligent ſearch for the Prieſts, and many laid violent hands upon them, and killed them: and ſtanding upon their dead corps ſometime they upbraided Ananus with the peoples favour towards him, ſometime Jeſus with the words he ſpake upon the wall unto them, and were ſo impious, as that they caſt away their dead bodies unburied, notwithſtanding the Jews in this point are ſo religious, that after ſun-ſet they take down the dead bodies of the malefactors, who by ſentence have been adjudged unto the croſs, and bury them.

The praiſe of Ananus the high Prieſt.

I think I do not greatly miſs the mark, if I affirm Ananus his death to have been the deſtruction of the city, & from that time forth the wals of Jeruſalem to have been overthrown, and the Common-wealth of the Jews to have periſhed in that day, when they beheld their Prieſt and Governour ſlain, even in the midſt of the city. He was a man that led a laudable and

and moſt juſt life: and being in great dignity, honour, and reputation; yet would he not exalt himſelf above any one, were he never ſo baſe. He was a man who thirſted after liberty, and bare the rule and government of the Common-wealth. He continually preferred the publick commodity before his own private gain, being always deſirous of peace; for he foreſaw that the Romans could not be withſtood: and that, if the Jews did not quickly accord with them, their ruine was at hand: briefly I ſay, that had Ananus lived, they had yielded with him unto the Romans. For he was an eloquent Orator, and could perſwade admirably: whereby he had now gained unto his ſide thoſe that hindred him, and cauſed the Wars: whom if they had had for their Captain againſt the Romans, it had not been ſo eaſie for the Romans to have conquered them. With him was joyned Jeſus inferiour to Ananus, yet excelling all the reſt. So that I think Almighty God having decreed the total ruine of the City, being now violated and filled with iniquity, and meaning by fire as it were, to purifie the holy Temple which was now defiled and prophaned, he firſt took up the defenders thereof, and thoſe that loved them moſt dearly. So they who a little before were cloathed in ſecret apparel, and reverenced of all thoſe that from the furtheſt parts of the world came to Jeruſalem, now lay murthered and naked in the open ſtreets, left as it were a prey to be torn in pieces with dogs or wild beaſts, who erſt were the Authors of piety and Religion. I think that Virtue it ſelf wept to ſee wickedneſs ſo prevail.

CHAP. I.

Of another Massacre, and of the return of the Idumæans, and the cruelty of the Zelous.

SUch was the end of Ananus and Jesus. After whose death the Idumæans and the Zelous massacred the people, as though they had been a flock of pernicious beasts, and every one was slain whersoever he was found: and taking the Nobility and younger sort of men, they kept them bound in Prison, hoping that by deferring their deaths, some of them would become partakers with them. Yet none was hereby moved, but every one desired to die, rather then impiously to conspire against their own Countrey: yet were they most cruelly whipped before they were put to death, their whole body being all as it were one sore place by whipping and stripes: and so when they could not endure these torments any longer, then were they killed. And who so was taken on the day time, was in the night carried to Prison, and those that died in Prison, and torments, they then cast their dead bodies out, that they might have place to imprison others in their room. And the people were so terrified, that none durst weep openly for his friend, nor bury the dead body of his Kinsman; yea those that were in Prison durst not openly weep, but secretly; looking about them, lest any of their Enemies should espy them. For whosoever mourned for any that was afflicted, was presently himself used in the same manner as he had been for whom he lamented; and sometime some in the night scraped up a little earth with their hands, and therewithal covered the dead body of their friend; and some bolder then the rest, did the like in the day time. And in this general slaughter were twelve thousand young Noblemen slain by this means; and thus being hated for these Massacres, they mocked and flouted the Magistrates, and made no account of their judgments. So that when they determined to put one Zacherie the Son of Baruch to death, a Nobleman one of the chief of the City (for they perceived that he was an Enemy to their wickedness, and loved the vertuous, and one that was rich, by whose death they hoped not only to have the spoil of his goods, but also to be rid of such a one who might be able to resist their bad purposes) they called seventy of the best amongst the common people together as it were in judgment, yet they having no authority; and before them they accused Zacherie that he had betrayed the Common-weal unto the Romans, and that for that intent he had sent unto Vespasian: but neither shewed any evidence nor proof thereof, but only they affirmed it to be so; and therefore would have credit given unto their words. When Zacherie perceived that under pretence of being called unto judgment, he was deceitfully brought into Prison; and having no hope of life, yet he spared not to speak liberally his mind: but began to scorn the rage and pretence of his Enemies, and purged himself of the crimes whereof he was accused; and converting his speech against his accusers, he laid open all their iniquities, and much lamented the miseries and troubles of the City.

Zacharie condemned to death by the Zealous.

In the mean-while the Zealous gnashed their teeth, and could scarcely contain themselves from drawing their swords, and were desirous that their pretended accusation and judgment might be ended. He also requested them, who by these miscreants were appointed his Judges, to remember justice, notwithstanding those dangerous times. The seventy Judges all pronounced that he was to be absolved and freed as unguilty; and rather chose to die, then to cause his death who was innocent. This sentence being pronounced, the Zealous began to shout and cry with a loud voice, and they all were angry at the Judges, who did not understand to what end that counterfeit authority was given them. Then two of the boldest amongst them set upon Zacharie, and killed him in the midst of the Temple, and mocked him, saying; Thou hast now our sentence and absolution, far more certain then the other was, and presently they cast him down from the Temple into the Valley underneath: and then contumeliously with the hilts of their Swords they did beat the Judges out of the Temple; yet they did not kill them, to the end that being dispersed thorow the whole City, they might tell the people as messengers from them, of their miserable Captivity. The Idumæans were now sorrowful for their coming: for they misliked these proceedings: who being assembled together, one of the Zealous secretly told them all that their faction had done from their beginning; and that the Idumæans had taken Arms, because they were enformed, how that the Metropolitan City was by the Priests betrayed unto the Romans: but as they might perceive, there was no proof nor sign of any such matter: and that indeed

Seventy Judges absolve and acquit Zacharie.

Zacharie slain in the midst of the Temple.

One of the Zealous discovereth their cruelty and barbarous dealing to the Idumæans.

A indeed the Zealous who pretended themſelves conſervers of the City, were meer Enemies; and exerciſed Tyranny over the Citizens even from the beginning. And though they had aſſociated themſelves with ſuch wicked perſons, and made themſelves partakers of ſuch and ſo many murthers, yet thought now to ceaſe from ſuch wickedneſs, and not aſſiſt men ſo impious to deſtroy their Countrey laws and religion. For although they took it in bad part; that the City Gates were ſhut upon them: yet now they were ſufficiently revenged of thoſe that were the cauſe thereof. Now was Ananus himſelf ſlain, and almoſt all the people in one night, whereof many of them ere long would repent, and that they might now themſelves perceive the cruelty of them, who requeſted their aid, to be more then barbarous; ſo that B they bluſht not to commit their Villanies, openly in the ſight of them who had ſaved their lives: and their miſdemeanour and impiety would be imputed unto the Idumæans, becauſe they neither hindred their miſchievous practiſes, nor forſook their Society. And that therefore it was their parts (ſeeing that it was now evident that the report of treaſon was only calumniation, and that no aſſault by the Romans was to be feared; likewiſe that an invincible force was eſtabliſhed againſt the City) to depart home, and by forſaking the Society of the impious acquit themſelves of their impiety, as being by them deceived, and ſo againſt their wills made partakers thereof. The Idumæans were hereby perſwaded, & firſt of all they looſed them that were in priſon, in number 2000. of the vulgar, and preſently leaving the City, they went unto Simon; of whom we will ſpeak hereafter, and ſo they departed home.

C Their departure was againſt the expectation of both parts: for the people, not knowing that the Idumæans were penitent for that they had done, rejoyced as now delivered from their Enemies: and the zealous grew more inſolent and proud, as though they never had needed help, but now were delivered from them, in reverence of whom they abſtained from Villany. So now they uſed no delay to effect their impiety: for they ſpent not much time in taking advice; but whatſoever ſeemed beſt unto them, preſently without any delay they put it in practice. But chiefly they murthered thoſe men that were ſtrong and valiant: for they envied the nobility for their Virtue: And they thought it a principal point firſt to be effected, not to leave any one man of account alive. Wherefore they ſlew amongſt the reſt Gorion a Nobleman of great Birth and Dignity, one who loved the people, and was very D bountiful, and a lover of Liberty: ſo that there was none amongſt the Jews like him, who for deſire of liberty, and his other Vertues was put to Death. But neither could Niger Peraita eſcape their hands, a man who in Wars againſt the Romans had ſhewed himſelf valiant: who although he often cried out and ſhewed the ſcars of his wounds received in defence of his Countrey; yet they ceaſed not for all this moſt ſhamefully to drag him thorow the City: and being led out of the City, deſpairing of life, he intreated that he might be buried. But the barbarous people denying his requeſt ſlew him. Who at his death beſought God that the Romans might come and revenge it upon them, and that Plague and Famine, and civil diſcord might light upon their City. Whoſe Prayers God heard, ſending all upon them which he did juſtly require, and firſt of all, they were plagued with Civil Wars among E themſelves. Niger being thus ſlain, they were freed from the fear they had of him, how that he would reſiſt their wickedneſs. There was no part of the common people, who were not by ſome forged tale or other put to death. For ſome were ſlain, for that long ſince they had born Arms againſt their own Citizens; and they who were innocent in all points were put to death, for ſome occaſion deviſed in the time of peace: and they who did not converſe with them were murthered, as ſuch as contemned them: and they that freely and friendly converſed with them were ſlain, as men that ſought to betray them; and the greateſt offenders, and the leaſt offenders were all puniſhed alike; to wit, with death: for no man eſcaped, except he was either poor, or of very baſe condition.

The Civil Diſcord amongſt the Jews.

IN the mean while the Romans addreſſed their courage againſt the City of Jeruſalem; and ſeeing them at great variance among themſelves, thought this to be for their great advantage. Upon this they incited Veſpaſian their General, affirming that it was Gods providence (who fought for them) that the Jews ſhould be at Civil Wars among themſelves, and that therefore he ſhould not overſlip ſo good an opportunity: for the Jews would quickly be friends again one with another, either by the wearineſs of Civil War, or elſe repenting themſelves of that which they had done. To whom Veſpaſian

The Souldiers incite Veſpaſian to reſort to Jeruſalem.

The year of the World, 4032. after the Nativity of Christ, 70.

Vespasian answered, that they were ignorant what was to be done, being rather desirous as it were in a Theater to shew their forces and strength, then with him to consider what was profitable and expedient. 'For (said he) if we presently assault them, our coming will make 'concord amongst our Enemies, and so we shall bring upon our selves their forces yet firm 'and strong; but by expecting a little while, they should have less ado to conquer them, their 'chiefest forces being destroyed by their own Civil Wars: And that God was more their 'friend then they were aware off, who without their labour and pain delivered the Jews into 'their hands, and will give us the Victory without endangering of our Army: And that there- 'fore it was rather their parts to be as it were beholders of that Tragedy, then to fight against 'men desirous of death, and troubled with the greatest evil that possible could be, to wit, 'domestical sedition, and Civil Wars. And if any think that the Victory is not famous being 'gotten without fight, let him know and consider the uncertain events of Wars: and that it is 'better, if it be possible, to get a Victory without bloodshed, then therewith to hazard the 'Victory. For they who by councel and advice do any worthy act, deserve no less praise then 'they, who by force of arms atchieve a Victory. Moreover, in the mean time that the Ene- 'mies one destroyed another, his Souldiers might take rest, and so be stronger and better able 'to fight when need should require. Beside that, it seemed not that there was much haste 'required to get the Victory: for the Jews neither prepared Arms or Engines of War, nor 'levied any Forces, nor sought for aid, and so by delay no damage could ensue: but that 'they would Plague one another more by Civil Wars, then his Army could by taking them 'and their City. And therefore whether they considered it best to abstain from assaulting 'them who fought with one another for security sake, or else for vain glory, though the 'honour of the Victory diminished thereby: yet he held it not meet to fight against them, 'who were at Civil Wars amongst themselves; for so it would be justly said, the Victory 'was not to be imputed to us, but to their discord.

Vespasian expecteth Victory by the civil dissention of his Enemies.

Many Citizens to fly the zealous, resorted to Vespasian.

The Captains all consented, and thought this advice of Vespasians best: and presently it appeared how profitable his Counsel was. For every day many fled unto him to escape the hands of the zealous: yet it was hard and dangerous to flie, because all the wayes were guarded with Watch-men. And if any man upon any occasion whatsoever were taken upon the way, he was presently killed, as one who intended to have fled unto the Romans: yet he that fee'd the Watch-men with money, escaped away safely; and he that did not, was counted as a Traitor: so that only rich men could escape, and the poor were left to the slaughter. The multitude of the dead bodies that lay on heaps together was innumerable, and many of them who had fled unto the Romans, returned again into the City, chusing rather to die there: for the hope they had to be buried in their native soil, made death there seem more tolerable. But they became so cruel, that they neither permitted them who were slain within, nor them without the City, to be buried. But like men that had now determined together, with their Countrey Laws to abolish the law of Nature, yea and by their impiety to pollute the sacred divinity with injustice, let the dead bodies rot above the ground, and whosoever attempted to bury any one of them that were slain, whether he were friend or Kinsman, were presently put to death, and left unburied, as men forsaking their City, and flying to the Enemy. To be brief, nothing so much increased their calamity as mercy: for the wicked people were herewith, as it were provoked to wrath, whose displeasure and cruelty was extended from the living unto the dead, and from the dead unto the living. And such fear fell upon the whole City, that those that were left alive, deemed them happy, that being dead, were at rest, and free from those miseries: and they that were in Prison, in respect of the torments they endured, thought themselves unhappier then they who lay unburied. All humane justice was by them perverted, and they scorned and mocked at all divine and holy things, and proudly derided the Oracles of the Prophets, esteeming them as fables and jests. But having now contemned all laws established by their forefathers for the punishment of vice, and increasing of virtue, at last they found that true which by them was foretold, concerning the destruction of themselves and their Countrey. For there was an old prophecy, that when sedition reigned amongst them, and their own hands had first violated the Temple of God and holy things; that then their City should be destroyed by War, and their holy places should be burned with fire, according to the use and custom of War. And the zealous giving credit to this prophecy, made themselves the ministers of this action.

The zealous tyrannize both over the living and the dead.

How Gadara was yielded: and of the Maſſacre there.

Johns Pride and ambition.

BUt John, who long ago deſired to be in chief authority, as Tyrant over all the reſt, thought it not ſufficient to be in as great reputation as his fellows; wherefore by little and little joyning unto himſelf the moſt impious of all the Zealous, he divided himſelf from their union and fellowſhip: So that now every one perceived (in that he always neglected what others commanded, and imperiouſly commanded what himſelf thought good) that he affected principality; and many joyned to him for fear, ſome for favour (for he had a ſmooth tongue, able to perſwade them unto what he would:) many alſo followed him, thinking it better that all the impiety before committed were laid to one mans charge in particular, then unto all men in general. Moreover, being a valiant man of his hands, and one able to give politick counſel, he wanted not followers, notwithſtanding, that many of the contrary faction left him, envying that he, who before was their equal, ſhould now be their Lord and commander. Fear alſo terrified them from living under the government of one man; for they thought that if he once prevailed, he could not eaſily be overcome: and again, if he were depoſed, that he would pick quarrels againſt them in the end, becauſe that they reſiſted him in the beginning. So every man determined rather to ſuffer all miſery in War, then to ſubmit himſelf, and periſh like a ſlave. Thus the ſedition was divided, and John was chief of the faction againſt the Zealous: ſo between them they appointed garriſons in every place; and if by chance they combated together, they did little or nothing hurt one another, but the chief contention was, who ſhould bear moſt ſway amongſt the people: and they did ſtrive on both parts who ſhould have the greateſt part of the ſpoyl. Thus the City at one time was vexed with three intollerable miſchiefs and evils, to wit, War, Tyranny and ſedition: and yet War ſeemed a leſs evil then the reſt unto the commonalty. In brief, many leaving their native ſoil, fled unto ſtrangers for ſuccour, and found among the Romans ſafety, who with their own nation lived in continual danger. There was alſo then begun the fourth evil, which wrought the ruine of the whole Nation. Not far from the City there was a Caſtle called Maſſada, builded by the ancient Kings of Jeruſalem, very ſtrong to lay their treaſure in, and their munition for War, and to retire themſelves thereunto in time of need, for the ſafety of their perſons. This Caſtle was taken and kept by that ſort of thieves that were called Sicarii, who for fear durſt rob no more. Theſe thieves ſeeing the Roman Army now idle, and the thieves in Jeruſalem at civil Wars and ſedition among themſelves, they took courage, and again fell to their Villanies. And ſo on that day, which is the feaſt of unleavened bread (which the Jews do keep holy, in memory of their deliverance out of the Ægyptian Captivity) deceiving the watchmen, they ſeized upon a Fort, called Engaddi: and before the townſmen could arm and unite themſelves together, they were by theſe perſons driven out of the Town, who alſo killed them that could not flie, to wit, women and children, to the number of more than ſeven hundred; and ſo ſacking the houſes, and taking the fruits that were now ripe, they carried all unto Maſſada: and ſo they waſted all the Villages and whole Country round about them, many wicked perſons daily flocking unto them, and joining with them: and by their example, other thieves that a while had been quiet, now robbed again, and ſpoiled in every part of Judæa. And as in a body, if the principal member thereof be ſick, all other parts of it are afflicted: ſo Jeruſalem being filled with tumults and diſcord, thoſe that were without the City found licence to rob and ſpoil: and all they that had their towns deſtroyed where they were wont to inhabit, went into the wilderneſs. Then they aſſembling and uniting themſelves together, not ſo many as an Army, yet more than a Company of thieves, they brake into the Towns and Temples; and as in War it cometh to paſs, they purpoſed to aſſault them, by whom they had ſuffered ſuch injury: but they were prevented; for the thieves underſtanding of their coming, fled with the ſpoil they had gotten. And there was no part of Judæa, that did not periſh together with Jeruſalem their Mother City. Thoſe that fled unto the Romans, certified Veſpaſian hereof: for although the ſeditious perſons did keep and obſerve all paſſages, and kill them that offered to fly, yet many ſecretly ſtole away from them, and beſought Veſpaſian, both to help the oppreſſed City, and to take compaſſion upon the reliques of their nation: affirming, that many had been butchered for wiſhing well to the Romans, and many being yet alive, were yet in great danger. And Veſpaſian moved to compaſſionate sionate their calamities, came with his Army neerer Jerusalem, as though he would have besieged it (but indeed his intent was to deliver it from the siege,) hoping in the mean time to conquer that part of the Country that was yet untoucht, and so to leave nothing to hinder him when he should begin the siege. Wherefore coming unto Gadara, the strongest place and mother City of all the Country beyond the River, he entred into it the fourth day of March: for the chiefest of the City, unknown unto the seditious people, had sent Embassadors unto him, partly desiring peace, partly to save their goods and lives, and promised him to yield the Town into his hands: for there were many rich men dwelling in Gadara: and their Enemies knew not of their Embassage, till they saw Vespasian at the City Gates. And so despairing that they were able to keep the City, by reason they had in the Town many Enemies, more in number and stronger then themselves; and moreover, seeing Vespasian even now almost at the City: and thinking it a shame to flie, and not to be revenged of their Enemies; they took Dolesus (who was both a Noble man and chief of the City, and also the Author of that Embassage) and killed him, and for anger beating him after he was dead, they fled out of the City. Now the Romans Army approaching neer unto the City, the people of Gadara went forth and received Vespasian joyfully, who also confirmed a league betwixt them and him, and left them a Company of Horse and Footmen to defend them against the incursions of the fugitives their Enemies: for they themselves before the Romans requested it, destroyed the City Walls, that so they might shew themselves before to desire peace, in that destroying their Walls, if after they desired to rebel, they could not.

The Gadarensians entertain Vespasian with joy and acclamations.

Vespasian then sent Placidus with five hundred Horsemen, and three thousand Footmen to pursue those, that were fled out of Gadara, and he with the rest of his Army returned to Cæsarea. But the fugitives perceiving themselves to be pursued by Placidus, before he could overtake them, got into a Town called Bethenabris: and finding there many young men, partly for that they were willing, partly by force they compelled them to arm themselves, and so rashly they came against Placidus. Placidus and his Army seemed a little to give back, to the intent to draw them further from the Wall, and then having compassed them about in a fit place, they wounded them afar off with Darts and Arrows. Then the Jews seeking to flie, were prevented by the Horsemen: and they who offered to fight, were by the Roman Footmen all put to the sword, never shewing any sign of valour. For the Jews assaulting the Romans, being all invironed and quite covered with their shields as with a Wall, and not being able to break into their battel, they were slain by the Romans Darts: but their darts could do the Romans no harm, and so like fierce and savage beasts they wilfully ran upon their Enemies Swords, and so were slain, some having all their face cut with Swords, some killed by the Horsemen. For Placidus was careful to intercept their passage unto the Town, and to hinder their recourse unto it, and brought those back again that fled towards it, using his Darts, and killing those that were next him; and those who fled afar off for fear, he caused to return; till at last, the strongest amongst them brake away, and got unto the Town Walls: And those that were within the City knew not what to do, for they would not shut the fugitives of Gadara out of the City, because they desired to let their own Citizens in; and again they perceived that if they let them in, they thereby should work the overthrow of the City, as it fell out indeed they did. For the Gates being set open for them to come in, the Roman Horsemen almost brake into the town with them, yet the Gates were shut before they could get in. Then Placidus with all his Souldiers assaulted the Town, and fighting a sore fight which continued even until the Evening, at last he got the Walls, and the Town, and slew the weaker sort: for the stronger fled: so the souldiers sacked the houses, and then fired the Town. They who escaped thence, incited the whole Country to flie with them, reporting their calamities with the most, and affirming that all the Roman Army was at hand: and so they put all the inhabitants there in great fear, and having assembled a great multitude, they fled unto Jericho, which place they put their confidence in, for that it was strong and populous. Placidus having Horsemen, and being incouraged with his former Victory, pursued them unto Jordan, and whomsoever he overtook he slew, and at the River he fought with all the multitude there gathered together; and staying, because that the River being waxed deeper by abundance of rain, that had lately faln, they could not pass over it. Wherefore necessity forced them to fight, because they could not flie: and placing themselves along the Banks of the River, they there received the Horsemen, and warded their Darts; yet many for fear fell into the River; so the Romans slew there 13000. and the rest not able to resist, cast themselves into the River; which were an infinite number; also the Romans took 2000 and 200 men alive, and a huge booty of Sheep, Asses, Camels, and and Oxen. This Massacre though it was no greater then the former, yet it seemed to the Jews far greater, because that many all over the Country flying were killed, and Jordan was so filled with dead Carkasses, that none could pass over it: and also the Lake Asphaltites was full of dead bodies, brought thither out of divers Rivers. Placidus having so good success, went into the Towns and Villages adjoining, and took Abila, Julias, Besemoth, and all the Towns even unto the Lake Asphaltites, and placed in them Garrisons of them that fled unto him: and afterward preparing ships and furnishing them with Souldiers, he pursued them that were fled by water, and overcame them: and so all the Country beyond Jordan yielded unto the Romans, and even unto Machæron, all places were by them conquered.

CHAP. IV.

How certain Towns were taken, and the Description of Jericho.

AT this time came news of the troubles in Gallia, and how that Vindex, together with the Nobility of that Country had revolted from Nero, whereof we have made mention in another place. This news caused Vespasian to be more earnest to end the Wars of the Jews: for even then he foresaw the Civil Wars that ensued, and the danger of the whole Empire: and he thought that if he could before the beginning of those troubles end the Wars in the East part of the World, that then Italy was not in so much danger. But Winter hindring him, he in the mean time placed Garrisons in all Towns and Villages, about the whole Country, and placed Decurions in every City, and repaired many places which he had before destroyed. And first of all, he with his whole Army that was at Cæsarea, went to Antipatris; and there having setled the Estate of that City, after his abode there two dayes, the third day he departed, spoiling and burning all the Country: as also all the Country about Thamnia the Toparchy, and so went into Lydda and Jamnia. But seeing that those two places submitted themselves unto him, leaving there such Inhabitants as he thought good, he went thence unto Ammaus, and placing himself in the way to their Metropolitan City, he there entrenched his Army, and then leaving the fifth Legion there, he with the rest went into the Toparchy of Bethlepton, firing it and all places thereabout; as also the Borders of Idumæa: but he reserved there certain Castles in fit places, and fortified them. And having taken two Towns in the midst of Idumæa, to wit, Begabri, and Caphartopha, he slew there above ten thousand men, and took almost a thousand, and driving out the rest of the Inhabitants, he left a great part of his Army there, who made Incursions, and wasted all the high places thereabout: and he with the rest returned to Jamnia; and from thence by Samaria and Neapolis, called by the Inhabitants Nabortha, the second day of June, he came into Corea: and pitching his Tents there, the next day he came to Jericho, where one of his Captains, named Trajan, met him with the Souldiers he brought from beyond Jordan, which place he had conquered. But the multitude before the Romans came, fled from Jericho into the high Country over against Jerusalem, and many that stayed behind, were there slain. So he found the City desolate, being scituate in a Plain, under a great Mountain that is Barren, which is of a huge length: for it reacheth on the North side, unto the Borders of Scythopolis, and on the South, unto the Borders of Sodom, and the Lake of Asphaltites. It is all rocky and not inhabited, because it beareth no fruit. Over against this near Jordan, is scituate a huge Mountain, beginning on the North-side, at Julias, and reaching unto Bacra on the South, which is the Limits of Petra, a City of Arabia. In this place is that, that is called the Mountain of Iron, reaching unto the Country of the Moabites.

Troubles in France.

Vespasian visiteth all Judea.

Vespasian cometh to Jericho.

The Country between these two Mountains is called the great field, reaching from the Village Gennabara unto the Lake of Asphaltites, being in length two hundred and thirty furlongs, and in breadth a hundred and twenty, and in the midst it is divided by the River Jordan. These are also two Lakes of contrary natures, Asphaltites, and Tiberias; for one of them is salt and barren, but that of Tiberias sweet and fertil. This Plain in summer time is burned with the heat of the Sun, and the Air is infected in all places thereabouts, save only about those which adjoin to Jordan: and this is the cause that the Palm-trees that grow about the River side do flourish most, and are more fertil then the rest. Neer unto Jericho, there is a large great Fountain, which plentifully watereth the fields thereabout, and runneth with a great stream out of the ground near unto the old City: which Josue the Son of Nun, General of the Hebrews took by War, the first of all that he took in the Land of Canaan. It is reported that in the beginning, the waters of this Fountain did destroy all fruits of the earth, earth, and also made women be delivered before their time, and to infect all places with diseases, and the plague; and afterward by Helizæus the successour of Helias was made sweet and fertil: Who being once courteously entertained by the Inhabitants of Jericho, did so reward them and all the Country for that their kindness: and going unto the Fountain, he cast a Pitcher full of Salt into the water; and hard by lifting up his hands to Heaven, and tempering with this fountain-water certain sweet waters, he prayed God to qualifie the rage thereof, to make it flow with more sweet streams: and besought God to give a better air unto the Fountain, which both might cause plenty of fruits, and also of Children unto the Inhabitants: and that the water might have the vertue to make women fertil, so long as they persist in piety. After these prayers, with his hands he altered the Fountain according to the knowledge he had: and from that time, this fountain which before was the cause of famine and sterility, was now the cause of plenty and fertility. And so it watereth the ground, that where a little of it cometh, it doth more good then all the other waters which lie long upon it: and so they that water their grounds but a little with it, receive much fruit; and they that water their grounds with it much, do not receive them in that measure; yet it watereth a greater compass of ground then other Fountains: and in length it runneth thorow a Plain seventy furlongs long, and twenty broad. There are most pleasant and goodly Orchards, and many sorts of Palm-trees growing by brooks sides, which are divers in the taste of their fruits; the fattest whereof being pressed, do yield a juice like Hony, nothing inferiour to other Hony: yet there is great store of Hony in that Country, and the juice of Balm, which is more precious then all fruits growing. There grow also Cypres-Trees and Myrobolans: so that one may justly call that part of the earth divine, where what fruit soever is most dear and precious, is in most abundance. Also in all other fruits it surpasseth all Countries in the World: for it multiplieth and increaseth all things sooner there. The cause hereof I judge to be the pleasant Waters, and warm nourishing Air, which as it were inviteth all things to spring up, and then encreaseth them: and the moisture causeth all things to take firm root; and also defendeth them from drought in summer time, when the Country is vexed with such intollerable heats, that all things are as it were scorched, so that nothing then will grow; yet if they be watered with water drawn before Sun-rise, by the blowing of a mild and temperate wind, they are refreshed, and it receives a contrary nature: In Winter time it is as it were luke-warm and temperate to them that go into it. The Air of that place is so temperate, that when it snoweth in other parts of Judæa, and is extreme cold, the Inhabitants in this place do only wear a linen Garment. This Country is distant from Jerusalem a hundred and fifty Furlongs, and threescore from Jordan, and all the ground betwixt it and Jerusalem is desart and stony, and so likewise between it and Jordan and Asphaltites, though it be lower ground then the other. Thus we have sufficiently declared the fertility of Jericho.

The Description of the Lake Asphaltites.

IT is worth the labour to describe the Lake Asphaltites, which is salt and steril; yet whatever is cast into it how weighty soever it be, it swimmeth above the water: so that one, though he would upon purpose, cannot scarcely sink unto the bottom. Vespasian coming thither to see it, caused some to be taken, who could not swim, and their hands to be bound behind them, and cast into the midst thereof, and all of them did swim aloft, being as it were born up by the power of some spirit. Moreover, it is admirable, how this Lake thrice in every day changeth colour; and shineth diversly, according as the beams of the Sun do sundry wayes fall upon it. And in many places it casteth up pieces of black Bitumen, in greatness and shape like a Bull without a head, and these float above the water. They that get their living upon this water, finding this Bitumen, that is thus gathered together, draw it to their Boats, and it is so tough and clammy, that having filled their Boats herewith, it is not easie for them to get them away, but their Boat is as it were fastened: so it hangeth upon the rest of that mass of bituminous matter till it be separated from it by the terms or urine of a woman. This bituminous matter is good for to close the rifts of ships, and also to cure many diseases. This Lake is five hundred and eighty Furlongs long, being extended unto Zoar which is in Arabia, and it is a hundred and fifty Furlongs broad. Neer unto this Lake is the Land of Sodom and Gomorrah, sometime both fertil and rich: now all burnt, being (as it is reported) for the impiety of the Inhabitants tants consumed with lightning and thunder. To be short, one may here behold as it were the sign and reliques of that fire, that by Gods appointment destroyed the place: for one may yet see as it were the fashion and tokens of five Cities, and trees and fruits springing up in the ashes: which fruit to the eye seemeth like unto other fruits; but if you handle them, they fall into ashes and smoak. And so the report of the Land of Sodom is known to be true to them that behold it.

How Gerasa was destroyed: of Neroes death, and of Galba and Otho.

Vespasian desirous to besiege Jerusalem on every side, builded Castles at Jericho and Adida, and left there both the Souldiers that came to assist him, and also Romans with them. And he sent L. Annius to Gerasa, giving him many Footmen, and part of his Horsemen; who at the first assault took the City, and slew 1000 young men, who thought to have fled, and led whole Families Captive, giving the Souldiers the spoil of their goods: and so firing their houses, he went to other places adjoyning. They who were able fled, and the weaker sort who could not flie were slain; and whatsoever came in their way, they consumed it with fire. Thus all places both Mountains and Plains being wasted and oppressed with Wars, the Inhabitants living at Jerusalem, had not whither to go, when they desired to flie from the Zealous by whom they were kept in. And they who were against the Romans, were kept in themselves, the City being on every side inclosed and incompassed with the Army.

After that Vespasian was returned unto Cæsarea, and with all his Army purposing to go to Jerusalem, news was brought him that Nero was slain, having reigned thirteen years, and eight dayes. Touching whom I will not recount how he did dishonour the Empire, committing the whole sway of all the Common-wealth unto two most wicked men, to wit, Nymphidius and Tigillinus, and of least worth amongst all the Libertines: and how he being taken by the treachery of these two men, was forsaken of all his Senators; and so fled only with four trusty Libertines into the Suburbs, and there killed himself: and how that long time after, they that deposed him were punished for that offence: and how the Wars ended in Gallia; and that Galba being created Emperour, returned to Rome out of Spain: and how he was accused by the Souldiers, and by them killed in the Market place, as one of base condition: and how Otho was declared Emperour, and led his Souldiers against Vitellius his Army: also Vitellius his broyls and his fight before the Capitol: and how Antonius Primus, and Mutianus slew Vitellius, and so appeased the German Troops and Civil Wars: Of all these I have refused to speak, because I hope that both the Greeks and Romans have written these things at large, yet I have briefly recapitulated all to continue my History.

After Vespasian heard these news of Nero, he deferred the siege of Jerusalem, expecting who should be created Emperour after him. And when he was certified that Galba reigned, he determined to do nothing; but lie quiet till such time as he should write unto him his mind, whether he would have him proceed in those Wars against the Jews. And he sent unto him his Son Titus both to salute him, and also to know his pleasure concerning the Jews. Likewise, King Agrippa went with Titus for the same cause unto Galba. But as they were passing by Achaia with longs ships in Winter time, as the Custom is, news was brought that Galba was slain, having reigned seven Months and seven days. After whom succeeded Otho, who governed the Empire three Months. Agrippa not terrified with this alteration, still kept on his journey to Rome. But Titus (as God would have it) returned from Achaia unto Syria, and so to Cæsarea unto his Father. They both were as it were in suspence what would ensue, and who should be Emperour, the Empire being so full of trouble: and so they neglected the Wars against the Jews, fearing their own Country, and therefore thinking it an unfit time to assault strangers.

CHAP. VII.

Of Simon of Gerasa, Authour of a new Conspiracy.

FOr all this War at Jerusalem was increased. For there was one Simon the Son of Giora born in Gerasa, young in years, and inferiour to John, who now already had gotten the dominion over the City: yet was he in strength and boldness more excellent then John. This Simon being for this cause also driven out of the Countrey of Acrabatena, where he was Governour by the means of Ananus the high Priest, he came to the Thieves that seized upon Massada. This Simon, at his first coming, was so suspected by the Thieves, that they only permitted him and the women that came with him to dwell in the lower part of the Castle, and they themselves kept the higher part: yet afterwards, his manners and behaviour was such, that they put confidence in him: for he was their Captain always when they went to spoil and rob any part of the Countrey about Massada. So he feared not to perswade them to attempt greater matters: for being desirous of rule, after he heard that Ananus was dead, he departed into the high places of the Countrey, and with the voice of a Crier, promised and proclaimed, that all bond-slaves that would follow him, should have their liberty, & all other should be richly rewarded; and so he gathered together all the wicked & desperate people in the Countrey. And having now a large Army, he robbed and spoiled all the Towns and villages thereabout; and his number daily encreasing, he also now presumed to come into the plain Countries: so that now Cities stood in awe of him, and many Potentates now feared him for his strength and prosperous success. And his Army did not only consist in Thieves and slaves, but now many people of the Country came unto him, reverencing him as their Prince and King. So they made excursions into the Toparchy of Acrabatena, and into the greater Idumæa. For he had fortified a town called Nain wall'd about, which he used for his defence like a Castle. And in the Valley called Pharan, he made many Caves, and found many already made, and in these Caves he kept his treasure, and the booties he got: also all fruits of the earth that he robbed and stole, there he laid up in store; as also munition for divers Companies. And now no man doubted, but that being thus furnished with men and munition, he would go to Jerusalem. The Zealous fearing this, and desirous to prevent him whom they every day did see increase his number, and to grow more potent against them; they armed many of their Company, and went out to meet him. Simon was not daunted at this, but boldly incountred them, and gave them so sharp a battle, that he slew many of them in fight; and forced the rest to retire themselves into the town: yet having men sufficient, he would not besiege the town; but first of all he purposed to subdue Idumæa, and so accompanied with 20000 armed men, he hasted towards the borders thereof.

Simon of Gerasa resorteth to the Thievs.

Simon assembleth all robbers in the Mountainous places.

The fight between Simon and the Zealous.

The Princes of Idumæa understanding this, presently assembled five and twenty thousand armed men; and leaving ot home sufficient Garrisons to defend their Country against the incursion of the Sicarii, which held the Fortress of Massada, they accompanied with this train, went out and expected Simons coming into the borders of their Country, where having met him they joined battel, and fought a whole day, yet neither party got the Victory. Then Simon returned to Nain, and the Idumæans home. Not long after Simon with a greater Army than before, assaulted the borders of their Countrey, and pitching his tents in a village called Thecue, he sent one of his Companions named Eleazar, to them that kept the Castle Herodium not far from that place, to sollicite them to yield it unto him. The Garrison there presently received him into the Castle, not knowing the cause of his coming. But so soon as he began to perswade them to Treason, they all pursued him with their drawn swords: and he not having any place to flie unto, cast himself from off the Castle wall into the valley underneath, and so presently he died. The Idumæans something fearing Simons forces, before they would offer him battel, thought it best to espie what number of men he had; to effect which business, one Jacob a ruler amongst them offered himself, meaning indeed to betray his country to Simon. So departing from Olurus where the Idumæans forces were assembled, he went unto Simon, and first of all promised him to betray his Country unto him, receiving of him an Oath, that for reward of this deed he should alwayes be next in dignity unto Simon himself, and so he presently promised to help to subdue all Idumæa. For this cause he was welcome to Simon and feasted liberally, and had great promises if he performed that which he offered: and then returned unto the Idumæans; and fained that Simons Army was far greater then indeed it was. And so at last terrifying the Governours of his Country, and the people, he by little and little perswaded them to receive Simon, and without any more fight yield

A unto him the whole Sovereignty over them, Jacob ſtudying to bring this his purpoſe to paſs, privily ſent meſſengers to Simon, willing him to come with his forces, and promiſing him to ſubdue the Idumæans for him, which he alſo did. For when Simons Army drew neer, he firſt of all got upon his horſe, and together with his Aſſociates that were partakers of his Treaſon, he fled to the Enemy. Then fear fell on the Idumæans, and every one without any more ado departed home. Thus Simon againſt his own expectation entred Idumæa without bloodſhed: and firſt of all aſſaulting a little Village called Chebron, upon a ſudden he took it, and in it an exceeding great booty, a great quantity of Corn, and many fruits, all which he carried away. The Inhabitants report, that this Chebron is not only more ancient then
B all Cities of that Land, but alſo then Memphis in Ægypt: for they affirm it to have been built 2000. and 3000. years ſince. They alſo ſay, that this was the place where Abraham the Father of the Jews dwelt, after he forſook Meſopotamia, and that his Poſterity departed from hence to Ægypt. And of this there are yet Monuments in the City, richly wrought in fine Marble. Six Furlongs from the Town there is an exceeding great Turpentine Tree, which they affirm to have endured ever ſince the Creation of the World, until this day.

Simon having obtained this place, from hence he invaded all Idumæa, and not only robbed and ſpoiled all Towns and Cities thereof, but alſo he waſted and deſtroyed many Territories: for beſides his Army, there followed him 40000. ſo that he could not find Victuals ſufficient for ſuch a multitude. Moreover, beſides this calamity that he brought upon
C Idumæa, he exerciſed great cruelty and outrage upon the Country, and ſo cauſed a great ſpoil therein. And like as after Locuſts, the Trees and Woods where they have been are leaves: ſo whereſoever Simon had been, all the Countrey from whence he came, he left deſolate. And either by fire or overthrowing it by ruinating places where he came, or elſe by treading upon it with the feet of his Army, or by devouring ſuch as they found, they left nothing ſtanding nor growing either in field or town: and only by paſſing thorow fertile places, he made the fields harder then barren ground; and left no ſign in places which he had deſtroyed, that ever they had been tilled.

Hereat the Zealous were again moved, yet durſt they not fight with him in open field: but placing ambuſhes in the way he was to paſs, they took Simons wife, and many of her ſervants,
D and ſo came again into the City, rejoycing as though they had taken Simon himſelf. For they perſwaded themſelves, that Simon would preſently, laying Arms apart, come in humble wiſe, and intreat them to reſtore unto him his wife. But Simon was not moved with compaſſion for the loſs of his wife, but with fury: and coming to the Walls of Jeruſalem, like a cruel beaſt that had been wounded, and could not come to them that hurt him, he killed and ſlew all he met. And taking them that went out of the City to gather herbs and wood, he cauſed them to be whipt to death, whether they were young or old: and this cruelty ſeemed only wanting in him, that he did not eat the fleſh of the dead bodies. Alſo he took many and cut off their hands, and ſo ſent them into the City thereby to terrifie his Enemies, and to recal the people from the Zealous: and bad them tell the Citizens, that except they pre-
E ſently reſtored his wife unto him, he ſwore by God who governed all, that he would break down their Walls, and uſe all that he found in the City after that faſhion, and that he would ſpare no age, nor reſpect the innocent more then the guilty. Theſe his threats did not only terrifie the people, but alſo the Zealous, inſomuch, that they ſent him his wife again; and ſo his anger being ſomewhat aſſwaged, he ceaſed a while from daily ſlaughter.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Galba, Otho, Vitellius and Veſpaſian.

F NOt only in Judæa, but alſo in Italy at this time were Civil Wars: for Galba was ſlain in the midſt of the Market, after whom Otho was created Emperour, and fought againſt Vitellius, who affected the Empire, whom the German Legions had elected: So the battel being fought near unto Bebriat, a Town in Gallia Ciſalpina, the firſt day, Otho got the Victory againſt Valens and Cæcinna, the Generals of Vitellius his Army. But the day following, they overcame Otho: and ſo many being ſlain on both parts, and news being brought that Vitellius his Army had gotten the Victory, Otho being at Brixels ſlew himſelf, when he had ruled the Empire three Months and two days. Then Othoes Souldiers came unto Vitellius his Captains, and joyned with them, and ſo Vitellius came to Rome with his Army. In the mean time Veſpaſian the fifth day of June departed from Cæſarea, and went unto thoſe parts of Judea which were yet unconquered, and firſt first of all he went into the high Countreys, and subdued the two Toparchies of Acrabaten and Gophnitis, and after them two Towns called Bethel and Ephrem, and placed Garrisons in them, and so went to Jerusalem, killing many that he found in the way, and he took many Captives. And one of his Captains called Cerealis, with a part of horse and footmen, wasted all the higher Idumæa, and in the way as he went, he took Caphetra a Castle, and burnt it, and besieged another called Capharis, enclosed with a strong Wall: for the which cause he deemed that he should have made long abode there: but contrary to his expectation, the Inhabitants opened the gates unto him, & came and yielded themselves, beseeching him to be good unto them. When he had overcome them, Cerealis went unto Hebron an ancient City, and set it on fire; this Hebron as I have already said, was scituated upon the Mountains, so far from Jerusalem: and breaking into it by force, he slew all them that he found there, and fired the City. And having subdued all places, save only three Castles, to wit, Herodium, Massada, and Macheron, which were kept by the Thieves, now only Jerusalem remained to be conquered.

CHAP. IX.

Of Simons Acts against the Zealous.

WHen Simon had received again his wife from the Zealous, he went into Idumea, to rob and spoil that which he had left: and chasing the Inhabitants up and down, at last he forced them to flie unto Jerusalem, and he himself followed them thither; and besieging the Walls, he killed all the workmen he took, that returned out of the fields from their labour. Thus Simon without the City, was more terrible to the people then the Romans, and the Zealous within the City crueller then them both, being incouraged and incited thereto by the counsel of the Galileans. For they had put John in Authority: and John in reward thereof permitted all things to be done which they requested. There was no end of robbing and spoiling rich mens houses, and of slaughtering both of men and women; and now to injure any person was a pastime. And having with blood-shed obtained their prey in security, and without all fear after they had gotten what they liked, they now began to lust after women: yea, they became themselves effeminate through luxuriousness, dressing their hair, and clothing themselves in womens apparel; and they anointed themselves with sweet Ointments, that their beauty might be pleasing, and alluring, their eyes wanton-like; they now did not only imitate the attire of women, but also their impudency, and became so shameless, that they now thirsted after unnatural pleasures, as though they had kept a stews, and so profaned the whole City with their execrable impurities. Yet though they did effeminate their faces, their hands were prone to blood-shed; and although they lived in ignominious maner, as people given over to pleasure, yet could they quickly become warriors, & under the habits of women drawing their swords, they did kill whomsoever they met. Whosoever escaped Johns hands, Simon crueller, murthered; and whosoever escaped the tyranny within the City, was slain by the Tyrant without. So now there was no way to flie unto the Romans. Furthermore, the Army of John began to be divided, for all the Idumæans separated themselves from the other people, and there began a mutiny against the Tyrant, partly envying his puissance, partly hating his cruelty. And so assaulting him, they slew many of the Zealous, and compelled the rest to flie into the Kings house, builded by Grapta father of Izata, King of Adiabena. The Idumæans also brake in thither with them, and drave them from thence into the Temple, and so seized upon Johns treasure: for John lived in that Palace, and thither carried all his spoils. Then those Zealous that were dispersed in the City, came unto them that were in the Temple, and John purposed to send them against the townsmen, and the Idumæans. But they feared not so much their forces, although they knew them to be the better warriors, as they did fear that now being desperate, they would steal out of the Temple in the night, and so slay them, and fire the City. Wherefore assembling themselves, they deliberated with the Priests how to avoid their assaults: but it pleased God to turn their own counsel to be their destruction, and that they should provide a remedy of safety, far worse than death it self. For to depose John, they devised to introduce Simon, and as it were to intreat yet another to tyrannize over them. So this counsel was thought best: and Matthias the Priest was sent unto Simon (whom before they stood in great fear of) now to request him to come into the City. With them also came such as had fled from Jerusalem, for fear of the Zealous, intreating him in like manner, because they desired to return to their wives and Families. So he entred into the City proudly, promising them to be their Lord, and all the people cried with loud voices as he came into the City, that he was their preserver, Being now within the City, preſently he deliberated with them about him, to eſtabliſh his dominion, thinking as well them that called him into the City, as thoſe againſt whom he was called, his Enemies. Then John and the Zealous with him, finding no way to come out of the Temple, and having loſt all that he had in the City, (for Simon and his followers at his entrance took all that belonged unto him) began now to deſpair of his ſafety. And Simon, being aſſiſted by the Citizens, aſſaulted the Temple, and the Zealous placing themſelves upon the Porches, and in Towers of defence, made reſiſtance, and hurt many of Simons followers. For the Zealous were upon the higher ground on the right hand, and ſo had the advantage againſt Simon. And although by reaſon of the B place wherein they were, they prevailed againſt Simon: yet they builded four high Towers, that from thence they might ſhoot Darts and Arrows againſt Simons Army. One of theſe Towers they built upon the Eaſt-ſide of the Temple; another on the North; the third upon a place oppoſite to the lower part of the Town; and the fourth Tower they built upon the top of the place called Paſtophorium, where one of the Prieſts do uſe to ſtand before the Sun-ſet, and at break of day, to ſignifie unto the people with the ſound of the Trumpet the beginning of the Sabbath, declaring thereby unto them, ſometime holy dayes, and afterward that they might go about their buſineſs. In theſe Towers they placed all kind of Engines to caſt ſtones, and men with ſlings. Then Simon perceiving many of his Souldiers languiſh, was more remiſs in his buſineſs: yet when his number increaſed, he came C neerer: for afar off many of his men were ſlain with the ſhot of thoſe Engines.

CHAP. VIII.

How Veſpaſian was elected Emperour.

AT this time the Romans were in great danger: for Vitellius was now arrived out of Germany with his Army, bringing beſide them an infinite multitude with him; ſo that his Army was ſo great, that the place appointed for Souldiers could not contain it: inſomuch that his Army occupied all the whole City, and every houſe was filled with Armed men. And they beholding the Romans wealth greater then ever they ſaw any, and admireing their abundance of gold and ſilver, not able to contain themſelves, they began to rob D and kill every one that fought to withſtand them. And this was the eſtate of the affairs in Italy. Veſpaſian having waſted all about Jeruſalem, returned unto Cæſarea, and there he underſtood of the troubles at Rome, and how Vitellius was Emperour. Hereat, though he knew as well to obey, as to be obeyed, yet was he moved to indignation, and diſdained to call him Lord, who had as it were invaded and uſurped the Empire, being deſtitute of a Ruler. And much grieved hereat, he could not conceal his grief, nor follow Wars againſt ſtrangers, his own Country being ſo endangered. But the diſtance between him and Rome did as much repreſs him, as anger incited him to ſeek revenge: for he conſidered that fortune might cauſe many alterations before he could get to Rome, eſpecially, it being Winter: and ſo he ſought to bridle his wrath which daily increaſed. But his Captains with the Soul- E diers, did now openly conſult of a change, and with indignation did exclaim againſt the Souldiers at Rome, who lived in pleaſure, and never heard ſo much as the report of War; and that notwithſtanding this, it was lawful for them to create whom they pleaſed Emperour; and under hope of gain, they diſpoſed of the Common-wealth at their own pleaſure: where they on the contrary ſide, having overpaſt ſo many labours and dangers, ſtill continuing in Arms till now, waxed old and gray-headed, and did ſuffer authority due unto themſelves, to be executed by others; when notwithſtanding, they had amongſt them one who deſerved the Empire, more then any one; and what recompence could they ever after make him? or what occaſion could they find hereafter to ſhew themſelves grateful to him for the benefits by him received, if they did now omit this occaſion?

Vitellius Encamps his Army in Rome.

Veſpaſian knew both how to govern and how to obey.

The Captains conſult with the Souldiers openly of a change.

F And they thought that Veſpaſian was ſo much more worthy of the Empire, then Vitellius, by how much they, who created Vitellius Emperor, were in very many reſpects much inferior unto them. For (ſaid they) we have endured no leſs toyl then thoſe that came out of Germany: neither are we leſs valiant than they, who bring a Tyrant with them out of Germany. And that no body would reſiſt Veſpaſian: for the Senate and the people of Rome would not rather endure Vitellius his unſatiable luſt, then Veſpaſians chaſtity and temperance; nor a cruel Tyrant, rather then a good and courteous Emperour; nor the Son ſhould by them be elected Emperour, before the Father. For true valour in an Emperour is a great defence of peace. Therefore if the Empire were due to aged experience, they had Veſpaſian; if to valiant youth, they had amongſt them Titus: and that they might reap commodity by both their Ages: And that they would not only aſſiſt him with the Forces of the Empire, having there three three Legions, beſide the help of the Kings; but alſo all the Eaſt part of Europe was out of Vitellius his danger. Moreover, they had in Italy ſome that would aſſiſt Veſpaſian, to wit, his brother and his Son, whereof the one (they hoped) would get many young men to follow him, and the other was now made Prefect of the City, which was no ſmall ſtep to attain unto the Empire. Laſtly, it might ſo fall out that the Senate would declare him Emperour, whom now the Souldiers, being as it were their conſervers, had elected.

Veſpaſians ſhamefaſtneſs and modeſty.

The cauſes that moved the people to elect Veſpaſian Emperour.

This was firſt talked amongſt the Companies of the Souldiers, at laſt, exhorting one another thereto, they came and ſaluted Veſpaſian by the name of Emperour, and requeſting him now to preſerve the Empire, being in great danger to be loſt. Albeit, Veſpaſian had always been careful for the good of the Common-wealth, yet he refuſed to be Emperour: deeming himſelf indeed to have deſerved it; yet he rather did chooſe to live a private life, wherein was ſecurity, then in the height of fortune and honour with perpetual danger. The Captains were more earneſt becauſe he refuſed it; and the Souldiers flocked about him with drawn Swords, threatning his death, except he would conſent to live as he deſerved: yet long time ſtriving to avert this their determination, being loth to be Emperour; at laſt, ſeeing he could not avoid it, he accepted their offer.

CHAP. XI.

The Deſcription of Ægypt.

Mutianus and the reſt of the Captains that had incited him to the Empire, together with the whole Army, cried aloud, willing Veſpaſian to lead them againſt their common Enemy. But Veſpaſian thought it beſt, firſt to ſettle the Eſtate of Alexandria, knowing that Ægypt for the ſupply of Corn was the greateſt and beſt part of the Empire: which if he once were ſure of, he hoped that although Vitellius were ſtronger then he, yet he could bring him under by force, becauſe the people would not endure that for his ſake the City ſhould be famiſht: which would have come to paſs except they had ſupply of Corn out of Ægypt.

Moreover, he deſired to joyn to himſelf thoſe two Legions that were at Alexandria. He alſo thought, that that Country might be a defence and refuge for him, if any adverſe fortune ſhould betide him: for the Country is not eaſily to be entred by an Army, and the Sea-coaſts have no havens, nor harbours to receive ſhips. On the Weſt, it bordereth upon the dry and barren part of Lybia; on the South, upon the Frontiers which ſeparate Syene from Æthiopia; and the ſtreams of Nilus not navigable; on the Eaſt it bordereth upon the red Sea, which extends it ſelf even unto the City Copton; on the North, it is defended with Syria, and the Ægyptian Sea, wherein there is no haven. Thus Ægypt is ſtrong on every ſide, and reacheth in length 2000 furlongs from Peluſium to Syene: and from Plinthine to Peluſium, they ſayl 3000 and 600. furlongs. And Nilus is navigable even unto the Town Elephantine.

The bounds of Ægypt.

The length and breadth of Ægypt.

Further, by reaſon of the downfals of Nilus, alſo the haven at Alexandria is dangerous to come unto in time of peace: for the entrance into it is very ſtraight; and beſide that, the way goes not directly on, but is made crooked by great ſtony rocks, and the left ſide is compaſſed artificially, but on the right ſide is the Iſle Pharus, having a Tower upon it exceeding great: ſo that the light in it is ſeen of the Mariners 300 furlongs off, that long before they come neer it, they may provide to bring their ſhips in with ſafety.

A moſt high Tower in the Iſland Pharus, giving light to thoſe that ſayl 300. ſtounds off.

This Iſle is incloſed with moſt huge Walls made by Art, againſt which the Sea beating, and ſo returning back again, maketh the entrance into the haven more dangerous. Yet this haven within is very ſafe, and 30 furlongs long: ſo that whatſoever that Country wants, it is brought them into that haven, and whatſoever aboundeth amongſt them which other Nations need, is carried from thence all over the whole World. So that Veſpaſian did not unadviſedly ſeek to eſtabliſh the eſtate of Alexandria, and diſpoſe thereof for his own profit, being to begin his Empire. Wherefore preſently he ſent Letters to Tiberius Alexander, who was Governour of Alexandria and Ægypt, and told him of the Souldiers reſolution: and how that he, ſeeing he could not avoid it, but that he was forced to take upon him the Empire, now requeſted him to help him in what he could. Alexander, receiving Veſpaſians letters, agreed willingly thereto, and preſently cauſed his Army, and the people alſo to ſwear unto Veſpaſian; which both of them did willingly, underſtanding Veſpaſians vertue, by reaſon that he governed ſo neer them. And ſo he having now leave, prepared all things to furniſh himſelf like an Emperour, and to be received like a Prince.

Tiberius Alexander governs Alexandria and Ægypt.

CHAP. XII.

How Veſpaſian delivered Joſeph out of Captivity.

The year of the World, 4033. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 71.

IT is incredible how quickly this news was carried into all parts of the World, to wit, that Veſpaſian was declared Emperour in the Eaſt; and now all Cities rejoyced and made Triumphs, and offered ſacrifices for his fortunate ſucceſs. Moreover, the Legions in Mœſia and Pannonia, who not long before were revolted from Vitellius, by reaſon of his cruelty, did now willingly ſwear obedience to Veſpaſian. Veſpaſian returned by Berytum to Cæſarea: where many Embaſſadours came unto him, bringing him Crowns, and applauding and rejoycing at his good fortune, who came out of Syria, and all other places thereabout. There was alſo preſent Mutianus, Governour of thoſe parts, who brought tidings how joyfully all the people received him for their Emperour, and how that they had all ſworn obedience unto him. So all things falling out proſperouſly on Veſpaſians ſide, and fortune for the moſt part inclining as he deſired, he began to think with himſelf, that it was Gods providence that he was made Emperour, and that a juſt deſtiny had brought him to that eſtate. And ſo he called to mind all tokens and ſigns (as there had hapned many, which did foretel that he ſhould be Emperour) and among the reſt, he remembred that which Joſeph had told him; whom, Nero being yet alive, preſumed to call him Emperour, and ſo he admired the man, whom as yet he kept in hold. And calling Mutianus and the reſt of his friends together, firſt of all he told them how valiant Joſeph had been, and what ado he had to win Jotapata, only becauſe of him; and then his Prophecies, which at that time he eſteemed only Fables, fained upon fear; yet now time and event had proved them true. Affirming it an undecent thing, that he, who had been the foreteller of his exaltation, and had been a Meſſenger to him from God, ſhould ſtill continue in bonds like a Captive, and be left in adverſity. So calling for Joſeph, he commanded him to be let looſe. This fact of his made the Captains under him, hope for great reward at his hands, ſeeing he had been ſo kind to a ſtranger. Titus being there preſent, ſaid; It is meet, O father, that as you acquit Joſeph from Captivity, ſo you alſo take away the ſhame of that which he hath already endured. For if we do not only unty his Chains, but alſo break them in ſunder, he ſhall be as though he had never been in bondage: for this is the manner uſed for redreſs, when any one being guiltleſs is committed to bonds. Veſpaſian hereto agreed: and ſo one came with an Axe, and hewed his Chain in pieces. Thus was Joſeph rewarded for his Prophecy, and ſo hereafter he was eſteemed worthy to be believed.

Veſpaſian by Common voice is created Emperour and Crowned.

Veſpaſian conſults with his Captains about Joſephs liberty.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Vitellius his death and manners.

WHen Veſpaſian had anſwered the Embaſſadors, and juſtly diſpoſed of all the Rulers of his Army according to every ones merit, he now came to Antiochia, and there did deliberate whither to go firſt, and it ſeemed beſt to him to go to Rome, rather then to Alexandria: for he knew that Alexandria was quiet and firm, but Rome was troubled by Vitellius. Wherefore he ſent Mutianus into Italy, with many Footmen and Horſemen: who fearing to go by Sea, went thorow Cappadocia and Phrygia, for it was Winter time. Now Antonius Primus, who was governour of Mœſia, brought from thence the third Legion remaining there, and came to War againſt Vitellius. Vitellius ſent Cæcinna to meet him with a great Army: who departing from Rome, preſently met with Antonius at Cremona, a Town of Gallia, ſituate upon the confines of Italy; and there beholding the diſcipline and multitude of the Enemies, durſt not fight with them: and thinking it very dangerous to flie, he plotted treaſon, and ſo calling unto him the Centurions and Tribunes under his government, he perſwaded them to go and joyn with Antonius, debaſing Vitellius his power, and extolling Veſpaſians: affirming the firſt to have only the bare name of the Emperour; and the laſt to have alſo all vertues meet for an Emperour. Moreover, that ſo it would be better for them to do that of their own accord, which otherwiſe they ſhould be compelled to; and ſeeing themſelves already overcome in number, ſo alſo now willing to prevent all danger. For Veſpaſian was able without their aſſiſtance to ſubdue all the reſt: but Vitellius was not able with their help to keep that he had: ſpeaking much to this effect, he perſwaded them to all that which he would have done. And ſo with his whole Army joyned with Antonius.

Veſpaſian bethinks himſelf to return to Rome.

Cæcinna perſwades the Souldiers to forſake Vitellius, and honour Veſpaſian.

that Vitellius ſhould get the upper hand, who ſent them againſt Antonius, drew their Swords, and would have ſlain Cæcinna; And had done it, had not the Tribunes come and entreated them to the contrary: wherefore they did not kill him, but kept him bound, meaning to ſend him to Vitellius as a Traitor. Primus Antonius hearing this, came with his Army and aſſaulted them who were revolted from him, and they a while reſiſted; yet at laſt forced to retire, they fled to Cremona, and Primus, accompanied with Horſemen, prevented their courſes, and ſo ſlew moſt of them before the City; and afterward ſetting upon the reſt, gave his Souldiers the ſpoil of it, wherein many Merchants of other Countries, and many townſmen were ſlain, and all Vitellius Army, 30000 and 200 men; and Antonius loſt in that battel 4000 and 500 of thoſe whom he brought with him out of Mœſia. And delivering Cæcinna from Priſon, he ſent him to bear news hereof to Veſpaſian: who coming unto him, was praiſed for his fact, and greatly honoured above his expectation, in reward of his Treaſon.

Cæcinna is apprehended for Treaſon.

Veſpaſian honours Cæcinna with unexpected honours, and is acquitted of Treaſon.

Sabinus, who was at Rome, hearing that Antonius was at hand, greatly rejoyced, and took courage: and gathering together the Companies of the watchmen in the night time, he took the Capitol, and in the morning, many of the Nobles came and joyned with him: and Domitianus his Brothers Son, who was a great cauſe and help to obtain the Victory. Vitellius little eſteemed Primus; but he was angry againſt Sabinus, and thoſe that had revolted with him: as it were naturally thirſting after the blood of the Nobility, he ſet all the Army he brought out of Germany with him, to aſſault the Capitol, where many valiant deeds were ſhewed on both parts: and at laſt the Germans, being moſt in number, got the Capitol hill. And Domitian with many brave Noblemen, as it were by Gods providence, eſcaped ſafe, the reſt of the multitude were there ſlain. And Sabinus was carried to Vitellius, and there by his commandment put to death: the Souldiers taking away all the gifts and treaſure in the Temple, ſet it on fire. The day after came Antonius, and Vitellius his Souldiers met him: and fighting in three ſeveral places of the City, they were all ſlain. Then Vitellius came drunk out of his Palace, and being full gorged with delicate meat, he was drawn thorow the midſt of the people, and after many contumelies ſlain, having Reigned Eight Months, and five Days: who if he had lived longer, I think verily the Empire had not been ſufficient to have maintained his Gluttony. There were ſlain above 50000 of other people. And this was done the third day of October. The day after, Mutianus with his Army came and entred Rome, and repreſſed the Souldiers of Antonius, who ſtill ſought about in every place for Vitellius Souldiers, and many other of his favourites, and ſlew whom they thought good, not examining any matter by reaſon of their fury: and bringing out Domitian, he declared to the people that he was to govern the City till his father came. The people being delivered from fear, proclaimed Veſpaſian Emperour, and made feaſts and triumphs both under one, for his eſtabliſhing in the Empire, and for joy that Vitellius was depoſed.

Sabinus takes the Capitol, and leaves Vitellius.

Vitellius ſlain.

CHAP. XIV.

How Titus was ſent by his father againſt the Jews.

Titus repairs to Jeruſalem.

WHen Veſpaſian came unto Alexandria, news were brought unto him what was done at Rome. And Embaſſadours came unto him from all parts of the World to congratulate him. And although next after Rome this City was the greateſt in the World, yet was it ſcarcely able to receive the people that came thither unto him. Veſpaſian now being eſtabliſhed Emperour of all the World, and the Common-wealth of the Romans, being contrary to his expectation freed from troubles, he now began to think upon the reliques of Judæa. And ſo he himſelf, winter being ended, prepared to go to Rome, and in the mean time he haſted to diſpoſe of all things at Alexandria. Moreover, he ſent his Son Titus with certain choſen men to deſtroy Jeruſalem. Who departed from Alexandria to Nicopolis by land, which is diſtant from it 20 furlongs, and there he did ſhip his men, and ſo ſailed along the River Nilus by Medenſia to Thumin, and there landing his men, he came to the City called Tanis. And the ſecond place he reſted in was the City Heraclea, and the third Peluſium: and there reſting, and refreſhing his Souldiers two days ſpace, the third day he paſt the borders of Peluſium, and having gone one days journey thorow the wilderneſs, he pitcht his tents at the Temple of Jupiter Caſſian, and the next day at Oſtracine, where there is no water, but all that the inhabitants do uſe, they bring from other places. After that, he reſted at Rhinocolura, and from thence in four days he came to Raphia, where begin the borders of Syria, and the fifth day he lodged at Gaza, and from thence to Aſcalon, and ſo to Jamnia and Joppe, from whence he went to Cæſarea, purpoſing to gather the reſt of the Souldiers there.

CHAP. I.

Of the three sorts of sedition in Jerusalem.

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Christ, 72.

A threefold sedition in Jerusalem.

Titus being thus come out of Ægypt by the desart into Syria, he departed thence unto Cæsarea: for there he purposed to set his Army in order. And whilst yet he was with his father Vespasian at Alexandria, disposing of the Empires that God had given him, it happened that the sedition at Jerusalem was divided into three parts, whereof one fought against another: and one may say it was a good turn that they were so equally divided. We have already sufficiently declared who were the Authors and beginners of the faction of the Zealous, whose tyranny over the City was the ruin thereof: and one may well call this a sedition raised out of a sedition; which, like a cruel and savage beast in penury and want of others, turned his cruelty against his own bowels. So Eleazar the Son of Simon, who was the first that in the Temple divided the Zealous from the people, faining himself to be displeased with that which John every day did; yet in truth, for that he envied that a more Tyrant of later time then himself should be his ruler, desirous to obtain the principality, and make himself mighty, he revolted from the rest: and with him Judas the Son of Chelcias, and Simon the Son of Ezron, two of the most potent amongst them. Besides them, was also Ezechias the Son of Chobarus a Nobleman, and all these had many of the Zealous following them: and getting in possession the inner part of the Temple, they ſet a guard in the entrance and in the ſacred gates, truſting in their abundance of all neceſſaries: for there was great ſtore of ſacred proviſion, and they thought it no impiety to uſe it; yet fearing their ſmall number, they permitted many of the Company that were killed, to remain in the places where they were ſlain. John was ſuperiour in multitude and number, but inferiour by the inequalitie of the place; and having his enemies above his head, he could not without danger make incurſions; and yet for anger he would not ceaſe to proſecute his Enemy: notwithſtanding that thereby his part had more harm then thoſe of Eleazars ſide, yet he ſtill aſſaulted them though to his own coſt: thus many aſſaults were continually made, and many darts caſt, and all the Temple was prophaned with murders. And Simon the Son of Giora (whom the people being in deſpair, incited to be their leader, in hope that he would have aſſiſted them, having in his hands both the higher part of the City, and the greater part of the lower) did now more boldly then before aſſault John and his followers, becauſe they were aſſailed by thoſe above them: yet he being as it were beneath John and his adherents, he ſuſtained as much loſs at their hands, as John himſelf did at theirs above him. So John had double Wars: and Eleazar harmed him becauſe of the higher place wherein he was, ſo likewiſe did he damage Simon for the like cauſe; and eaſily without any labour repulſed all his aſſaults, which he made being on the lower ground, and terrified by Engines thoſe that caſt darts at him from the top of the Temple: for he uſed all Engines to caſt darts and ſtones, and killed many not only of his Enemies, but alſo of them that were offering ſacrifices. For although that they were carried headlong unto all vice, yet they permitted thoſe that would, to offer ſacrifice, watching and diligently guarding them of their Nation. For the ſtrangers that came thither for devotion, were not miſtruſted: yet afterward that they had entreated theſe wicked people to permit them to ſacrifice, they when they had done were a prey for them, and conſumed by this ſedition. For darts and other ſhot with force of the Engines came into the Temple and Altar, and ſlew the Prieſt at the Altar. And many who came from the uttermoſt parts of the World unto that holy place, were ſlain even as they offered ſacrifice, and ſo imbrued the Altar with their blood, which all the Greeks and barbarous people did reverence: and ſtrangers and the Prieſts being now prophaned, were forced to be amongſt the dead bodies, and the place about the Altar ſtood full of blood of men that were ſlain. 'O miſerable City! What didſt thou 'ſuffer at the Romans hands, to be compared unto this, although they entered with fire to 'purge thee from iniquity? For now thou waſt no longer the Houſe of God, neither couldſt 'thou endure being made a Sepulchre of thine Inhabitants, and having by thy Civil Wars 'made thy holy Temple a grave of dead bodies. Yet maiſt thou once again come into better 'eſtate, if firſt thou appeaſe Gods wrath that hath made thee deſolate. But I muſt not give 'place unto ſorrow, and write a lamentation of my miſerable Country, ſeeing I have under-'taken to write a Hiſtory of all things that paſt there. Wherefore I will recount the reſidue 'of the impiety of theſe ſeditious.

The fight between John and Eleazar.

Simon and John ſkirmiſh in the Temple.

Great ſlaughter in the Temple.

The ſeditious people being divided into three Companies; Eleazar and his followers who had the keeping of the holy firſt-fruits, and all the ſacred oblations, came againſt John when they were drunk. And they who followed John ſpoyling the people, aſſaulted Simon, and the City did ſuccour Simon. Wherefore when John was aſſaulted on both ſides, he turned ſome of his Souldiers againſt Simon, and the reſt againſt Eleazar, and againſt Simon he uſed darts to caſt from the Porches of the Temple: and againſt Eleazar he uſed Engines for ſhot. And always ſo often as they above his head ceaſed (as they often did being either weary or drunken) he freely aſſaulted Simon and his men. Alſo as far as he drave them into the City, ſo far did he fire all, and burn houſes full of Corn and other neceſſaries; and that which he left unburned, Simon at his return (when John was gone into the Temple) ſet on fire: as if upon purpoſe, to the great advantage of the Romans, they had conſumed all that was provided againſt the ſiege; ſo did they deſtroy their own forces and ſtrength. To be ſhort, all was conſumed with fire about the Temple, and the City was made a plain ground to fight in, and all the corn was burnt that might have ſufficed the City many years; and ſo they were taken by famine, which they could not have felt, had they themſelves not cauſed it. The Citizens were in every place a prey unto thoſe that were ſeditious on one ſide, and to them that beſieged the City on the other ſide, and like a great body torn in pieces between theſe two. The old men and women aſtoniſhed with theſe calamities, prayed for the good ſucceſs of the Romans, and deſired ſome forreign War to deliver them from their civil diſagreement.

John aſſaulted on both ſides.

They of Jeruſalem had wel-nigh burnt all their Corn.

A wretched calamity in Jeruſalem.

And forthwith great fear and terrour fell upon them all: beſides, it was no time as now to take take counsel to change their minds, nor hope of agreement or of flight to them that desired it. For all places were kept and the rebels within, whomsoever they perceived to wish peaceably to the Romans, or offer to fly unto them, they presently killed them as their common enemies. And all these wicked persons agreed in this, to wit, to put the just men to death, who best deserved to live. Day and night nothing could be heard save only the noise of them that fought one against another; yet the lamentable cries of them that lived in perpetual fear was far more miserable, who every day had new causes and occasions of sorrow given them; yet durst they not publickly lament, for fear; and so not daring to shew their grief, they secretly sorrowed, and now no man observed any reverence to them that were alive amongst them, nor took any care to bury the dead. The cause of both which was, that every man despaired of himself. For whosoever were not joyned with the seditious, grew to be careless of all things, as making account presently to die a thousand deaths. But the seditious gathering the dead bodies upon heaps, continued their fighting, and trod upon them; and as it were encouraging themselves by the dead under their feet, they became more cruel, still devising one pernicious practise or other, and presently executing whatsoever they devised without any commiseration, omitting no way to murther, and leaving no tyranny unattempted: so that John abused the holy things of the Temple to make Engines of War. For before-time when the Priests and people had determined to underprop the Temple and build it twenty Cubits higher, King Agrippa with great cost and charges, brought them very goodly timber sufficient for their purpose from Mount Libanus. And this work being prevented by Wars, John took them, and seeing them fit for his purpose, he erected a tower to fight against those that assaulted him from off the Temple; which he built along the Wall over against the Chapter-house, that standeth on the West side of the Temple: for he could build it in no other place, by reason that all other places were filled with stairs. And having thus impiously provided Engines, he hoped hereby to destroy his Enemies. But God shewed his labour to be in vain, and before he could prevail against them, he brought the Romans against the City.

Lamentation and mourning in Jerusalem.

The cruelty of the seditious in Jerusalem.

John made use of the wood, that was kept for holy uses, to make Engines of.

For after that Titus had now gathered together part of his Army, and by writing appointed the rest to meet him at Jerusalem, he departed from Cæsarea, having three Legions that lately under the conduct of his Father Vespasian had wasted all Judæa, and the twelfth Legion that sometime under Cestius were overcome, and put to flight by the Jews: who though they were otherwise valiant enough; yet they desired to fight against the Jews to revenge themselves for that disgrace. Titus commanded the fifth Legion to meet him at Jerusalem, and go by Emmaus, and that the tenth Legion should march by Jericho: the rest he took with himself accompanied with the Kings forces that came to help him, having now more help then before, and many also out of Syria. Titus also brought men with him to supply the number that was wanting, being sent by Vespasian with Mutianus into Italy: for he brought two thousand chosen men from the Legions at Alexandria, and three thousand followed him from Euphrates, together with Tiberius Alexander his chiefest friend, and one next him in most authority, who before was Governour of Egypt, and as then thought a fit man worthy to be Governour of the Army; for that he was the first that did entertain the Emperour being new elected, who faithfully joyned with Vespasian, though yet he knew not what success he should have: and he was present with him in all his affairs as his chiefest Counseller, renowned both for his wisdom and experience.

The order of Titus Army.

CHAP. II.

How Titus went to Jerusalem to see their strength, and how he was in great danger.

Titus being now to go into the Country of the Enemy, caused all those that came to help him, to march in the foremost place: after whom followed they that were to mend the wayes, and to pitch the tents: and after them they which carried the baggage of the Rulers and Governours of his Army, and with them, the Armed Souldiers. Next after these came Titus himself accompanied with chosen men, and with him many that bare his colours: next, the Horsmen going immediately before the Engines. And the Prefects and Tribunes with certain chosen men, and their Companies followed. After them the Eagle with many other Ensigns: and the trumpets went before them. And after them followed the Army marching six in a rank: then the multitude of Servants that followed every Legion did drive their baggage before them: lastly, came the Hirelings and those that were appointed to guard them. Marching in such comely and warlike manner, as the Romans are wont, he came by Samaria into Gophna, which place was already conquered by his father, and then also was under the custody of the Roman Garrisons. And staying there one night, he departed from thence the next day: and after a days journey he pitched his Tents in a place, which in the Jews language is called Acanthonaulona, that is, the Valley of Thorns, neer unto a Village named Gabath Saul, which signifieth the Valley of Saul, which is almost thirty furlongs from Jerusalem. From thence accompanied with 600 chosen Horsemen, he went to Jerusalem, to view how strong it was, and of what courage the Jews were, to see if peradventure at sight of him they would yield without any further War, for fear. For Titus understood (and it was true) that the people desired peace, but they were oppressed by the seditious, and so durst not attempt any thing, being not able to encounter or resist the Rebels. Titus riding along the high way that went straight to the Walls saw no man all the way: but turning aside towards the tower Psephinos with his horsemen, an infinite number presently issued out by the towers of women, at a Gate opposite to Helens Tomb; and brake his rank of Horsemen into two parts, and opposed themselves, hindring those Horsemen that were yet in the high way, to come and joyn with the rest that had crost the way, and so did single out Titus accompanied only with a few men. So he could go no further for the Ditch of the Town Wall on one side, and for the Garden Pales on the other side: and there was no hope for him to return unto his Souldiers, the Enemies being between him and home. And many of his Souldiers not knowing their General to be in any danger, but supposing him to have been amongst them still, fled away. Titus seeing that he had only his own valour to trust unto, turned his horse against his Enemies, and with a loud voice exhorted his followers to do the like, and so he brake violently into the midst of them, hasting to get unto his Company. It was evident at that time that God giveth the Victory, and hath a particular care of Kings and Princes and Emperours. For notwithstanding that an infinite number of Darts and Arrows were shot at Titus, and he had no Armour at all (for as we have already said, he came to espy, and not to fight) yet had he not one wound, but all past him; as though purposely every one had striven to have mist him. But Titus with his Sword made way, and cut many upon the face that opposed themselves against him, and so they falling down, he with his Horse past over them. The Jews seeing Titus his valour, cried and exhorted one another to set upon him; but whithersoever he turned, the Jews fled, and would not abide by it: likewise those Souldiers that were in the like danger with him, came of either side him and behind him. For no man had any hope to save his life, but only by making themselves way with Titus, before they were so enclosed and oppressed. So, of two of the most valiant amongst them one was slain, and his horse likewise: the other was slain, and his horse taken by the Jews. And Titus with the rest of his followers came safe into the Camp. And the Jews getting the first Victory, rashly took courage, and that encouragement being of moment, made them very confident a long time after.

CHAP. III.

How the Jews did issue out upon the Romans pitching their Tents.

SO soon as the Legion that was to pass by Ammaus, was joyned to the rest of the Army that night, Cæsar presently the next morning removed, and came to Scopos, where he might perfectly view the City and the Temple on the North part, where the ground adjoyning unto the City is very low, and is properly called Scopos, being distant seven Furlongs from the City: and there Titus commanded two Legions to encamp themselves, and the fifth Legion to retire three Furlongs off, to the intent that the Souldiers who were wearied with travelling all night, might entrench themselves without fear or danger; no sooner had they begun their work, but presently the tenth Legion came, who were to pass by Jericho, which Vespasian had already subdued, and had placed their Garrison. This Legion was commanded to encamp six furlongs from Jerusalem, near Mount Olivet, which is opposite to the East part of the City, and is enclosed with a deep Valley called Cedron. This great and huge Army so suddenly arriving, presently staied the Wars within the City: and these three sects of seditious people beholding with admiration the Romans Camp, became friends, and made agreement amongst themselves. They began also to question one with another, what fury caused them to suffer themselves to be enclosed with three Walls, to their prejudice and loss of their lives: and seeing such preparation of Wars towards, that they should be as it were beholders of that which was done, done, keeping themſelves quiet; and not providing to reſiſt the aſſaults of their Enemies: and ſome cried, We are only valiant againſt our ſelves; and we by our ſedition maſſacring one another, ſhall betray our City into the Romans hands.

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 72.

Thus they being aſſembled together, exhorted one another: and preſently arming themſelves, they iſſued out of the City, and aſſaulted the tenth Legion, and with a huge cry ſet upon the Romans that were entrenching themſelves in the Valley. The Romans being every one appointed to do ſome buſineſs for the furtherance of that work, and for that cauſe the moſt of them having laid down their weapons (for they thought the Jews durſt not have made any excurſions, and although they would, that yet they were hindred being at variance among themſelves) they were troubled above meaſure, and preſently leaving the work ſome fled; many arming themſelves to fight, were ſlain before they were prepared to reſiſt. The multitude of the Jews was daily increaſed, becauſe that at the firſt they got the upper hand, and notwithſtanding their number was ſmall, yet did they think themſelves many: and ſo did the Romans think them to be, becauſe of their good Fortune. The Romans who were always wont to obſerve military diſcipline and order, at that time by their ſudden aſſaulting, were ſo troubled, that they obſerved no order, and ſo fled: yet whenſoever they turned again upon them that followed them, they eaſily wounded the Jews, partly, becauſe that they were ſo earneſt, that they did not greatly ſeek to defend themſelves, and alſo they did eaſily ſtay the Jews from purſuing them. Yet the number of them that purſued them ſtill increaſing, they were alſo more troubled, and ſo at laſt forced to forſake the field, and leave their tents: and the whole Legion had been in greater danger, had not Titus having preſent news hereof ſpeedily came and ſuccoured them, and upbraiding their cowardlineſs recalled them from flight; who with them, and the choſen men he brought, encountring the Jews on one ſide, he ſlew many of them, and wounded divers, and put the reſt to flight, and forced them into the Valley. The Jews being now in the lower ground, and having endured much at the Romans hands, ſince fortune frowned upon them, turned again, and having the Valley between them, they fought with the Romans. And thus the fight continued till the midſt of the day.

The Citizens aſſail the Romans.

The Jews drive the Romans from their Camp.

A little after mid-day Titus guarding the reſt with thoſe that he brought to ſuccour them, and placing others, to prevent the excurſions of the Jews, he commanded the reſt to entrench themſelves in the top of the Mountain. The Jews thought the Romans had fled, and their Sentinel upon their Walls, making a ſign unto them by ſhaking his Garment up and down, a great multitude of them ran ſo violently upon the Romans, as though they had been ſavage beaſts, ſo that none of their enemies were able to withſtand them; but as though they had been ſtricken with ſome Engine; ſo all of them were diverſly ſcattered and forced to flie into the Mountain. But Titus in the midſt of the ſide of the Mountain remained alone having but a few with him; notwithſtanding his friends, who for the love they bare to their Emperour, ſtaied with him, and abode the danger, did earneſtly perſwade him to fly from the Jews, who deſperately ran upon their own deaths, and not to endanger himſelf for them, who ought rather to abide it then he: And that he ſhould think upon his own eſtate, who was not a Souldier, but General of them all, and Lord of the whole World, and that he ſhould not abide when all others fled ſo faſt, and in ſuch danger. But he made as though he heard them not, and oppoſed himſelf againſt them that offered to aſſault him, ſtriking them upon the faces, and killed them that made reſiſtance, and he purſued them down the Hill, and ſo forced them to retire. The Jews amazed at his valour, did not yet flie into the City, but avoided him on both ſides, and fled into the Valley: then again purſuing them that fled from them; yet Titus croſſing them as they went, hindred their purſuit. In the mean time thoſe that were encamping themſelves above, ſeeing them beneath put to flight, were diſcomfited, and all fled, thinking that they were not able to reſiſt the Jews, and imagining that Titus was likewiſe fled: for had they thought that he had ſtaied by it, they never would have forſaken their quarters; yet being now terrified they knew not wherefore, ſome fled one way, and ſome another without any order, till ſome ſeeing the Emperour in the midſt of the battel, and fearing the miſchance that might betide him, they with loud cries ſignified it unto the whole Legion. Then the Romans turning again for ſhame, and accuſing themſelves guilty of a great offence in forſaking their Emperour amidſt ſuch danger, came with all the violence they could uſe againſt the Jews, and driving them down the Mountain, forced them to retire; yet the Jews fought flying, and ſeeing the Romans to have the upper hand of them, becauſe they were upon the higher ground, they departed into the Valley. Titus aſſaulted them that were oppoſite againſt him, and ſo commanded the reſt to go and finiſh their trenches. And he with thoſe that before were with him to defend the workmen, did now also keep the Jews from molesting them. So if I may speak without flattery or envy, Cæsar himself did twice preserve the whole Legion from destruction, and gave the Souldiers opportunity to entrench themselves.

CHAP. IV.

Of the fight within the City upon the feast of unleavened Bread.

John entreth and seizeth the inward Temple and all the furniture thereof, putteth the Zealous to flight, and raiseth a mighty sedition.

DUring the intermission of the Foreign Wars, they fell to their former sedition again, which caused Civil Wars among them. And against the feast of unleavened bread, which is the fourteenth day of April (for upon this day the Jews say that they were delivered out of the bondage of Egypt) Eleazar and his Companions opened the Gates, to the intent that all that would, might come in to adore and do their devotion. But John used this Festival day as a means to effect his deceit; and caused many of his Company that were unknown, to enter in among the people with weapons under their garments, giving them charge when they were within, to get possession of the Temple: and so soon as they were within, they cast off their garments, and shewed themselves to be in armour. Presently a great tumult arose within the Temple; for all the people that were not of the sedition, thought themselves betrayed: and the Zealous thought this treason, only practised to prejudice them: and so leaving the Gate which before they kept, and leaping down from the Towers, they never offering to fight, fled unto the Vaults about the Temple. And the people flocking about the Altar, and others who were driven into the Temple, were killed with Clubs and Swords, and so trodden upon. And many were slain upon private hatred, under pretence to be partakers with the Enemies. And whosoever formerly had offended any of those Traitors, he was put to death, as though he had been one of the zealous. But they who had cruelly raged against the innocent, let the wicked have leisure to escape out of those Caves, whereby they had no harm: and having gotten the inner part of the Temple, and all belonging thereunto, they did now more confidently then before fight against Simon: and thus the sedition that was before divided into three parts, was now brought only into two. Titus being desirous to bring his Army nearer the City, sent a certain number of Horsemen and Footmen, which he thought sufficient to hinder all excursions of the Jews from Scopos, and another Company he sent to plain all the grounds betwixt him and Jerusalem: who cutting down all Hedges, and Pales, and Fences, and Wood (though they were fruit-trees) filled the Valleys, and made it all plain ground: and hewing down all stones that standing up made the ground unequal, they plained all that ground from Scopos, even unto Herods Monument, which adjoyned to the Lake of Serpents called sometime Bethora.

A threefold sedition divided into two parts.

Whatsoever about Jerusalem is hollow or troubled with Valleys is filled up.

CHAP. V.

Of the deceit the Jews used against the Roman Souldiers.

ABout this time the Jews devised this stratagem against the Romans. The most courageous among the seditious people went out unto the places called the Womens Towers, and counterfeited themselves to be driven thither by them within the City that desired peace; and for that they feared the Romans, they were come thither to hide themselves one behind another: others standing on the Walls, and counterfeiting themselves to be the Citizens, with loud cryes desired peace, and a league of friendship; promising to set the City Gates open, and inviting the Romans to enter: and crying thus they also cast stones against their Country-men before spoken of, as though they did drive them from the Gates; and they made as though they would by force break thorow the people, and come to the Gates, partly by force, partly by entreating the people to permit them. And making many offers to go unto the Romans, they returned again like men troubled in mind, and studying what to do. The Roman Souldiers did not perceive their subtil meaning; who seeing the seditious ready to fall into their hands, that so they might punish them, and seeing the people (as they thought) ready to open the Gates unto them, would in post haste have gone unto the City. But Titus suspected some deceit coloured with this kind, inviting him to enter, because he did not see any reason for it. For the day before, having by Joseph offered them peace, he understood that their minds were far from any peaceable cogitations: wherefore now he commanded the Souldiers to keep their quarters and not to remove; yet some of them, appointed to work in the trenches, taking their weapons, ran unto the Gates; and the Jews who seemed to be driven out of the City at first fled; at last when they came unto

A unto the Gates of the Towers, they encloſed the Romans round about, and aſſaulted them upon their backs: and they that were upon the Walls did caſt all kind of darts and ſtones upon them: ſo that they ſlew many, and wounded very many; for it was not eaſie to eſcape from the Walls, others being behind them, and offering them violence. Moreover, they were aſhamed that their Captains had ſo offended, and in fear of their offence committed, both which cauſed them ſtill to perſevere in it. And after a long conflict receiving many wounds, and giving as many, at laſt that put them to flight that incloſed them, and ſo the Jews departed, and followed them to Herods Monument, purſuing them with Darts. And then the Jews returned rejoycing in their good fortune; and deriding the Romans for be-
B ing ſo deceived, lifting up their ſhields and Bucklers, ſhouting and rejoycing.

The Victory of the Jews.

The Roman Souldiers were received of their Captains with threatnings, and of Cæſar, with this ſpeech: The Jews led only with deſperation, do all things with advice and counſel, deviſing deceits: and fortune favoureth their practiſes becauſe they are ordered, and truſty to one another. And now the Romans, whom for their obedience and diſcipline fortune was wont to favour, do contrariwiſe offend herein, and for their raſh and unadviſed fighting are overcome: and which is worſt of all, in Cæſars preſence offering to fight without their Captains. Truly the military law and diſcipline will be grieved hereat, and my father very ſorrowful to hear of this. For he who from his infancy unto old age, hath been trained up in arms, yet did he never offend in this ſort; and what ſhall we ſay to our law that
C puniſheth the leaſt offences againſt them committed with death, when our whole army doth diſobey their Emperours command? But (quoth he) they who ſo arrogantly have diſobeyed our command, ſhall preſently underſtand, that among the Romans Victory againſt the Generals command, is an infamy. Titus having thus ſpoken in anger to the Captains, evidently declared to them what and how he purpoſed to puniſh them. And they preſently deſpaired as though by and by they were juſtly condemned to die. But all the other Legions flocking about Titus, beſought him to pardon their fellow Souldiers, and to remit the offence of the raſhneſs of ſome few, for the obedience ſake of the reſt; affirming that their future valour ſhould be a ſufficient recompence for this their offence. Cæſar was now pacified, partly thinking what was moſt profitable, partly for the entreaty of the reſt; for he purpoſed to puniſh
D one man only, and to rebuke the reſt, and ſignifie to them his diſpleaſure, and ſo he was reconciled to his Souldiers; ſtraightly charging them to be wiſer hereafter: and after, he deviſed how to be revenged on the Jews for this deceit. When all the ground between the Walls of Jeruſalem, and his Army was in four days made plain, Titus being deſirous ſafely to conduct the baggage, and the reſt of the multitude in ſafety, he placed the ſtrongeſt of all his Souldiers every one in his rank ſeven by ſeven, and cauſed them to march from the North part of the City unto the Weſt, all along without the City Walls, placing the footmen in the fore-front, and in the laſt place, the Horſemen three in a rank, and between them both the Archers. So the Jews not able now to make any excurſions, Titus Souldiers being thus diſpoſed of, the baggage of the three Legions and the multitude paſſed along without any dan-
E ger. And Titus himſelf being now within two Furlongs of the City Walls, pitched his tent againſt that Corner of the Wall that is called Pſephinos, where the compaſs of the Wall from the North bends into the Weſt: the other part of the Army entrenched themſelves againſt that part of the Wall that is called Hippicos, diſtant in like manner two Furlongs from the City. But the tenth Legion remained ſtill in Mount Oſivet where it was before.

CHAP. VI.

The Deſcription of Jeruſalem.

F THE City was compaſſed with a threefold Wall on every ſide, ſave only on that part where it was incloſed with Valleys inacceſſible: for on that ſide it had only one Wall. It was built upon two little Hills, one of them being oppoſite unto another, and ſeparated one from another with a Valley, which was wonderfully repleniſhed with houſes. One of theſe Hills whereon ſtandeth the upper part of the City, is far higher and ſteeper then the other, inſomuch that becauſe of the ſtrength of it, King David in times paſt called it a Caſtle (this David was the Father of King Solomon, who firſt builded the Temple in that place;) but we at this day call it the high Market place. The other Hill called Acra, is the place where the lower part of the City ſtands. Oppoſite againſt this Hill, there was alſo another lower then this Acra was, which was firſt divided from it with a large Valley, but afterward at ſuch time as the Aſmoneans reigned, they did fill up this Valley, to the intent intent they might joyn the City unto the Temple, and cut down the top of Acra, and so made it lower, that it might not hide the Temple. The Valley, by which we have said the two higher Hills are separated one from another, is called Tyropœon, and reacheth unto Siloa (which is a Fountain abounding with sweet water.) Without the City were two Hills compassed with deep Vallies: and being inclosed with high Rocks, they were on every side inaccessible. The most ancient of the three Walls, by reason of the Valley about it, and the Hill whereupon it stood, could not easily be taken; and beside the opportunity of the place, it was very strongly built, at the cost and charges of David, Solomon, and other Kings. This Wall, beginning at the Tower called Hippicos, reacheth to that called Xystus, and afterward being joyned unto the Palace, it endureth in the West porch of the Temple: on the other side towards the West it begins at the same Tower, and passing by the place that is called Betiso, it descends unto the Gate of the Esseans, and so into the South, and from thence again it bendeth into the East, where is also Solomons Pond, and reacheth unto the place called Ophlan, where it is joyned unto the East Porch of the Temple. The second Wall beginneth at the Gate that is called Genath, which is a Gate of the former Wall, and it only compasseth the North part of the City, and reacheth to Antonia, a Castle so called. The third Wall beginneth at the Tower Hippicos, from whence it goeth into the North part, and from thence it cometh unto the Tower Psephina, over against the Sepulchre of Helena that was Queen of Adiabena, and Mother of King Izates: and passing along by the Kings Caves, it turneth towards the Tower near the Monument of Fullo, and the Valley called Cedron it joyneth with the old Wall, Agrippa compasseth that part of the City that he built, with this Wall, it being before all open without defence. For the City grew so populous, that by little and little they were forced to inhabit some part without the Walls: and this Wall reacheth a great way, being joyned unto the Hill next the City on the North side of the Temple. There was also a fourth Hill inhabited, named Bezetha, situate against Antonia, but separated from it with very deep Ditches, which were made of purpose, lest that the Foundation of Antonia being joyned unto it, it might be easier to come unto, and seem lower: for the deepnes of the Ditch maketh the Tower seem much higher then otherwise it would. This place being added unto the City, is called in that Country language Bezetha, which signifieth the new City. And the Inhabitants desiring that part to be fortified, Agrippa Father to this Agrippa that finisht the Wall, did begin that Wall aforementioned: and fearing lest Claudius Cæsar, hearing how sumptuous a Wall he built, should mistrust that he purposed to revolt, he only laid the Foundation of it, and so left it unfinished.

Agrippas cost in building the Wall.

For the City could never have been taken by force, if he had finished that Wall as he began it, it being built with stones twenty Cubits long, and ten Cubits broad, which could neither easily be undermined, nor battered with Engines: and this Wall was built ten Cubits high, and no doubt had been raised higher, had not his liberality who began this building been hindred. Yet again by the Jews industry the same Wall was raised twenty Cubits high, the Battlements hereof were two Cubits high, and the Tower three Cubits, and in all it was twenty four Cubits high, as before. Upon the Wall were three Towers twenty Cubits broad, and twenty Cubits high, built four-square very strongly, and was builded of as firm a foundation as the Wall it self, which for the building and fair stone was not inferiour to the Temple above. Within this strong Tower, which reacheth twenty Cubits high, were rooms for men to dwell in, and Cisterns to receive rain-water, and large turning stairs to go into every place there: and this third Wall had four-score and ten of these Towers, and between every Tower were two hundred Cubits space. The middle Wall had fourteen Towers, and the old Wall had threescore, and the compass of the whole City was three and thirty Furlongs. And although the third Wall was admirable, yet the Tower of Psephina, which was built upon a Corner of the Wall, between the North and the West part of the City, had a certain excellency of more wonder, against which part Titus had encamped himself: for it was seventy Cubits high, so that from thence upon a clear Sun-shine day, one might discover Arabia, and see the uttermost parts of all the dominions of the Hebrews unto the Sea, and it had eight Corners. Just opposite to this was the Tower Hippicos, and near unto it were other two, that King Herod builded upon the old Wall, which in bigness, beauty and strength, did surpass all others in the whole World.

The third Wall had 90. Towers.

Psephina was 70. Cubits high.

Herod called three Towers by the names of three his most dearest Friends.

For King Herod, besides his natural liberality and desire to adorn this City, did also for his own pleasure so beautifie this building, that it might excel all other, and dedicated them to three most renowned personages, whose names they also did bear, to wit, to his brother, his friend, and to his wife, she being (as is aforesaid) put to death for jealousie; the other two being slain in Wars, after they had fought valiantly. The Tower Hippicos called by the name

A name of his friend, had four Corners, and every one of them were five and twenty Cubits broad, and as many in length, and thirty Cubits in height, being no place hollow; and above the high places and ſtone-work, there was a Well to receive rain-water, twenty Cubits deep: and aloft of it were houſes with double roofs twenty five Cubits high, and divided into many rooms: and above them were Battlements two Cubits high, and Turrets three Cubits high: ſo that the whole height was accounted to be fourſcore and five Cubits. The ſecond Tower that by his Brothers name he called Phaſelus, was in breadth and length fourty Cubits, and ſo many Cubits high, in figure of a ſquare Pillar, all which height was ſolid, and not hollow within: and above this a Porch ten Cubits high, decked with
B Turrets and Pinnacles. Over the midſt of this Porch he built another Tower diſtinguiſhed into goodly rooms and ſumptuous Baths, that it ſhould not want any thing neceſſary for a Prince: on the top it was beautified with Turrets and Pinnacles, ſo that all its height was almoſt fourſcore and ten Cubits: And it reſembled the Tower Pharus at Alexandria, wherein continual light is kept to guide the Seamen that ſail thither, ſaving that it had a greater compaſs then it. And in this houſe now at this time did Simon lodge, who tyrannized over the people. The third Tower was, according to the Queens Name, called Mariamme, the Wife of Herod, twenty Cubits high, all ſolid, and other twenty Cubits broad, having more magnificent and beautiful houſes and lodgings then the reſt. For the King ſo thought it meet, that the Tower called by his Wives name, ſhould be more beautiful then
C they who only bare the names of other men, like as they were ſtronger then this that bare the name of a woman. This Tower was in all fifty five Cubits high.

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 72.

Hippicos 85 Cubits high.

Phaſelus 90 Cubits high.

Mariamme a goodly Tower 55 Cubits high.

Notwithſtanding theſe three Towers were of ſuch height, yet by reaſon of their ſituation they ſeemed far higher: for the old Wall whereupon they were built was placed upon high ground, and the top of the hill whereupon they ſtood was above thirty cubits high, whereby their height was much increaſed. The greatneſs alſo was admirable; for it was not ordinary ſtone which men might bear, but all white marble, whereof every ſtone was twenty Cubits long, and ten Cubits broad, and five Cubits thick, and they were ſo coupled one to another, that every ſtone by it ſelf ſeemed a Tower; and ſo cunningly conjoyned by workmens hands, that every tower ſeemed one ſtone. And theſe were placed on the North ſide of the D City; and adjoyning to them within the City, was ſituate the Kings Palace, ſurpaſſing all that can be ſpoken of it: which for greatneſs and excellent work may be compared to all that were in the world. It was compaſſed about with a wall thirty cubits high, and adorned with goodly Towers round about, every one of like diſtance from other, beautified with dwelling houſes and lodgings for a hundred of the Nobility. The variety of the marble it was built withal, was admirable, for all ſorts being there uſed that were never ſo rare to be found: and the tops of theſe houſes for the length of the beams and the beauty thereof paſſed all credit; and the multitude of rooms, and diverſity of buildings, all filled and adorned with houſhold-ſtuffe and furniture. And in every room there were many Veſſels of gold and ſilver, and many porches round about, one anſwerable unto another, and Pillars
E in every one. And there were many pleaſant walks repleniſhed with divers trees, and many walking places, or allies, all beſet with conduits that ſpouted up water on high, and ciſterns full of brazen images, from which ran out water, and about the water many Dove-houſes full of tame Pigeons. But it is impoſſible ſufficiently to declare the riches and beauty of the Kings Palace; and a grief to think what goodly things, and how rich, the thieves did there ſet on fire: for theſe things were not burnt by the Romans, but by the ſeditious thieves (as is before ſaid) at the beginning of this rebellion, who conſumed all with fire, even from the Caſtle Antonia from whence the fire came, and deſtroyed the Kings Palace, and the Covers and tops of the three Towers. The Temple was, as is before ſaid, built upon a hard Mountain, and at the firſt, the Plain upon the top thereof was ſcarcely big enough to con-
F tain it and the Temple-yard, the hill being very ſteep. But when King Solomon, who alſo built the Temple, had compaſſed the Eaſt part thereof with a Wall, he alſo placed a Porch upon the rampire, and ſo for many ages after, it lay unfenced on other parts: wherefore the people every day bringing earth thither, at laſt made it plain and large enough: and breaking down the North Wall they took in all that ſpace which the Temple had continually occupied even until now: and the hill being now incloſed with a threefold Wall, it was a work paſſing all expectation in building. To the effecting whereof many ages were ſpent, and all the holy treaſure offered to God, even from all parts of the World, was employed therein, as well in the Buildings of the higher, as of the lower part of the Temple; the foundations whereof were laid three hundred Cubits deep, and in many places more: yet could not all the height of the foundations be ſeen, being now buried in valleys, that were filled up to make them equal with the ſtrait ſtreets of the City. The ſtones of this building were of fourty Cubits: for the abundance of treaſure and liberality of the people did effect that which was ſcarcely poſſible; and that which all men thought could never have come to paſs, in time and by induſtry came to perfection.

The Porches were built of white marble ſtone ſuſtained by Pillars.

The building was anſwerable unto theſe Foundations. For all the Porches were double, and every one was ſupported by Pillars, each of them being five and twenty Cubits high, and all of one piece and of white marble: the top whereof was all of Cedar, whoſe natural beauty for the good conjoyning of this wood and poliſhing thereof, did aſtoniſh all that beheld it, being adorned neither with painting nor carved works. Theſe porches were thirty Cubits broad: and the compaſs of them altogether, with the Fort of Antonia, was ſix furlongs. All the ground whereon ſtood no building, was curiouſly wrought and paved with all ſorts of ſtones. The way to the ſecond Temple was all incloſed with ſtones of lattice work, which were three cubits high, and moſt beautifully wrought along: in which place alſo were placed certain pillars equally diſtant one from another, to ſhew the law of purification; ſome being written upon in Latine letters, other-ſome in Greek, forbidding all ſtrangers to enter into the holy place: for the ſecond Temple is called the holy place. To go unto the ſecond from the firſt, one muſt paſs fourteen ſtairs, and it was fourſquare aloft, and encloſed with a wall by it ſelf; whoſe outſide being forty cubits high, was all covered with ſtairs to aſcend up into it; and within, it was five and twenty cubits high: for all the part of the inner ſide was unſeen, becauſe it was built on the deſcent of a hill. After the fourteen ſtairs there was a Plain made level with the wall of three hundred cubits: from thence paſſed on five other ſtairs which lead unto the gates, whereof on the North-ſide and the South there were eight, four on each ſide, and two on the Eaſt. For it was neceſſary that there ſhould be a peculiar place for women to exerciſe their devotion in, which alſo was encloſed with a wall. And ſo it was neceſſary there ſhould be two doors: and againſt the firſt gate there was oppoſite unto it one gate on the North-ſide, and another on the South, both ſeparated from the reſt, whereby one entred the place allotted for women; for it was not lawful for any to paſs by any other gate unto the women, neither could they go beyond their own door, becauſe of the wall: for that place was common both to the women of that nation, & alſo to all ſtrange women that came for religion ſake. There was no gate on the Weſt part, but a wall that reacheth all along in that place. Between the gates were porches oppoſite one againſt another, reaching from the wall unto the treaſure-houſe, ſupported with great and goodly pillars, being as plain, and fully as big as they below. The gates were covered with gold and ſilver, as alſo the poſts and foreparts thereof were, one only excepted that was covered with Corinthian braſs, far ſurpaſſing in beauty the other that were covered with ſilver and gold. In every gate there were two doors, each one thirty cubits high, and fifteen cubits broad: and after the entrance where they were made larger, every one had on each ſide ſeats thirty Cubits long, and large like a Tower, and fourty Cubits high, each one ſupported with two Pillars twelve Cubits thick. And all other Gates were of like greatneſs, but that which was covered with Corinthian Braſs, which was the entrance into the place allotted for the women, and opened into the Eaſt Gate of the Temple, doubtleſs was bigger then the reſt: for it was fifty Cubits high (the Gates whereof were fourty Cubits) and was more richly adorned then the reſt: for the cover of gold and ſilver was thicker then it was in the reſt, which Alexander Tiberius his father had melted, to cover all the nine Gates. And there were 15 ſtairs, that went from the Wall that ſeparated the women, unto the great Gate of the Temple: for theſe ſtairs were ſhorter by five degrees, then thoſe that went to other Gates.

A peculiar place deſtinated for women for religion ſake.

Some of the Gates were of gold, ſome of ſilver, and one of Corinthian Braſs.

The ſacred Sanctuary.

The Temple it ſelf was ſituated in the midſt of all, to wit, the holy Sanctuary, and had twelve ſtairs to go unto it. The forepart whereof was in height and breadth a hundred Cubits: and behind, it was fourty Cubits outright: and before it, was as it were two ſhoulders on each ſide riſing up in height twenty Cubits. The firſt Gate hereof was ſeventy Cubits high, and twenty five wide, and had no door: for it ſignified that Heaven was ſpread all over, and might be ſeen in every place: and all the foreparts were guilded with gold, and all the firſt building did appear and might be ſeen without, and all that was within and about the Gate gliſtered with gold. The inner part thereof was divided into two rooms, whereof only the firſt room might be ſeen, which was in height fourſcore and ten Cubits, and in length fourty, and in breadth twenty. The inner Gate was (as is already ſaid) all guilded with Gold, and all the Wall about it, and above it: it had a golden Vine, whereon were hanging Cluſters of Grapes all of gold, every cluſter being as long as a man is high. And becauſe the height was ſeeled above, the inner Temple did ſeem to be lower then it was without, and it had Golden Gates fifty five Cubits high, and ſixteen Cubits broad.

It

A It had hangings alſo of the ſame length, which was a Babylonian vail, all wrought with violet, and purple ſilk and ſcarlet, admirable to behold: the permixtion of which colours had a myſtical meaning, bearing as it were the ſignification of the whole World. For the ſcarlet doth ſeem to expreſs the fire, the ſilk ſignifieth the earth, the violet ſheweth the Air, and the purple declares the Sea, partly in their colours reſembling them, partly alſo as having their beginning from them: for the purple is ingendred in the Sea, and the ſilk is produced by the earth. In this tapeſtry work was curiouſly wrought, and deciphered all the ſpeculations of the Heavens, only the Celeſtial ſigns excepted. Being entred within, you come into a lower place of the Temple, which was 60 Cubits high, and as many in length, and 20 in
B breadth. Again, this place was divided into two, whereof the firſt part contained 40 Cubits, having in it three moſt admirable things, and famous thorowout the World, to wit, a candleſtick, a table, and the altar of incenſe, upon the candleſtick ſeven lamps were placed, which ſignifieth the ſeven Planets (for ſo many did there come all out of one ſtem of the candleſtick) upon the table were ſtanding twelve loaves of bread, ſignifying the twelve Celeſtial ſigns, and revolution of the year. By the altar of incenſe, out of which proceedeth thirteen odours, coming partly from the Sea which is unhabitable, and partly from the earth which is inhabited, is ſignified that all things are in the hands of God, and ſubject to yield him obedience. The inner part of the Temple contained 20 Cubits, which alſo was ſeparated from the other part by a vail, and nothing was within it: and this place was the holy of
C holies, and no man might enter, look into it, nor violate the ſame. On each ſide of the lower Temple, there were many lodgings and doors to paſs into, every one of them having three roofs one above another; aud there was a gate which led unto both ſides of the Temple, and unto theſe rooms: but the higher part of the Temple had not the like rooms on each ſide, and therefore it was made ſo much narrower then the other, yet was it higher then it by 40 Cubits, neither was it ſo gorgeous as the lower. For the whole height was 100 Cubits, and the ground thereof 60. The outermoſt part was ſo curious and richly wrought, that it was impoſſible for any one to imagine any workmanſhip that it wanted: for it was all covered with a maſſive plate of pure gold, which ſhined far brighter then the Morning Sun, ſo that it dazled the eyes of the beholders, as doth the Sun when it is gazed upon. And afar off
D it ſeemed unto ſtrangers that came thither, like a white Mountain: for where the Temple was not guilded with gold, there was it milk-white. The top hereof was all ſet full of rods of gold, very ſharp at the upper end like Pikes, leſt the Birds ſhould come and ſit thereon, and ſo defile it: many ſtones wherewithal it was built, were 45 Cubits large, 5 Cubits in length, and 6 Cubits broad. Before the Temple there ſtood an Altar 15 Cubits high, being 40 Cubits broad, and as many long, and four-ſquare, having Corners made like horns. The way to this Altar was on the South ſide, where it by little and little mounted from below even unto the Altar. This Altar was builded without Iron, and never Iron did touch it. The Temple and the Altar were encloſed with ſtone-work, beautiful to behold, which was a Cubit high, ſeparating the people from the Prieſts. Thoſe that were troubled with a flux of their ſeed, and E Lepers were expulſed out of the City, and Women alſo having their monthly courſes; and thoſe that were not unclean, might paſs this foreſaid limit. Likewiſe men that were not purified, were not permitted to come within the inner Temple; and thoſe that were, might not come among the Prieſts: thoſe alſo that deſcended from the line of the Prieſts, and for blindneſs did not adminiſter their function, were notwithſtanding admitted into the place appointed for the reſt of the Prieſts that were ſound, and had a ſhare as they had; yet did they go attired as Lay-men, for only he that did ſacrifice, might wear Prieſtly attire.

The Prieſts that came unto the Altar and Temple had no infirmity, and they were cloathed in a fine linen garment, and abſtained from Wine, and lived in abſtinence for reverence of re-

The high Prieſt alſo aſcended with the Prieſts into the Temple; yet not always, but every ſeventh day, and in the Calends of every month, or on a feſtival celebrated according to the cuſtom of their Country, or wherein all the people were preſent. And then he ſacrificed being girded with a vail, which covered his thighs even unto his privities, under which he wore a linen garment hanging down unto his feet, and above it a round violet garment all fringed at the ſkirts, and hanged full of golden bells, and pomgranats of gold, firſt one, and then another; the bells ſignified thunder, and the pomgranats lightning. Upon his breſt he wore a veſture of five colours; to wit, gold, purple, ſcarlet, ſilk and violet, which alſo (as we have ſaid) the vails of the Temple were wrought withal. He had likewiſe a Rotchet of the ſame, wherein was more gold, and in ſhape it was like the garment he wore on his body to the thighs: it was alſo alſo buttoned with two golden buttons, made in the form of Aſps, wherein was incloſed the greateſt and moſt precious Sardonyx Stone that could be found, bearing the names of the 12 Tribes of Iſrael engraven in them. On the other ſide did hang 12 precious ſtones, three and three in a rank, divided into four rows. In the firſt was the Ruby, the Topaze, and the Emeraud: in the ſecond the Carbuncle, the Jaſper and the Saphire: in the third the Agate, the Amethyſt, and the Diamond: in the laſt the Onyx, the Beryl and Chryſolite, in every one of which one name of the twelve tribes was written. Upon his head he wore a Miter of ſilk, which was crowned with Hyacinth: and aloft of it was another Crown of gold, wherein was engraven ſacred letters, to wit, the four vowels. He did not always uſe this garment, but another moſt commonly not ſo gorgeous: this he uſed when he entred into the Sanctuary, which he did only once every year alone, none elſe going with him, upon which day all the Nation was wont to faſt. But we will hereafter ſpeak more at large of the City and Temple, the Laws and Cuſtoms, the ordinances and obſervations, for theſe things cannot be briefly declared. The Caſtle Antonia was ſituate in a Corner of the two porches of the firſt Temple, which looked unto the Weſt, and the North: and it was built upon a Rock of ſtone of fifty Cubits high, which on every ſide was inacceſſible: this firſt was built by King Herod, to ſhew the greatneſs and magnificence of his mind. For firſt of all the Rock at the foot thereof was all covered with thin and ſlender ſtones like ſlates. Which did both adorn it, and would alſo eaſily ſlide down if any one walked upon them. Before the Battlements of the Fort there was a Wall three Cubits high, within which the Caſtle Antonia was built 40 Cubits high, being within all furniſhed and contrived like the Palace of a King, having all kind of houſes of office, and other neceſſary rooms. For there were Porches, Baths, and large Halls, to place tents in: ſo that for all convenient rooms and places it ſeemed to be a City, and for the magnificence thereof a Kings Palace. In outward faſhion it was built like a Tower, and invironed about with four other Towers, at every Corner one, whereof they that were on the South and Eaſt-ſide were 70 Cubits high, the other two were only 50. So out of theſe two higheſt, one might have perfect view of the whole Temple. Where it joyned to the Porches of the Temple, there was on either ſide of it a pair of ſtairs for the Souldiers to come down out of it into the Temple. For always the Roman Souldiers lodged there, and guarded the Temple in Armour upon feſtival days, leſt the people ſhould attempt any Rebellion or Sedition. For the Temple was a Caſtle to keep the Town in awe, and the Caſtle Antonia to overthrow the Temple: there alſo were placed the Souldiers: likewiſe in Herods Palace, which ſerved for a Caſtle over the higher part of the City. The Hill Bezetha was divided from the City, as is before mentioned: which being the higheſt of all, was joyned to part of the new City, which did obſcure the view of the Temple on the North-ſide. And thus I have here ſpoken ſufficiently of the City, and the Wall in this place, becauſe we mean hereafter to deſcribe them more at large.

CHAP. VII.

How the Jews refuſed to yield, how they aſſaulted the Romans.

15000 follow Simon.

THe moſt warlike of all the people joyned with Simon, being in number ten thouſand, beſide the Idumæans: and thoſe ten thouſand had 50 Captains of their own fellows, yet all ſubject unto Simon. The Idumæans that took his part were five thouſand, and had ten Captains, the chief of whom were Jacob the Son of Soſas, and Simon, the Son of Cathla. And John, who kept the Temple, had ſix thouſand Armed men, over whom were twenty Captains: and then there came unto him two thouſand of the zealous, and four hundred, who before had followed Eleazar and Simon, the Son of Jairus. So theſe warring one againſt another, the people was their booty, and the multitude that were not ſeditious as they were, was their prey. Simon kept the higher part of the City, and the greater Wall even unto Cedron; and all that part of the old Wall which is between Siloa, and the Palace of Monobazus, who was King of Adiabena, that lieth beyond the River Euphrates: he alſo kept all the Hill Acra (which is the lower part of the City) unto Helenas Palace, who was Monobazus his Mother. But John kept all the Temple and the ſpace about it, Ophla, and the valley Cedron: and that which was between theſe two places which Simon and John kept, was all conſumed with fire, and made a place to fight in. For although the Romans Tents were pitched near unto the Walls of the City, yet did not this ſedition ceaſe; but having recovered ſome ſecurity a while at the Romans firſt coming, preſently they returned unto their former wont. And dividing themſelves again, every man fought for his own part,

Simons Camp againſt John.

A part, doing all that the Romans could wish to be done. For the Romans did them no more harm than they did themselves: for after them the City suffered no new calamity, but indured far more misery before it was taken and destroyed by the Romans, then it did at that time. For the Romans in destroying it, did rather end their misery than bring them into it. For the seditious did take the City, and the Romans did overcome and take the seditious, which was far stronger than the walls: so that one may ascribe all their miseries to their own Nation, and equity and justice unto the Romans, as every one shall clearly see by that which ensued.

The year of the world, 4034. after Christs nativity, 72.

The seditious took the City, and the Romans overcame and took the seditious.

The City being in the estate beforesaid, Titus with chosen Horsemen went up and down without it, to espie where he might most easily assault the walls. And being in doubt a long B time what to do, for that where the Valley was, footmen could not possibly get up to it; and where it was walled, they seemed to be impossible to be battered down with Engines: at last he determined to assault it on that part, where was the monument of John the HighPriest: for only in this place the first wall was lower than in other places, and it was not compast here with the second wall, for this place was not fortified, because that those parts of the new City were not much inhabited. So that from this place the wall might easily be assaulted: whereby Titus was perswaded that the higher City, and the Temple, and Antonia, might easily be taken. As he was thus viewing the place, one of his friends called Nicanor, came unto him: who was shot in the left shoulder with an arrow, because he desired to come near Joseph, who went thither of purpose to perswade the Jews which were upon the wall to yield: C for Nicanor was very eloquent. Cæsar perceiving their minds, and that they would not abstain from him, who perswaded them to that which was most expedient for them, was now moved, and began earnestly to besiege them: and so he permitted his Souldiers to waste all the suburbs, and to gather all the rubbish, stones, wood, and other matter together, and made therewith a Mount. And dividing his Army into three parts, he disposed of every one what he should do, and in the midst of all upon the Mounts he placed Archers, and before them engines for shot, wherewithal he hindred the incursions of his Enemies, lest they should annoy the work, and also did beat those off from the wall, who made any resistance from thence. And presently all trees being cut down, the suburbs appeared naked. Whilst the Romans having gathered the wood together, were busied in the work, the Jews were not D idle: and then the people, who were troubled with murthers and robberies, did hope to have an end of their misery, the seditious people being busied against their Enemies: and they now hoped that if the Romans did overcome, they might be revenged upon them. John still kept where he was, fearing Simon; yet were his followers very earnest to assault the Romans. But Simon being next unto the siege, did not rest, but placed all along that part of the wall, men with darts, which before were taken from Sestius Governour of the Romans, and found in the Castle of Antonia. But the darts did the Jews small pleasure, by reason that few of them knew how to use them: only some who were taught by certain that fled from the Romans, could use them a little. Yet did they assault the Roman souldiers that were building the Mounts, with arrows and stones, and also made incursions upon them by companies, and E fought with them. But the Roman workmen were defended by Hurdles that were of purpose set before them: and every Legion had strange and admirable Engines against the excursions of their enemy, and especially the Engines that the tenth Legion had to cast darts, and others that cast stones; which did not only repulse them, by whom they were assaulted, but also those that stood upon the wall: for every stone was a Talent weight, and were shot more than a furlong, and slew not only those that they did first strike, but also many that were stricken with the rebound. But the Jews always espied the stones before they came (for they were white) and so avoided them: and they were not only descryed by the noise they made in flying, but they might easily be perceived: and by this means the watchmen in the Towers gave warning always when these Engines were shot off, and when the stones came, F crying in their Country language, The stone cometh: so the Jews upon the walls knowing what they meant, avoided the stones, and so received no harm. Then the Romans devised to black the stones with Ink, and so they could not be seen as they flew, but at one stroke slew many. But the Jews were not herewith so terrified, that they permitted the Romans peaceably to build the Mount, but night and day they hindred them with stratagems and valour. Now when the Romans had finished their work, the Carpenters measured the space between the mounts and the wals with a Plummet fastned unto a line, which they cast from one place unto another: for they could not measure it otherwise, because of the darts cast from the walls; and finding that they had Rams long enough, they set them up, and Titus commanded the wall to be battered in three places, to the end that the battery might not be hindred. The noiſe that theſe Rams did make, was heard round about the City; and the Citizens cried mainly out, and the ſeditious perſons were alſo ſore afraid. And ſeeing themſelves all in like danger, they now determined to join all together in reſiſting the Romans: and the ſeditious cryed one unto another, ſaying, that they rather aſſiſted the Enemies, than reſiſted them: and therefore exhorted one another at leaſt for that time to become friends if not for ever, only to reſiſt the Romans. And Simon ſent a Cryer unto the Temple, licenſing all ſuch as would, to come unto the Walls: which alſo John did permit, notwithſtanding he miſtruſted Simon: ſo they forgetting their old quarrel, joyned all together, and reſiſted the Romans, and guarding the walls round, they caſt much fire upon the Engines of the Romans, and againſt thoſe that did rule them; and threw darts againſt them without intermiſſion: and the boldeſt amongſt them in great companies leapt down, & deſtroyed that wherewith the Engines were covered, and aſſaulted thoſe that ſtood to defend them: and ſo did the Romans much harm, by reaſon of their deſperate boldneſs, more than by their skill.

Titus commandeth the wall to be battered in three places.

The ſeditious forgetting their hatred and diſcords join in one.

Titus was ſtill at hand to ſuccour them that ſtood in need: and placing Horſemen and Archers about the Engines, he repulſed the Jews who came to caſt fire, and repreſſed them that caſt darts, and ſhot arrows from the Towers, and ſo gave the Rams time and opportunity to beat the walls. Yet for all this the wall was not ſhaken with rams, ſave only that the ram of the fifth Legion did ſhake the corner of a Tower; but yet the wall ſtood firm, and not harmed by the ſhaking of the tower: for it was far higher than the wall, and ſo could not draw down any part of the wall as it fell. So ſoon as they had a while ceaſed from excurſions, they perceived that all the Romans were buſied in one labour or other, and ſo diſperſed all over the Camp, thinking that the Jews for fear durſt come no more. The Jews all ſecretly iſſued out of the Gate by the Tower Hippicos, and caſt fire upon the works, and couragiouſly made incurſion upon the Romans even unto the rampire of their Camp. The Romans ſeeing what danger might enſue, preſently aſſembled themſelves, both they that were near, and thoſe that were far off. The diſcipline of the Romans overcame the fury of the Jews: and putting thoſe to flight that firſt met them, they aſſaulted thoſe that oppoſed themſelves againſt them afterward. So there began a grievous battel about the Engines; the Jews ſtriving to fire them, and the Romans fighting to hinder them; and a doubtful cry was raiſed on both parts, and many in the forefront were ſlain on both ſides. But the Jews audacity got them the upper hand; and their fire did ſomething touch the Engines: and all had been conſumed quite with fire, had not the choſen Souldiers that came from Alexandria hindred it, who for the opinion that they had of themſelves did fight ſtoutly (for they were accounted to have been the moſt valiant of all in this battel) till ſuch time as the Emperour with certain ſelected horſemen, came and ſet violently upon the Enemies: and he himſelf ſlew 12 men that did reſiſt him, for whoſe deaths the reſt fearing fled, and were forced to retire themſelves into the City, and ſo ſaved the Engines from being fired. It chanced that one of the Jews was in this fight taken alive, and Titus commanded that he ſhould be crucified before the wall, that perhaps the reſt being herewithal terrified might yield. After Cæſar was retired, John the Captain of the Idumæans talking upon the wall with one of his friends, being ſtricken in the breaſt with an arrow by an Arabian ſouldier, preſently dyed: which cauſed great lamentation among the Jews, and ſorrow amongſt the ſeditious, for he was valiant of his hands, and very wiſe and of good advice.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the fall of the Tower, and how the two Walls were taken.

THe night following, there was a great tumult amongſt the Romans. For Titus the Emperour had commanded to be builded three Towers, 50 Cubits high apiece, each one upon a ſeveral Mount, that from thence he might the more eaſily beat the Enemies from off the walls: but one of theſe Towers in the midſt of the night fell down without any aſſault. And making a great noiſe with the fall, fear fell upon the whole Army; who ſuſpecting that it came to paſs by ſome ſtratagem wrought by the Jews, every one ran and armed himſelf, and ſo there was a great tumult in the army: and for that no man could tell what the matter was, a long time, they ſtood as it were all amazed, every one asking his fellow what had hapned. And ſeeing no Enemies come, they began to fear ſome treaſon amongſt themſelves; and ſo were in a great fear they knew not wherefore, till ſuch time as Titus underſtanding the matter, cauſed the truth thereof to be preſently proclaimed thorowout the Camp; and ſo the tumult (although with much ado) was appeaſed.

The

A The Jews valiantly bearing and induring all other dangers, were ſore troubled by reaſon of theſe Towers which Titus had erected; for they were ſlain and wounded from thence with ſmall engine ſhot, darts, and arrows; neither could they build themſelves any ſo high, nor was there any hope to deſtroy them: for neither could they be thrown down for their weight, nor fired, becauſe they were covered with Iron: and ſo they flying out of the reach of the ſhot, did not ſeek to hinder the Ram from battering their walls; which never ceaſing at laſt prevailed ſomewhat. So the great Ram, which the Jews called Nicon, becauſe it overcame all, at laſt battered the wall; and the Jews being weary with fighting, for that they had watched all the night before, for ſloth, or elſe becauſe they perſwaded themſelves that the B wall was ſuperfluous, they having two more beſide it, they all forſook their quarters, and retired themſelves unto the ſecond wall; and the Romans entred the firſt, that the Ram called Nicon had battered. Then the Romans that had paſſed and entred the firſt wall, went and opened the Gates and let in the whole army. Having thus gotten the wall the ſeventh day of May, they deſtroyed the greateſt part thereof; and alſo the North-ſide of the City which before Ceſtius had waſted.

Nicon, that is to ſay, Victor, the Romans great Ram.

The Romans get the firſt wall.

Titus removed his Camp from thence, and went unto the place called the Aſſyrians Camp, and ſeized upon all between that and Cedron; and being without the ſhot of an arrow from the ſecond wall, he began again to aſſault it. Then the Jews dividing the wall betwixt them to defend each others part, they reſiſted moſt valiantly. And John and his partakers de- C fended all Antonia, and the North part of the Temple from Alexanders Tomb: and Simon defended all from Johns Tomb unto the gate by the Tower Hippicos. And many times iſſuing out at the gates, they fought hand to hand with the Enemy, being always repulſed by the diſcipline of the Romans, only for want of knowledge in warlike affairs; and ſtill in all fights upon the wall they got the beſt: for the Romans were aſſiſted by fortune and knowledge, and the Jews with deſperate boldneſs which came of fear; for they are of ſtout courage in adverſity. Moreover, the Jews were moved to fight, in hope that way to ſave their own lives: and the Romans to get a ſpeedy conqueſt. Neither party was weary, neither did they ever ceaſe from aſſaulting one another: all the day long the Jews in whole companies made excurſions againſt the Romans, and they omitted no kind of fight, beginning D at Sun-riſe, and continuing all night long, far more terrible to them both then in all the day before: the Jews feared leſt that the Romans ſhould get the wall; and the Romans likewiſe miſdreaded that the Jews ſhould invade their Camp. Thus ſtill all night long being armed, early in the morning they were prepared again to fight. The Jews did one ſtrive with another who ſhould undergo the moſt danger, and ſo deſerve his Captains favour. Simons followers did greatly reverence and fear him, inſomuch as if he ſhould have commanded any of them to have killed himſelf, he would preſently have done it. The Romans were encouraged to fight, by their wont and cuſtom in getting the victory, and that they were not wont to be overcome: again, their frequent and daily wars and continual exerciſes, and large dominions gave the like courage, and eſpecially Titus their General ſtill preſent, E in all their affairs greatly ſtirred them forward: for every one thought it a hainous crime to be a coward in the preſence of ſuch a Captain as Cæſar was. Cæſar himſelf beholding and looking on, who alſo was a witneſs of their deeds that behaved themſelves valiantly, would reward every man for his valour: beſide that, it was advantage to be eaſily known unto the Prince for a valiant man: ſo that many of them ſhewed that their alacrity was far greater than their ſtrength. At this time Longinus one of the horſemen coming out of the Roman Army, preſſed into the midſt of the Jews forces, and caſting them down that ſtood in his way, by this violence he ſlew two of the ſtrongeſt of the Enemies amongſt them, ſtriking one of them over the face, and ſlaying the other with his own dart he took from him: who for this deed was greatly honoured, having broken through a ſtrong Army of the Jews, that F were placed before the walls, and caſt darts at him on either ſide. Many of the Romans by this his example were enticed to do the like. The Jews now regarded not what they ſuffered, but only deviſed which way to harm their Enemy; nothing eſteeming death, ſo that they might kill ſome one of the Romans. But Titus had as much care to preſerve his Souldiers, as he had to get the victory; affirming theſe raſh aſſaults to proceed of deſperation: and that only was to be accounted for virtue, when one did warily not indanger himſelf to atchieve any worthy action, and willed them rather to ſhew themſelves men where there was no danger.

CHAP. IX.

How Castor the Jew derided the Romans.

Castor a subtle and politick Jew.

THen Titus commanded the Ram to be set up against the Tower on the North part of the City, wherein a crafty and politick Jew accompanied with ten men had hid himself, all the rest being fled: this Jew was named Castor. These men having lien still a while there in their armour, at last being afraid, and the Tower beginning to shake, they start up: and Castor stretching forth his hand, did as it were humbly crave favour at Cæsars hands, and with a lamentable voice besought him to spare him. Titus seeing the mans simplicity, as he thought, and perswading himself that the Jews did now repent them of their enterprize, he caused the Ram to cease from battery, and the archers to hold their hands; and withall permitted Castor to speak his pleasure. Castor said, that he desired to come & make a league of peace. And Titus answered, that he would grant it, if so be all the rest would do so likewise, and that he would presently confirm a league of peace between him and the City. Five of Castors fellows seemed to be willing, and to request the like; but the other five counterfeited to withstand them, crying out aloud, that they would never be slaves to the Romans, seeing they might die in liberty. Whilst Castor and his fellows were debating the matter, the battery ceased. In the mean time Castor privily sent word unto Simon, willing him whilst the battery ceased, to deliberate what was expedient to be done in this necessity: for he a while would deceive the Roman Emperour, and hold him in suspence. And in the mean time he seemed to exhort his companions, that denied to embrace the kind offer of Titus: and they as it were angry hereat, drew their swords and stroke upon their corslets; and they so stricken seemed to fall down, as though they had been slain. Titus and his souldiers were amazed at this their obstinacy; for being on the lower ground, they could not well perceive what was done: and so they wondred at their desperation, and also pitied their calamity. At this time one struck Castor in the buttock with a dart, and Castor pulling it out of his flesh, shewed it unto the Emperour, and complained of it, as being injured. Titus presently with sharp words corrected him that shot it, and forthwith would have sent Joseph to promise Castor pardon and peace. But Joseph denied to go, affirming that Castor only dissembled, and so hindred his friends that would have gone. At last one Æneas, who had fled unto the Romans, offered himself to go. Castor invited him, as though he would give him something in token of his true meaning. Then Æneas opened the skirt of his garment, thinking Castor would have cast him down something of worth: and when he came underneath the Tower, Castor took a great stone and threw it down upon him; yet hurt him not, because he was aware of it, and avoided the stone; but it wounded another souldier standing by. Then Cæsar considering this deceit, began to think that piety and mercy in wars was hurtful, and that cruelty was not so easily deceived; and so being very angry at this deceit, he caused the wall to be beaten with the Ram more than before. Castor and his fellows perceiving the Tower to shake, they set it on fire, and so passed through the flame, and conveyed themselves into a mine of the tower; so that again the Romans admired their courage, thinking that they had burned themselves.

Mercy in wars hurtful.

Titus assaulting the wall on his part, took it five days after he had taken the first, and causing the Jews to flye from thence, he accompanied with a thousand chosen men about him, entred in where the woolmen, and copper-smiths, and merchant-taylors dwelt, which place was the new City, having only narrow and strait ways to go unto the wall. And had he presently beaten down a great part of the wall, or according to the laws of arms destroyed what he had gotten, he had obtained the victory without any loss on his side. Yet now hoping the Jews would yield, seeing that if he pleased he might take them by force, he gave the more ample and easie passage to retire: for he did not think that they whose good he sought, would have been traitors unto him.

Titus taketh the second wall.

CHAP. X.

How the Romans did twice take the second Wall.

WHen Titus was entred the City, he suffered none of them that were taken, to be slain, nor the houses to be burned, but permitted the seditious (if they were so minded) to fight, and that without the prejudice of the people: and also promised the people to restore unto them all their goods. For many besought him to spare the City for them; and the Temple

A Temple for the City. The people were glad hereof: and many of the warlike Jews thought the humanity of Titus to proceed from cowardize; and judged that Titus, for that he despaired to win the rest of the City, did now coward-like propound these conditions. They likewise threatned all the people, that whosoever should speak one word concerning peace and yielding unto the Romans, should presently die: and some of them did resist the Romans from out of their houses, and others in the narrow ways: and others going out at the higher gates, began a battel; wherewith the watch-men being sore troubled, fled from the wall, and forsaking the towers, they retired themselves into the camp. The Roman souldiers within the City cryed out, because they were inclosed with Enemies, the gates being shut, and assaulted without, by those who apprehended their companions to be in great danB ger. The number of the Jews encreasing, and prevailing, for that they knew the ways and turnings of the streets, many of the Romans were slain, and violently born down, when they offered to resist in that necessity: for a multitude together could not flie, by reason of the narrowness of the streets, that went unto the wall: and all that entred into the City had been slain, had not Titus succoured them. For placing at the beginning of every street archers, and himself being where most need was, he so did drive away the Jews with darts and arrows: and with him Domitius Sabinus, who in that fight was proved a stout warriour; who so long continued beating the Jews with arrows, till all the souldiers were escaped away.

Thus the Romans having got the second wall, were beaten from it again: And the Citi- The Jews courage encreaseth.
C zens fit for war, were hereat encouraged, and were drunken with this good fortune, thinking that now the Romans durst no more offer to come into the City, and that they could not be overcome, if they did arm themselves to fight. For God, because of their iniquity had darkned their understanding, so that they never considered that the Roman forces were far greater then they that were overcome, nor the famine that presently insued: for as yet they lived upon the destruction of the people, and drank the blood of a City: but the good did even now suffer famine, and many of them had already perished for want of food: yet the seditious did rejoyce at the death of the Citizens, as though thereby they were eased of a great burthen, only desiring their lives that bare rebellious minds, and would joyn with them against the Romans, rejoycing at the death of the rest, as free from a heavy clog: and this was the affection they bare unto their Citizens. And so they armed themselves and resisted the Romans, who now again did attempt to enter the breach: and they
D threw down stones and part of the wall upon them as they came up, and so drave them back again, and valiantly resisted them for three days. But the fourth day they were not able to withstand Titus his assault, but were forced to retire, as before: and he having gotten the wall, destroyed all the North part thereof, and placed a Garrison in the Towers and Fortresses of the South part.

CHAP. XI.

Of the mounts raised to batter the third Wall: and a long Oration of Josephus to perswade the people to yield: and of the Famine in the City.
E

TITUS now determined to batter the third wall, and he thought to continue the siege but a short time: and that it was convenient to give the seditious some time to bethink themselves, to see that if either by the taking of the second wall, or terrified with Famine, they would repent. For now there were no more preys for them left in the City, and he lay before the walls thereof, even as he desired. And the time being come, that every Souldier should receive victuals and provision for himself, Titus caused them to be led every one in order into a place, where the Jews in the City might presently behold them, and caused his Captains to distribute money to every one: and the souldiers (as their custom is) all armed, and drawing their swords out of their
F sheaths, marched along, the horsemen leading their horses gallantly adorned, and a great part of the suburbs glistered with gold and silver. This spectacle was grateful to their own souldiers, and terrible to the Jews: for all the old walls, and the North part of the City, and many houses were filled with the multitude of them who came to view this sight: and there was no part of the City that was not filled with people to see and behold it. And fear came upon the very boldest amongst all the Jews, seeing both the Romans armour and their order: and perhaps that shew would have caused the seditious people to have relented, had they not despaired to have found mercy and pardon at the Romans hands for their offences committed; committed; and so they thought it better presently to be slain in wars, then to be put to G death shamefully, if they desisted from fight. Destiny also hindred this, whereby it was decreed that the innocent should perish with the wicked, and the City with the seditious, and for four days space they distributing necessaries unto the souldiers; and on the fifth day Titus perceiving that for ought he could do, the Jews were still obstinate, he divided his army into two parts, and about Johns tomb he began to raise mounts, and against Antonia, hoping that ways to take the higher part of the City: and by Antonia to seize the Temple; which except he could effect, he could not safely take the City: and against either of these places he raised two mounts, every legion making one. The Jews and Simons followers did hinder the work that was begun before Johns tomb, and John likewise with a great number of the Zealous hindred them that made the mounts over against Antonia: who not only did fight with the advantage of the higher ground, but also had now learned the use of Engines: for H continual use by little and little made them skilful, and they had 300 Engines called Balistaes: and 40 Engines to cast stones, wherewith they greatly annoyed the Romans, and hindred them from their work.

Destiny had decreed that the innocent should perish with the nocent, and the City with the seditious.

The Romans in their labour are hindred by the Jews.

Titus, foreknowing that fortune would favour him, and that the city was like to perish, hasted to take it, never ceasing to perswade the Jews to yield: and with his deeds he joyned counsel. For he knew that many times words prevail more then violence of arms, and exhorted them to save themselves, and yield the City unto him: and told them of Joseph, how that he should make a speech unto them in their own language, for he hoped that they would hear their own countreymen.

Titus bounty towards the Jews.

Then Joseph, going about the City without the danger of shot, cryed unto them to spare themselves, the city, the Temple, the people, and not become more hard-hearted unto them then strangers were. For the Romans did reverence the holy places, notwithstanding they had no society, or portion in them; and how even till this day they had abstained from violating them: and they who were nourisht with them, and might only save them, did wilfully cause their destruction: and bad them consider that their strongest walls were battered down; and only now the weaker remaining unbattered, he willed them to consider, how they were not able to withstand the Romans forces. And that it was no news to the Jews, nor strange, to be subject unto the Romans. For although it be a good and commendable thing, to fight for liberty, yet that was to be done in the beginning: for he that was once subject, and would rebel, having a long time lived under the obedience of the Romans, seemed rather to be destrous of a shameful death then a lover of liberty. Moreover, that they should disdain to be subject unto base people, and not unto them whom the whole world K obeyed. For (said he) what place have not the Romans that may be inhabited? Nay themselves may perceive how fortune did still favour them: and that God who guided the Empire to be placed in all parts, was now in Italy. Also that even by the law of nature, as well by the example of beasts as men, we are taught to give place unto them that are stronger then our selves, and be contented that they should get the victory that are valianteſt in arms. And this (quoth he) was the cause that your ancestors, who were far more strong and politick then you, and had better means to resist; yet did they submit themselves unto the Romans: which if God had not been pleased withal, he would never have permitted them to have done. And how could they hope to resist, seeing the City was as it were already taken? And that the Citizens supposing their walls were whole, yet were they all destroyed. For the Romans well knew what famine was amongst L them, and how it did every day waste the people, and would also in short time destroy the warriours amongst them. For suppose that the Romans would cease, and not besiege the City, nor offer with drawn swords to assault it: yet is there a civil war within the City, which the Jews cannot overcome or avert, it every day increasing: except they would also fight against hunger, and they alone overcome adverse fortune. Further, he added, that it was best, before intolerable calamities befel them, to change their opinion, and whilest they have time, to be counselled by good advice; and that the Romans would not punish them for that which was already past, except they persisted obstinate even unto the end. For they are (quoth he) kind, courteous, and gentle to their subjects, and do prefer their commodity before revenge. And they thought it advantage to have the City, and the Countrey inhabited; therefore the Emperour would make a league of peace with them: but if he took the City by force, he would M not spare one, especially seeing that they were willed by him to save themselves, and yet in their greatest necessity refused to obey him. Likewise he told them that the third wall would also be taken very shortly, as well they might perceive by the two walls: and suppose that the City was inexpugnable, yet the famine would cause it to be yielded into the Romans hands in despite of them.

Josephs Oration to the Jews.

Fortune and God for the Romans.

Famine in the City.

As

A As Joseph did thus advise them, many standing upon the walls did rail against him, many upbraided him, and others shot at him. Joseph seeing he could not avert them from their imminent calamities, recounted unto them all their own Histories making for his purpose. 'O 'wretches (quoth he) and ungrateful to them that help you! you fight against the Romans, 'and bear arms against them, as though this way you had conquered some others that came, 'as they now do, against you. When doth God the maker of all things deny help unto us if 'we be oppressed? Will you not remember your selves? For what cause did you enterprise 'these wars, and how great a friend and assister of yours do you daily offend? Do ye not re- 'member the miraculous works of your ancestors, and this holy place, and how in times past 'it was by the enemies destroyed? but I quake and tremble to recount the works of God to B 'such unworthy hearers: yet harken, that you may know that you do not only resist the Ro- 'mans, but also God himself. Nechias at that time King of Egypt, who also was called Pharao, 'came, & with an infinite army took away Queen Sara, the mother of our nation. And what 'did our first father Abraham in this case? Did he with weapons & arms revenge this injury? 'having under his command three hundred and eighteen Captains, and under them an infi- 'nite multitude? Or did he rather desist from war, perceiving God not to accompany him? 'wherefore lifting up pure & undefiled hands towards this holy place, which now you have 'defiled and prophaned, he chose God an invincible helper to aid him. And was not the 'Queen the second night after sent home again unto him untouched? And the Egyptian 'adoring this holy place, which ye have polluted with murders of your own nation, & trem- 'bling at the visions he saw in the night time, fled, rewarding the Hebrews with gold and sil- C 'ver, whom he perceived to be so beloved of God. Shall I recount unto you the going of our 'ancestors into Egypt? who having for four hundred years been slaves unto the Egyptian 'Tyrants and Kings, and able to have revenged themselves by force of arms, yet did they 'rather expect and stay Gods leisure. Who knoweth not, that then Egypt in revenge of the 'Hebrews, was filled with all kinds of Serpents, and infected with all Diseases, and the earth 'became so barren, that Nilus waxed dry, and the ten plagues followed one another without 'ceasing; whereby our ancestors were safely delivered without any bloodshed: for God con- 'ducted them, as willing to reserve them for his Priests?

'When the Assyrians had taken away from us the holy Ark, did not Palestina and Dagon re- 'pent that fact? did not all the nation of them that took it, weep and lament therefore? For D 'their privy parts being putrified, their bowels and the meat they did eat ran out there; 'and so with unclean hands they were forced to bring it back again, with cymbals and trum- 'pets: thereby to make satisfaction for their offence. It was God that did this for our ance- 'stors, because that they laying their arms aside, wholly resigned themselves to his pleasure. 'Was Senacherib King of Assyria, coming with all his power out of Asia, and incamping him- 'self before this City, overcome by humane force? Did not our ancestors leaving arms, flie 'to prayers, and by an Angel God in one night destroyed an infinite army? And the next day 'the Assyrian rising, found a hundred fourscore and five thousand of his men dead, and so fled 'with the rest from the Hebrews being unarmed, and not pursuing him? You know also, that 'in the captivity of Babylon, where the people lived the space of seventy years, they got not E 'their liberty, till such time as God put in Cyrus heart to suffer them to go into their own 'country. Who still assisting them, they again as the Priests in old time were wont, did serve 'and reverence their helper. In brief, our ancestors did never atchieve any great matter by 'force of arms, neither did they leave any thing undone, wherein they expected Gods help, 'but still remaining quiet at home, they overcame their enemies through his providence: & 'when they did fight after their own wills, they always failed of their expectation. For when 'Zedechias our King, contrary to the admonition of the Prophet Jeremy, did go forth, and 'fight with the King of Babylon then besieging the city, both he and all his were taken, and 'this city destroyed. Yet consider how far your captains are inferiour unto that King, & your 'selves unto the people of those times. For Jeremy crying up and down the city, and saying F 'that God was offended at their iniquity, and that except they did yield the same, it should 'be taken force; yet did not the King nor any of the people lay hands upon him. And you '(that I may omit your iniquity, done within the city, which though I would, I could not suf- 'ficiently decipher) do attempt to kill me, and using railing speeches against me, who once 'gave you wholsome counsel for your good; only for that I put you in mind of your sins, 'you not enduring to hear of that which you daily commit. This same betided also when 'Antiochus sirnamed Epiphanes besieged the City, God being highly displeased at our ance- 'stors, who going out in arms against him were all slain, the Town spoiled, and this holy 'place for three years & six months made desolate. What should I shew unto you any more examples?

'examples? Who first incited the Romans themselves against the Jews? Was it not the im- G 'piety of our own countreymen that did it? Whence began our bondage at that time? Did
'it not proceed from the sedition of our ancestors, when the fury of Aristobulus and Hircanus
'brought Pompey into our city: and so God subdued them unto the Romans, being now un'worthy of liberty? and at length for three months space having endured a siege, being not 'so great offenders as you are, and better able to abide the siege then you, yet did they yield 'themselves. Are we ignorant of the end of Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, who invading
'the Kingdom brought our nation again into subjection; God so laying this bondage upon 'them, for that he was moved at the iniquity of our nation? and Herod the son of Antipater, 'brought Sosius and the Roman army, and besieged the City round six months space: and at 'last, for the greatness of our iniquity, was taken and punished for their offences, and the 'city sacked by the enemies. So you evidently see that our nation did never prevail by force H
'of arms. And assure your selves that the City will be taken by this siege. It is meet therefore 'that you who keep this holy place, wholly commit your selves to Gods will and pleasure,

The Jews sins against the laws.

'& then fear not the forces of the enemies, when by reason of your piety, you are assured of 'Gods help and succour. But what one parcel of Gods Law have you observed? Nay, what 'mischief have you left undone, that he detested not? How far greater is your impiety then
'theirs, that did suddenly perish for their sins? For you making small account of secret sins,
'to wit, stealing, deceit, and adulteries, do violently take away mens goods by open force,
'and murder whom you please, and have devised new ways to sin. Moreover, you have 'made the holy Temple a place of all these your impieties; and the seat that the Romans did
'adore, is by your own Nation polluted: much derogating from the honour of our religion
'by your impious facts. Last of all, you hope of his help whom you have so hainously offended: I

The Romans use the same manner of overthrow against the Jews, as the Assyrians did.

'Truly you are very just people & obedient, & with pure hands you ask help of God. Did
'our King thus pray unto God, when he obtain'd that in one night so many of the Assyrians
'should be destroyed? Or do the Romans commit such impiety as the Assyrians did, that 'you may hope of the like revenge against them? for he having received a piece of mony to 'save the City, did, not regarding his oath, seek to destroy the same. The Romans do only 'request the tribute that our ancestors were wont to pay unto them: which if they have, they 'will never destroy the city, nor touch our holy things. They will also permit you to enjoy 'freely your families and possessions, and suffer our laws to remain inviolate. It is altogether

God knoweth when to revenge.

'madness for you to hope that God will so punish just men, as he did sinners & impious per- D
'sons, who knoweth to punish at his pleasure. To be short, he destroyed the Assyrians the first K 'night that they encamped before the City. And if he purposed also to deliver you, and pu'nish the Romans, he would then have done it, when Pompey and Sosius came against the Ci'ty, or when Vespasian wasted Galilee, or lastly now, when Titus came to assault it. But nei'ther Pompey nor Sosius suffered any harm, yet both of them took the City. Vespasian so gained

'by warring against us, that he hath hereby got the whole Empire. And the fountains which 'before gave you no water, yield it to Titus in great abundance. You know that before his 'coming, the fountains without the City and Siloa were so dried up, that water was sold by 'measure, yet now they flow so plentifully, that they do not only serve all their army, and E 'their cattel also, but besides that, do water all the gardens about. What this wonder fore-
'telleth, you have already experience, when the King of Babylon came with his Army and L 'destroyed the City: who took it and fired it and the Temple, notwithstanding that (as I am 'perswaded) the Jews of that time were nothing so wicked as you are. Wherefore I think that 'God hath forsaken this holy place, and is now gone to them that do besiege you. Will not 'a good man flie a wicked house, and hate the impious that dwell therein? And do you then
'think that God will abide your impiety, who beholdeth all secrets, and knoweth all things 'that are hid? But what is secret amongst you? Or what do you seek to find? Nay what do 'you that your enemies do not know? All your iniquities are disclosed to all men: and you
'every day strive one with another who shall be most impious. And you do as greatly labour F
'to shew your selves vicious, as others do to shew themselves vertuous. Yet for all this there

Joſeph crying thus unto them with tears trickling down his cheeks, the ſeditious were nothing moved, but told him that it was not ſafety for them to yield. But the people were perſwaded to flie: and ſome ſelling their poſſeſſions and that they had for ſmall prices, they did ſwallow down the Gold, for fear the thieves ſhould take it from them. And ſo when they had eſcaped unto the Romans, they emptying their bellies found it again, and ſo had money B to buy them neceſſaries. Titus alſo permitted many to go away whitherſoever they pleaſed: which thing cauſed divers to flie, ſeeing that thereby they were delivered out of their calamity, which in the City they abode, and were not forced to ſerve the Romans. But John and Simon were as diligent to ſtop the ways, leſt the Citizens ſhould eſcape, as they did hinder the Romans from entring into the City: ſo that whoſoever did but give any ſuſpicion of flight, he was preſently by them put to death. The richer ſort, whether they ſtayed or fled, were ſlain for their wealth and poſſeſſions. The famine of the City, and the deſperation of the thieves both increaſed alike, every day more and more; ſo that now there was no more corn found. Wherefore the ſeditious perſons brake into the houſes, and ſearched every corner for to find corn; and if after their ſearch they found any, then they did beat the owners C for denying it at the firſt: and if they found none, they tortured the houſholders, as having more cunningly hidden it. And whoſoever was yet ſtrong of body, and well liking, him they preſently killed; for hereby they deemed him to have ſtore of food, or elſe he ſhould not have been in ſo good plight of body as he was. And they that were pined with famine, were by theſe barbarous ſeditious people ſlain, who eſteemed it no offence to kill them, who would ſhortly after die though they were left alive. Many both rich and poor ſecretly exchanged all that they had for one buſhel of corn, and preſently ſhutting themſelves in the ſecreteſt room of their houſe, ſome of them did eat the corn as it was, unground: others, made bread thereof as neceſſity and fear required. No man in the whole City ſate down to eat his meat on a Table, but greedily taking it not boiled from the fire, they even raw as it was D did eat it.

Joſephs love and conſtancy towards his Country.

The people flie with their money.

A wonderful famine in the City.

The argument of ſtore of meat.

Moſt miſerable was this manner of living, and a ſpectacle which none without tears was able to behold; for the ſtrongeſt ſtill got the moſt, and the weakeſt bewailed their miſery: for now famine was the greateſt calamity they endured. And nothing doth arm men more than ſhame; for during this famine, no reverence was had towards any man: for Wives took the meat even out of their Husbands mouths, and children from their Parents, and Mothers even from their infants, which was the moſt lamentable thing of all. No body had now any compaſſion, neither did they ſpare their deareſt infants, but ſuffered them to periſh even in their arms, taking from them the very drops of life. Yet could they not eat thus in ſuch ſecreſie, but preſently ſome came to take away from them that whereon they fed. For if in any E place they ſaw any door ſhut, preſently hereupon they conjectured that they in the houſe were eating meat, and forthwith breaking down the doors they came in; and taking them by the throat, they took the meat already chewed, and ready to be ſwallowed down. The old men were driven away, and not permitted to keep and defend their food from being taken from them: the women were drawn up and down by the hair of the head, for that they hid between their hands ſome part of their meat, and would not forgo it. No pity was now remaining, neither to old age nor infancy, but they took young babes eating, their mouth full of meat, and not permitting it to be taken out of their mouths, and threw them againſt the ground. Now if any one had prevented theſe thieves, and eaten their meat before they could come at them, then they were more cruel; and the rather ſo much more tyrannouſly handled, as having committed ſome greater offence againſt them. They alſo deviſed moſt barbarous and cruel torments to extort food from others: for they thruſt ſticks or ſuch like into the cavity of mens yards, and ſharp thorny rods into their fundaments: and it is abominable to hear what the people endured to make them confeſs one loaf of bread, or one handful of corn which they had hidden.

A miſerable kind of living, and a ſpectacle of great compaſſion.

The ſouldiers enter the houſes, and take the meat unchewed out of the Citizens mouths.

Theſe miſcreants did not yet for all this feel either hunger or thirſt: for then theſe their impieties had been more tolerable; but they did it only to exerciſe their cruelty, preparing ſix days food for themſelves aforehand. Wherefore meeting ſuch as had eſcaped the Roman watch in the night, and gone into the fields to gather weeds or herbs, when they again came into the City, and thought they had now eſcaped the danger of their Enemies; they there took took from them the herbs they had gotten with the hazard of their lives, denying to give them any ſmall part of that, for which they had undergone ſuch danger: and they required them for Gods ſake to do it, yea they thought it a benefit, if being thus robbed and ſpoiled, they did not alſo periſh by the ſwords of theſe miſcreants. Theſe calamities the baſer ſort of people endured at the hands of the common ſouldiers: but the Nobles and chief men of the City were led unto the Tyrants, and accuſed before them of betraying the City unto the Romans; and ſo by ſome forged treaſon or other put to death. And many times their ſuborned accuſers would teſtifie againſt them, that they purpoſed to flye unto the Romans. And thoſe that Simon robbed, he ſent unto John; and thoſe that John ſpoiled, he ſent unto Simon: and ſo they did as it were one drink unto another the blood of the people, and divide their dead carcaſſes between them; inſomuch that they diſagreed only for their deſire of rule and domination: but both conſpired to do miſchief and commit iniquity. For he that did not give to the other part of that which by cruelty he had extorted from the miſerable Citizens, was accounted impious: and he that received not part, did now grieve as ſuſtaining loſs, in not having a ſhare in cruelty and impiety.

The honourable and rich are drawn before the Tyrants.

The diſſention between John and Simon was for rule, their concord was in wickedneſs

I am not able to recount all their iniquities: but briefly, I think that never any City endured the like, nor never any people ſince the memory of men were ſo cruel and barbarous: and finally, to the intent that their impiety unto ſtrangers might ſeem the leſs, they ſpake evil of the Nation of the Hebrews, and curſed them, and openly confeſſed themſelves to be ſlaves, people of divers Countries, united together in wickedneſs, baſtards and abortives of their Nation. They overthrew the City, and forced the Romans (though againſt their wills) to accept of this ſorrowful and heavy victory, and almoſt drew the fire into the Temple, as though it ſtayed from it too long. Neither did they weep or lament, when they ſaw the higher part of the City on fire; but many among the Romans did with ſorrow behold that ſight which we will ſpeak of hereafter, where we will deſcribe the event of that buſineſs.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Jews that were crucified, and the Rampires burnt.

The poor peoples miſery.

THe mounts and Rampires that Titus built, did greatly advantage him: and although his ſouldiers endured ſome loſs by the Jews who were upon the wall, yet he ſent part of his horſemen, and commanded them to lay wait for the Jews that came out of the City into the Vallies to fetch food: and amongſt them were alſo ſome fighting men. For now that which they could rob and take from the Citizens, was not ſufficient for all of them: yet the greater part of them were poor people, who durſt not flie unto the Romans, for fear that ſome harm ſhould thereupon betide their deareſt friend, not enduring to leave them behind to be murthered by the thieves. Famine did now embolden them to go forth of the City; and now it only remained for them to go forth privily, and be taken by the Enemies. And being taken, neceſſity forced them to fight for fear of torments; for they now thought it too late to requeſt mercy: after the fight, they were beaten and tortured all ways poſſible, and then crucified before the City walls. Titus deemed this calamity moſt miſerable: for every day 500 Jews and ſometime more were taken; and yet did he not think it expedient to diſmiſs ſo great a multitude, nor to keep them who would be as a guard of guards. But the principal point for which he did not hinder this, was, that by this ſpectacle he might terrifie the Jews, and make them fear to ſuffer the like, except they did quickly render themſelves and the City unto him. Wherefore the ſouldiers for a hatred which they conceived againſt our Nation, crucified all they took, one after one faſhion, and another after another, in deriſion. And the multitude of the captives was now ſo great, that there remained no more ſpace to ſet croſſes in, nor any more croſſes to crucifie bodies upon. But the ſeditious Jews within the City were ſo far from relenting by this maſſacre, that rather their hearts were hereby more hardned; ſo that herewith they terrified the reſt of the multitude: for they carried the kindred of them that had fled unto the Romans to the walls, and bad them behold how thoſe were uſed that fled unto the Romans: the ſame ſight they alſo ſhewed unto them that deſired peace; affirming that they whom the Romans had ſo uſed, were thoſe that fled unto them for ſuccour, and not captives by them taken. This terrified many who deſired to flie unto the Romans, from effecting their deſire; till ſuch time as the truth hereof was known. Yet ſome preſently went boldly unto the Romans, as it were intending to ſuffer death and torment at their hands, accounting that death coming unto them by their Enemies hands, was far more tolerable than the famine they endured.

Titus crucifieth many Jews before the walls.

The Jews carried the kindred of thoſe that were fled out of the City to the Romans, and ſhewed them the tortures they ſuffered.

Here-

Hereupon Titus cut off many of the captives hands, and ſo ſent them into the City unto Simon and John, that their Calamity might teſtifie them to be captives, and not ſuch as had fled and yielded unto the Romans, willing to admoniſh them at leaſt now to yield, and not compel him to deſtroy the City: telling that in ſo doing, even now at laſt they ſhould ſave their own lives, Country, and Temple, which had not the like in all the world: and he continually went about the Rampires haſtning the workmen in their buſineſs, as though he preſently meant to effect that in deeds, which in words he had ſpoken. The Jews that ſtood upon the walls, curſed both him and his Father, reviling them, and affirming that they contemned death; and that they did chuſe rather to die, than to become bond-ſlaves: and that whilſt life laſted, they would as much as lay in them harm the Romans, neither having care of themſelves nor of their Country; which Cæſar ſent them word were both preſently to periſh. Moreover, they ſaid that the whole world was a Temple dedicated to God, far more excellent than that of theirs, which notwithſtanding ſhould be conſerved by him that dwelt in it; whoſe help they alſo enjoying, would deride all his threatnings, which could not come to paſs, God being the end of all. And thus opprobriouſly they exclaimed againſt the Romans.

The year of the world, 4024. after Chriſts nativity, 72.

The Jews both curſe Cæſar and his Father.

At this time arrived alſo Antiochus Epiphanes, and with him many armed men; and beſide them, guarded with a company called the Macedonians, who were of like age; and little older than young men, in their youth all trained up in arms, and armed after the Macedonian manner, whereof alſo they took their name: yet for the moſt part not able to anſwer the expectation that men had of the Macedonians. For the King of Comagene was the moſt fortunate and happy of all Kings that were ſubject unto the Roman Empire, till ſuch time as he felt the frown of Fortune: who in his aged years ſhewed that none ought to be accounted happy before his death: he yet flouriſhing, his ſon (ſaid he) marvelled that the Romans did delay ſo long to aſſault the City, & entered the battered walls (for this young man was a fine warriour, and of exceeding ſtrength, to the which he truſted too much, ſo that he did many things raſhly.) Titus hereat ſmiled, and anſwered, that that was a labour not only for the Romans, but for all in common. After he had ſaid thus, preſently this young man Antiochus, as he was accompanied with his Macedonians aſſaulted the wall, and himſelf with his ſtrength and dexterity avoided the darts of the Jews, and caſt his darts at them: but all his young men (only a few excepted) were there ſlain: for aſhamed of their boaſting ſpeeches, they continued longer in fight than it was expedient for them: at laſt, many being wounded retired themſelves, now perceiving the Macedonians to win a victory had need of Alexanders fortune. The Romans the twelfth day of May, began to build their Rampires: and labouring full ſeventeen whole days, with much ado they ended them the nine and twentieth day of the ſaid Month. For they builded four moſt huge Rampires, one of them over againſt Antonia, which was built by the fifth Legion oppoſite to the midſt of the Struthian waters: another was builded by the twelfth Legion, twenty Cubits diſtant from the other. But the tenth Legion, which was of more account than the two former, erected a mount oppoſite to the Pond called Amygdalon on the North-ſide: and the fifteenth Legion made the fourth, thirty Cubits diſtant from the other, over againſt the Monument of the High Prieſt John.

The infolence of Antiochus and the Soul-diers.

The Romans in ſeventeen days build four huge bulwarks.

The Mounts being thus finiſhed, John undermined that which was over againſt Antonia, and underpropped it with poſts of wood, and filling the mine with wood, bitumen and pitch, he fired it: ſo the poſts that held it up being burnt, the Mine fell, and the Mount alſo with a hideous noiſe fell into it: and firſt of all there aroſe a great ſmoak and duſt, for the mines did cover the flame; at laſt the fire having conſumed the matter that covered it, the flame clearly appeared. The Romans at this ſudden and unexpected exploit were amazed, being grieved at it: ſo that thereby thoſe who before made account of the victory, as though it had been theirs already, began to deſpair. Two days after Simon and his aſſociates did ſet upon the other Rampires: for thereon were planted Rams, wherewith the Romans began to beat the wals. Amongſt the reſt, a certain man named Tepthæus of Garſus a City of Galilee, and Megaſſarus, one of Queen Mariammes ſervants, and with them one of Adiabena the ſon of Mabateus, who for his fortune was named Agiras, which ſignified lame: theſe three taking fire-brands, ran unto the Engines, and there was none found in all the Roman Army more valiant than theſe men, nor more terrible: for they ran amidſt the throng of their Enemies ſo boldly, as though they had gone amongſt their friends, and never made any ſtay, but breaking through the midſt of their Enemies, they fired their Engines: and notwithſtanding that on every ſide they were aſſaulted with darts and arrows; yet did they not give back, nor ſeek to avoid the danger, till ſuch time as the fire had taken hold of the Engines.

gines. The flame mounting on high, the Romans now came running out of their Camp to succour their fellows: and the Jews upon the wall with darts and arrows hindred them, fighting with them that ſought to quench the flame, nothing ſparing their own Bodies. The Romans began to draw away the Rams, their ſhelters being fired. And the Jews amidſt the flames ſought to keep them there: yet for all this the Romans ſaved their Rams. From thence the fire caught hold of the rampires, and thoſe that would have prevented it were burned: and the fire ſo increaſed, that it could not be extinguiſhed; ſo the Romans now environed with a flame, and deſpairing to reſcue their works, retired themſelves into their Camp, and left them on fire. But the Jews were ſo much the more earneſt, their number ſtill encreaſing, by new ſupplies coming out of the City: and ſo encouraged by this their victory, they raſhly adventured unto the Romans Camp, and aſſaulted the guard there. Which guard was a company placed round about before the Camp in Armour; and there was a law made, that whoſoever of them forſook his place, he ſhould loſe his life: ſo that they eſteeming rather to die a glorious death, than ignominiouſly to ſuffer a penal puniſhment, reſiſted very valiantly: ſo that many that had fled retired themſelves back again to fight, both for ſhame that they had forſaken their place, and for fear of puniſhment thereof: and placing Engines upon the rampire of their Camp, they hindred the Jews from iſſuing out of the City any more: for they came out unarmed, having nothing to defend their bodies withal. For the Jews fought with whomſoever they met; and raſhly running amongſt their Enemies Pikes, they ſtruck them with their fiſts. For the Jews prevailed more by their hardineſs, than by their deeds: and the Romans fled more for the Jews boldneſs, than for any harm they ſuſtained by them.

A moſt bitter Law among the Romans againſt thoſe that forſook their places.

Titus accuſeth his ſoldiers of negligence.

Then Titus came from Antonia, where he had been to view a place to build another rampire, and he greatly blamed the Souldiers, who having gotten their Enemies walls, did now ſuffer themſelves to be in danger in their own walls; and now forced to abide that, which firſt the Jews did ſuffer, being now as it were broken out of Priſon; and ſo he with certain choſen men aſſaulted the Enemies on one ſide; and they, though ſtricken upon the faces, yet did they not give back, but ſtoutly reſiſted him: and ſo joyning the battel, the duſt was ſo thick, that none could ſee one another, nor any hear what was ſaid for the cries and noiſe, ſo that now no man could diſcern his friends from his foes. The Jews perſiſted ſtill in the battel, not for that they truſted to their force, or thereby prevailed, but becauſe they were deſperate. The Romans on the other part took courage, and fought ſtoutly for ſhame, and for that Cæſar himſelf was in danger amongſt them. So that I think, that had not the Jews retired themſelves into the City, the fury of the Romans had then conſumed the whole multitude. The Romans were now ſorrowful for the loſs of their rampires, who in one hour had loſt that, which with ſuch labour and ſo long time they had been making: and many of their Engines being now diſplaced, they deſpaired to take the City.

The Jews retire within the City.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the wall which the Roman Army built about Jeruſalem in three days ſpace.

Titus conſulteth with his Captains.

Titus now deliberated with his Captains what was to be done; and they that were moſt forward amongſt them, thought it beſt with all the whole Army to aſſault the walls: for that as yet the Jews had only fought with one part of the Army, but they were not able to withſtand the force of the whole Army, but would be all conſumed with darts and arrows. The wiſer ſort again perſwaded Titus to build Rampires: but others counſelled the contrary, to hold themſelves quiet there, and only to keep all places about, that no food ſhould be conveyed into the City, and ſo famiſh the City, and never fight with the Enemy. For that the Jews being now deſperate, and deſiring to be ſlain, would not be overcome by force; or if not, to ſlay others, which was worſt of all. But Titus thought it a ſhame to lie there idle with ſo huge an Army, and do nothing; yet he deemed it ſuperfluous to fight with them who would willingly fight to be ſlain: and he could not make any mounts, becauſe he wanted matter, and it was moſt difficult of all to guard every place about the City, that none could go forth, for that it could not be beleaguered round on every ſide, by reaſon of the difficult places and huge compaſs thereof, fearing alſo the dangers that ſo might enſue, the Jews iſſuing out of the City. For the Jews ſeeing their open ways all guarded by the Romans, they would deviſe ſome ſecret ways, both urged thereunto by neceſſity, and alſo becauſe they knew all places thereabout very well. And if ſo be that the Jews ſhould ſecretly effect any thing to prejudice them, that then their ſiege was like to continue

so much the longer: so that he feared that the continuance of time would diminish the glory of his victory. For though all those ways might be taken, yet he preferred haste before glory: and if so be he would use celerity and safety, that then it was needful for him to compass the whole City round about with a wall: for so all ways and passages might be hindred: and so the Jews seeing now no hope of safety, should either be compelled to yie d the City, or else be consumed with famine, otherwise he could not be in safety and at quiet; and that so he might erect Mounts, having that wall to defend them. And if any one think that work difficult, and not to be atchieved, let him consider that it did not become the Romans to make a base or slender piece of work: and that no man in the world could without labour effect any great matter, but God only. Having with these speeches encouraged his Captains, he caused them to lead the Souldiers, and dispose them all in these businesses. The Souldiers had as it were some divine force and courage faln upon them: for the Captains, parting the circuit amongst them, not only they, but the Souldiers also did strive who should first effect their part, and every Souldier laboured to please his Decurio, the Decurio to content the Centurion, and the Centurion the Colonel, and the Colonel to please the Captain, and the Captain to please Cæsar, who every day went round about and beheld the work: and so beginning at the place called the Assyrians Camp, where he was encamped, he drew a wall all about, even unto the new City, and from thence by Cedron and Mount Olivet, and so turned toward the South, and enclosed the Mountain to the Rock called Peristereonos, and the hill next adjoining thereunto which hangeth over Siloa: and from thence bending his work into the West, he brought it down all along the Valley of the Fountain: from thence ascending to the Monument of Ananus the High-Priest, where Pompey pitched his Tents, and so brought it about by the North side of the City: and coming along unto the Village called Erebinthonicus, he compassed the Monument of Herod towards the East, and so joined the wall unto his Camp, where he began. This wall was nine and thirty furlongs about. Without this wall he builded also thirteen Forts, every one ten furlongs in compass. And all this whole work was finished in three days space, which desired Months to have been builded in: so that the celerity in the building thereof doth make it scarcely credible. The City being thus encompassed with a wall, and Guards placed in every Fort, Titus himself did still go round about the first Watch, to see all things in good order: the second Watch he allotted unto Alexander; and the third unto the Captains of the Legions, and the Watchmen appointed every one in his turn to sleep in: and so all night long some of them went about the Castle.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the Famine in Jerusalem: and of the building of the second Rampire by the Romans.

THe restraint of liberty to pass in and out of the City, took from the Jews all hope of safety; and the Famine now increasing, consumed whole households and Families, and the Houses were full of dead women and infants; and the streets filled with the dead bodies of old men: and the young men swoln like dead mens shadows, walked in the Market place, and fell down dead where it happened. And now the multitude of dead bodies was so great, that they that were alive could not bury them, nor cared they for burying them, being now uncertain what should betide themselves. And many endeavouring to bury others, fell down themselves dead upon them, as they were burying them. And many being yet alive, went unto their Graves and there died. Yet for all this calamity, was there no weeping nor lamentation, for Famine overcame all affections. And they who were yet living, without tears beheld those, who being dead were now at rest before them. There was no noise heard within the City, and the still night found all full of dead bodies: and which was most miserable of all; the thieves at night came and took away that which covered the dead bodies nakedness, and went laughing away, and in their bodies they proved their Swords, and upon pleasure only thrust many through, yet breathing. Yet if any had desired them to kill him, or to lend him a sword to kill himself, that so he might escape the Famine, they denied him. And every one that died, as he was dying, fixed his eyes upon the Temple, and beheld it now with grief, leaving the Seditious behind them. The seditious now not able to endure the stink of the dead bodies that lay corrupted above the ground, first commanded that all such should be buried at the charges of the City: at last, finding no place wherein to bury them all, they threw them over the walls into the ditch. When Titus, going about the walls, beheld all the ditch filled with dead mens bodies, he lamented; and lifting up his hands to Heaven, he called God to witness, that it was not his doing. Such was the estate of the City. Now the Romans, when none of the seditious durst make any more excursions, passed their time in joy and mirth: for they neither suffered famine nor sorrow, having abundance of corn, and all other necessaries out of Syria, and the Provinces adjoining: and many standing before the walls, and shewing their abundance of victuals unto the Jews, did so much more encrease their famine. Yet were not the seditious people moved at these calamities: wherefore Titus pitying the reliques of the Nation, and minding at least to save them that were left alive, hasted to take the City, and so he began anew to build Mounts, though he scarcely found matter to do it withall. For all the wood near unto the City, was consumed in the first works, so that now the souldiers were forced to fetch more wood ninety furlongs off; and only against Antonia, were erected in four places, four mounts greater than the former. Cæsar went about and hastened the workmen, and now shewed the Thieves that were fallen into his hands. Yet for all this, they would not repent: and now as it were deprived of their wits and bodies, they used both as though borrowed, and not their own. For neither did any affection move their minds, nor any grief their bodies: for they rent and tore the dead bodies like dogs, and filled the prisons with weak and languishing people.

CHAP. XV.

Of the massacre of the Jews, both within and without the City.

Simon's cruelty against Matthias and his sons.

AT last, Simon having tormented Matthias, put him to death, notwithstanding, that by his means he had obtained the City. This Matthias was son unto Boethus a Priest, whom the people for his fidelity towards them greatly esteemed of: who seeing the the outrage of the Zealous towards the people, John being now joyned with them, perswaded the people to call in Simon to help them, conditioning nothing with him before, for that they misdoubted no evil. And when he was come into the City, he held him for his Enemy as well as the rest: notwithstanding, that by his only advice he was received into the City, as though Matthias had only done that of simplicity. Wherefore calling him before the people, he accused him that he did favour the Romans, and so condemned him to die, not suffering him to clear himself; and put to death likewise his three sons with him, for the fourth was before this time fled unto Titus. Matthias requested Simon that he might be put to death before his sons: but Simon, in regard that by his means he had gotten the City, caused him to be executed last of all. And so he was killed upon the murthered bodies of his sons, in a place where the Romans might behold him: for so Simon commanded Ananus his Executioner who was the son of Bamadus. This man was the most cruel of all Simon's followers; who even when he was to kill Matthias, derided him, asking what they could now help him, to whom he sought to flie; and permitted not their bodies to be buried. After them Ananias a Priest, the son of Masbalus a Nobleman, and chief Secretary to the Councel, a valiant strong man, and born at Emaus, and with him fifteen of the chiefest men in the City were put to death. They took also Josephs Father, and kept him in prison, and with the publick voice of a Crier proclaimed, that no man should talk with him, nor visit him, pretending fear of Treason: and whosoever bewailed his estate, were put to death without any trial. It happened a certain man called Judas the son of Judas, who was one of Simons Captains, seeing this, (who also kept a Tower that Simon committed unto his charge, perhaps moved with compassion towards them that perished without desert, yet, rather fearing his own life) assembled together ten of his most trusty companions, and said:

Ananus one of the cruellest souldiers about Simon.

Judas consultation with his companions.

How long shall we endure these calamities? or what hope have we of life, in being trusty to a most impious man? Behold how famine doth take our City. The Romans are almost within our walls, and Simon is cruel and faithless, even towards them that have well deserved at his hands: with him we are in fear of punishment; if we flie unto the Romans, we shall assuredly be received into favour. Wherefore let us deliver the wall unto them, and save our selves and our City. Neither can Simon hereby sustain any great loss, in being punished a little sooner, than otherwise he should be, being now desperate of his own health and safety. The ten men to whom in this manner he brake his mind, agreed hereunto, and so he in the morning sent the rest of his souldiers under his rule into divers places, that they might not perceive his intent, and he at the third hour of the day, standing upon the Tower, called the Romans. But some of the Romans proudly contemned their offer, and others scarcely believed them, and the rest, made no speed to come. In the mean time, time while Titus with certain armed men came unto the wall, Simon had notice of their intent; and so speedily got the Tower, and slew them that were within, in the sight of the Romans, and cast down their bodies over the wall. And Joseph going about the wall, and coming thither (for he never ceased from requesting the Jews to remember their estate) he was struck upon the head with a stone, and so amazed with the blow, fell down: who being fallen down, presently the Jews made excursions out of the City, and had carried him away into the City, had not Titus sent men to defend him: and whilst they fought, Joseph was carried away, scarcely knowing what was done. The seditious with loud cries rejoyced, as having slain him whose death they chiefly desired; and so they reported within the City. Hereupon the people were most sorrowful, verily believing him to be slain, by whom they had confidence to flie unto the Romans.

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Christ, 72.

Joseph wounded in the head with a stone, the rumour is spread thorow the City.

When Josephs mother, who was in prison heard this, she said unto those of Jotopata that were her Keepers, that she verily believed it, for that he was never taken alive by the Romans: yet secretly unto her maidens she wept, and said, that this benefit she received by having born a son, that she could not bury him, by whom she hoped to have been buried her self. But this false report did not long grieve her, nor comfort the thieves: for Joseph was quickly healed of his wound, and recovered; and shewing himself, he cryed out unto them, that ere long they should find that he would be revenged on them for his wound; yet he ceased not to exhort the people to obey the Romans, and yield: but the seditious seeing him alive were astonished, and the people conceived good hope. Many (present necessity urging them) leapt over the walls, and fled unto the Romans; divers with stones going forth under pretence to fight with the Romans, yielded themselves, who had harder fortune there, than within the City; and were now more harmed by plenty of victuals which they found amongst the Romans, than with their famine they suffered in the City: for many became by famine all swollen, as though they had the Dropsie, and presently filling their empty bodies they burst; and so all died, save only those who being wary, did by little and little accustom their bodies to food, which they had long wanted. Yet they who thus escaped fell into another grievous misfortune: for one of the Jews that were fled unto the Romans, was found amongst the Syrians, gathering Gold out of his own dung which he had swallowed, as is before said, for that the seditious did search all, and take that they could find from them: and there was very great store of Gold in the City, and that was sold for twelve Atticks, which before was worth twenty five. This device being discovered in one, presently, a report was spread all over the whole Camp, that the Jews that fled from the City, came full of Gold. And now the Arabians and Syrians did rip the bellies of their poor suppliants, to see if they could find any Gold or Silver within them. And I am perswaded that there was no greater calamity befell the Jews than this was: for in one night the bellies of two thousand Jews were ript. Titus hearing of this cruelty, had caused the Authors hereof to have been compassed round with Horsemen, and slain with darts; and had the multitude of offenders been known, many more of them should have been punished, than of the Jews that were so murthered. Wherefore, he called together the Leaders of the Souldiers that came to help him, and the Roman Captains (for some of the Romans also did commit this fault) and said unto them in anger, that if any of his Souldiers did commit any such acts for uncertain gain, and were not ashamed that their Armour should be made of Gold and Silver: or if the Arabians in these wars against strangers did what they pleased, and presently cause the infamie of their vile facts to redound unto the Romans; they committing such murthers, and exercising their hatred against the Jews (for now every one that bare arms under him, were defamed with this vile report) he declared unto them, that such being hereafter found in that fact, should be put to death. Also he commanded his own Legions to make enquiry, who were suspected among them for this matter, and bring him word thereof. But avarice is not terrified by fear of punishment, and cruel people have naturally a desire of lucre and gain, and no one calamity may be compared to the desire of wealth; yet sometime it is bridled and restrained for fear. But now God, who had given over the people to perdition, suffered all things to be turned to their destruction: for that which Cæsar did so strictly forbid, was still secretly committed against the poor Jews that fled for mercy unto the Romans. So that now whosoever fled out of the City, the souldiers first looking about them, lest any of the Romans should see them, ript their bellies, and so got an ungodly and impious booty; yet in very few did they find that they sought for; and the most of them that were slain, had no Gold nor Silver found within them. And this mischief caused many that fled unto the Romans to return again into the City.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Sacriledge committed about the Temple, and the dead bodies cast out of the City, and of the Famine.

John falleth to Sacriledge, and taketh away many Presents out of the Temple

WHen John could rob no more, nor get any spoil from the Citizens, whom he had robbed of all they had, he presently fell to sacriledge, and took many gifts that were bestowed upon the Temple, and carried away sacred Vessels for Divine Service, as Cups, Plates, Tables, and the Cruets of Gold that Augustus and his Wife sent. So that now a Jew robbed and spoiled the Temple of all gifts, wherewith the Roman Emperours and other Nations had honoured it: affirming unto his associates, that without fear they might use the holy things of the Temple, seeing they fought for God and the Temple. And therefore it was lawful for them to be fed by the Riches of the Temple. Moreover, that it was lawful for them to spend the holy Wine and Oyl, which the Priests reserved for Divine Sacrifice: which he distributed in the Temple amongst the multitude, and they without fear were anointed therewith, and drank thereof. I will not cease to speak that which grief compelleth me. I verily think, that had the Romans forborn to have come against these seditious, that either the Earth would have swallowed the City up, or some deluge have drowned it, or else the Thunder and Lightening which consumed Sodom, would have light upon it: for the people of the City were far more impious than the Sodomites. In brief, by their desperation and obstinacy, the whole Nation was extinguished. What need I recount every particular misery? Mannæus the son of Lazarus, flying to Titus out of the Gate that was committed unto his custody, and yielding himself unto him, recounted unto Titus, that from the time that the Romans Army was placed neer the City, from the fourteenth day of April, until the first of July, were carried out of that Gate he kept, a hundred fifteen thousand and fourscore dead bodies; yet was he not the Keeper of the Gate; but being appointed to pay for the burying of the dead at the charges of the City, was forced to number the dead bodies. For others were buried by their Parents, and this was their burial, to cast them out of the City, and there let them lie. And certain Noblemen flying unto Titus after him, reported that there were dead in the City six hundred thousand poor folks which were cast out of the Gates, and the others that died were innumerable: and that when so many died that they were not able to bury them, that then they gathered the bodies together in the greatest houses adjoining, and there shut them up. And that a bushel of Corn was sold for a Talent, which is six hundred Crowns: and that after the City was compassed with a wall, that now they could not go out to gather any more herbs, many were driven to that necessity, that they raked sinks and privies to find old dung of Oxen to eat; and so the dung that was loathsome to behold, was their meat. The Romans hearing this, were moved to compassion; yet the seditious within the City, who beheld this miserable sight, were nothing moved, nor repented not, but suffered them to be brought to that calamity: for their hearts were so blinded by the providence of God, that they could not see what hanged over their heads, and over their City.

Six hundred thousand dead carcasses cast out of the City.

CHAP. I.

Of the breach made in the Walls: and how the Mounts were burned: and how Sabinus assaulted the Wall.

THE misery of Jerusalem every day increased, the seditious being by reason of their misery more and more incited against the people: for now the Famine was not only amongst the people, but amongst them also. And it was a miserable sight to see the multitude of dead bodies heaped together in the City, from which came a pestilent and infectious smell, so that it hindred the souldiers from making excursions. For they were forced to tread upon dead bodies, as though they were to march a long a field covered with dead carkasses. Having now embrewed their hands in the blood of their Country-men, they prepared to resist and fight with their enemies, and (as it seemeth to me) hereby upbraiding God, in that he so deferred ferred to punish them. For the greatest part of them did now fight more earnestly then before, not for hope of safety, but as despairing of all. The Romans though much troubled to get wood to build withal; yet did they in one and twenty days finish their Mounts, having cut down all the woods near the City by ninety furlongs. It was miserable to behold that Country and place, before all beset with trees and fertile plants, now to lie plain like a desart, and all cut down: neither was there any stranger that before-time had seen Judæa, and the beautiful Suburbs of Jerusalem, who now beholding it, could abstain from tears, or not lament the woful change so far different from the former. For now this war extinguished utterly all signs of beauty: neither could one coming suddenly now know the place, which he well knew before.

The Jews upbraided God, in that he so long delayed to punish them.

Judæa a desart and desolate.

The Jews and Romans are equally afraid.

When the Mounts were ended, both the Romans and the Jews greatly feared: the Jews, for that except they were destroyed, their City would be presently taken; the Romans, for that if these were overthrown, they knew not how to erect more, wanting matter: and now their bodies were wearied with labour, and their minds with many griefs and molestations. But the Romans were more grieved at the calamity of the City, then the Citizens within: for the Jews notwithstanding these miseries, did nevertheless stoutly defend their walls: but the courages of the Romans failed, when they saw that the Jews policy made their Mounts unprofitable, that the strength of the wall resisted the Engines, that the Jews boldness overcame their strength in fight: and especially, seeing that the Jews having endured such calamity, famine, and misery, were still more couragious then before: so that they deemed their strength not to be overcome; and that their minds were invincible, who were hardned and encouraged by misery. For who were able to abide their forces in prosperity, who by adversity were incited to vertue? Wherefore the Romans made a stronger watch about their Mounts. But Johns followers who were in the Castle Antonia, fearing what might ensue if the wall were battered, prevented it in what they could, before the Rams were set up: and taking fire-brands in their hands, they assaulted the Mount; but deceived with a vain hope, they retired themselves. For first of all they seemed to disagree among themselves; so that they came from their walls one after another, and some space between every one; so that they came softly and fearfully; and briefly, not after the manner of the Jews: for they wanted courage, rashness, and flocking together at once, which is proper unto all that Nation, and so came more soberly, and with less courage then they were wont. They did also find the Romans more couragious then of late, who so defended their Mounts with their bodies and weapons, that it was not possible to come and fire them; and every one was fully determined not to shrink out of his place till he was slain. For besides that, if so be that work were destroyed, they had no hope left to build more, they all accounted it a shame that their vertue should be overcome by subtlety, or their weapons by rashness and temerity, or their skill by a multitude; or the Romans by the Jews. Also they had Engines to cast darts at them as they came down their walls. And when any one of the Jews that was slain fell down, he hindred them that followed, and the danger of him that went before, terrified them that came after. They also that rashly adventured within the shot of a dart, either were terrified with the discipline, and multitude of their Enemies, or else wounded with their darts: and so they all retired, one accusing another of cowardliness, and atchieved nothing.

The Romans most of all fear the desperateness of the Jews.

The Jews with firebrands set upon the Engines: but losing their hope return back again.

The valour and violence of the Jews decreaseth.

The Jews retire arguing one another of cowardize.

The assault of the City the first day of July.

The first day of July the City was assaulted: and the Jews being now retired, the Romans set up their Rams, notwithstanding, that they were assaulted from Antonia with stones, fire and sword, and whatsoever their Enemies in that extremity could find. For though the Jews had great confidence in their walls, as that they could not be battered, yet did they not permit the Romans to place their Rams against them. And the Romans being perswaded that the Jews so laboured, because they knew their walls to be weak, and lest Antonia by the breach of the wall should be hurt, the Romans did safely & without danger (notwithstanding, that many darts were cast at them from off the walls) persist to beat the wall with their Rams: who being below, and seeing the stones broken with the force of their Engines, they shielded themselves with their bucklers: and so some with their hands pulled the stones out of the wall; some digged under the foundation thereof: and when four stones with much labour were broken and shaken, the night hindered both parties from doing any more at that time, and in it the wall now shaken with the Ram (in the place which John had undetermined to destroy the mounts, the Mine setling) fell down. So that fell out otherwise then either part expected: For the Jews who had cause indeed to be sorrowful for the Mine of the wall, and for that they did not prevent that mischance, were joyful and coura-

The Romans undermine the wall.

A couragious, as though Antonia did yet remain firm and ſtrong: And the Romans rejoycing for this unexpected fall, were again diſmayed, ſeeing the other wall that John had built within, yet they judged it eaſier to be taken then the former; but no man durſt aſcend it, for that he who firſt aſſaulted it, was certain to die. Titus, thinking that by hope and perſwaſion his ſouldiers might be encouraged, and knowing, many times promiſes and exhortations make men forget danger, and ſometime to contemn death it ſelf, he called together the moſt valiant of all his Souldiers; and ſpake thus unto them as followeth:

No man durſt aſcend the wall that John built.

Titus exhortation to the moſt valiant and ſtrongeſt.

Fellow Souldiers, it is manifeſt cowardlineſs to exhort men to enterprize a thing without danger both in them that are exhorted, and in him that exhorts: for exhortations are only to be uſed in doubtful Affairs, where it is praiſe-worthy for every man to adventure him-
B ſelf. So that I confeſs it is hard for you to aſcend the wall: yet will I ſhew that it is a glorious death to die in ſuch a fight, and eſpecially, it becometh them that are deſirous to win honour; and that they that firſt adventure valiantly to do it, ſhall not go away unrewarded. And firſt let this move you which terrifieth others, to wit, the patient mind of the Jews, and their conſtancy in adverſity. For it is a ſhame for the Roman Souldiers, who in time of peace practiſe themſelves in Warlike Feats, and are accuſtomed in time of War to get the Victory, now to be overcome by the Jews; and that in the end of the victory, we having alſo God to help us: for all our harms proceed from the Jews deſperation; and their deſtruction and calamity by Gods favour and your valour is every day increaſed. For what elſe is betokened by their ſedition amongſt themſelves, their famine, the fall of their walls without our engines to batter them, and the ſiege it ſelf; then the wrath of God towards them, and his favour toward us? Where-
C fore it is unſeemly for you either to give place to your inferiours, or to betray Gods favour and furtherance. Is it not a ſhame that the Jews, who, were they conquered, ſuſtained no great reproach, as being accuſtomed to ſerve and obey others, ſhould ſo valiantly contemn death, leſt they ſhould hereafter ſuffer or endure the like; and many times boldly to adventure and make excurſions even amongſt the midſt of us, not for hope they have to overcome us, but only to ſhew their valour: and we who have conquered almoſt the Earth and Sea, to whom it is an infamy not to be victorious, to lie idle, never making valiant aſſault upon our Enemies, but being thus armed, to expect till fortune and famine deliver them into our hands? Eſpecially, ſeeing that by under-going a little danger, all will be ours. If we get into Antonia, we have taken the City. For ſup-
D poſe that we were then to fight againſt them that are within the City (which I do not think) we having gotten the higher part of the City, being above our enemies head, are then aſſured of a perfect victory over them. I omit now their commendations who have been ſlain in wars, and their immortality whom martial fury hath deprived of this life: and thoſe that do not ſo think, I pray that they may die of ſome evil death in peace, whoſe ſouls are condemned to be interred with their bodies. For what valiant man knoweth not, that the ſoul of him that dies in war, is preſently received into the moſt pure Airy Element, and from thence carried and placed among the ſtars of Heaven, and the good and valiant ghoſts do always aſſiſt his poſterity? And that all that in peace do die of ſome diſeaſe and ſickneſs, their ſouls are kept in the bowels of the earth in darkneſs, notwithſtanding that they be moſt juſt and pure: and preſently they are forgotten, and their life
E and memory together with them extinguiſhed. Seeing therefore that we are all certain to die, and that to die by the ſword is a more eaſie death, then to die by any diſeaſe, why ſhould we deprive our ſelves of this opportunity, ſeeing that at laſt we muſt neceſſarily forgo our lives as due debt unto the deſtinies? And this I have ſpoken as though it were unpoſſible to eſcape with life, you doing your endeavours; yet they that bear the minds of men, can find means to ſave themſelves even in the greateſt dangers. For firſt of all, that part of the wall that is faln may eaſily be entred, and the wall new built is not hard to be thrown down: and many of you together enterprizing this work, may one exhort and help another, and your audacity and courage will quickly daunt the enemies heart, and perhaps may get us the victory if we get this one place with-
F out bloodſhed. For they will not reſiſt us if we offer to aſcend the wall: and let us but effect any one exploit either ſecretly or openly, and the Jews will never more undure us, though we be but few in number. And I would be aſhamed, if I did not ſo reward him that doth firſt begin, as to make all that are in our Army to envy his happineſs: and from henceforth I decree, that whoſoever eſcapeth, ſhall be Governour of them that are now his equals; and who ſo is ſlain in this quarrel, I will do him great honour.

The patient minds of the Jews, and their conſtancy in misfortunes.

The wrath of God againſt the Jews, is the Romans furtherance.

Titus ſpeaks of the life to come, after a poetical manner.

The reward of valiant men.

Titus having thus ſpoken, the reſt of the multitude feared the greatneſs of his danger: but one of them that warred in the companies, named Sabinus, a Syrian born, a man of excellent ſtrength and courage; yet of ſo ſmall ſtature, that if one had ſeen him, they would have deemed him unfit to have been a ſouldier: for he was of very ſmall ſtature & of black colour,

but

The year of the world, 4034. after Christs Nativity, 72.

but he had a mind far bigger then his body, and ſtrength ſcarce able to be contained in ſo little room. Sabinus riſing up, ſaid; I offer my ſelf unto thee, O Cæſar, firſt of all to aſcend the wall, and that with a willing mind, requeſting that my fortune may aſſiſt my ſtrength and mind: yet if fortune ſhall hinder my enterprize, know that I die not againſt my expectation, but that I will gladly give my life for thee. When he had ſo ſaid, he took his ſhield in his left hand, and holding it above his head, with his drawn ſword in his right hand, about the ſixth hour of the day, he went unto the wall: and eleven men followed him, who only envied his vertue. But Sabinus with a divine fervour of ſpirit went before them all; notwithſtanding, that on every ſide the Jews upon the wall caſt an infinite number of darts at him, and rowl'd down upon him huge ſtones, which did ſtrike down ſome of the eleven that followed him. But Sabinus, meeting the darts and peſtering arrows, yet did not remit his force, till ſuch time as he had gotten to the top of the wall, and put the enemies to flight: who terrified with his ſtrength and courage, and indeed thinking that more had come up after him, fled. Wherein, who may not juſtly blame fortune, and accuſe her; as envying at vertuous Acts? For this man failed not of his purpoſe, yet was he ſtricken with a ſtone, and thrown down flat upon his face moſt violently with a great noiſe: ſo that now the Jews ſeeing him alone, and lying on the ground, returned again, and ſhot at him on every ſide: and he kneeling upon his knees, and covering himſelf with his ſhield, did firſt of all revenge himſelf upon his Enemies, and wounded many that came near him, till with wounding them, he was ſo weary, that he could ſtrike no longer; and ſo at laſt, was ſlain with arrows: A man, who for his valour deſerved better fortune, and died as valiantly as his enterprize was couragious. Thoſe that were left of his company, having almoſt gotten to the top of the wall, were ſlain with ſtones, and the reſt being wounded, were carried into the camp. And this was done the third day of July.

How the Romans aſſaulted Antonia, and how they were driven back from thence by the Jews.

The Romans invade Antonia.

TWo days after, twenty of the watch-men which guarded the Mounts, two Horſemen, and one Trumpeter, gathered themſelves together: and about the ninth hour of the night they came by the ruines into Antonia without any reſiſtance: and finding the firſt Watch-men aſleep, they ſlew them and got the wall, and commanded the Trumpeter to ſound; by which ſound the reſt of the Watch-men were awaked, and fled for fear, before they ſaw what company of the Romans was gotten upon the wall: and the ſound of the Trumpet perſwaded them, that a great multitude of enemies were come up the wall. Cæſar, hearing the ſound of the trumpet, preſently armed his ſouldiers; and accompanied with his chief Captains, and a company of choſen men, he aſcended the wall. The Jews fled into the inner Temple, and the Romans alſo brake in amongſt them by the Mine that John had made to deſtroy the mounts of the Romans. And the followers both of John and Simon did couragiouſly drive them back: for they thought it the utter ruine of all that the Romans were now gotten into the holy place, which indeed was the beginning of their victory. So they began a ſore fight, even in the very entrance, the Romans ſtriving to get the inner Temple, and the Jews endeavouring to beat them back towards Antonia. And now arrows, darts, and ſpears, nothing availed either part, but they both fought it out at handy blows with ſwords: and in that conflict no man could diſcern on which ſide any one fought; for the ſouldiers on both parts were mingled together, and for the ſtraightneſs of the place, could not keep their rooms: for there was ſuch a noiſe that no man could hear one another, and many were ſlain on both parts: and the dead bodies of thoſe that were ſlain on both parts: and the dead bodies of thoſe that were ſlain, and their weapons falling with them, did hurt many that trod upon them; and whoſoever had the worſt, preſently cryed out pitifully, and the victours ſhouted for joy: neither was there any place to flie, or follow; the fight was ſuch, that now one had the better, and now the other. Moreover, they that ſtood in the forefront of the battel, were either of neceſſity to kill or be killed: for there was no void ſpace left between the two Armies. At laſt the Jews courage overcame the Romans skill, and they were all beaten back (having fought from the ninth hour of the night, unto the ſeventh hour of the day.) The Jews were encouraged to fight for fear they ſhould be overcome. And that parcel of the Roman Army (for as yet the legions were not come) thought it ſufficient at that time to have gotten the Caſtle of Antonia.

Of the exceeding valour of Julian the Roman ſouldier.

The year of the world, 4034. after Chriſts nativity, 72.

THere was one Julian, a Centurion, born in Bithynia, of good parentage, who (as my ſelf well knew) was moſt valiant of all, both in ſtrength of body and skill, and courageous mind. This Julian, ſeeing now the Romans to have the worſt (ſtanding by Titus in Antonia) he preſently leapt down, and all alone purſued the Jews who had the victory, into the inner Temple. And the whole multitude fled, deeming him by his force, and courage, not to have been a man. But he amongſt the midſt of them, ſlew whomſoever he light on, one of them for haſte caſting down another. So that this his deed ſeemed admirable to Cæſar, and terrible to his Enemies. Yet did that deſtiny befall him which no man can eſcape; for having his ſhoes full of ſharp nails, as other Souldiers have, running upon the pavement, he ſlipt and fell down, his Armour in the fall making a great noiſe: whereat his Enemies, who before fled, now turned again upon him. Then the Romans in Antonia fearing his life, cryed out: but the Jews many at once ſtruck him with ſwords and ſpears. And he defended many blows with his ſhield, and many times attempting to riſe, they ſtruck him down again: yet as he lay, he wounded many; neither was he quickly ſlain, becauſe all parts of his body, which being wounded might cauſe preſent death, were armed, and ſhrunk in his neck a long time till the reſt of his body being cut off, and no man helping him, his ſtrength failed: Cæſar was very ſorrowful to ſee a man of ſo great force and fortitude ſlain in the ſight of ſuch a multitude: and that the place wherein he was, hindred him from helping Julian: and others that might have helped him, durſt not for fear.

At laſt, when Julian had a long time ſtriven with death, and wounded many of them that ſlew him, he was with much ado killed, leaving behind him a renowned memory, not only amongſt the Romans and Cæſar, but alſo amongſt his Enemies. Then the Jews took his dead body, and beat back the Romans, and ſhut them in Antonia. In this battel one Alexas and Gypthæus, two of Johns company, fought valiantly, and of Simons company Malachias and Judas, the ſon of Merton, and James the ſon of Soſa Captain of the Idumæans; and two brethren of the zealous, the ſons of Jairus, Simon, and Judas.

Joſephs ſpeech, perſwading the Jews to yield their City: and how many of them fled unto the Romans.

AFter that Titus had commanded his ſouldiers to pull down the foundations of Antonia, and make an eaſie entrance for the whole Army: he called Joſeph unto him (for he underſtood, that day being the ſeventeenth of July, that the Jews were wont to celebrate a certain Feaſt to God, which they called Entelechiſmus, and that it was not ſolemnized for want of men; ſo that the people greatly mourned therefore) and again commanded him to tell John that whereof before he had ſent him word, to wit, that if he deſired to fight, he ſhould have liberty to come with what multitude he pleaſed; ſo that the City and the Temple might not both periſh with him, willing him now to deſiſt from prophaning the holy place, and from ſinning againſt God: ſending him alſo word, that if he ſo pleaſed, he would grant him leave to celebrate the feſtivity which had been now long time omitted, and that by what company he pleaſed. Joſeph, to the intent that not only John might hear this offer of Titus, but alſo the reſt of the people, he ſtood in an eminent place, from whence he might be heard, and in the Hebrew tongue he recounted unto the Jews Cæſars pleaſure, earneſtly requeſting them to ſpare their Country, and forbid the fire now ready to take hold of their Temple, and to offer the accuſtomed ſacrifices unto God. When he had thus ſaid, the people were very ſorrowful, and every one held his peace, not knowing what to ſay. But the Tyrant John, having uſed many railing ſpeeches againſt Joſeph, at laſt he anſwered, that he need not fear the deſtruction of the Temple and City, ſeeing that it belonged to God.

Titus willeth John to come out to fight, leſt with him the City and temple ſhould periſh alſo.

John raileth againſt Joſeph.

Then Joſeph with a loud voice cryed out, True it is, you have kept it pure and unprophaned for God, and the holy things you have kept inviolate, neither haſt thou committed any iniquity againſt him, from whom thou expecteſt help, but haſt offered ſolemn ſacrifice unto him. If any man ſhould take from thee thy daily food, no doubt thou wouldeſt account him thy enemy: Canſt thou then hope that God, whom thou haſt deprived of daily ſacrifice, will aſſiſt thee in theſe wars? Doſt thou impute theſe offences to the Romans? why? they even now do defend our Religi- G on, and command ſacrifice to be offered, which thou haſt forbidden. Who doth not bewail this unexpected change, and lament our City? Strangers and Enemies correct thy impiety, and thou a Jew born, and brought up in our Law, art more cruel than they. But conſider, John, it is no ſhame to repent thy wickedneſs in extremity: and at the laſt caſt, If thou be deſirous to ſave thy Country, thou haſt a good example of Jechonias, ſometime King of the Jews; Who, when the Babylonians warred againſt him, of his own accord went out of the City before it was taken, and willingly endured captivity with all his Family and Kindred, only, leſt he ſhould betray theſe holy places to his Enemies, and behold the Temple fired. And for this act of his, he is of ſacred memory among the Jews, and hath thereby gained immortal credit amongſt all his poſterity. This is H a good example, O John, although danger be at hand: and I will promiſe thee alſo pardon from the Romans, only remember that I thy Country-man admoniſh thee, and promiſe this unto the Jews: behold, who is the Author and Counſellour hereof. God forbid, that ever I ſhould ſo live a captive, that I ſhould not live according to the Laws of our Country. Yet, thou art again incenſed againſt me, and exclaimeſt on me, and curſeſt me. But true it is, I deſerve worſe than this; who ſeek to perſwade contrary unto the determination of Gods providence, and ſtrive to ſave them whom his ſentence hath condemned. Who is ignorant of the writings of the ancient Prophets and their Prophecies, now hanging over this wretched City? For then it is foretold by them to be deſtroy- ed, when we murther our own Nation: and now not only the City, but alſo the Temple is full of your dead bodies. Certainly, it is God, God it is that together with the Romans, bringeth in fire I to purge this City filled with iniquity.

Jechonias ſustained a voluntary baniſhment in Babylon.

The City, by the ordinance of fate and Gods will, was to be overthrown.

Joſeph thus crying with tears and lamentations, he could ſpeak no more for ſobbing: And the Romans compaſſionating his ſorrow and affliction, were aſtoniſhed. But John and his confederates were ſo much the more incited againſt the Romans, and ſought to take Joſeph; yet his ſpeech did move many of the Nobles; and divers fearing the ſeditious watchmen, remained ſtill where they were, making full account both of their own deſtruction, and the ſubverſion of the City. Yet ſome there were, who finding opportunity, fled unto the Romans: amongſt whom were two Prieſts, Joſeph and Jeſus, and three ſons of Iſmael the Prieſt, who was beheaded at Cyren, and four ſons of Matthias the Prieſt, and one of the other Matthias, who eſcaped unto the Romans before his Father was put to death by Simon Giora, with K his three ſons, as is before ſaid: and many other Nobles revolted with the Prieſts, whom the Emperour received very courteouſly, and ſent them unto Gophna; knowing that it was a grief for them to converſe amongſt the people of divers manners from them, and willed them to remain there, and promiſed every one of them great poſſeſſions after the wars were ended. So they joyfully departed unto the people appointed: but the ſeditious, for that they were not ſeen, reported unto the people, that they who had fled unto the Romans were ſlain, meaning hereby to terrifie the reſt from fleeing to them: and thus their device a while prevailed, as their former did; and they that fain would, durſt not now flee for fear. But afterward, when Titus recalled them from Gophna, and commanded them to go about the Walls with Joſeph, and ſhew themſelves unto the people; then many of the Jews fled unto the L Romans.

Joſephs ſpeech is interrupted with ſighs.

Ceſar's humanity towards the Jews.

And after they had gathered themſelves together, ſtanding all before the Romans, they beſought the ſeditious with tears, firſt to receive the Romans into the City, and ſave their Country: or if it pleaſed them not, at leaſt to depart out of the Temple, and to deliver it up unto them. For the Romans durſt not, except neceſſity urged them thereto, fire the holy Temple. But their malice againſt the Romans encreaſing, and railing againſt them that had fled unto them, they planted all their Engines to caſt ſtones, darts, and arrows upon their holy Porches. So that all the void ſpace about the Temple was filled with dead bodies like a Sepulchre, and the Temple it ſelf reſembled a Caſtle, and they now with their weapons having their hands imbrewed with the blood of their Country-men, preſumed to enter into the M
Sanctuary where none ought to come: and they became ſo injurious againſt their own laws, that look what indignation the Jews ought to have conceived againſt the Romans, if they had ſo prophaned the holy places, the ſame they cauſed the Romans to have againſt them, for doing the like. For there was not one amongſt the Roman ſouldiers, that did not with reverence behold the Temple, and adore it, and that did not heartily wiſh that the thieves would repent themſelves before it was too late. Moreover, Titus pitying the ſeditious, once again ſpake unto John, and his adherents, ſaying: O ye impious people, have you not invironed the Temple about with a Cloiſter? have not you your ſelves in Greek and our Language engraven in Tables, forbidden all men to enter into thoſe limits? did not we licence you to kill any man that ſhould paſs them, notwithſtanding that he were a Roman? wicked wretches, do you tread upon dead mens bodies within your Temple? Or wherefore have you polluted the Temple with the blood of ſtrangers, and of your Country-men? I call my Country Gods to witneſs, and him who ſometime dwelt in this place, if ever there were any (for now I am perſwaded there is none;) I call alſo my Army to witneſs, and proteſt to the Jews that are with me, and to your ſelves; that I will not compel you to violate theſe ſacred things: but that if your Army will depart from this place, that then no Roman ſhall come into theſe holy places, nor commit any thing in contumely of them, but I will preſerve the Temple for you againſt your wills.

Titus in deſpight of the Jews, ſtrives to ſave the Temple.

CHAP. V.

How the battel was renewed, the Rampiers being again builded, and of the excurſions of the Jews.

Joſeph having delivered theſe words of Titus to the Jews, the ſeditious thinking that they proceeded not of good will, but of fear, began to be more proud hereat. Then Titus, ſeeing they neither pitied themſelves, nor the Temple, determined again to fight, though very loth ſo to do; yet could he not bring all his Army againſt them, the room was ſo little. Wherefore out of every hundred he made choice of thirty of the ſtrongeſt among them, and over every thouſand he appointed a Colonel, and made Cerealis their Captain or General, commanding him at the ninth hour of the night to aſſault the Watchmen of the Enemy. Alſo he himſelf would have gone down with them armed; but his friends, and the Captains about him, foreſeeing the great danger he might fall into, would not permit him: affirming, that he might do more good ſitting in Antonia, and encouraging the Souldiers that fought, then if he ſhould go and endanger himſelf: for every man being in the view of the Emperour, would fight more couragiouſly. Titus was herewith perſwaded, telling the ſouldiers that the only cauſe he went not with them was this, that he ſtayed behind to view and judge every ones valour and virtue, and to the intent that no one behaving himſelf valiantly ſhould go away unrewarded, nor any coward eſcape unpuniſhed, but that he himſelf would be a beholder of every mans vertue, and a witneſs thereof, who was their Lord either to reward or puniſh.

Titus choſe thirty out of every hundred, moſt ſtrong and able men, and bids them charge the beſieged.

Then went he unto a watch-tower in Antonia, from whence he beheld what was done. But they whom Titus ſent did not find the Watchmen aſleep, as they hoped, but with a cry, aſſaulted the Romans that came againſt them: and at this noiſe they awaked their fellows, who came in whole companies to aſſiſt them, and made excurſions upon their enemies. So the Romans ſuſtained the violence of their firſt companies: but the ſecond that came, fell upon their own fellows, and uſed them like their Enemies: for no man could know one anothers voice for the noiſe there, neither could one ſee another by reaſon it was night: and moreover, ſome were blinded with fury, ſome with anger, ſome with fear: wherefore every one ſtruck him that met him, without any reſpect. And the Romans received ſmall damage thereby, becauſe that they were defended with their ſhields, and remembred one anothers watch-word. But the Jews fell on every ſide, ſhewing themſelves raſh as well in excurſions as in their retiring; ſo that many times one of them took the other to be his enemy. every one falling upon him that retired, as though he had been a Roman, aſſaulting them in the dark. Briefly, more were wounded by their fellows than by their Enemies, till day breaking that every one knew his companion; and each one keeping his rank, did then betake themſelves to their darts and arrows. Neither part gave back, nor was wearied with labour: but many Romans together and apart, did in the view of the Emperour ſhew their courage, every man accounting that day the beginning of his preferment, if he behaved himſelf valiantly. The Jews fought ſtoutly, both for that they feared their own eminent danger, if they were overcome, and the deſtruction of the Temple: and John ſtanding by, encouraged them to fight, ſome with blows, otherſome with threatnings. They fought moſt commonly with handy blows; yet fortune often changed: for neither part had either far to flee, or any ſpace to follow them that fled. The Romans in Antonia cried unto their fellows that fought the battel, Now for the hope of victory: preſently encouraging them to ſtand to it, when they began to give back; ſo it was as it had been a Theatre of war: for Titus, and they with him, beheld all that was done; ſo at laſt, in the fifth hour of the day the fight ceaſed, having continued from the ninth hour of the night, neither party forſaking the place where firſt they began battel, neither any part having the victory. Many Romans there fought couragiouſly, and amongſt the Jews theſe that follow: Judas, the ſon of Merton; Simon, the ſon of Joſias; and Jacob, and Simon Idumæans; this, the ſon of Cathla, but James was the ſon son of Sosa: and all these were of Simons company, and of Johns followers Gipthæus and Alexas; and of the Zelous, Simon the son of Jairus. But the seventh day, the rest of the Romans pulling down the foundations of Antonia, made a large entrance for the rest of the Army, and the Legions coming unto the wall, presently began to raise Mounts, one against the corner of the inner Temple, which was situate North and East: and another against the Gallery on the North side, betwixt the two Porches: and the other two, one against the Porch of the West side of the outward Temple; the other against the North Porch. So with much toil and labour they finisht this work, fetching wood to build it withall one hundred furlongs off. And many times they were endamaged by treachery, not being wary by reason of their victory: and the Jews despairing of themselves every hour, more and more were encouraged. For many of the horsemen going either to get wood or hay, while they were about it, they took the Bridles from off their Horses, and permitted them to feed till they had ended their business; and presently the Jews issuing out in Troops upon them, took them away.

Four mounts raised neer to the Temple.

The Jews surprize the Romans horses.

Titus seeing that this fell out, deemed (as indeed it was) that his mens horses were stoln rather by their negligence, than their Enemies valour: wherefore he thought by the severe punishment of one, to make others look better to their horses. And so he put to death one of the souldiers that had lost his horse: by whose punishment the rest of the souldiers being terrified, kept their horses better. For after that, when they went about any business, they never left their horses in the pastures, but kept always with them. Thus the Romans assaulted the Temple, and builded their Mounts. The day following, certain of the seditious, who now could get no more booties in the City, and now also began to taste of hunger, assaulted the Romans that were placed towards Mount Olivet, about the eleventh hour of the day: for they hoped to take them unawares, as being now at dinner. But the Romans perceiving their intent, came out of their places, and resisted them who attempted violently to break in upon them over the wall: so that there was a hot fight, and many other deeds were done on either party, the Romans having both strength and knowledge in warlike affairs; the Jews led with a desperate fury: and shame forced the Romans to fight, and need compelled the Jews: for the Romans accounted it a shame not to overcome the Jews, who were as it were fallen into their hands; and the Jews thought it the only way to save their own lives, to break down the wall by force. And one of the horsemen called Pedanius, the Jews being put to flight, and driven into the Valley, pursued them with his horse as fast as he could gallop, and overtook a young man, one of his enemies, being heavy of body, armed all over; and taking him about the ankle, he carried him violently away: thereby shewing the strength of his arm and of the rest of his body, and his skilful Cavalry, and so brought the Captive unto Cæsar as a present. Titus admiring Pedanius his strength, and punishing the Captive for having attempted to assault the wall, he now hasted to assail the Temple, and commanded the workmen quickly to dispatch the Mounts. In the mean time the Jews being ill handled in the former wars, and war still increasing to the overthrow of the Temple, they did, as the custom is in a putrified body, prevent the Plague from going any further, by cutting off the corrupted members. For that part of the Porch that reached from the North unto the East, joined unto Antonia: which they firing, seperated it 20 Cubits from it, having now with their own hands begun to cast fire into the holy place. Two days after, which was the 24. day of the aforesaid Month, the Romans set the Porch on fire, and the fire having gone fourteen Cubits, the Jews pulled down the top thereof, and not desisting from their accustomed works, they pulled down all adjoyning unto Antonia; when it was easie for them, and that they ought to have hindred the fire. The Porch being on fire, they permitted so much to be burned, as they thought good for their purpose. The fight about the Temple never ceased, many excursions were made one against each other.

About this time a certain Jew of low stature, and to see to a contemptible person, every way an abject, both by reason of his base parentage, and otherwise, named Jonathan, going to the Monument of John the Priest, dared the strongest amongst the Romans to come and fight a single combat with him. The Romans that beheld him, disdained him: yet some amongst them (as it is commonly seen) were afraid of him: others wisely deemed, that they ought not to fight with one that was desirous to die: for they that were desperate, neither fought advisedly, nor had the fear of God before their eyes: and so that it was not a sign of valour, but of overmuch hardiness, to fight with such a one; whom though they overcame, yet they could win no credit, but with infamy hazard themselves to be vanquisht. So a long time none of the Romans came against him, and he upbraided them of cowardliness. At last, an arrogant and proud fellow, one of the Roman horsemen, named Pudens, disdaining his insolency, and perhaps also for that that he was of little ſtature came againſt him; and fighting with him, fortune frowned upon him, ſo that he was laught to ſcorn by his fellow, for he falling down, Jonathan ſlew him; and ſetting his foot upon the dead body, with his left hand he flouriſhed his ſhield, and with his right his bloody ſword; and ſtriking his weapons one againſt another, he inſulted over the Roman Army, and over the dead body, upbraiding the Romans, ſo long till Priſcus a Centurion as he was thus vaunting ſhot him thorow with an Arrow, and ſo he fell down dead upon the body of his Enemy; at which deed, both the Romans and the Jews raiſed a confuſed cry or noiſe. So Jonathan there ſhewed how quickly revenge purſued the felicity of warlike victory, falling out contrary to all reaſon.

CHAP. VI.

How the Romans through the deceit of the Jews were conſumed with fire, and of one Artorius.

THe ſeditious that kept the Temple, did now every day openly in fight reſiſt the Romans that kept the Mounts, and the twenty ſeventh day they deviſed this ſtratagem: they filled the void part of the Eaſt Porch of the Temple with dry wood and brimſtone, and bitumen, and then fled out of it as not able longer to reſiſt. Wherefore many of the Romans raſhly purſued the Jews that fled, and with Ladders got into the Galleries. But the wiſer ſort conſidering that the Jews had no juſt occaſion to flie, kept their place. The Porch being now full of Romans that were got up into it, the Jews gave fire to the Wood and Brimſtone, and upon a ſudden all the Porch was compaſſed with the flame: ſo that the Romans who were out of danger were thereat amazed, and thoſe that were amidſt the flames became deſperate: and invironed with the flames, ſome ſought to run back into the town, otherſome unto the Enemies; others killed themſelves, ſo preventing the fury of the fire: and preſently the flame overtook thoſe that ſought to flie. Cæſar though offended at the ſouldiers for having aſcended into the Porch unbidden, yet ſeeing them die ſo wofully in the flames, he compaſſionated them. And although that the fire could not be quenched, yet the poor Souldiers dying amongſt the flames were hereat comforted, in that they perceived him to be ſorrowful for them, for whom they had loſt their lives. For they beheld him crying to their fellows to help to extinguiſh the fire, and he himſelf laboured what he could to do it; ſo that every one eſteemed his ſorrow and lamentation for them as much as a ſumptuous funeral: but ſome eſcaped the fire and got into the largeſt part of the Porch: yet invironed round about with Jews, having long reſiſted, though with many wounds; yet in the end they were all ſlain.

The Jews fill the void part of the Eaſt porch with dry wood, ſulphur and bitumen.

The Romans calamity in the fire.

Cæſar hath compaſſion of the Romans that were in the fire.

At laſt a young man named Longus, was an honour to all this miſery: and notwithſtanding that every one that there periſhed deſerved particularly to be remembred, yet he ſhewed himſelf the moſt valiant of them all. The Jews were deſirous to kill this man for that he was ſtrong, and willed him to come down unto them, ſwearing unto him to ſpare him. But his Brother Cornelius, who ſtood on the other ſide, intreated him not to diſcredit his own honour and the Romans; whom he obeyed: and he lifting up his Sword on high, that either part might ſee, ſlew himſelf. Yet one Artorius from amidſt the fire eſcaped by this device; he called unto him one Lucius his fellow-Souldier and chamber-fellow; I will (quoth he) make thee heir of all my inheritance, if thou wilt catch me in thy arms. Lucius willingly endeavouring to do it, Artorius caſt himſelf down upon him, and ſo eſcaped with his life, but Lucius upon whom he fell was bruiſed againſt the pavement, and ſo died. This calamity a while did greatly grieve the Romans, yet it made them more wary afterward, and acquainted them with the Jews ſubtilties, whereof before being ignorant, they ſuſtained great damage; ſo the Porch was burnt unto the Tower which John built, during his wars againſt Simon; and the Jews, after the Romans that were aſcended into it were conſumed, pulled down the reſt. The next day the Romans fired the North Porch, even unto the foreſaid Eaſt Porch, which contained the corners of the wall builded over the valley Cedron, ſo that it was terrible to behold the valley from thence, by reaſon of the depth.

Of the Famine amongst the Jews.

The inteſtine wars of the Jews that were welnigh famiſhed with hunger.

SUch were the affairs about the Temple: but an infinite multitude periſhed within the City through Famine, ſo that they could not be numbred: for in every place where any ſhew or ſign of food was, preſently aroſe a battel, and the deareſt friends of all now fought one with another, to take the food from other poor ſouls, neither did they believe them that were now a dying for Famine, but the thieves ſearched them whom they ſaw yielding up the ghoſt, thinking that they dying for Famine, had hid about them ſome food: but they were deceived of their hope, being like mad-dogs, greedy of meat, and fell againſt the doors like drunken men, ſearching the ſelf-ſame houſes twice or thrice together in deſperation, and for very penury they ate whatſoever they light upon, gathering ſuch things to eat, as the moſt filthy living Creatures in the world would have loathed. In brief, they did eat their Girdles and Shoes, and the skins that covered their ſhields, ſo that a little of old hay was ſold for four Attiques. But what need is it to ſhew the ſharpneſs of this Famine by things that want life? I will recount an act never heard of, neither among the Greeks, nor any other barbarous people, horrible to be rehearſed and incredible: ſo that I would willingly omit this calamity, leſt poſterity ſhould think I lie, had not I many witneſſes hereof, and perhaps ſhould incur reprehenſion, not fully recounting all accidents of them that are dead.

The Jews eat their own girdles, ſhoes, the leather of their Targets, and old hay.

CHAP. VIII.

Of a Woman that for Famine killed her ſon, and dreſſed him for meat.

A Certain woman named Mary, dwelling beyond Jordan, the Daughter of Eleazar of the Town of Vitezokia, which ſignifieth the Houſe of Hyſope, deſcended of noble and rich parentage, flying with the reſt unto Jeruſalem, was there with them beſieged, her other goods the Tyrants had taken from her, which ſhe had brought from beyond the River into the City: and whatſoever being hid, eſcaped their hands, the thieves daily came into her houſe and took it away: whereat the woman greatly moved, curſed them, and with hard ſpeeches animated them the more againſt her, yet no man either for anger, or compaſſion would kill her, but ſuffered her to live to get them meat: but now could ſhe get no more, and famine invaded her, with rage and anger more than danger. Wherefore by rage and neceſſity ſhe was compelled to do that which Nature abhorred, and taking her ſon unto whom ſhe then gave ſuck; "O miſerable child (quoth ſhe) in War, Famine, and "Sedition, for which of theſe ſhall I keep thee? If thou continue among the Romans, thou "ſhalt be made a ſlave, yet Famine will prevent bondage, or elſe ſedition worſe than them "both. Be therefore meat for me, a terrour unto the ſeditious, a tragical ſtory to be "ſpoken of by poſterity, and that which is only yet unheard of among the calamities of "the Jews. Having thus ſpoken ſhe ſlew her ſon, and did ſeeth the one half of him and eat it, the reſt ſhe reſerved covered. Preſently came the ſeditious, ſmelling the ſcent of that execrable meat, threatning preſently to kill her, except ſhe forthwith brought ſome of that unto them which ſhe had prepared. Then ſhe anſwered that ſhe had reſerved a good portion thereof for them, and preſently uncovered that part of her ſon which ſhe had left uneaten, at which ſight they trembled, and a horrour fell upon them. But the Woman ſaid, "This is truly my ſon, and my doing, eat you of it, for I my ſelf have eaten thereof. Be not "more effeminate than a woman, nor more merciful than a Mother. If Religion make you re-"fuſe this my Sacrifice, I have already eaten of it, and will eat the reſt. Then the ſeditious departed hereat, only trembling; and ſcarcely permitting this meat to the Mother. Preſently the report of this hainous crime was bruited all about the City, and every man having before his eyes this execrable fact, trembled as though himſelf had done it. And now all that were vexed with this Famine, haſtened their own deaths, and he was accounted happy that died before he felt this Famine. This unnatural fact was ſoon after recounted unto the Romans, and ſome of them would not believe it, others pitied them within the City, and many hereat encreaſed their hatred towards that Nation.

The mothers ſpeech before ſhe ſlew her ſon.

The ſeditious challenge the meat which the deſolate mother had dreſſed.

The calamity recounted to the Romans.

Ceſar before Almighty God proteſted, that he was not the cauſe of this, having offered the

the Jews peace, free pardon and forgiveneſs for all their offences paſt, and that they did rather make choice of war than peace, of ſedition than quietneſs, of famine rather than wealth and plenty, having with their own hands begun to ſet on fire the Temple, which he had preſerved for them, and that therefore ſuch like meat was fit for them, and that he would bury this abominable crime of eating their own children in the ruines of their Country, and that he would not in any part of the world ſuffer the Sun to ſhine upon ſuch a City, wherein Mothers did eat their own children, and that ſuch food did more beſeem Fathers than Mothers, who for all their miſeries would not yet ceaſe from arms. Having thus ſpoken, he conſidered the deſperation of the enemies, and that they would not recall themſelves, who had already endured all ſuch calamities, which might if it had been poſſible have altered their opinions, rather than have endured them.

CHAP. IX.

How the wall was taken, and the Temple burnt.

THe eighth day of Auguſt, two of the Roman Legions having finiſhed their Mounts, they began to place their Rams againſt the Eaſt-Galleries without the Temple, having ſix days together without intermiſſion, already beaten the wall with their ſtrongeſt Rams, and nothing prevailed, the ſtones being ſo ſtrong, that the Rams could not move them: others of the Romans laboured to dig up the foundations of the Porch, that was on the North ſide; and after much toil, they only could pull away the outward ſtones, and the inner ſtones did ſtill ſupport the porch. At laſt the Romans ſeeing themſelves not prevail by their Javelins and other Inſtruments, they ſet Ladders to aſcend into the Galleries. The Jews did not greatly labour to hinder them from getting up: but when they were within the Galleries, then they came and fought with them, and caſt ſome of them down headlong, forcing them to retire; others they ſlew that ſtood in it; and other that were upon the Ladders going down, before they could defend themſelves with their ſhields, were with Swords ſtricken down, and they alſo thruſt down ſome Ladders full of armed men. So that there was a great Maſſacre of the Romans, ſome fighting for their Enſigns, which the Jews had taken from them, eſteeming the loſs thereof a great ſhame unto them. At laſt the Jews got their Ancients, and ſlew them that came up to reſcue them; and the reſt terrified with their deaths that were ſlain, went down again, and no one of the Romans died, who before he was ſlain did not ſome valiant act; and thoſe ſeditious people that in the former battels did ſhew themſelves valiant, did now alſo fight valiantly, and beſide them Eleazar, ſon unto the Tyrant the Brother of Simon. Then Titus perceiving that he ſpared the Temple of the Jews to his loſs, and to the death of his Souldiers, he commanded fire to be put to the Temple Gates: preſently Ananus of Emmaus the moſt cruel of all Simons followers, and Archelaus the ſon of Magadatus fled unto Titus; who for their cruelties committed, determined to put them to death, yet they hoped for pardon, for that they had now forſaken the Jews when they had gotten the better hand. But Titus affirmed they came not of good will, but for neceſſity, and that they did not deſerve to live forſaking their Country now ſet on fire for their offences: yet his promiſe bridled his wrath, and he diſmiſſed them, but they were not ſo much eſteemed as the reſt. The Roman Souldiers did now put fire unto the Temple doors: and the Silver plate wherewith they were covered being molten, the flame quickly fired the wood, and encreaſing took hold preſently on the next Porch. The Jews ſeeing themſelves invironed with flames, were now altogether diſcouraged, and their ſtrength failed them, and being amazed, no man ſought to extinguiſh the flame, and ſo they ſtood ſtill beholding the fire, yet not lamenting that which was ſet on fire, more than deſiring to ſave the reſt: and ſo that day and all the next night the fire encreaſed, for the Porches were burnt by little and little, and not all at once.

The Jews overcome the Romans, and ſeize their enſigns.

Two of Simons guard revolt from him.

Titus promiſe reſtraineth his wrath.

None of the Jews go about to extinguiſh the fire.

The next day Titus cauſed part of his army to quench the fire: and calling unto him his Captains, and ſix that were the chiefeſt among them, to wit, Tiberius Alexander General of the whole Army, Sextus Cerealis Commander of the fifth Legion, Largius Lepidus of the tenth, Titus Frigius of the fifteenth, with whom alſo was Æternius Fronto Commander of the two Legions that came from Alexandria, and Marcus Antonius Julianus Governour of Judæa, and with them the Colonels and Captains, he deliberated with them what was to be done concerning the Temple. Some counſelled to uſe the cuſtom of wars, for that the Jews would would never live peaceably their Temple ſtanding; all their Nation whereſoever living, aſſembling themſelves thither at certain times. Others perſwaded Titus, that if ſo be the Jews yielded their Temple, and fought not for it, then to ſave it; but if they fought for it, to burn it: for now it ſeemed a Caſtle and not a Temple: and if any man were offended hereat, it ſhould not be imputed to the Romans or to their General, but to the Jews who conſtrained them to do it; and he offended not, they forcing him to fire it. But Titus affirmed, that although the Jews fought for their Temple, being men without conſcience, yet it ſhould not be deſtroyed: for he would not ſo be revenged of their iniquities, neither would he ever fire ſo goodly a building; for ſo it would redound to the loſs of the Romans: as alſo it would be a credit unto them, if it were left remaining. And now Alexander, Fronto, and Cærealis, perceiving Cæſar's mind, were of his opinion, and ſo he diſmiſſed the convocation, and commanded the Souldiers and Captains to reſt, that they might be more able to fight when need required: and preſently he appointed certain choſen men to make the ways even, and eaſie for the Army to paſs by the ruines, commanding them to quench the fire; and that day the Jews being fearful and weary did make no reſiſtance. The day following taking heart and aſſembling together, they aſſaulted the Watchmen that kept without the Temple, the ſecond hour of the day. The Romans valiantly reſiſted their firſt aſſault, ſo defending themſelves with their ſhields as though they had a wall before them; yet ſure it was that they would not long abide, for that they were fewer in number than their enemies, and not ſo deſperate as they were. Then Cæſar before his men retired (beholding the fight from Antonia) with certain choſen horſemen came to ſuccour them: whoſe force the Jews not ſuſtaining, but the firſt of them being ſlain, the reſt fled: and the Romans departing, they returned and fought againſt them; and when the Romans returned again, preſently they fled till about the fifth hour of the day, the Jews were forced to betake themſelves into the Temple, and there they were ſhut up. Then Titus returned into Antonia, purpoſing the next day to aſſault them with all his Army, and win the Temple. But the ſentence of God had already determined, that it ſhould be conſumed with fire: and now the fatal day was come after many years, which was the tenth of Auguſt: upon which day alſo, the King of Babylon did once before fire it, yet was it now firſt ſet a fire by our own Country-men, who were indeed the cauſe thereof. For the ſeditious being quiet till Titus was departed, then again they aſſaulted the Romans, and ſo fought with the Guard that were without the Temple, labouring to extinguiſh the flame; who putting the Jews to flight, came unto the Temple.

Titus counſel as concerning the Temple.

Titus with his choſen horſemen cometh to reſcue the Romans.

The Temple was burnt by the Romans the tenth of the month of Auguſt, on which day beforetime it was burned by the King of Babylon.

CHAP. X.

How the Temple was burnt againſt the will of Titus.

THen a certain Souldier who expected no Command, nor feared to do ſo execrable a Fact, moved with ſome divine fury, and lifted up by his fellow, took in his hand a flaming Firebrand, and caſt it into the Golden-Gate which entred into the Rooms on the North part of the Temple, and the flame preſently aroſe: which cauſed a great cry amongſt the Jews, expreſſing their calamity, and every one haſted to extinguiſh the fire; now neither accounting of their lives nor forces, having loſt that for which they ſo fought. News thereof was preſently brought unto Titus, by one who came from the fight, who then was reſting in his Tabernacle, and he preſently aroſe and ran unto the Temple to hinder the fire, and all the Captains after him; whereat the Souldiers being terrified followed, and there aroſe a great cry and tumult in that Army being unordered. Cæſar both with his voice and hand made a ſign unto the Souldiers that were fighting, to quench the fire. But they did not hear him, there was ſo great a noiſe, neither did they perceive the ſign he had made unto them with his hand, becauſe that ſome were diſtracted with fight, others with anger: and the Souldiers iſſued in, not reſtrained either by commands or threatnings, but every one went whither fury carried him: and thronging together at the entrance, many preſſed one another to death; and many being amongſt the fiery ruines of the Galleries, periſhed as miſerably as thoſe that were overcome. When they came unto the Temple, every one counterfeited himſelf not to hear Cæſars command, and ſo exhorted his fellows that were before him to fire the Temple. The ſeditious now had no hope to withſtand them, but either fled or were ſlain; and many unarmed and unable people, whereſoever they were found, were ſlain: ſo that about the Altar were an innumerable company

A ſouldier contrary to Cæſar's will burned the Temple.

A pany of dead bodies heaped together, and their blood flowed down the Temple ſtairs; and their bodies that were ſlain rouled down. Cæſar ſeeing he could not reſtrain the fury of the Mad-brain Souldiers, and that the fire encreaſed, entred into the Temple with his Nobles, and beheld all the holy things there, and whatſoever elſe was there, far ſurpaſſing all report which ſtrangers had given of it, and equal to the report which the Jews made of it. And the flame not having yet pierced into the inner part of the Temple, nor yet conſumed the houſes and rooms about it, he deemed that as yet it might be preſerved: wherefore himſelf came and intreated the Souldiers to extinguiſh the fire: commanding Liberalis the Centurion of his Guard to beat thoſe with a Trunchion that would not be obedient, and drive them away. B But their fury and the rage of War, and the hatred they bare againſt the Jews, overcame in them all Cæſars commands, and fear of them that forbade them. Many were incited ſo to do, hoping for ſome booty, thinking that all the Temple within was full of money, becauſe they ſaw the Gates of gold. Moreover, a certain Souldier, when Cæſar ſought to quench the flame, fired the Poſts about the doors: and preſently the flame appearing within, Cæſar and the Captains departed, and ſo every one ſtood looking upon it, and no man ſought to extinguiſh it. Thus the Temple was burnt againſt Titus his will. And although every man will judge it a lamentable caſe, in ſuch a building ſurpaſſing all that ever was ſeen or heard of, both in greatneſs, workmanſhip, coſtlineſs and plenty of all things; in this yet we may comfort our ſelves, in that the deſtinies had ſo determined. For neither living creatures, nor places, nor C buildings can avoid their deſtiny. One may alſo admire the exact and juſt revolution of time: for it was now deſtroyed in the ſame month, and on the ſame day that the Babyloni-ans firſt deſtroyed it: and from that time that Solomon began the firſt Temple, unto the de-ſtruction of the ſecond Temple, which hapned the ſecond year of Veſpaſians Reign, were a thouſand a hundred and thirty years, ſeven months, and fifteen days; and from the building of the latter Temple which Aggæus built in the ſecond year of the Reign of King Cyrus, un-to the deſtruction thereof now in Veſpaſians Reign, were ſix hundred thirty nine years and five and forty days.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Prieſts, the Treaſure-houſe and the Porch.

WHen the Temple was thus conſumed with fire, whatſoever the Souldiers found therein, they carried away, and put all to the Sword that were in it, which was an infinite number: neither did they ſhew any pity to old age, or infants: but old, young, Prieſts and common people, all were ſlain without reſpect, and all ſorts of peo-ple taſted the calamity of War, whether they reſiſted, or intreated for mercy. And now the flame encreaſed, which grieved even them that were yielding up the Ghoſt: and by reaſon of the height of the Hill, and the building together, one would have thought the whole City had been on fire. Then a moſt lamentable cry was raiſed between the Roman Legions, and the ſeditious now invironed with fire and ſword, and of the people that were taken in the higher part of the City, and had fled unto the Romans, lamenting their cala-mity; and they of the City anſwered the cryes and tears of them in the Hill, and many whoſe Eyes death by Famine had already cloſed, took ſtrength a while to bewail the Temple, which they now opening their Eyes beheld on fire. The Country beyond Jordan, and the Mountains about did eccho with their laments: and yet the calamities ſurpaſſed that tu-mult. For one would have judged the Hill whereon the Temple was ſituate, to have been burnt up by the roots, it was ſo full of fire: Yet multitude of blood-ſhed ſurpaſſed the fire. Many that were ſlain were covered with them that ſlew them, and all the ground was over-ſpred with dead bodies, ſo that the Souldiers ran upon the dead bodies to purſue them that fled. At laſt the thieves having driven the Romans without the Temple, they ran into the City; and the reſt of the people that were left, fled into the outward Porch. And many of the Prieſts firſt uſed Spits, and then their Seats made of lead, inſtead of Darts againſt the Romans; at laſt, nothing at all prevailing, and the fire falling upon them, they went unto a Wall eight Cubits broad, and there ſtaied. Yet two of the Nobles, when they might ei-ther have fled unto the Romans, and there have been ſaved, or elſe have endured like for-tune with the reſt, they notwithſtanding caſt themſelves into the fire, and ſo were burnt with the Temple: one of them was named Meierus the Son of Belga, the other Joſeph the Son of Dalans.

The Romans thought it in vain to ſpare the buildings about the Temple, ſeeing the Temple was already conſumed, and ſo ſet fire on them all, the Porches, Galleries and Gates; two only excepted, one on the Eaſt-ſide, and the other on the South-ſide, both which afterward they razed unto the ground: they burnt alſo certain Cheſts called Gazophylacia, or mony Boxes, wherein was great ſtore of Coin, and rich Garments, and other precious things, and indeed all the Jews treaſure, for the richeſt of the City had brought all their wealth thither. There came into the Porch that was left ſtanding, many men, women, and children, to the number of ſix thouſand. And before Cæſar and the Captains did determine any thing what ſhould be done with them, the furious Souldiers fired the Porch wherein they were, and ſo they all periſhed in the flames; ſave a few, that leaping down to avoid the fire, were ſlain in the fall, ſo that no one eſcaped of all that multitude. A certain falſe prophet was cauſe of all their deaths, who the ſame day preached in the City, and commanded them to go into the Temple, and behold ſigns of their deliverance: for many falſe prophets were then ſuborned by the Tyrants, to perſwade them to expect Gods help, thereby to hinder them from flying to the Romans, and to cauſe the Souldiers to fight more valiantly to defend their City. Men eaſily believe and are credulous in adverſity, ſo that if any deceitful perſon promiſe deliverance out of calamity, he that ſuffereth miſery, is full of hope thereof.

CHAP. XII.

Of the ſtrange ſigns and tokens that appeared before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

The blindneſs of the people.

THeſe miſerable people were thus eaſily perſwaded by impoſtors who did bely God, yet would they not believe, nor give any ear or regard unto certain tokens and ſigns of the ruine of their City: but as it were blinded, neither having eyes nor ſouls, they counterfeited themſelves not to ſee what God foreſhewed them. One while there was a Comet in form of a fiery Sword, which for a year together did hang over the City: another time before the firſt revolt and War, the people being gathered together to the feaſt of unleavened bread (which was the eighth day of April) the ninth hour of the night there was ſo much light about the Altar & Temple, as though it had been bright day, which remained half an hour: this the ignorant people interpreted as a good ſign; but they that were ſkilful in holy Scripture, did preſently judge what would enſue before it came to paſs. At the ſame feſtivity, a Cow led to be ſacrificed at the Altar, brought forth a Lamb in the midſt of the Temple: and the inner Gate of the Temple on the Eaſt-ſide being of maſſive braſs, which at night-time had always at leaſt twenty men to ſhut it, and was bound with Locks of Iron, and was barred with bars, the ends whereof went into Morteis holes in the ſtones on either ſide the door (the foreſaid ſtones being on each ſide one whole ſtone) was ſeen at the firſt hour of the night to open of its own accord: which being preſently related unto the Magiſtrate by the Keepers of the Temple, he himſelf came thither and could ſcarcely ſhut it; and this alſo to the ignorant ſeemed a good ſign, affirming that God opened unto them the gate of his bleſſings; but the wiſer ſort judged that the defence of the Temple would decay of its own accord, and that the opening of the Gate foretold, that it ſhould be given to the Enemies, affirming one unto another that this ſign ſignified deſolation. A little while after the feaſt days, on the 21. day of May, there was ſeen a viſion beyond all belief, and perhaps that which I am to recount might ſeem a fable, if ſome were not now alive that beheld it, and that calamity worthy to be ſo foretold enſued: for before the ſun ſet, were ſeen in the ayr Iron Chariots, all over the Country, and an Army in battel aray paſſing along in the Clouds, and begirting the City. And upon the Feaſt day called Pentecoſt, at night the Prieſts going into the Inner Temple to offer their wonted ſacrifice, at firſt felt the place to move and tremble, and afterward they heard a voice which ſaid, Let us depart hence. And that which was moſt wonderful of all, one Jeſus the Son of Ananus a Country man of the common people, four years before the Wars began, when the City flouriſhed in peace and riches, coming to the celebration of the Feaſt to Jeruſalem, which we call the Feaſt of Tabernacles, ſuddenly began to cry out thus; A voice from the Eaſt: A voice from the Weſt: A voice from the four Winds: A voice againſt Jeruſalem and the Temple: A voice againſt men and women newly married: A voice againſt all this people: and thus crying night and day, he went about all the ſtreets of the City.

Some

A Some of the Nobility diſdaining misfortune, took him and ſcourged him with many ſtripes: but he, neither ſecretly ſpeaking for himſelf, nor to thoſe that did beat him, perſevered crying as before. The Magiſtrates then thinking (as indeed it was) that the man ſpake this through ſome divine motion, led him unto the General of the Romans, where being beaten till his bones appeared, he never intreated nor wept, but as well as he could, framing a weeping voice he cryed, Wo, wo unto Jeruſalem. Albinus (being then Judge) aſked him what he was, or of whence, or wherefore he ſaid ſo; but he made him no anſwer. Yet he ceaſed not to bewail the miſery of Jeruſalem, until Albinus thinking him to be out of his Wits, ſuffered him to depart. This man even until the time of War never went to any Citizen, nor B was ſeen ſpeak to any one: but ſtill as it were ſtudying of ſome ſpeech, he cryed, Wo, wo unto Jeruſalem. Neither did he ever curſe any one, though every day one or other did beat him, nor thank any one that offered him meat. All that he ſpake unto any man was this heavy Prophecy. He went crying as is aforeſaid, chiefly upon holy days, ſo doing continually for the ſpace of ſeven years and five months, his voice never waxed hoarſe nor weary, till in the time of the ſiege, beholding what he foretold them, he ceaſed, and then once again upon the Walls going about the City, with a loud voice he cryed, Wo, wo to the City, Temple and people: and laſtly he ſaid, Wo alſo to my ſelf. Which words were no ſooner uttered, but a ſtone ſhot out of an Engine, ſmote him, and ſo he yielded up the Ghoſt, lamenting them all.

If any one do diligently conſider all theſe, he ſhall find that God hath a care of mankind, C and doth every way foreſhew betime, what is moſt expedient for them, and they through their own madneſs, to have voluntarily periſhed in their wickedneſs. For the Jews, when the Caſtle Antonia was taken, made the Temple four-ſquare: notwithſtanding that it was written in the holy Scripture, that the City and Temple ſhould be taken, when the Temple was made four-ſquare. But that which chiefly incited them to War, was the doubtful Prophecy likewiſe found in the holy Scriptures: That at the ſame time one in their dominions ſhould be Monarch of the whole World; and many wiſemen were deceived in this interpretation, making account that he ſhould be one of their own nation, yet indeed thereby was foretold Veſpaſians Empire. But men cannot prevent deſtiny, though they foreſee it. Thus the Jews interpreted ſome of the ſigns as they pleaſed, and at others they laughed, till by the D ruine of their Country, and their own woful overthrow, their iniquity appeared.

CHAP. XIII.

How Titus was made Emperour: and of the Death of the Prieſts.

AFter the ſeditious were fled into the City, all the Temple and places thereabout being ſet on fire, the Romans placing their Enſigns in the Temple over againſt the Eaſt-gate, and there celebrating ſacrifice, with great cryes declared Titus Emperour, and the Romans got many preyes and booties, that they ſold gold in Syria for E half the value. And among thoſe Prieſts that kept on the Wall, a Child being thirſty, deſired peace of the Roman Watchmen, ſaying, that he was thirſty. So they, pitying both his years and his need, gave him their hands that he ſhould have no harm, and then he came down and drunk, and filled a bottle which he brought with him: and when he had done, he ran up again to his fellows, and none of the watchmen were able to overtake him, and they upbraided him with falſhood. But he anſwered, that he had done nothing, but that which he and they intended: for they did not give him their hands to ſecure him to remain with them, but only to come down and take water, which he had done. The Roman watchmen greatly admired the ſubtilty of him that was but a Child. The fifth day, the Prieſts being almoſt famiſhed came down, and the watchmen carried them to Titus, whom F they beſought to grant them their lives. But he anſwered them, that the time of pardon was paſt, ſeeing that was deſtroyed, for the which he might have pardoned them, and that it was meet that the Prieſts ſhould periſh with the Temple: and ſo he commanded them to be put to death. Then the Tyrants with their followers being on every ſide beſet with Wars, and having no way to flee, they being thus beleagred round, requeſted to parley with Titus; who for his natural meekneſs, his friends alſo perſwading him thereto, thought at leaſt to ſave the City (judging indeed that now the ſeditious had already their minds) and ſo he ſtood in the Weſt part of the Inner Temple: for there was a Gate built above a Gallery, and a Bridge that joyned the Temple and City together, which was then between Titus and the Tyrants. Many Souldiers on both parts flocked about their Rulers; the Jews about Si- mon and John, hoping for pardon: the Romans about Titus, desirous what he would say unto them: and Titus by an Edict commanding the Souldiers to be quiet, and to shoot no Arrows, spake unto them first by an Interpreter, thereby shewing that he had the upper hand, and said, 'O ye men of Jerusalem, are ye not now glutted with the calamities of your 'Country? Neither calling to mind our power, nor your own infirmity, but with a rash fury 'have destroyed your people, City, and Temple: your selves also having justly deserved to 'perish; who since Pompey first conquered you, have never ceased to be seditious, and at last, 'have openly born Arms against the Romans. Did you trust unto your multitude? You have 'seen that a small parcel of the Romans Army hath sufficiently resisted you. Or did you ex- 'pect forreign aid? What Nation is not under our dominion? and who would rather make 'choice of the Jews then of the Romans? Did you trust in your strength of body? why you 'know the Germans serve us. Or in the strength of your Walls? what Wall, or what greater 'hindrance then the Ocean, wherewith the Britains invironed, have yielded unto the Ro- 'man forces? Or to your courage, and politick counsel of your Captains? You have al- 'ready heard that the Carthaginians have been by us surprized. It was therefore the Romans 'humanity that incited you against themselves, who first of all permitted you to possess your 'Country, and gave you Kings of your own Nation: and after all this, we kept your Laws in- 'violate, and suffered you to live as your selves desired, not only in your own Country, but 'also amongst other Nations; and which is the greatest of all our benefits bestowed upon you, 'we permitted you to gather tribute and gifts to the maintenance of your Temple and sacri- 'fices to God; of all which, we neither forbade any to be brought unto you, neither hindred 'any that would offer unto your Temple, but suffered you our Enemies to be made richer 'then our selves, so that you have used our own money against us. Wherefore, having recei- 'ved so many benefits at our hands, you have now disgorged your selves upon us, and like 'spiteful Serpents spet your poyson upon them that made much of you. Let us omit that 'by Nero his negligence you became forgetful of your duty, and like some member in the 'body broken or shrunk, you being still tumultuous, at last were taken in a greater offence, 'and were encouraged with immoderate desires to hope for unlawful liberty. My Father 'came into your Country, not to punish you for your misdemeanour towards Cestius, but by 'good counsel and warning to reprehend and quiet you. And whereas if he had come to de- 'stroy your Nation, he ought first to have cut down the very root, and to have come unto this 'City and destroyed it, with the inhabitants: he rather chose first to wast Galilea, and the 'places adjoyning, that in the mean time you might repent you, and consider of your Estate. 'But this his mercy towards you was held for cowardliness and infirmity in him, and by our 'long suffering, you were emboldned against us: and when Nero was dead, you did as treache- 'rous subjects are wont to do, taking occasion by our civil dissention, to revolt from us: and 'whilst my Father and I were gone into Ægypt, you prepared your selves to War against us: 'neither were you ashamed to trouble them that were designed Princes, whom notwithstand- 'ing you had found most gentle Captains unto you. At last, when the Empire fell unto us, 'and all things being now quieted, all Nations with gifts and presents came to congratulate 'us: behold again, the Jews shewed themselves our Enemies, and you sent an Embassador be- 'yond Euphrates, only to nourish your Rebellion, walling and fortifying your Towns anew: 'and contending like seditious and Tyrants one with another, set abroach Civil Wars: all 'which, none but impious people would have committed. Wherefore being commanded by 'my father, who was now urged thereunto, I came against this City with a heavy charge, yet 'did I rejoyce when I heard that the people desired peace. Before I warred against you, I ex- 'horted you to peace: after War was begun, I desisted a while from using severity: I spared 'all them that of their own accord fled unto me, and kept my promise unto them, pitying 'those that were Captives. I with strokes restrained them that hasted the War against you a- 'gainst my will, and even forced so to do, I set the Romans against your Walls, and always 'restrained my Souldiers so much desirous of your blood. As often as I overcame you, so of- 'ten did I exhort you to peace, as though I had been vanquished. Again, when I approached 'unto the Temple, I (willingly omitting the Law of Arms) requested you to spare both it 'and the holy things, offering you leave to depart, and promising you safety, or licensing you 'to fight another time in another place, if so you thought good. All these my offers you refu- 'sed, and with your own hands fired your Temple. And now you wicked wretches urge me 'to a parlee. What thing can you now preserve so excellent, as that which is already perished? 'What pardon can you expect, seeing your Temple is destroyed? nay even now you stand 'armed, not so much as counterfeiting submission in the last cast. O wretches, with what hope

Titus Oration to the Jews by an Interpreter.

The Romans humanity incited the Jews against them.

A hope? Is not your people dead, is not your Temple deſtroyed, and your City now in my hands, yea, your lives alſo? But do you think death the renown of fortitude? I will not ſtrive with your obſtinacy: yet if you will caſt down your weapons, and yield your bodies, I will ſpare your lives: And like as in a private houſe I will ſhew my ſelf unto you a gentle Maſter; and after I have puniſhed that which otherwiſe is incurable, I will reſerve the reſt for my ſelf.

The year of the world, 4034. after Chriſts nativity, 72.

Titus grants the Jews life on condition they ſhould lay aſide their weapons and ſubmit themſelves.

To this they anſwered, that they could not receive pardon at his hands, having vowed the contrary: wherefore they requeſted licence to depart with their wives and children by the Camp which he had invironed with a wall, and ſo to go into the wilderneſs and leave the City to the Romans. Titus was hereat greatly enraged, that they being in a manner cap-
B tives ſhould impoſe upon him conditions, as though they were Victors; and commanded a Crier to tell them, that henceforth they ſhould not flee unto him, nor hope that he would pardon them: for he would ſpare nothing, willing them with all their forces to fight and ſave themſelves as they could, for he would now in all things uſe the law of Arms: and ſo he permitted the Souldiers to ſack the City and ſet it on fire. The ſame day they did nothing: but the next day following they fired the Councel-houſe, the Palace Acra, and Ophla, and the fire came unto Queen Helens palace, which was ſituate in the midſt of Acra: alſo the houſes and ſtreets of the City full of dead bodies were ſet on fire. The ſame day, the Sons and Brethren of King Izates, and with them many Nobles of the people, aſſembled together, beſought Cæſar to pardon them: and he though incenſed againſt them all, yet not
C changing his manner, received them to mercy, and put them all in priſon, and afterward carried them bound to Rome for Hoſtages, that were the Kings Sons and Kinſmen.

The ſouldiers ſet the City on fire.

Cæſar conſtant in his reſolution.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the prey of the ſeditious, and the burning of the inner part of the City.

D THe ſeditious went unto the Kings Palace, where many had left their wealth, becauſe it was a ſtrong place: and driving the Romans from thence, they ſlew all the people there aſſembled, amounting to the number of 8000 and 400, and carried away all the Money, and they took there two Roman Souldiers alive, one a Horſeman, and the other a Footman; and they ſlew the Footman and drew him all along the City, as it were in the body of that one, revenging themſelves upon all the Romans. But the Horſeman affirmed that he had ſomething to ſay unto them, which would greatly profit them, and ſave their lives: who was carried to Simon; and not having there any thing to ſay, Simon delivered him to one of his Captains called Ardala to be ſlain, and he brought him where the Romans might behold him with his hands bound behind him, and a veil before his eyes, meaning there to behead him: but he, whilſt the Jew drew out his ſword, fled to the Ro-
E mans. And Titus would not put him to death, becauſe he had eſcaped from the Enemies: yet deeming him unworthy to be a Roman Souldier, who ſuffered himſelf to be taken alive; he took from him his arms, and diſcharged him from bearing them any more, which to a wiſe man was worſe than death. The next day, the Romans putting the ſeditious to flight that were in the lower City, they fired all unto Siloa, rejoycing that the Town was deſtroyed: yet they got no booties, becauſe the ſeditious had already robbed and ſpoiled all, and carried it into the higher City. For they nothing repented them of their wickedneſs, but were as arrogant as though they had been in proſperity: ſo that they with joy beheld the City on fire, affirming that they deſired death; for that the people being ſlain, the Temple deſtroyed, and the City on fire, they ſhould leave nothing to their Ene-
F mies. Yet Joſeph in that extremity laboured to ſave the reliques of the City, much inveighing againſt their cruelty, and earneſtly exhorting them to ſave themſelves: yet he nothing profited in all this, but was derided for his labour: for neither would they yield to the Romans for their Oaths ſake, neither were they able to fight with the Romans, being now as it were beſieged round by them; yet their accuſtomed murthers did encourage them to ſtand out.

The puniſhment of a Roman ſouldier taken by the Jews.

The Jews are arrogant in the midſt of their calamity

The Jews refuſe to ſubmit themſelves to the Romans, yet are they unable to wage war with them.

Thus diſperſed all over the City, they lurked in the ruines, lying in wait for thoſe that ſought to flee unto the Romans, and many of them were taken, and all of them were ſlain; for Famine had ſo weakned them, that they could not flee, and they caſt their dead bodies to dogs. And any death were eaſie in reſpect of Famine. So that many fled unto the Romans, mans, having no promiſe, no nor hope to be pardoned by them, and upon purpoſe fell into the hands of the ſeditious, who never ceaſed from murther: and now there was no place in the whole City void, but was fill'd with dead bodies, who either periſhed by famine or ſedition. But the Tyrants and factious Thieves put their laſt refuge in the vaults, where they hoped whatſoever hapned to ſave themſelves, hoping that there they could not be found, and ſo after the City was deſtroyed, to eſcape, which was only their vain fantaſie. For they could neither be hid from God, nor the Romans: yet at that time they truſted in thoſe Caves, from whence they fired the City more than the Romans, and cruelly murthered them, that having eſcaped the flames, came and fled into ſecret places, and ſpoiled them: alſo if they in any place found any meat, though all bloudy, yet they took it, and did eat it, and now one of them began to fight with another about the ſpoil they got. And I verily perſwade my ſelf, that had they not been prevented by the deſtruction of the City, their cruelty would have been ſuch, that they would have eaten the bodies of dead men.

The tyrants uttermoſt hope was in their vaults.

Rapine and ſlaughter in the vaults.

How the higher part of the City was aſſaulted: and how ſome of the Jews fled unto Titus.

Cæſar perceiving that the higher part of the City would not be won without Mounts, being ſituate in a ſoil, round about the which were high and deep places, on the twentieth day of Auguſt, he ſet all his ſouldiers on work, and the carrying of wood for that purpoſe was very painful: all trees within 100 furlongs off the City were already cut down, and uſed in the former work, as is before ſaid. So the four Legions raiſed a mount on the Weſt ſide of the City, and all the reſt made a mount againſt the Porch, Bridge, and Tower, which Simon during his wars with John had built. About this time, the Captains of the Idumæans aſſembling together, deliberated to yield themſelves, and ſent five of their company to Titus, beſeeching him to confirm a peace unto them: and he hoping that the Tyrant would yield after them, who were the greateſt part of his army, with much ado granted them life, and ſo ſent them to their fellows: but Simon had notice of their departure, and preſently ſlew thoſe five that were ſent unto Titus, and taking the Captains (the nobleſt of whom was James the ſon of Soſa) he put them in Priſon, and alſo kept and guarded the Idumæans, who now having no Governours knew not what to do, yet the Guard could not hinder them from fleeing, for although many of them were killed; yet divers fled and eſcaped and were all received by the Romans; Titus courteſie being ſuch, as that he remembred not his former Edict to the contrary, and now the Souldiers hoping for gain, and having already gotten ſufficient, abſtained from murthers: for leaving only the common people, they ſold the reſt with their wives and children for a ſmall price, many being expoſed to ſale, and few coming to buy them: ſo that he having made an Edict that none ſhould flee unto him alone, intending thereby to bring their families with them, yet he now received them alſo, appointing ſome to enquire who had deſerved puniſhment, and to inflict it on them. And an infinite number was ſold, and more than 40000 of the people were ſaved, whom the Emperour diſmiſſed, and permitted to go whither they pleaſed. The ſame time a certain Prieſt, the ſon of Thebuthus, named Jeſus, was promiſed pardon on condition he ſhould deliver certain holy things given to the Temple: and ſo he came and brought out of a wall two Candleſticks, like to them that were in the Temple, Tables, Goblets, Cups, all made of ſolid and maſſie Gold: alſo the Veil and the Ornaments of the Prieſt, and the precious ſtones about them, and many Veſſels made for Sacrifice. Moreover, the Keeper of the holy Treaſure called Phineas, brought forth the Garments, and all things that did belong to the Prieſts, and much Purple and Scarlet, which were laid up in ſtore, to make Tapeſtry or Hangings, among which alſo was ſome Cinnamon, Caſſia, and many other odoriferous things, whereof were compounded ſweet odours to be offered to God. He alſo delivered him much wealth of other mens, and much ſacred Treaſure: for the which, notwithſtanding he was taken by force, yet he was pardoned, as they were that fled unto Cæſar.

CHAP. XVI.

How the reſt of the City was taken.

The year of the world, 4024. after Chriſts nativity, 72.

THe ſeventh day of September, the Mounts being finiſhed, which was the Eighteenth day after they were begun, ſome of the Romans placed their Rams and Engines to batter them; and ſome of the ſeditious, who now deſpaired to keep the City, left the walls, and fled into Acra, others hid themſelves in certain Vaults, and many hindred the Romans, and reſiſted them for placing their Rams againſt the walls, who were overcome by them, being both more in number than they were, and alſo ſtronger and more valiant. The Jews being now all diſcouraged and ſorrowful, ſo ſoon as any part of the Wall was broken down, or ſhaken with the force of the Rams ſtraightways fled, and now the Tyants were ſurprized with a greater fear than needed. For even before ſuch time as the Enemies had entered the Wall, they ſtood in doubt whether they might flee or no: and they who a little before were proud and arrogant Malefactors, did now tremble and quake, ſo that it was pitiful to ſee ſuch a change in them, though they were wicked perſons. And they endeavoured to aſſail the Wall that Titus had built to compaſs the whole City withall: but ſeeing themſelves forſaken of all thoſe that were wont to be truſty unto them, every one fled whither neceſſity did drive him. Preſently news was brought them that all the Weſt-wall of the City was beaten down, others affirmed that the Romans had entered, and that they had ſeen the Enemies in the Towers, fear dazeling their Eyes: and proſtrate on the ground, they bewailed their misfortune; and as though they had been lame, they ſtood ſtill and ſought not to flee. From whence one may chiefly perceive Gods juſtice toward the impious, and the Romans fortune; for the Tyrants deprived themſelves of their ſtrong holds, and voluntarily departed out of their Towers, wherein they could never have been taken but by Famine: and the Romans having ſo much laboured at the lower Walls, did now by fortune take theſe, which their Engines could never have ſhaken, for there were three inexpugnable Towers that could not be battered with the Engines, whereof before we have made mention. So the Tyrants having forſaken theſe, or rather being by Gods will driven from thence, preſently they fled unto the Valley Siloa: after the fear was paſt, they again took heart, and went unto the Wall that was in that place: yet not uſing ſuch courage and violence as their need required, they were beaten by the Watchmen that guarded it; their ſtrength now failing and wearied with labour, fear, famine, and calamity. And ſome were driven one way, and ſome another, and were forced to hide themſelves in Vaults and Sinks. The Romans having obtained the Wall, placed their Colours in the Towers, and clapping their hands and ſinging for joy, they cryed, Victory, finding the end of the War nothing ſo terrible as the beginning. Yet did they not believe that was the end, becauſe they got the Wall without any bloodſhed, but admired, ſeeing no man did offer to reſiſt them. And now iſſuing into every ſtreet, they ſlew whomſoever they found without any reſpect, and fired Houſes, and all the people that had fled into them, and deſtroyed many whereas they entred for to get a prey, and they found whole Families dead, and Houſes full of dead bodies, conſumed by Famine. Thus terrified with that heavy ſight, they departed out not taking any thing away, yet for all that they pitied not them that were left alive, but ſlew whomſoever they met, whereby they filled the narrow ſtreets ſo full of dead bodies by them ſlain, that none could paſs that way for them: all the whole City flowed with blood, ſo that many things ſet on fire, were quenched with the blood of them that were ſlain. At Evening they ceaſed from killing, but all the night long the fire encreaſed: and ſo in the Morning, which was the Eighth day of September, all was now on fire; the City in the time of the Siege having endured more miſery and calamity, than ever it received joy and happineſs from the time of the firſt foundation, notwithſtanding that they were ſo great, that all Cities might juſtly envy it, and it no wiſe deſerved ſo to be oppreſſed with ſuch miſery, ſave only for that it foſtered and bred ſuch impious perſons as wrought the overthrow thereof.

Titus entring into the City, amongſt the reſt admired the ſtrong holds thereof, and the rocky Towers which the Tyrants like mad-men deprived themſelves of; and ſeeing the height, firmneſs, bigneſs, and the joining of the ſtones together, and their breadth and height, he ſaid: Surely God hath aſſiſted us in the fight, and he it was that did withdraw the Jews from theſe Fortreſſes. For what could mens hands and engines prevail againſt them? And having ſpoke much to this effect, coming with his friends, he ſet them at liberty whom whom the Tyrants had left bound in the Caſtles: and when he deſtroyed the reſt of the City and walls, he left thoſe Towers ſtanding as a monument of his good fortune and victory, by the which he had gained them, though inexpugnable. The Souldiers now being weary with killing the miſerable Jews, and yet a great multitude remaining alive, Cæſar commanded that only the armed Jews and they that reſiſted ſhould be ſlain, and the reſt left alive. But the Souldiers alſo killed old folks and weak perſons, and taking all able men and luſty, they carried them into the Temple, and ſhut them there in the place appointed for the women. Cæſar left one Fronto a Libertine and his friend to keep them, giving him alſo charge to make inquiry who had deſerved puniſhment; who ſlew all the thieves and ſeditious, one of them bewraying another, and reſerved certain choſen young men of large ſtature and beautiful withall for the Triumph: and all the reſt that were above ſeventeen years old, he ſent bound into Egypt, to be imployed in certain works there, as digging, delving, and manuring the fields, and to be uſed in other publick buſineſſes. Titus alſo ſent many of them unto divers Provinces, to be ſlain in the Theatres with beaſts or ſwords; and they that were under ſeventeen years of age were ſold. And during the time that Fronto kept them, 10000 died for hunger; partly, for that their keepers hating them, would not give them any meat; partly, for that ſome refuſed meat when it was offered them. For there was now ſcarcity of corn, by reaſon of the great multitude of the people.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the number of the Captives, and them that were ſlain.

The number of the captives and ſuch as died during the ſiege of the City.

THe number of all the Captives that were taken during the whole time of War, was 97000, and the number of all that died and were ſlain during the Siege, was 110000, the moſt of them being Jews by Nation, but not inhabitants of that place. For being aſſembled together from all parts to the feaſt of unleavened bread, preſently and on a ſudden they were invironed with War, and firſt of all a Plague fell among them by reaſon of the ſtraitneſs of the place, and immediately after, Famine, worſe than it. And that the City was capable of ſo many men it is evident, for that Ceſtius before numbred them; who deſirous to ſignifie the flouriſhing eſtate and ſtrength of Jeruſalem unto Nero, who contemned our Nation, requeſted the High-Prieſts, that if poſſibly they could, they ſhould number all the people in their City: and that upon the Feaſt of Eaſter, when they killed Offerings from the ninth Hour of the day until the eleventh (and to eat a Lamb not fewer than ten perſons were aſſembled, for it is not lawful to feaſt alone, yea, many times twenty are in a company) they numbred 256000 and 500 Oblations or Lambs to be killed; ſo that if we reckon to every Lamb ten men, the number amounts to 2700000 men, all purified whole and ſound: for it was not lawful for any that were Lepers, or had a flux of ſeed, nor Women that had the monthly tearms, to eat of that Sacrifice, nor for any ſtranger, except he came thither for Religion ſake. And this multitude was aſſembled together from other places, and was there by the providence of God ſhut up as it were in a Priſon. And the City being filled with men of War was beſieged, that the number of them that were ſlain, paſſed all that ever periſhed, either by any Plague ſent from God, or by the means of men; who were partly openly ſlain, partly taken by the Romans: who ſearching the Vaults, and opening the Sepulchres, ſpared none they met withall. There alſo were found more than 2000, whereof ſome ſlew themſelves with their own hands, otherſome kill'd by others, the reſt periſhed by Famine. The ſtink of dead bodies was ſo great, that many minding to go and ſearch the foreſaid places, and being entred into them, were forced to retire: yet others for lucre ſake treading on the dead carkaſſes, ſearched the dead bodies, if they could find any thing; for much riches were hid in the Vaults, and covetouſneſs omitted no way to gain. Moreover, many were taken out from thence, whom the Tyrants had bound, who even in their extremity ceaſed not to tyrannize: yet God plagued them both according to their deſerts: for John being now almoſt famiſhed with his brethren in a vault, beſought the Romans to ſave his life. And Simon, having long ſtriven with neceſſity, as we ſhall hereafter make mention of, at laſt yielded himſelf, who was kept for the Triumph; and John was condemned to perpetual priſon. Then they deſtroyed the walls, and fired the outward parts of the City.

The Romans ſearching the graves and vaults, find much treaſure

CHAP. XVIII.

A brief Hiſtory of the City of Jeruſalem.

The year of the World, 4034. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 72.

THus was Jeruſalem taken the ſecond year of Veſpaſians Reign, on the eighth day of September, and having been already five times before ſurprized, it was finally again deſtroyed. Firſt Aſochens King of Egypt, and after him Antiochus, then Pompey, and after them Herod with Soſius took the City, and yet deſtroyed it not. But before them the King of Babylon deſtroyed it, when he had enjoyed the ſame, a thouſand three hundred and threeſcore years, eight months and ſix dayes after it was firſt built: but he that firſt built it, was one of the Princes of the Cananeans, in his own language called the juſt King. For he indeed was ſo, and therefore was the firſt Prieſt that ſacrificed unto God, and dedicated a Temple, called the City Solyma: but David the King of the Jews having driven out the Cananeans, gave it unto his people to be inhabited, and after four hundred threeſcore and four years and three months, it was deſtroyed by the Babylonians, and from King David who was the firſt Jew that reigned there, until the time that Titus deſtroyed it, were a thouſand one hundred ſeventy and nine years, and from the time that it was firſt erected until it was by him deſtroyed, were two thouſand one hundred and ſeventy ſeven years: yet neither the antiquity, nor riches, nor the fame thereof now ſpread all over the World, nor the glory of Religion did any thing profit or hinder it, from being deſtroyed. Such was the end of the beſieging of Jeruſalem. When there was none left to kill, nor any thing remaining for the Souldiers to get, and that now there was nothing, againſt which the Souldiers could ſhew their outrage (for they would have ſpared nothing that they could have ſpoiled) Cæſar commanded them to deſtroy the City and Temple, only yet leaving ſtanding certain Towers, that were more beautiful and ſtronger then the reſt, to wit, Phaſælus, Hippicos, and Mariamme, and the Wall that was on the Weſt ſide; meaning there to keep a Garriſon, and that they ſhould be Monuments of the Romans vertue, who had ſurpriſed a City ſo well fortified as it appeared by them. All the reſt of the City they ſo plained, that they who had not ſeen it before, would not believe that it had ever been inhabited. This was the end of their madneſs, who were always given unto ſedition in Jeruſalem, a moſt worthy City and famous amongſt all Nations.

Jeruſalem being five times ſpoiled, was at that time once more ſackt.

The Romans wholly ruinate both the City and the Temple.

CHAP. XIX.

How the Souldiers were rewarded.

Cæſar determined to leave the tenth Legion for a Garriſon in Jeruſalem, with ſome Troops of Horſemen, and other Companies of Footmen: and all Wars being now ended, he purpoſed to thank the whole Army for their valiant acts, and reward the moſt couragious for their deſerts. And placing a great tribunal in the midſt before the Camp, ſtanding in it with the chief Peers about him, from whence the whole Army might hear him, he gave them hearty thanks for that of their good will towards him, they had patiently abode with him during thoſe Wars, praiſing them for their loyalty during all the foreſaid time, and that in many ſkirmiſhes they had ſhewed themſelves valiant, and by their valour had enlarged the dominions of their Country: likewiſe they had now given all Nations to underſtand, that neither the multitude of enemies, nor ſtrong holds, nor greatneſs of Cities, nor raſhneſs, nor barbarous cruelty of their adverſaries could ever reſiſt the forces of the Romans, nor eſcape their hands; notwithſtanding that in many things fortune favoured them: adding that it was a credit for them to have ended thoſe Wars that had continued a long time; which was all that they hoped for at their coming; and which was moſt glory of all unto them, that thoſe Captains whom they had elected to be the Roman Emperours, were all liked and imbraced of all men, all ſtanding to their appointment, and acknowledging themſelves beholding to them that elected them. Moreover, that he admired them and loved them all, for that every one ſhewed himſelf valiant and couragious: affirming that he would now recompenſe thoſe with honours, and due deſert, who had behaved themſelves moſt valiantly, and moſt hazarded themſelves, and effected worthy deeds, and whoſoever was forwarder then the reſt, ſhould have reward according to his deſert; and that he would be more diligent in honouring them that had been been his Companions in that War, then in punishing their offences; then presently he willed them to whom it appertained, to nominate them who had valiantly behaved themselves in those Wars, and had performed any worthy exploit: which being done, he called every one by his name, and praised them, as greatly rejoycing at the valour of his Country-men, crowning them with Crowns of gold, and put Chains of gold about their necks, and gave them large spears of gold, and ensigns made of silver; he also preferred every one of them, and gave them of the spoil, precious garments, with gold and silver very plenteously: and thus having rewarded every one according to his merit, and praising God with all his Army, he descended with great applause out of the tribunal, and went and offered sacrifices for the Victory, and having gathered a great multitude of Oxen about the Altar to sacrifice them, he offered them all, and therewith feasted his Army, and himself three days with all his Nobility, dismissing all the Souldiers to depart whither they would, or thought good, appointed the tenth Legion to keep Jerusalem, and did not send it back unto Euphrates, where before it was. He banished also the twelfth Legion out of all Syria, remembring that under Cestius his government they fled from the Jews, being before at Raphanæas, which he sent unto Malto that is situate by Euphrates, in the confines of Armenia and Cappadocia, and the other two he kept with himself, as sufficient to guard him into Ægypt, which were the fifth and fifteenth Legions. And coming to Cæsarea by the Sea-coast, he there laid up all his spoils, and caused the Captives to be kept, because that the Winter season permitted him not to sail into Italy.

CHAP. XX.

Of Vespasians Voyage by Sea, and how Simon was taken: and of the spectacles, and shews made upon his Birth-day.

Vespasians sailing and journey.

WHilst Titus was busied in the siege of Jerusalem, Vespasian in a Merchants Ship sailed to Rhodes: and from thence departing in a Gally, having visited all Cities by the which he passed, being joyfully received of them all, he went from Ionia into Greece, from thence unto Corcyria, and then unto Japygia, and afterwards by Land. Thus Titus being returned from Cæsarea on the Sea-Coast, he came unto Cæsarea Philippi, and there he made a long abode, proclaiming all sorts of pastime: wherein many Captives perished, some being cast unto wild beasts, others forced in great Companies to fight one against another; being in this place, he understood that Simon the Son of Giora was taken. This Simon at such time as Jerusalem was besieged, was in the higher part of the City, when the Roman Army had entered the Walls, and began to wast it: and with his most trusty fellows, and certain Masons, having provided them all necessary tools, and victuals that might have sufficed them all for many days, he accompanied with them, and went into a secret Cave, unto the end thereof, and there he caused them to dig further, hoping so to get out at some place where he might safely escape away. Yet this his hope had not so good success as he expected: for they had but digged a little way, ere Victuals failed them: notwithstanding, that they had made very great spare thereof. Then Simon thinking to fear the Romans, cloathed himself in white, and a purple Cloak buttoned about him, and so came out of the earth in that place where the Temple had been builded formerly. And they that did first see him, were astonished awhile, and stirred not, but let him alone: yet at last they came unto him, and demanded what he was, but Simon would not tell them, willing them to call their Captain unto him, and presently some of the Souldiers ran to call him, and so he came: at that time Terentius Rufus was Captain of the Souldiers. Terentius having learned the truth of all, kept him bound, and related unto Cæsar the manner of his taking, and thus Simon was by the power of God delivered into his enemies hands, who hated him above measure, and so was justly hereby punished, for having so cruelly tyrannized over his own Country-men, not taken by their force, but yielding himself unto them, having cruelly butchered many, under pretence of false criminations: to wit, for having revolted unto the Romans.

But impiety cannot escape Gods vengeance, neither is the Divine justice of so weak force, but that it can at one time or other punish them that violate it, and it many times inflicteth a grievous punishment upon men, when they think they have escaped all, for they were not presently punished; which also Simon felt, after he fell into the Romans hands: his coming out of the earth, made a great many more of the seditious at that time to be taken in the Caves. When Cæsar was returned into Cæsarea by the Sea-Coast, Simon was presented bound unto unto him, who commanded him to be reserved for his triumph, which he purposed to make at Rome. After making some abode in that place, he celebrated his brothers birth day with great solemnity: and in that solemnity bringing forth divers Jews, whose punishment he had of purpose deferred till that time, the number of all that perished there with fighting against beasts and amongst themselves and by fire, amounted to more then two thousand five hundred men. Yet the Romans thought all these punishments too light and easie for them. After this, Cæsar came to Berytus (which is a City in Phœnicia, and a Colony of the Romans) and here also he made some long abode, and celebrated the birth of his father, with far greater solemnity then the former, as well in making divers shews unto the people, as in great expences and sumptuousnes, and causing many Captives to perish as before.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the calamity of the Jews at Antiochia.

AT the same time the rest of the Jews were in great misery, and the City of Antiochia was incited against them, both for certain criminal causes now laid unto their charge, as also for certain offences before committed, which necessarily I must recount, before I speak any thing of the rest. The Nation of the Jews is mixed almost amongst all Nations of the World, and especially amongst the Syrians, by reason of their vicinity, and many of them were at Antiochia, because it was a great City, and the Kings that succeeded Antiochus, permitted them freely to inhabit there, and to enjoy all liberties of the City. For Antiochus sirnamed Epiphanes, destroyed Jerusalem and sacked the Temple: but the Kings Successors restored all the brass that was taken from the Temple unto the Jews, offering it unto their Synagogue in Antiochia, and permitted them to have the same liberties in the City, that the Greeks enjoyed, and the other Kings also of latter times used them after the like sort: so that their number greatly encreased, and they enlarged their Temple and enriched it with sundry offerings, oftentimes winning many Pagans to be of their religion, and so as it were made them also a part of their Nation. Now about the time that the Wars began, and Vespasian was newly arrived, the Jews began to be generally hated of all men: then one of them named Antiochus, reverend for parentage, whose father was chief of all the Jews in Antiochia, at such time as the people of Antiochia were assembled in the Theater, this man came in amongst them, and accused his own father, and the rest of the Jews to have conspired together to burn the City in the night time, and delivered some Jews unto them that were his guests, as conspirators with the rest. The people hearing this, could not repress their rage, but presently caused them that were offered unto them, to be burnt in the Theater, and made great speed to set upon all the Jews, hoping that by speedy dispatch they might preserve their Country, which otherwise was like to perish. And then Antiochus to enrage them the more, did now offer to sacrifice according to the custom of the Pagans, thereby as it were assuring the Antiochians, that he hated the Jews and their customs, willing them also to compel all the rest of the Jews to do the like, for whosoever refused so to do were Traitors. The Antiochians followed his counsel: but few Jews would obey them, yet they that denied to sacrifice were slain. Then Antiochus receiving a charge of Souldiers from the Captain of the Romans, became most cruel against his Country-men, and would not permit them to keep holy the seventh day; but in it to do all labour and business, that they were accustomed to do upon any other day, and so urged them hereto, that within short time the seventh day was not only violated among them of Antiochia, but also in other places and Cities round about. The Jews at Antiochia having then endured the foresaid misery, now fell into as great calamity as that was, whereof I intending to speak, was forced to relate the former. For it happened that the foursquare market was fired, and the publick places, where all Writings and Registers were kept, as also the Kings Houses: and the fire so encreased, that with much ado it was hindred from firing the whole City. Of this fact Antiochus accused the Jews, thereby sufficiently inciting the Antiochians against them, although that they had not before born them any malice, and making them so easily believe his calumniations, who now gave full credit unto his accusations, by reason of that which was past: so that now they almost perswaded themselves, that they did see the Jews put fire unto them, and so in a great rage all of them set upon them that were accused. Wherefore Collega the younger had much ado to pacifie the people, notwithstanding that he requested them to permit him to inform

Then Collega making diligent enquiry of the matter, found out the truth, and not one of the Jews accused by Antiochus was guilty: for certain impious people had done all this mischief, being indebted; thinking that if they had burnt the market-place, and the publick writings, that then their debts could not be required at their hands. Yet the Jews lived in great fear, and expected the event of those forged accusations.

The year of the World 4035. after the Nativity of Christ, 73.

After that Titus had received Letters from his father, that he was arrived in Italy, and all Cities wherein he as yet came, welcomed him very joyfully, and that especially Rome had entertained him with great pomp and triumph, he was now eased of the care he had before, and very joyful for his fathers welfare, and good fortune. For all the people of Italy did reverence Vespasian, though absent, as though he had been present with them, desiring to see his expected arrival, whose coming they so heartily wished for. For the Senate, remembring what calamities had befaln the City in the change of Princes, desired to receive their Emperour dignified with the honour of old age, and martial renown, whose presence only would be to his subjects profit and safety. And the vulgar sort also troubled before with civil Wars, long expected his arrival, assuring themselves thereby to have an end of their calamity, and to recover again their wonted affluence. Especially he was expected by the Souldiers, who knowing his skill in martial affairs, by that which himself had already done, and finding their other Captains under whom they warred, ignorant and unskilful, they wished for his coming, thereby to be delivered from the disgrace wherein they lived, desiring to receive him by whom they might both be honoured, and preserved from danger. The Nobility seeing him so beloved of all men, could no longer wait his coming, but went and met him, he being far from the City, and accompanied him; and no man stayed his coming, but in whole multitudes they went to meet him, they were so desirous to see him: so that more went to meet him then stayed at home.

When news was brought that he approached near unto the City, and how friendly and courteously he had entertained all men, the people with their Wives and Children stayed in the way he came, to salute and see him: and whersoever he came, with joyful applauses and acclamations they cried, calling him their Conserver and Benefactor, and he who only was worthy to be the Roman Emperour, and the whole City was as it had been a Temple, all hung with Garlands, and full of sweet odours and perfumes: and the multitude of the people being such that he could scarcely get into the Palace, he offered sacrifices unto his houshold gods for his safe return, and all the people were feasted by their Tribes, Kindred, and Neighbours, sacrificing unto God, and requesting that Vespasian might long continue their Emperour, and his Son after him, and that the Empire might never depart from his linage. The City of Rome having thus received Vespasian, it presently was blessed with all happiness and felicity.

Before such time as Vespasian was gone to Alexandria, or that Titus besieged the City of Jerusalem, a great part of Germany was revolted, with whom the Frenchmen that bordered upon them, renouncing their allegiance, they were in great hope to free themselves from the yoke and Government of the Romans. The first motives that caused the Germans to revolt, and to war against the Romans, was their temerity and rash natures prone to fight, having but very little hope of success; then the hatred of their nobles, who knew that none could by force bring them into subjection but only the Romans, and chiefly thereunto encouraged by the opportunity they had. For they seeing the Empire greatly afflicted with civil wars, by reason reaſon of the often changing of Emperours, and knowing that all the World under their dominion was now in ſuſpence, they thought that by reaſon of their troubles and Civil Wars, fit opportunity was offered them, and they were hereunto perſwaded by one Caſſius and Civilis, two of the moſt potent amongſt them, who long before deſired alteration; and now finding opportunity, ſhewed what minds they bare: who now taking courage, made tryal what the common people thought of this point, and the greateſt part of them manifeſtly condeſcended hereunto, and perhaps the reſt were not unwilling. At this time, as it were by Gods providence, Veſpaſian ſent letters unto Petilius Cerealis (who before-time had been Governour of Germany) and declared him Conſul, commanding him to go into Britain and take the rule of the Country. He forthwith obeyed Veſpaſians command: and hearing that the Germans had revolted, he came againſt them, they having now levied an Army, and gave them a great overthrow, killing many of them, and forced them to their due obedience unto the Romans. Notwithſtanding, if he had not come thither, not long after they had aſſuredly been puniſhed for their offence. For ſo ſoon as news of their rebellion was brought to Rome, Cæſar Domitianus hearing of it (not as one of his years would have done, being very young) undertook that expedition to go and conquer them: but having his Fathers courage, and being more ſkilful then his age required, he preſently went againſt them: who terrified with the report of his coming yielded unto him, thereby gaining this, that without bloodſhed they were brought under ſubjection as before. Now all things in Gallia being well diſpoſed of, ſo that it was not eaſie for them although they would, to rebel any more, Domitian returned again to Rome, being a credit unto his age and Country.

When Veſpaſian heard thereof, and how Mæſia was all waſted, he ſent Rubrius Gallus to be revenged upon them; who having ſlain many of them in fight, he forced the reſt to retire into their own Country. The General of the Army having thus ended that War, provided to prevent them if hereafter they did attempt the like; for he built far more ſtronger Forts then were before, ſo that the enemy could no way paſs out of their own Country; by which means the Wars in Mæſia were quickly ended.

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the River Sabbaticus, and the famous triumph of Veſpaſian and Titus.

E Titus the Emperour having ſome while remained at Berytus (as is before ſaid) and being returned from thence, he ſhewed many ſpectacles in all the Cities of Syria, wherein he came, reſerving for that purpoſe the Jews that were Captives, to let all men underſtand of their overthrow; in his Journey he beheld a River worth the recital, which runneth in the midſt between Arcas and Raphaneas, two Cities of the Kingdom of Agrippa, which had a miraculous nature: for when it floweth it is very full of water, and runneth with a ſwift ſtream; yet having flowed ſix days, it is on the ſeventh day ſo dry that you may ſee the bottom, and ſo continueth his courſe; which for this cauſe the Jews called Sabbaticus, taking the name thereof from the Jews Sabbath, which F is the ſeventh day. When the Antiochians underſtood that Titus was coming to their City, they could not contain themſelves within their Walls for joy, but all went out to meet him; and not only men but alſo women and children, expecting his coming thirty ſtounds off; and when he approached near unto them, they holding up their hands to him, ſaluted him with great joy, and having received many courteſies from him, they returned with him, and amongſt other acclamations, they often beſought him to baniſh the Jews out of their City. But Titus returned no anſwer, making as though he heard not what they requeſted. Yet the Jews doubtful what he would do, and what his intent was, were all in exceeding great fear. For Titus did not tarry at Antiochia, but paſſed from thence to Zeugma towards Euphrates, where Vologeſus the King of Parthians Meſſenger came unto him, bringing him a golden Crown for his Conqueſt of the Jews: which he receiving, feaſted the Kings Ambaſſadours;

dours, and so returned to Antiochia, where the Senate and people besought him to come into the Theater, where all the people were assembled expecting him, and he accorded so to do: and again they besought him to expel the Jews out of their City; but he answered that their Country whereunto he might have banished them, was now destroyed, and there was no place that would receive them. So the Antiochians seeing they could not attain their former petition, requested another thing of him, to wit, that he would take away the brazen tables, wherein were engraven the Jews priviledges, but Titus would not grant that, but leaving the Jews in the same estate he found them, he departed from thence into Ægypt: and as in the way he past by Jerusalem, comparing the desolation of that place with the beauty and goodly buildings that were before it was destroyed, he lamented and pitied the overthrow thereof, not insolently rejoycing as another would have done, for having destroyed so fair and strong a City, but cursing the seditious who forced him to destroy it, not purposing to make his virtue known by the calamity of wretches. For as yet great part of the treasure of the City was found in the ruines, and some the Romans found of themselves; but the most they got, the Captives told them of, which was gold and silver, and other precious things buried by the owners in the earth, being uncertain what would betide them. Titus going forward in his journey speedily past the Wilderness, and came to Alexandria: and determining now to sayl unto Italy, he sent the two Legions that accompanied him unto the places from whence they came, the fifth into Mæssia, the fifteenth into Pannonia, commanding John and Simon Captains of the Prisoners and others, to the number of seven hundred, all of goodly stature and beautiful, to be carried presently into Italy, meaning to use them in his triumph. When he was now arrived at Rome as he desired, the people were so affected towards him, as if he had been their father, and came to meet him. Vespasian also honoured his Son Titus, meeting him in his own person with great joy: all the Citizens likewise received him with exceeding joy, seeing that now the father and his two Sons were met. Within a few days after they purposed to make a triumph in common, but the Senate had decreed a private and peculiar triumph, for their valiant deeds; and in the day prefixed for the same, no man in all the City remained at home, but every one got a place to stand in, that they might see the Emperours, leaving only room between them for their passage. All the Souldiers before it was day-light, every one with his Captain in Companies, came and expected the Emperour, not at the Palace Gate, but near the Temple of Isis (for the Emperours that night lodged there) and at day-break Vespasian and Titus came forth both crowned with Lawrel, and in purple garments made after their Country fashion, and they went unto Octavians walks, where the Senate, Captains and Knights expected their coming. Before the Porch was made a tribunal, and in it placed seats of Ivory, which they ascending sate down in, and presently all the Souldiers with a loud voice declared their valour and fortitude. The Emperours were unarmed and cloathed in silk, and crowned with Lawrel. Vespasian having received their praises, they offering still to speak more in his commendations, he beckned with his hand, and made a sign unto them to be silent: which being done, he arose up, and covering the greatest part of his head with his garment, he performed his solemn vows, and Titus also did the like. That done, Vespasian spake unto them all in general in few words, and so dismissed the Souldiers to go to dinner, which according to the custom, the Emperour was to provide for them: himself departed from them to the triumphant Gate, so called for that all triumphs passed that way, and they did eat meat, and put on triumphant apparel, having offered sacrifices unto the Gods that were placed by the Gate, and so went in triumph all along the place where people strived to see them, to the end that all people might have a better view of them. But the spectacles there exhibited, both for number, variety, and costlinesse, cannot be described sufficiently, being excellent in all things, which any man could devise, both workmanship, riches, and varieties, and novelties of nature. For almost all things that ever were in any place amongst men that lived in felicity, either rich or beautiful, and pleasant to behold, all of them were that day shewed and seen in that triumph, giving a testimony of the large dominions of the Romans. For there was such store of works of gold, silver, and Ivory, that one would not have deemed them to have been made only for the pomp of that day, but to have been so plentiful, as if they had flowed all about the City: some carried fine tapestry made of all sorts of purple, othersome carried others diligently wrought with Pictures and Babylonian work, and there were so many gems and precious stones, some set in Crowns of gold, some in other works, that it appeared, that without reason, we judged them to be rare and scarce. Moreover, the Pictures of their Gods were carried with them, which were admirable both for greatness and workmanship, and all of precious matter. And divers sorts sorts of living creatures were there to be seen, all adorned with some attire, agreeing and alluding unto their nature. There was also an infinite multitude of men, in purple garments over-wrought with gold, which carried all these things, and they who were separated from the rest to be seen, were attired in such garments, that as many as beheld them admired. The Captives went not without their gorgeous attires, but the variety and beauty of the garments hid all the deformity of their bodies, which hapned through their bad usage. The Pageants that were born in that triumph, were of an admirable bigness, so that the people that beheld them, wondred how it was possible that men should carry them: for many were builded with three or four lofts one above another, surpassing all that can be imagined of them for work and cost, for many of them were hanged about with Tapestry of gold, and all things annexed unto them, whereon they were carried, were made of wrought gold or Ivory. Therein was curiously represented the manner of War, and all stratagems, and manners of fighting, that could be devised; some in one part of the Pageant, some in another. There might one have beheld a most fertil and fortunate land destroyed, and all the Army of Enemies to be slain, and some flying, others taken Prisoners, and strong and huge walls battered down with Rams, and Castles and strong holds destroyed, and the walls of populous Cities to be ruined, and the Army entring the walls, all places filled with massacred men, and how those that were not able to fight, yielding themselves, asked mercy; the Temples set on fire, and after all else was wasted, the houses thrown down upon their owners heads, and a River representing sorrow, not flowing as it was wont, into tilled places, and to serve the use of man, nor for Cattel to drink, but into a Country which was in every part burning, and invironed with flame, all which the Jews in their Wars endured. These things were so artificially represented unto their views that had not seen them, as though they were now a doing. Before every Pageant went the Captain of the City, representing the manner how it was taken. After all these followed many ships, and in every place were carried the spoils taken in War: amongst all which, those that were taken in the Temple of Jerusalem, were most excellent, for there was a golden table weighing many talents, and likewise a golden Candlestick, the use whereof was now not such as we were wont to put it unto, for in the midst of the stem thereof was fixed a base, and out of it proceeded many small branches, framed like a three forked spear, every one being at the top made like a Lamp, which were seven in number, shewing the honour of the seventh day, which is called the Sabbath amongst the Jews. After all this, was carried the Jews Law, which was the last of all the spoils. Then followed many that carrying the Image of Victory, all made of gold and Ivory. Afterwards came Vespasian, and after him Titus, and with him Domitian gallantly adorned, and mounted upon an excellent horse, and so they went all to the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and there was the end of all this pomp, where they made some abode.

The last of the spoils was the Law of the Jews.

For it was an ancient custom of their Country, to repose themselves there till some came and brought news unto them, of the death of him who was General of their Enemies. This as then was Simon Giora, who was also carried in the triumph, and having a rope fastned about his neck, was drawn all along the market-place, where they that drew him did kill him. For it is the custom of the Romans, there to put malefactors to death that are condemned. After word was brought that he was dead, all the people made joyful exclamations, and so they began to sacrifice: which done according to the custom, they returned into the Palace, and they feasted some, othersome had prepared banquets for themselves at their own houses. For this day was sacred amongst the Romans, in joy of the victory over their enemies, and an end of civil calamity, and the beginning of good fortune and hope, which they had in their new Princes. When the triumphs were ended, and all the Roman Empire quieted, Vespasian built a Temple, and dedicated it unto Peace, which he did in so short a space as it was admirable: and having bestowed great cost upon it, he also beautified it with divers pictures and carved works. And he placed in that Temple all things that men of former ages had come to see, from the uttermost parts of the earth. And he placed there all the golden vessels, and other necessaries that the Jews used in their Temple, doing them great reverence. But their Law and the Tapestry or purple veils of the Sanctuary he commanded to be kept in the Palace.

CHAP. XXV.

How Herodium and Machærus were taken by Bassus.

CÆsar sent Lucius Basilius into Judæa to be Lieutenant there, who receiving an Army of Cerealis Vetilianus, he took the Castle and Garrison of Herodium, being yielded unto him. After this, gathering together all his Army, who were dispersed in divers places of the Country, he with the tenth Legion purposed to War against Machærus; for he thought it necessary to destroy that Castle, lest that for the strength it might move many to rebel: for by reason of the situation of the place, they that were in it, had certain hope of their safety, and those that sought to assault it, were in great danger. For it was built upon a Rock that was exceeding high, which made it almost inexpugnable; and nature had so devised, that it is hard to come unto it, who hath environed it round about with Valleys; so deep, that the bottom thereof cannot be described, neither could one pass over them, nor fill them up: for that which is on the West part is threescore stounds large, and endeth at the Lake Asphaltites, and on this side Machærus hath a very high prospect, and it is environed on the North and South with Valleys of the like measure that the former is, whereby it is impossible to win the Castle; but that Valley which is on the East side, is at least a hundred Cubits deep, and it endeth upon a Mountain near unto Machærus. King Alexander seeing the nature of the place, did there build a Castle, which afterward Gabinius in the War against Aristobulus destroyed. But Herod when he was King, judged this place worthy to be fortified, as a principal defence against the Neighbouring Arabians. For it was aptly situate upon a Mountain, where one might behold their borders: wherefore making a large Wall, he builded a City there in the place that men do enter unto the Castle: he also compassed the very top thereof with another Wall, and in the corner he placed Towers that were threescore Cubits high, and in the very midst of all he built a Palace, for largeness and beauty admirable, and made many Cisterns to receive water in convenient places, which served the people abundantly, as it were striving with nature, that the places which she had made inexpugnable, he by Art might make places more strong then that was. He also laid up there in store, Arrows and Engines, and made all provision wherewith the Inhabitants might be able to hold out a great siege.

Herod environeth Machærus with a great wall and tower.

Wonderful store of arrows and other Engines in this Tower.

In the Kings Palace, there grew the Herb called Rue, which was very admirable for the greatness, for there was no fig-tree taller or broader then it; and it was reported that it had continued ever since Herods time, and had endured longer, had not the Jews Inhabitants of the place cut it down. In the Valley that lyeth on the North side of the City, there is a place called Baaras, where also groweth a root of the same name, the colour whereof resembleth the flame, and it shineth at night like the Sun-beams, and is not easie to be pulled up, till that one cast upon it the urine of a woman or her flowers: which done, whosoever toucheth it is sure to die, except he carry the root hanging on his hand. It is also gathered another way without danger, after this manner: They dig all round about it, so that they leave a very little of the root covered with earth, and then they tie a Dog unto it, which striving to follow his Master who maketh as though he would go away, he easily pulleth up the root, and the dog presently dieth, as it were in his stead that seeketh to get it, so that afterward none that handleth it or taketh it, need to stand in fear thereof. This Herb notwithstanding all this danger is diligently sought out for the virtue it hath. For it driveth away devils (which are the spirits of wicked men) out of mens bodies, if it be but applyed unto them, whereas otherwise if they had no help, these devils possessing their bodies would kill them. Out of that place also do spring certain hot waters, very different in taste one from another; for some are bitter, some sweet, there are also sources of cold waters, one near unto another in a Plain: but which is most admirable, there is a Cave hard by, not very deep, environed with an eminent Rock above, from the which there cometh as it were two duggs or paps hard by one another, and out of the one of them there floweth very cold water, out of the other very hot; which mingled together make a pleasant bath, and serve to cure many diseases, and especially helpeth all pains of the sinews. In the same place also are mynes of Sulphur and Allom.

Bassus having viewed this place on every side, resolved to besiege it, and endeavoured to fill up the Valley that was on the East side, and so make away unto it: which he began to do, hastning haſtning to raiſe a very high Mount, and ſo make it eaſie to be taken. Thoſe that were inhabitants, conſtrained the Jews that were ſtrangers, to go into the lower City, judging them an unprofitable multitude, and ſo cauſed them to endure the firſt brunt of the Enemies, and they themſelves kept the Caſtle, both for that it was ſtrong, and alſo to preſerve themſelves, hoping that by yielding the place unto the Romans, they might obtain pardon of them; yet firſt they purpoſed to make trial if they could avoid the ſiege: and therefore very courageouſly, every day they made excurſions, and fought with them they found, and many were ſlain on both parts. Fortune and opportunity ſometime cauſed one to be victors, ſometime another: for the Jews got the beſt when they could aſſault the Romans, at unawares, and the Romans overcame, when they were aware of the Jews coming, and armed themſelves. But the ſiege was not ended by theſe ſkirmiſhes: yet a chance befel, that forced the Jews to yield their Caſtle. Amongſt them that were beſieged was one Eleazar a young man, and very hardy and bold in any enterprize, who oftentimes made excurſions and ſought to hinder the Romans work, who always in every fight did greatly endamage the Romans, and by his valour and adventurous courage, he gave them that were his fellows, opportunity to aſſault the Romans, and to flie again and retire in ſafety, himſelf being always the laſt that ſo retired. It hapned one day that the fight being ended, and both parts parted, he as it were contemning all men, and thinking that none of his enemies durſt undertake to combate with him, ſtaied without the Gate, ſpeaking to them that were upon the wall, and giving great attention unto them. Then one Rufus an Egyptian one of the Roman Army, eſpying this opportunity, ran upon him ſo ſuddenly, that he at unawares took him all armed as he was, and they upon the walls ſtood amazed, whilſt Rufus led him unto the Romans Camp. Then the General of the Romans cauſed him to be led into a place, where they in the City might ſee him, and there to have all his Cloaths taken off him, and whipped; and the misfortune of this young man did greatly diſcourage the Jews, and all the City was reſolved into tears for the calamity of that one man. Baſſus ſeeing this, he deviſed this counſel againſt them; for he ſought to move them ſo to compaſſion, that for to ſave him they ſhould yield their Caſtle: which fell out as he deſired. For he preſently commanded a croſs to be erected, as though he would preſently have crucified Eleazar: which ſight greatly moved them in the Caſtle to ſorrow: ſo that now with loud cries they lamented, ſaying that this calamity was inſupportable: Then Eleazar beſought them not to deſpiſe him, who was now to die a moſt miſerable death: and moreover to provide for their own ſafety in yielding the Caſtle unto the Romans vertue and fortunate ſucceſs.

Then they moved with his words, and many alſo within the City intreating for him (for he came of a great parentage and had many Kinsfolks) though contrary to their natures, compaſſion took place in them: and ſo ſending ſome of their company ſpeedily, they deſired to parley, affirming they would yield their Caſtle, upon condition that they might ſafely depart away, and Eleazar might be likewiſe reſtored unto them. Which offer of theirs, the Romans accepted; and the Jews in the lower part of the City having intelligence of this Covenant, reſolved themſelves to flie away in the night: but ſo ſoon as they had opened their gates, thoſe that had agreed with Baſſus, gave him intelligence thereof; either envying that their Countrymen ſhould eſcape, or elſe fearing that Baſſus would puniſh them for their flight: yet for all this, the moſt valiant of them that fled, eſcaped, who were gone before the reſt, and the reſt were ſlain to the number of 1000 and 700 men, for the women and children were made bond-ſlaves. And Baſſus thinking it meet to keep his promiſe unto them of the Caſtle, permitted them ſafely to depart, and reſtored Eleazar unto them.

Of the Jews that Baſſus ſlew: and how he ſold Judæa.

THis done, he prepared to carry his Army into the Paſture called Jardes, for he had notice that many Jews were there aſſembled together, who had eſcaped from Jeruſalem and Machærus during the ſiege. So coming unto the place, and finding it to be as it was reported unto him: he firſt of all invironed it with Horſemen, that if any of the Jews ſought to eſcape, the Horſemen might withſtand them, and he commanded the footmen to cut down the wood, into the which they fled to hide themſelves. And ſo through neceſſity they were conſtrained to fight, hoping ping by a courageous fight to find opportunity to flie: wherefore they altogether with a cry G violently assaulted them by whom they were invironed, and they did valiantly withstand them, and by their valour and the Jews desperation, the fight endured a long time: yet the event of the War was not like unto the rest of the fight, for only twelve Romans were slain and very few wounded, and all the Jews were slain in that fight, being in number three thousand; and their Captain Judas the Son of Jairus (of whom we have already made mention, who during the siege of Jerusalem was Commander of a Company there) hid himself in a certain Cave, and secretly escaped from thence. At that time Cæsar writ unto Liberius Maximus his Governour, and unto Bassus, to sell Judæa: for he did not build in all the Country and City, but appropriated it unto himself, leaving there only eight hundred H Souldiers, and giving them a place to dwell in called Emaus, thirty stounds distant from Jerusalem, and he imposed a tribute upon all Jews wheresoever they lived, commanding every one of them every year to bring two Drachms into the Capitol, according as in former times they were wont to pay unto the Temple of Jerusalem: and this was the Estate of the Jews at that time.

Of the Death of King Antiochus: and how the Alans invaded Armenia. I Cesennius Petus President of Syria, accuseth Antiochus before Cæsar.

IN the fourth year of Vespasians Reign, it hapned that Antiochus King of the Comagenes with all his family fell into great misery upon this occasion; Cesennius Petus Governour of Syria (either for envy, or for that indeed it was so, for it is not well known) sent Letters unto Cæsar, declaring unto him that Antiochus was determined to revolt from the Romans, together with his Son Epiphanes, and had made a league with the King of the Parthians, and that therefore it was necessary to prevent them in time, lest that if they first began to revolt openly, they might trouble all the Roman Empire K with Wars. Cæsar did not neglect these news, for that the nearness of both the Kings Countries one to another, seemed to require that they should be quickly prevented: for Samosata the greatest City of Comagena is situate upon Euphrates, which might both easily receive the Parthians, and be a strong hold for them, and also there might easily pass over the River. Wherefore Vespasian believing it, permitted him to do what he thought expedient: and he forthwith, Antiochus thinking nothing, suddenly entred into Comagena, with the sixth Legion, and certain other Companies of footmen, and troops of Horsmen, accompanied with Aristobulus King of Chalcis, and Sohemus King of Emesa, who came to assist him. So they entred the Country without any fight, for none of the Inhabitants offered to resist.

Antiochus is suddenly invaded by Cesennius.

Antiochus daunted with these unexpected news, did not so much as think of any War L against the Romans, wherefore he determined to leave the whole Kingdom in that Estate that then it was in, and with his wife and children depart from thence, hoping hereby to clear himself unto the Romans, from that which they suspected of him: and going almost a hundred and thirty stounds from the City into a field, there he placed a Tabernacle. And Petus sent men unto Samosata to take it, and left them to keep the City, and he with the rest of the Souldiers purposed to go against Antiochus. But for all this the King though by necessity urged thereto, yet would he not fight against the Romans, but bewailing his misfortune, endured patiently all whatsoever: but his Sons being lusty strong young men, and skillful in martial affairs, could not easily abstain from fight in that their distress. Wherefore Epiphanes and Callinicus his two Sons, had recourse unto their forces, and in a M great fight that endured a whole day, they shewed their valour, and departed receiving no loss. But Antiochus after this fight would not any longer abide in his Country, but taking his wife and daughters he fled into Cicilia, and thereby discouraged his Souldiers, who despairing to keep the Kingdom for him, revolted unto the Romans. But Epiphanes and the rest were forced to seek to save themselves, before such time as they were left destitute, and so accompanied with ten Horsmen, they passed the River Euphrates: and thus being out of danger they came to Vologesus, of whom they were received, not as fugitives, but with great honour, and according to their degree, as though they yet possessed their ancient dignity. And Petus coming to Tarsus of Cicilia, he sent a Centurion to carry Antiochus bound unto Rome. But Vespasian permitted not a King to be so brought unto unto him, thinking it meeter to conſider the old friendſhip between them, then to perſevere in danger, and not to be pacified by reaſon of War. Wherefore he commanded that in the way as he came, he ſhould be unbound, and a while to live at Lacedemon, and leave his journey towards Rome, allowing great ſtore of money, ſufficient to maintain a Kingly dignity.

Epiphanes, and they with him hearing this, were eaſed of the great care they took for their father, whom they greatly feared to be fallen into ſome danger, and now they alſo conceived ſome hope to be reconciled unto Cæſar. Whereof Vologeſus writing unto Cæſar (for they were contented to live out of the Roman Empire, notwithſtanding that they were honourably entertained) Cæſar courteouſly gave them leave, and they came to Rome, and their father was preſently ſent for unto them from Lacedemon, and ſo remained at Rome in great honour: The Nation of the Alanes being Scythians inhabited about Tanais, and the Marſhes of Mæotis, as in another place we have recounted. Who conſpiring with the King of the Hyrcans to paſs into Media, and ſack it (for he was King of that paſſage) which King Alexander had made in ſuch wiſe, that it was ſhut up with Iron Gates, obtained leave to paſs, and ſo came into Media, and the Medes nothing fearing any ſuch matter, and ſacked and ſpoiled all their populous and wealthy borders, being full of Cattel, none daring to reſiſt them; for Pacorus King of that Country, for fear fled into the ſtrongeſt hold he had, and left all his goods behind him, and with much ado redeemed his wife and concubines whom they had taken, for a hundred talents. Having therefore licence to rob and ſpoil, for that no man reſiſted them, they came into Armenia, and waſted all the Country thereabout: and Tyridates was then King of that Country, who with an Army coming to fight againſt them, was almoſt by them taken alive in the battel; for one caſt a halter about him and began to draw him amongſt the Enemies: and ſo had done, but that he with his ſword did quickly cut the rope and fled: and they being more enraged, by reaſon he fought againſt them, waſted all the Country, and carrying with them a huge multitude of men and cattel out of both Countries, they returned into their own.

CHAP. XXVIII.

How Maſſada a moſt ſtrong Caſtle was taken.

The year of the World 4038. after the Nativity of Chriſt, 76.

Baſſus dying in Judæa, Flavius Silva ſucceeded in his place, and now perceiving that all the Country elſe were conquered ſave one only Caſtle, he with all the forces he could make went againſt it. This Caſtle is called Maſſada. The Captain of the Sicarians named Eleazar, who firſt invaded it, was a very ſtrong and valiant man born of the Tribe of Juda, who perſwaded a great many Jews as is before ſaid, not to enroul themſelves when Cyrenæus was Cenſor, and ſent to tax Judæa. For at that time the Sicarians had conſpired againſt them that obeyed the Romans, and in all things uſed them like Enemies, taking and driving away their goods, and firing their houſes, affirming that they did not any thing differ from ſtrangers, who betrayed the liberty of their Country, rather then they would fight for it, and that they had rather have them war on the Romans ſide. But that was only an excuſe to hide their avarice and injurious dealing, as the proof made manifeſt, for they themſelves revolted and bare Arms againſt the Romans, and their enterprizes againſt the Romans were worſe then the reſt, and when their firſt forged pretence was known and confuted, they did rage more then before againſt thoſe that upbraided them with it. For that time amongſt the Jews abounded with all manner of iniquity, ſo that none was left undone: yea, though one endeavoured to invent ſome new villanies, yet could he deviſe none that was not then practiſed: all laboured with this malady, both in particular, and in common, and every one did ſtrive with other, to ſurpaſs his fellow in impiety againſt God, and injuſtice towards his Neighbour. The mighty vexed the weaker ſort, and the meaner ſort deſtroyed the Potentates, and took their riches away from them; they gaped after rule and dominion, theſe after miſchief.

The time among the Jews which was moſt fruitful in all manner of impiety.

John Giſcala.

The Sicarians were the firſt that were ſo cruel and injurious againſt their neighbours: for not provoked thereunto, neither by deed nor word, they ſlew and injured all men without cauſe, but John ſhewed them to be very moderate. For he did not only ſlay all that counſelled that which was good and profitable, as his greateſt Enemies, and eſpecially dealing thus with the Citizens, but alſo many ways injured his Country, like one who had impiouſly alſo concontemned God himself. For he did eat forbidden meats, and violated his Countries temperance: so that it was no wonder to see him observe no justice nor fidelity towards men, who had now infringed the laws of God. Again, what villany did Simon Giora leave undone, or what injury did he abstain from to offer unto their bodies, who had chosen him for their ruler? What did kindred and friendship then prevail any man? save only this, that it made them be more cruelly used, and every day be more tyrannously butchered, then otherwise. For they thought it a hainous offence to abuse strangers, and a glory to exercise cruelty upon their most familiar friends. The Idumæans were followers of this fury, who killed the high Priests, and left not any one of note in the City, whereby God might be honoured, and induced all injustice possible, wherein the zealous excelled. For they committed all mischief, leaving nothing unattempted, that had ever before that time been practised: yet they took their name from them that imitated good and godliness, but in truth it was to mock and flout them that did well: so savage and cruel was their nature, or else accounting the greatest impiety to be goodness. But their end was as they deserved, God punished their desert with his just vengeance. For even unto the latter end of their lives, they endured all the miseries that is possible for mans nature to abide, being killed with divers sorts of torments. Perhaps one will say that their punishment was not so great as they deserved: but what punishment could be devised sufficient for their deserts? But I cannot now stand to lament those who perished by these mens cruelty; Wherefore I will return to that where I left.

Silva the Captain of the Romans besiegeth Massada.

The Roman Captain came against Eleazar, and them that kept Massada with him, who were Sicarians, and he brought an Army with him, and presently subdued all the confines and borders round about, and he placed in every fit place Garrisons, and invironed the Castle with a wall, lest any of them that were besieged should escape, and that they that besieged them might there keep a continual guard. Moreover, he placed his Camp in a fit place for the siege, even there where the rock, that the Castle was built upon, joyned unto the other Mountain, which was an unfit place to get necessaries in. For not only victuals were fetcht far off by great labour of the Jews, who were commanded to do it, but also water for the whole Army somewhere else, for there was no Fountain neer that place. This done, Silva attempted the siege, wherein it was requisite for him to use both art and labour, by reason of the strength of the Castle, which is thus situate. It is invironed round with a huge stone very high on every side, and the valley underneath is so deep, that one cannot see the bottom, all rocky, and inaccessible to all living creatures, saving only that in two places there is a difficult passage unto it, one of them is from the Lake Asphaltites towards the East, and the easiest of the two is the West side: the first is called a Snake; taking his name of the straitness and and crooked turnings, for the rock that is eminent, seemeth as it were broken in sunder, and by little and little often returneth again unto it self, and it is by little and little extended in length, so that he that goeth that way, can make no hast, but must step with one foot first upon them, and the other upon another, and must stand upon one foot whilst he removeth the other, and he that falleth is sure to be slain in the fall: for there is such a hollow place on either side between the Rocks, that it is able to terrifie the boldest man alive. When thou hast gone thirty stounds by this way, then thou comest to the top of the Hill, which is not steep at the top, but hath a Plain about it, and Jonathan the high Priest was the first that built a Castle in this place, and called it Massada: and Herod after him bestowed great labour and cost in building that place, for he invironed it with a Wall, seven stounds Circuit, all of white stone, twelve Cubits high, and eight Cubits broad, and placed in it seven and twenty towers that were fifty Cubits high, by the which men passed into the houses that were round about the wall within: for the King appointed the top of the Hill for tillage, because it was a more fertil and fatter soil then any ground else, so that if at any time they within the Castle wanted provision from other places, yet they might not be famished, having this to find them. He also builded in this place a Palace for himself, the way to which was on the West side within the Castle Wall, whose prospect was towards the North, and invironed the same with a most strong Wall, and in the Corners thereof he built four most firm Towers threescore Cubits high, very sumptuous within, having divers Rooms and Galleries and Baths, supported in every place with Pillars, every one of which was one only stone, the Walls thereof were of solid stone of divers colours: and to every house, and in the top of the Hill, and round about the Palace, he hewed certain Cisterns out of the rock for to bear water; so that by this means water was as plentiful, as though they had Fountains within the Castle. There was a way unto the Castle under the ground and from the Kings Palace, which they that were without could not perceive, the way above ground was inaccessible, for as we have already already said, the way on the East-side no man could pass, and as for that on the West-side, it was stopt up with a tower built in the streight thereof distant a thousand cubits from the Castle by which it was impossible to pass, and it was not easie to get it by force, and the more leisurely they went, the nearer they were to danger. And thus was this Fortress strengthned both by Art and Nature.

A tower to the west-side.

The provision within the Castle was admirable both for the magnificence thereof, and also for the long time it had continued, for there was corn sufficient for many years, and Wine and Oyl and divers other provision and heaps of Dates. All which Eleazar found ready there, having deceitfully obtained the Castle with his Sicarians, which provision was all as sound and as fresh, as though it had newly been laid up in store: notwithstanding, that from the time it remained there, unto the time that the Romans took it, were a hundred years, and the Romans found the reliques of the fruit incorrupted: and one may justly think that the cause hereof is the Air about the Castle, which by reason of the height of the place is most pure, and free from all earthly corruption. There was also found all manner of Armour in great quantity, which Herod made, and would have armed ten thousand men; also unwrought iron, brass and lead, so that one may judge that provision to have been reserved for some great cause. It is reported that Herod prepared that Castle for his refuge, when he doubted two great dangers, first, that the people of the Jews would depose him, and make them Kings whose ancestors had before reigned.

Great store of provision in the Castle.

Fruit for an hundred years kept uncorrupt.

The other which was more dangerous then the first, was, for that he feared Cleopatra Queen of Egypt, who not concealing her intent, did often request Antonius that Herod might be slain, and that she might have the Kingdom of the Jews given unto her. And it was a great marvel that Antonius doting so upon her, did not fulfil her request. Herod for these occasions having builded Massada, left it unfurnished at the last bulwark for the Romans to make war against the Jews. For the General of the Romans, having now compassed all the place without it with a wall (as is before said) to the end that none might escape, he did very wisely, and so began to assault the Castle, finding one only place that would bear a mount. For behind the Tower, that on the West-side stopped up the passage into the Castle and Palace, there was a great rock very large and long, yet not so high as Massada by 3 hundred cubits. The rock was called Leuce, which signifieth white. When Silva had gotten this rock, and ascended it, he commanded his souldiers to build a mount thereupon; and they chearfully labouring, raised a sudden mount two hundred cubits high: by reason of the height it seemed not firm nor sufficient enough to bear the Engines, but upon it was built a Tribunal with great stones fifty cubits high, and as many cubits broad, and the Engines were such as first Vespasian, and after him Titus devised to batter walls with, and so they made a Tower threescore cubits high, all plated about with Iron.

Herod suspecting a double peril, builded the place for a refuge.

There was but one place about Massada to raise a mount to batter on.

Now the Romans with many shot did drive the Jews from off the Castle walls, not suffering them to lift up their heads. And Silva having builded a mighty Ram, caused the wall to be continually battered therewith, but it could scarcely enter upon: and the Sicarians quickly prevented that, building another wall within, which could not be broken with the Ram being yet soft, and so would break the force thereof, for they did sawe timber in pieces, and as it were made two rails, and then filled the space between the two rails with earth, and with other planks they kept the earth from falling down, so that they made a work like the wall of a house, and for that it yielded unto the blows of the Ram (being soft earth) the Ram could not prevail against it, but rather made it more strong then before, by ramming the morter together.

The City battered with a large Ram, and by Silvas appointment.

Silva perceiving this, judged that he might sooner destroy the wall with fire then with his Engine: and so he commanded the souldiers to cast upon it many burning firebrands, and the fire did quickly take hold of the wall, because it was for the most part built with wood, and easily also pierced thorow it, by reason it was not clean wrought together, and there was a great flame.

Firebrands darted against the walls.

At the very beginning of the fire, the North wind did greatly annoy the Romans, for the fire blowing furiously from above against them that were Romans, it did drive it extremely upon them, so that they were in great despair; fearing their Engines would be burnt, and presently the wind changing and blowing from the South, (as it were by Gods providence) it turned the fire again upon the wall, and now all of it even unto the foundation thereof, was there most cruelly on fire. And the Romans having Gods assistance, returned again into their Camp joyfully, purposing the next morning betimes to assail their Enemies, and that night to place stronger watches, lest any of the Enemies should escape. But

The North wind diverting the flame, turneth it on the Romans.

The year of the world, 4038. after Christs Nativity, 76.

Eleazar thought not to flie, neither would he permit any one of his company ſo to do. And ſeeing now the wall was fired, and not knowing any way elſe to help himſelf, conſidering likewiſe what the Romans would do unto their wives and children if they ſhould take them, he deliberated of all their deaths, which he in that extremity judged to be the beſt way they could take. And ſo he aſſembled the moſt valiant of all his company, and exhorted every one thereunto, after this manner.

Eleazars Oration to his companions.

Valiant Champions, we long ago reſolved our ſelves neither to ſerve the Romans, nor any other ſave only God, for he alone is the true and juſt Lord of all men. Behold, the time is now come, that exhorteth you to ſhew your reſolute minds: let us not therefore diſhonour our ſelves, and beſides our ſlavery, ſuffer alſo intolerable torments if we be taken alive by the Romans. For, we were the firſt that revolted from them, and the laſt that war againſt them. And I verily think that God hath given us this benefit, that we may die well in our own liberty, which he denied to other, who were overcome contrary to all expectation. We are certain to be conquered as ſoon as it is day light: but to die valiantly with our deareſt friends, is a glorious reſolution unto valiant men, and of this our enemies cannot debar us, who do labour to take us alive, and carry us away Captives, and we are not able to vanquiſh them in fight. For truly, at the firſt (when we who coveted liberty, ſuffered all miſery at the hands of our own Countreymen, and worſe at the hands of our enemies) we ſhould have conſidered that God, who was ſometime favourable unto the Nation of the Jews, had now condemned them unto perdition: for had he yet been favourable unto us, or had he been but lightly offended at us, he would not have permitted ſo many men to have periſhed, and have delivered his holy City into the hands of the enemies to be conſumed with fire. And we only amongſt all our Nation, hoped to live in liberty, as though we had no ways offended the divine Majeſty, nor been guilty of any offence, who indeed taught others iniquity. So you ſee how we are checked for longing after vain hope, being brought into greater extremity then we expected. Neither hath our Caſtle by Nature inexpugnable, any thing profited us to our preſervation, but we having ſtore of victuals and armour, and all other neceſſaries, have loſt all hope of ſafety, God himſelf openly taking it from us. For, the fire that once was carried againſt our enemies, did not of it ſelf return againſt us and unto the wall we built.

Eleazar confeſſeth Gods wrath to be kindled againſt the people.

The puniſhment of thoſe crimes which the Jews in Jury attempted againſt the Gentiles.

But it was the puniſhment of our offences, who furiouſly raged againſt our own Nation. For the which I requeſt you, let us not be puniſhed by the Romans: whoſe forces are invincible, but by our ſelves, let us ſatisfie the ire of God, and ſo it will be more tolerable for us; even by that means our wives ſhall die undefiled, and our children ſhall not taſte of ſervile captivity. After whoſe deaths, we will one help another to die with credit, concerning our liberty, which is the beſt ſepulture of all: yet let us firſt fire our Caſtle, and burn our treaſure: for it will be no ſmall grief unto the Romans, if they neither get our bodies alive, nor can find any one jot of our riches for recompence of their labour. Let us only leave our victuals as a ſufficient teſtimony, that famine did not at any time cauſe us to be conquered, but that we, as at firſt we reſolved, preferred death before bondage.

The beſt grave is when liberty is maintained.

Eleazar having thus ſpoken, they that were preſent did not all accord unto him, for ſome joyfully haſted to execute his advice, thinking it ſo glorious a death. But they who moved with compaſſion towards their wives and families, were ſomething effeminate, or elſe abhorred to kill themſelves, one looking upon another with tears, did ſhew his mind to diſagree from that which Eleazar perſwaded. Which when Eleazar perceived, and that his counſel through fear was defeated, fearing alſo that they who couragiouſly had accorded thereunto, would be withdrawn by the tears of others, he did not ſo end his exhortation; but ſtanding up, and with a vehement ſpirit, he began to ſpeak unto them of the immortality of the ſoul, and fixing his eyes upon them that wept, he uſed a vehement exclamation, ſaying:

Eleazars Oration as touching the immortality of the ſoul.

'How much am I deceived, who thought that valiant men fighting for their liberty, would 'rather chuſe to die then to live? but ye do ſhew your ſelves nothing to excel any ordinary 'men, who fear to die, notwithſtanding, that thereby you may eſcape great miſery, and cala-'mity, when in this point you ought not to have expected any admonition thereunto, nor to 'have made any delay to do it. The ancient cuſtomes, which have endured ever ſince men 'had reaſon, the divine doctrine of our nation, which hath continually bin confirmed by the 'deeds of our predeceſſours, do inſtruct us, that it is miſery to live, and not to die. For death 'freeth our ſouls from priſon unto their moſt pure and proper place, where never after they 'ſhall be touched with calamity. Which whileſt they are bound in a mortal body, and do 'participate of his miſeries, may probably be affirmed to be dead. For it is an unſeemly

'con-

'conjunction for that which is divine, to be coupled and connexed unto that which is mortal.
'True it is, that our ſouls can do much being joyned to our bodies, for they uſe the bodies as 'their inſtruments, ſecretly producing in them motion, and many other actions paſſing the 'nature of mortal things. But when the ſoul is looſed from that heavy burthen which doth 'weigh it down even unto the earth, which hangeth upon it, and hath received its proper 'habitation, then it enjoyeth free and perfect felicity; and remaineth inviſible to our 'mortal eyes as God himſelf is, neither is it viſible in our bodies. For it cometh ſecretly 'into them, and ſo departeth from them again, that no man can perceive it, having only a 'nature incorrupt, and cauſing a change in our bodies. For whatſoever the ſoul toucheth, 'that preſently liveth and flouriſheth; and what it forſaketh, that incontinently withereth
'and dyeth: ſo much doth it participate of immortality. The ſleep may be an evident argu'ment unto you of this which I ſpeak, where the ſoul not diſtracted, taketh a moſt pleaſant
'and ſweet repoſe; and communicating with God, it is with him preſent in every place by 'reaſon of affinity, and foretelleth many future events. Wherefore then ſhould we fear death
'who love the reſt that we have in ſleep? were not he a mad man that for a ſhort life would 'hinder himſelf of eternal life? It were neceſſary that we who are inſtructed in the law of our 'Nation, ſhould give example to others to deſpiſe and contemn death. But if we ſeek confir'mation hereof from ſtrangers, let us ſee the example amongſt the wiſer ſort of the Indians:
'for they being juſt men do tolerate this life as a neceſſary office of nature for a certain time,
'though againſt their wills; yet do they haſten to unlooſe the ſoul bound in this mortal body,
'though not urged thereunto by any calamity or neceſſity, but only for deſire of immortali-
'ty, telling others that they will depart out of this life; neither doth any one ſeek to hinder
'them, but all men eſteeming them moſt fortunate, ſend by them commendations and other 'meſſages unto their friends departed: ſo firm is their belief that the ſouls of them that are 'dead have communion and converſation together: And ſo they having all inſtruction what 'to ſay to the ſouls departed, do with great applauſe leap into the fire, that thereby their 'ſouls may be purified from their bodies. And their friends go more joyfully with them when 'they go to their deaths, then any doth that bringeth his friend on the way when he is to go
'a great journey; and they bewail themſelves, not thoſe who are dead and have attained im'mortality. Shall not we then be aſhamed not to believe ſo firmly as the Indians do? deſpiſing
'through our own ſloth our Country-laws which are to be emulated of all men? Nay, ſuppo-'ſing that by our law we had bin inſtructed contrariwiſe, to wit, that to live in this life is bliſs,
'and to dye is calamity: yet notwithſtanding, this preſent neceſſity, this preſent time had bin
'a ſufficient motive to cauſe us to embrace death rather then life, ſeeing that by Gods ap'pointment, and of neceſſity we muſt needs dye. In times paſt it appeareth God ſo provided,
'that he ſhortned the days of our own Nation, that would not uſe their life as they ought to 'have done. I dare not aſcribe it unto the Romans, nor report of our ſelves that their Wars
'conſumed us all. For this did not happen through their forces, but a more potent cauſe here-
'of there was which made them conquerors. Which of the Romans ſlew the Jews that inha'bited at Cæſarea? whom the Inhabitants thereof upon the Sabbath-day, they being aſſem-
'bled in one place together with their wives and children, did maſſacre, notwithſtanding that 'they had no intent to revolt from them, nor never lifted up their hands in their own defence,
'nothing fearing the Romans, who only accounted them of our Nation their enemies that 'revolted from them. But ſome may object the Jews at Cæſarea, and the Inhabitants thereof 'were always at variance, and that now they revenged their old quarrel, having gotten op'portunity. What then ſhall we ſay of the Scythopolitans? who bare arms with the Grecians 'againſt us, and denied to aſſiſt their own kindred againſt the Romans. What profit did they 'receive by this their good will and fidelity? for they were altogether with their whole fa'milies cruelly ſlain, and this was the reward they had for their labour, for having withſtood
'us to have done the like unto them; it were too long to recount all things ſeverally to this 'effect. For as ye know there is no City in all Syria that hath not maſſacred the Jews there
'inhabiting, being more enemies then the Romans were, where they of Damaſcus, al'though they could not deviſe any probable cauſe for it, yet did they maſſacre all the Jews 'living among them, who amounted to the number of eighteen thouſand, beſide their wives 'and families. And as we have heard it reported, the number of the Jews ſlain by the Egyp'tians were above 60000. It may be that finding no adverſity in a ſtrange Country they 'were put to death by their enemies: but they that in their own Country fought a-'gainſt the Romans, wanted nothing that might have cauſed a perfect hope of a full victory 'over the Romans, they had weapons, armour, walls, and ſtrong holds inexpugnable; their

'valorous courage in fighting for liberty ſhunned no danger, and encouraged men to revolt: C 'which all, having a while ſerved their turns, at laſt was a cauſe of their greater miſery. For 'all were taken and ſubdued by the enemies, as though they had been built and made to make 'their enemies victory more famous, and not to do them ſervice. And we may juſtly deem 'them happy who were ſlain in the War, for they died in liberty. Yet who doth not pity
'the multitude of them that fell into the Romans hands? or who would not haſten to dy, ra'ther then endure the like miſery that they ſuffered? Some of them being tortured, and ſome 'with fire and ſtripes periſhed; and others half eaten of wild beaſts, were reſerved alive for 'their ſecond food: and they are moſt miſerable of all that are yet alive, who often wiſh for 'death and cannot find it. Where is now that gorgeous City? where is it that was once the 'Mother City of all the Nation of the Jews? ſo ſtrengthned with ſuch ſtrong walls, ſo for'tified with Towers and Caſtles to defend the Walls, ſcarcely able to contain the proviſion
'made for War, having in it ſo huge a multitude of men to fight for it, what is it now be'come, wherein God himſelf was thought to dwell? It is now razed down even unto the 'very foundations; and no other memory or reliques thereof is left ſtanding; their Camp is 'deſtroyed, only a few old men and unhappy ſurvive, who ſate among the Aſhes of the Tem'ple, and a few women whom the enemies reſerved to ſatisfie their filthy luſt. And will any 'amongſt us, conſidering all theſe things, deſire to behold the light of the Sun, although he 'could live without moleſtation? who is ſuch an enemy to his native ſoil? who is ſo effeminate,
'or deſirous of his life, that doth not grieve to have lived till this time? would God we had 'been all in our graves, before we had ſeen that ſacred City fired by a hoſtile hand, before
'we beheld the holy Temple deſtroyed by impiety: and ſeeing that the hope we had to be 'revenged upon our enemies, is now vaniſhed away, and that we are left alone in miſery and 'neceſſity, let us haſten to dy well, and take compaſſion upon our ſelves, our wives and chil'dren, and that whilſt we have time to compaſſionate our ſelves. For both we are born to 'dy, and all that are begotten by us, and the ſtrongeſt men living cannot avoid it: but injury
'and bondage, and to ſee our wives and children abuſed before our faces, is no neceſſity pro'ceeding from mans nature, but they only are forced to endure it, who when they might 'have died without it, did refuſe for fear. We firſt of all truſting to our ſtrength, rebelled 'againſt the Romans; Now laſtly, they exhorting us to obedience, we denied: which of 'them then will not be enraged againſt us, if they can take us alive? Moſt miſerable ſhall 'thoſe young men be, whoſe ſtrength will endure many torments, and thoſe old men will 'move compaſſion whoſe aged years cannot ſuffer tortures; one ſhall ſee his wife carried 'away from him, and another his Son having his hands bound behind him, cry out unto his 'father for help: who now whilſt they are free from the thraldom of their enemies, may glo-
'rioufly aſſiſt us with their Swords. Let us with our Wives and Children dy free men, let us 'altogether depart out of this life. This our Religion commandeth, this our Wives and 'Children perſwade; God himſelf hath driven us unto this neceſſity for this purpoſe.
'The Romans would have it otherwiſe, who fear leſt any of us ſhould periſh, and not fall 'into their hands alive. Let us therefore haſten, that in ſtead of their expected hope, L E 'whereby they verily perſwaded themſelves to take us alive, we may contrary to their ex'pectation daunt them with a ſudden admiration of our glorious deaths.

The calamity of thoſe Jews who were taken by the Romans.

Jeruſalem the Metropolitan City razed from the foundations.

We are born to die, and the moſt ſtrongeſt cannot avoid the ſame.

Eleazar tells the Jews of the Romans Tyranny.

It is a happineſs among the Jews to die free.

Whilſt Eleazar was yet ſpeaking, and deſirous ſtill to continue his exhortation, they all interrupted him: every one now in a fury bent to follow his advice, made haſt to effect it; and as though they had been urged by ſome ſpirit thereunto, every one laboured to prevent one another in the execution thereof, judging him to ſhew moſt valour and fortitude, that firſt diſpatched himſelf. They were alſo deſirous to kill their Wives and Children with themſelves. And which is moſt ſtrange, their minds were nothing altered when they came to effect this bloody work; but with the ſame reſolution they had, when they heard Eleazars ſpeech, every one retained his good affection towards his friends: yet permitting reaſon M F to take no place, and perſwading themſelves that thus they had well provided for their Children, they all at once embraced their Wives and Children for their laſt farewel, and took their leaves of them, kiſſing them with tears, and then at once ſlew them, as though it had been done by the hands of other men, and not their own, comforting themſelves, being forced ſo to do, in that hereby they ſhould eſcape the tyranny and cruelty of their Enemies. Finally, no man was ſo cowardly, who durſt not preſume to this action; ſo every one of them killed his deareſt friends. O miſerable people, whom neceſſity forced to ſlay their Wives and Children, accounting the action thereof to be the very leaſt of all their miſeries! Wherefore, now not enduring the grief that enſued upon this fact, and thinking that in living any while while after them, they ſhould injure them whom they had ſlain, they with all ſpeed poſſible gathered all their riches together, and ſet them on fire: which done, they elected ten by lot, who ſhould ſlay the reſt, every one proſtrating himſelf upon his wife and children, and embracing them in his Arms, and was ſo ſlain willingly by them that executed that wretched office: who having without fear diſpatched them, they caſt lots whoſe fortune it was to kill all the reſt, and he upon whom the lot ſhould fall, ſhould kill the other nine, and laſtly himſelf upon them all, every one ſo encouraging one another, that there was no difference between them that were to be killed, and them that were to kill, and ſo the reſt offered themſelves to death: which done, one who was the laſt of all, being yet alive, went amongſt the dead bodies, and ſearched to ſee if none lived that needed his hand in ſo great a multitude of ſlain people; and finding all of them diſpatched, he went and fired the Palace: which done, he with all his force thruſt his Sword into his own body up to the Hilts, and ſo fell down by his deareſt friends.

Ten choſen by lot to kill the reſt of the Jews.

In this manner they died, thinking they had left no one alive to have fallen into the Romans hands, but one certain old woman, and another that was Eleazars Couſin, who in learning and wiſdom ſurpaſſed all other women, and five children, who all hid themſelves in a Cave, wherein water was reſerved to drink, whilſt the reſt were buſied in this Maſſacre, who were in number nine hundred and ſixty, beſide women and children. This calamity hapned the fifteenth day of April. In the morning the Romans expecting that the Jews would fight with them, made Bridges from their Mounts unto the Walls, and ſo aſſaulted the Walls: and ſeeing none of their Enemies appear, but all the Walls waſted and on fire, and deep ſilence in every place, they could not conjecture what was done, and at laſt they made a cry at once, as though they had been beating the Walls with a Ram, thereby to ſee if they could make any Enemies come out. The women in the vaults heard this cry, and coming forth, declared to the Romans all that had hapned, one of them relating unto them the event of all the whole matter: yet for all this the Romans did not eaſily believe the words, by reaſon of the greatneſs of that fact, but they endeavoured to quench the fire, and paſſing through it, they preſently came into the Palace, where they beheld all the dead bodies, yet they did not inſult over them as their Enemies, but admired that ſo many ſhould be ſo obſtinately minded to deſpiſe death.

The Romans expect the fight.

The Romans admire the Jews fortitude and obſtinate contempt of death.

Of the death of the Sicarians that were fled unto Alexandria and Thebes.

THE Caſtle being thus taken, the General of the Romans leaving a Garriſon there, went unto Cæſarea, for there was no enemy left in all that Country, but now all Judæa was deſtroyed through continuance of long Wars, and many of that Nation, though far diſtant from it, taſted of thoſe troubles: for it ſo fell out, that afterward many Jews periſhed in Egypt at Alexandria: for thoſe Sicarians who had eſcaped thither, were not content to be ſafe and free from danger, but there alſo they attempted alteration, and to defend their liberty againſt the Romans, eſteeming themſelves nothing inferiour unto them, and that only God was their Lord. And ſome of the nobler race of the Jews, ſeeking to withſtand that their enterprize, were by theſe Sicarians ſlain: which was no ſooner done, but they exhorted the people to revolt.

The murtherers, authours of new calamity.

The chief and Elders of the Jews ſeeing this, and that they could not repreſs them without danger, they aſſembled all the Jews together, and declared unto them the temerity of theſe Sicarians, ſhewing them to be the Authours of all the miſery that had befallen the Jews, and that now notwithſtanding they were eſcaped, yet they were not certain of their lives; for that if they were known, the Romans would preſently put them to death, and draw them alſo into the like miſery, who were not partakers of their wickedneſs. Wherefore, they admoniſhed the multitude to beware leſt they drew themſelves into the ſame danger, wherein they were, and to make ſatisfaction unto the Romans for themſelves, by delivering ſuch people unto them. The Jews were perſwaded by theſe ſpeeches: and foreſeeing the danger that might enſue, they furiouſly aſſaulted the Sicarians, and took of them 600. and ſhortly after thoſe who there eſcaping, fled into Egypt and Thebes, were were taken and brought back again; whose hard-hearted obstinacy was so great, that none can without admiration hear of. For notwithstanding, that all torments and tortures that could be devised were inflicted upon them, only to force them to confess, that Cæsar was their Lord, yet no one of them would say so, nor make any shew thereof, but all persevered in their former opinion, as though the body tormented had been dead, and not alive. Moreover, their children were most to be admired, for not one of them could be constrained to call Cæsar Lord. So much did their boldness overcome the torments inflicted upon their bodies.

How the Temple of Onias at Alexandria was shut up.

AT that time Lupus was Governour of Alexandria, who with all speed by letters gave Cæsar notice of these troubles. And Cæsar, seeing that it was necessary to beware of the Jews, who were naturally inclined to sedition and unquietness, fearing also that they would once again gather themselves together, and cause some to joyn with them, he commanded Lupus to destroy the Temple, which Onias erected in Egypt, which was builded and named upon this occasion: Onias the Son of Simon one of the high Priests, being driven out of Jerusalem, Antiochus King of Syria then warring against the Jews, he came unto Alexandria, and was courteously entertained by Ptolomæus, who was then also Enemy unto Antiochus, affirming, that he would annex unto his Country the people of the Jews, if he would agree to that which he required. The King according to all that could be granted, he requested him to permit him to build a Temple in some place of his Country, and that he might worship God therein according to the custom of their Country: for so the Jews would hate Antiochus the more, who had destroyed their Temple at Jerusalem, and be friendly unto him, and many of them did flie unto him for Religion sake. Ptolomæus agreed so to do, and gave him a piece of ground for that purpose, a hundred and fourscore stounds from Memphis, in that place which was called the way to Heliopolis: where Onias building a Castle, made also a Temple unlike to that of Jerusalem; but he erected a Tower like that of Jerusalem, with stones, that was threescore Cubits long, and he built an Altar after the fashion of that of his Country, and adorned it with all manner of gifts (save only a Candlestick) which had instead thereof a Lamp to give light, which he caused to be hung before the Altar in a golden Chain, and he inviroued all the Temple with a wall made of Brick, and the Gates he made of Stone, and the King granted unto it great revenues of money and ground, to the intent that the Priests might have abundance of all things which they required.

Onias by Ptolomies consent buildeth a City and Temple in Egypt.

Onias Temple built in Egypt.

But Onias did not this with a good conscience, but for that he was at variance with the Jews of Jerusalem, for that they forced him to flie: and he perswaded himself that by the building of this Temple, he might withdraw all men from Jerusalem thither; and of this, there was a Prophecy 970 years before, and Esaias foretold that a certain Jew should build a Temple in Egypt. And thus that Temple was built, and Lupus having received the Emperours letters, went unto the Temple, and taking away certain gifts from it, he shut it up: And after him Paulinus who succeeded in his stead, left not one gift there (for he threatned the Priests, if they did not bring forth all) and permitted not any that came thither for to sacrifice, to come neer it; but shutting up the gate thereof, he left no sign of divine service there, and from the time it was built, till the time it was shut up, were three hundred thirty and three years.

CHAP. XXXI.

The year of the World, 4038. after the Nativity of Christ, 76.

Of the Massacre of the Jews at Cyrene.

THe boldness of the Sicarians, like some infectious disease, infected also the Towns about Cyrene. For one John, a Weaver, and a wicked man, having escaped, perswaded many simple people to follow him, and led them into the Wilderness, promising to shew them signs and visions, and thus he deceived the simplest sort of the Jews: but the noblest of them of Cyrene, understanding his deceit, gave Catullus notice of his preparation and departure, who was then Governour of Lybia; who sending Horsmen and footmen, did easily surprize them being unarmed, and the most part of them were slain, yet some were taken alive, and brought to Catullus. But their leader Jonathan at that time escaped: yet being diligently laid, and sought for over all those Countries, he was at last taken, and being brought unto Catullus, he sought to delay his own punishment, in offering an occasion of iniquity unto Catullus. For he accused the richest among the Jews, to have been his advisers to do this matter. Catullus was glad of those allegations, and exaggerated his accusations very much with tragical terms, so that he seemed to have made an end of the Wars against the Jews, and which was worst of all, to be content to credit whatsoever was maliciously spoken: he himself instructed the Sicarians to frame scandalous accusations; and commanding them to nominate one Alexander a Jew, whom he had long hated, and his wife Bernice, he put them first of all to death, and after them, all that were well moneyed, who amounted to the number of 3000. And this he thought he did without controul, because he confiscated their possessions unto Cæsar. And lest any Jew living in any other place should complain of his injustice, he extended his malicious lies against others further off, and perswaded Jonathan, and certain others that were taken with him, to accuse the most trusty and faithful Jews at Rome, and Alexandria: one of them who were thus falsly accused, was named Joseph, who writ this History. But this device of Catullus, had not success as he hoped: for he came to Rome, and brought Jonathan, and the rest bound with him, thinking that no more inquiry would be made of the false accusations invented by himself.

A part of Jonathans companions were taken and slain, the rest kept captive alive, and brought to Catullus.

Three thousand Jews slain by Catullus.

Joseph by Catullus perswasion is accused by Jonathan.

But Vespasian, suspecting the matter, made diligent inquiry to know the truth: and finding these crimes injuriously imposed upon those men, at Titus intreaty, he acquitted them, and punished Jonathan, according to his desert; who being first whipped, was afterward burned alive. And Catullus at that time, by reason of the mildness of the Emperour, had nothing said unto him: but not long after he fell into a grievous disease, and was cruelly tormented not only in body, but also in mind. For he was greatly terrified, and still imagined to see the Ghosts of them, whom he had so unjustly slain, ready to kill him; so that he cried out, and not able to contain himself, leapt out of his Bed, as though he had been tortured with torments and fire. And this disease daily increasing on, his Guts and Bowels rotting, and issuing out of him, at last he died in this manner, leaving behind him an evident argument, that the Divine Justice doth punish impious malefactours. And this is the end of the History, which we promised to beset down with all fidelity, for them that are desirous to know the event of the Wars between the Jews and the Romans. And as for our style, we leave it to the judgment of the Reader: but touching the verity of the History, it is such, as no man need to doubt of; for I do affirm that to be the only scope, which I aimed at in this whole work.

Jonathan being first beaten is burnt alive.

The conclusion of the seven books of the Wars of the Jews.

The end of the seventh and last Book of Flavius Josephus, of the Wars of the Jews.

The FIRST BOOK of
FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS
The Son of MATTHIAS.

Written againſt APION, as touching the Antiquity of the JEWS.

I Suppoſe, (O thou worthieſt amongſt worthy men! Epaphroditus) that I have ſufficiently teſtified unto them, who ſhall read thoſe Books which I have written, as touching the Authentick Hiſtory of the Jews, that our Nation is moſt ancient, and that they have had their Original from themſelves, and have from the firſt beginning inhabited that Country, whereof they are now poſſeſſed at this preſent. To which effect I have gathered out of our ſacred Writings, and publiſht in the Greek tongue, a Hiſtory containing the occurrences of five thouſand years. And for that I ſee there are divers, (who being too much addicted and ſeduced by the ſcandalous blaſphemies and reports, which ſome of thoſe who are lewdly affected towards us, have publiſhed againſt us) have miſconceited and miſbelieved that which I have written of our Antiquity, and labour to approve our Nation to be modern, becauſe none of the moſt ancient, and moſt renowned Hiſtoriographers among the Grecians, have thought our Anceſtours worthy to be enrouled in their writings: I have for theſe cauſes held a part of my duty to write ſome ſhort Treatiſe hereupon; both to reprove the evil intent and affected lying of thoſe our calumners, as alſo to correct their ignorance, by teaching thoſe who are deſirous to know the truth, what the Original of our Nation is. For proof whereof, I will produce no other Teſtimony then thoſe, who from antiquity have been judged worthy of credit among the Greeks; laying open before their Eyes, that they who have ſlanderouſly and falſely written againſt us, are convicted by their own mouths: I will alſo enforce my ſelf to expreſs the cauſes why very few Grecians have made mention of us in their Hiſtories: and moreover, I will make it known to thoſe who are ignorant, (either in effect or pretence) who they have been that omitted not our Hiſtory.

The Hiſtory of the Antiquity containeth the events of five thouſand years.

The cauſes that moved him to write this Book.

Firſt of all therefore, I do not a little marvel at thoſe, (who in reſpect of antiquity) ſuppoſe that the truth ought only to be gathered from the Greeks: and that they juſtly may claim the honour and knowledge of faithful writing, whereas they neither vouchſafe either us, or any others, the credit or truth in that we ſet down, although I am able to prove, that all things have faln out quite contrary. For which cauſe it behoveth us not to look to mens various opinions, but to examine that which is right, and gather the ſame by the effects. For, whatſoever is ſet down by the Greeks is new, and of late memory, and hath been brought to execution in a manner but yeſterday: I mean the foundations of Cities, the inventions of Arts, and the deſcriptions of Laws, and the lateſt practice among them hath been, and is, the diligent travel in Hiſtory.

All things among the Greeks are modern, but ſuch things as were done among the Egyptians, Chaldees, and Phœnicians, are of happy memory and venerable antiquity.

But amongſt the Egyptians, Chaldees and Phœnicians (for I preſume not to compare my Countrymen with them) as they themſelves confeſs, the memory of their writings is moſt ancient and infallible. For all theſe Nations dwell in ſuch Countries as are not ſubject to the corruption of Air; and have carefully provided, that none of thoſe things that have been done by them ſhould ſleep in obſcurity, but ſhould be kept in memory in the publick writings writings of the learnedſt men: whereas innumerable corruptions have crept in among the Greeks, by which the memory of things ſo repaſſed, is defaced. But they always who have eſtabliſhed new eſtates, have each of them ſuppoſed in their own behalf, that whoſoever was of theirs, he was the firſt of the World. Yet notwithſtanding they have had the knowledge of the nature of letters very late, and have attained the ſame with very great difficulty. For they that ſpake of the moſt ancient uſe of the ſame, do boaſt and glorifie themſelves, that they have received the knowledge thereof from the Phœnicians, and Cadmus. Yet notwithſtanding, there is not any one of them that can ſhew any Record of that time, either in their Temple, or in their publick Regiſters: whereas, after, there aroſe a great doubt and B queſtion, whether thoſe letters were in uſe during their time, who ſince have for the ſpace of many years continued the ſiege before Troy. And indeed, their opinion who affirm that they were ignorant of the uſe of thoſe letters, which are at this preſent allowed and accuſtomed among us, is not to be refuſed. For it is moſt manifeſt, that there is not any writing extant among the Greeks that is more ancient then Homers Poeſie, which as it is moſt manifeſt, hath been in allowance and continuance ſince the time of the ſiege of Troy: and yet it is reported, that he left no part of that his Poeſie in writing, which was compoſed of divers Songs, and not only ſung by roat; by which means it came to paſs that there are ſo many contradictions in the ſame. And as touching thoſe who have undertaken to write Hiſtories among them, I mean Cadmus the Mileſian, and Acuſilaus the Argive, and after him C if there were any others; they were not alive, but very little time before the paſſage of the Perſians into Greece. Furthermore, they who among the Greeks were the firſt that introduced Philoſophy, and the knowledge of Celeſtial and divine things, that is to ſay, Pherecydes the Syrian, Pythagoras and Thales, theſe all of them confeſs with one accord, that being inſtructed by the Egyptians and Chaldees, they have publiſhed ſome few writings, which are ſuppoſed to be the moſt ancient among the Greeks, and it is hardly believed alſo that they were written by them. What reaſon therefore have the Greeks to be ſo proud, as if there were none but themſelves only who knew the affairs of Antiquity, and could exactly expreſs their truth and verity? Or who cannot eaſily conjecture by their own Writers themſelves, that their writings were only upon here-ſay and ſuppoſition, and that their D ſtyle was only tied to their vain conjectures? Hence cometh to paſs, that in their Books they cavil and reprove one another, and make no conſcience to maintain and write contradictions in one and the ſame thing.

Innumerable corruptions invaded Greece.

The Phœnicians and Cadmus the firſt inventers of Letters.

Among the Greeks there is not any writing more ancient then Homers Poem.

But it may be ſaid, that I taſk my ſelf to a fruitleſs labour, if I ſhould go about to inform thoſe who are better experienced then my ſelf, in how many points Hellicanus differeth from Acuſilaus as touching the Genealogy: in how many places Acuſilaus hath corrected Herodatus; or how Ephorus hath approved that Hellicanus was a lier in the greater part of that which he recited. Ephorus hath been reproved by Timæus; and in general, all they have taxed Herodotus. Neither hath Timæus vouchſafed to accord with Antiochus or Philiſtus, or Callias in the Hiſtories of Sicily. Neither have they who have written the Hiſtories of E Athens, or thoſe who have entreated of the Argoliques, followed others. What need I reckon up thoſe who in particular have entreated of Cities, or of ſuccinct and ſhort matters? whereas in the deſcription of the Perſian War, and thoſe exploits that were performed therein, thoſe of greateſt authority are moſt at odds. Thucydides is accuſed by ſome for a lier in divers places, notwithſtanding that he ſeemeth to have deſcribed the Hiſtory of his time moſt exactly. But the cauſes of this diſcord are divers, and it may be that they who ſhall narrowly pry into them, ſhall find more. For mine own part, thoſe two which I ſhall here ſet down, in my opinion are of greateſt weight. The firſt, and in my judgment the chiefeſt, is, that amongſt the Greeks, from the beginning they have not been induſtrious to keep publick Regiſters of ſuch matters as happened in any time or place: which hath made F them erre, and given thoſe a priviledge to lye, who afterwards would look to write any thing of ſuch matters as were acted long ſince. Neither are the other Greeks only to be touched with this negligence for not making account of ſuch Regiſters, but amongſt the Athenians alſo (who are reputed to be glorious for the antiquity of their Countrey, and who are exerciſed in Sciences) there is no mention of them. For it is ſaid, that the moſt ancient and publick writing which they have, are thoſe capital laws which were ſet down by their Law-maker Draco, who lived but a little time before Piſiſtratus Tyranny. What need we ſpeak of the Arcades, who vaunt themſelves of their antiquities? For they have learned the uſe of letters with very great difficulty, and ſometime after this: whereas therefore there was not any writing publiſhed before that time, which might inſtruct thoſe that would learn,

Thucydides writ a moſt exact Hiſtory of his time.

The cauſes of diſcord among the Jews.

learn, or reprehend thoſe that publiſhed untruths: from thence it is, that ſo many differen- G ces have happened amongſt Hiſtoriographers. A ſecond cauſe is, for that they, who addicted themſelves to compoſe Hiſtories, did not buſie themſelves about the inquiſition of the Truth (notwithſtanding that each of them did ordinarily promiſe no leſs) but they laboured to expreſs how eloquent they were, and fixed their whole ſtudy thereon, as the only means whereby they hoped to obtain reputation above the reſt. Some of them therefore addicted their ſtyles to fables, other ſome by flattering praiſes thought to curry favour with Kings and Cities. The reſt inforced their ſtudies to accuſations, by obtrecting the work of the Writer thereof, under truſt to get the more credit thereby. In effect they have followed that courſe in compoſing their Hiſtory, that was every way different from the true H nature thereof. (For the aſſured ſign of a perfect and true Hiſtory is, whereas all men accord both in word and writing in ſetting down the ſame thing:) and they who have written diverſly, made men believe that they were the trueſt amongſt all the reſt. We ought therefore to grant the ſuperiority to the Grecians in all that which concerneth Eloquence, and the Ornament of Language, but not in that which appertaineth to Antiquity or truth of Hiſtory, and eſpecially, when the queſtion is, what each man writ as touching his own Nation.

Another cauſe of their diſcord recorded by the Grecian Hiſtoriographers.

The ſign of a true Hiſtory.

Seeing therefore that both the Egyptians and Babylonians long time ſince uſed all diligence in writing, inſomuch as their Prieſts were hereunto enjoyned, who did moſt curiouſly intreat of all ſuch points; the ſame alſo did the Chaldees amongſt the Babylonians, and the I Phœnicians alſo (inhabiting amongſt the Greeks) uſed laws (both concerning private and publick affairs) which, becauſe all men confeſs it, I will omit to ſpeak of. I let paſs alſo to recount what care our Nation had of this point (no doubt greater then thoſe Nations above mentioned had) charging our high Prieſts and Prophets to execute this office, which cu-ſtom hath been obſerved even until this our Age: yea (and if I may preſume ſo far) will be obſerved in all ſucceeding Ages, as by the ſcope of my ſpeech enſuing, I will endeavour to make manifeſt. For our Nation did not only depute this office to the moſt juſt men amongſt them in the beginning, and unto ſuch as were always ready to appeaſe the heavy diſpleaſure and wrath of God kindled againſt them; but they alſo provided to preſerve the line and deſcent of Prieſts from all impurity, and from being intermingled with others. For no K man amongſt us can be a Prieſt, who is not born of a woman deſcended from the Prieſts line; neither in this caſe is any reſpect made either of riches or honours: but the party who claimeth the dignity of Prieſthood, muſt by many witneſſes prove his Genealogy, and that he is deſcended from Prieſts. This cuſtom is not only of force in Jurie, or our own Country, but whereſoever elſe any of our Nation inhabit, as in Egypt and Babylon, and in any other place, where continually the Prieſts in their marriages have this reſpect, not to marry with any woman that is not of their own line, and they ſend unto Jeruſalem the name and Pedigree of the woman whom they have married, and all teſtimony hereof which they can deduce from her Anceſtors. Now if Wars moleſt our Nation (as often they have) in the time of Antiochus, ſirnamed Epiphanes, of Pompey the Great, Quintilius Varo, and eſpecially in L this our Age, then thoſe Prieſts who ſurvive, make new Genealogies, and Pedigrees out of our holy writ for the foreſaid women, that are not devoured by the fury of War. For they come unto theſe women, not fearing the Company of ſtrangers amongſt whom they live:
yea, this is an evident token of the Prieſts integrity, that every Prieſt during the revolution of two thouſand years, are regiſtred together with the names of their fathers, and if any one do erre or falſifie any of the things before-ſaid, he is then interdicted from the Altar and from exerciſing any Prieſtly function. So that in the writings of ſuch men, all things muſt of neceſſity be true, and as they ought to be, for that neither all men are permitted to write, nor yet any diſſonance and diſagreement is found in their writings. For ſuch things as paſt in ancient times quite beyond the memory of men, were only written by our Pro- M phets, who had the knowledge thereof by inſpiration from God himſelf: but other things of latter time are only recorded by thoſe who lived in the age, wherein the things they writ of were done. The books amongſt us, containing the Hiſtories of all Ages, are neither infinite, nor one repugnant to another: for all our Chronicle is contained in 22 Books, to which Books it is impiety to deny credit.

A cuſtom which the Prieſts obſerved.

The Prieſts amongſt the Jews are every one regiſtred with the name of their fathers and this cuſtom hath continued two thouſand years.

Two and twenty Books of holy Writ.

Five of theſe Books were written by Moſes, comprehending Genealogies, and the begining of mankind, and ſuch notable events as hapned even from the beginning of the World until his death; which is little leſs then three thouſand years. After the death of Moſes, until the time wherein Artaxerxes lived, who was King of the Perſians, and Son to Xerxes,

the

the Prophets of our Nation every one writ the History of his time wherein he lived, so that of these mens writings we have thirteen books: the four other books, which make up the number already mention'd, are known to contain holy Hymns dedicated unto God, and wholsome precepts for mans life and conversation. All things which from Artaxerxes, until our time have hapned, are also set down in writing: yet the books wherein they are registred, do not deserve so much credit as the former of ancient times, for that there was no certain succession of Prophets in this age. Moreover, it is evident, that to the former works we give as great credit as to things we our selves write; and notwithstanding, they have been so long written, yet in all that time no man durst presume either to alter or blot out any thing therein contained. For all Jews even from their cradle do believe these books to be sacred, holy, and divine, and therefore do give all credit possible unto them, and so would willingly suffer death, rather then to do the contrary. Many captives of our Nation have already been cruelly tormented, and divers ways put to death in open Theaters, only for that they would not commit any thing either in word or deed against their laws, nor violate the writings of their fore-fathers. Now who amongst the Greeks did ever sustain the like? Nay, they are so far from doing it, that none can be found among them who would suffer any loss in his goods or fortunes, thereby to preserve all the writings of their Nation from perdition: and the reason hereof is, that every one esteemeth the verity of their Histories to depend upon the will of the Writer. And this they do also of their most ancient Historiographers, and not without cause: for they every day see men of their own times writing Histories of matters long past before in former ages, wherein neither themselves were present, neither yet vouchsafe they to credit the writings of such as were then eye-witnesses thereof; yea, some among them have divulged Histories of such things, as of late befel our Nation, when themselves never have bin in the place where such matters past as they did write of were, nor have lived in any neighbour place, where they might have probable report how matters past, but only making a few centones or broken news, they most impudently arrogate to their patcht stuff, the name of a History.

The Jews and Grecians are compared together.

Some others have written of the wars of the Jews.

I my self have composed a most true History of those wars, and of every particular thing there done, as well I might, having been present in all those affairs. For I was Captain of the Galileans amongst our Nation, so long as any resistance could be made against the Romans: and then it so fell out, that I was taken by the Romans, and being prisoner unto Titus and Vespasian, they caused me to be an eye-witness of all things that past. First, In bonds and fetters, and afterward freed from them, I was brought from Alexandria with Titus, when he went to the siege of Jerusalem. So that nothing could then pass whereof I had not notice. For beholding the Roman Army, I committed to writing all things with all possible diligence. My self did only manage all matters disclosed unto the Romans by such as yielded themselves, for that I only did perfectly understand them. Lastly, Being at Rome, and having now leisure, all business being past, I used the help of some (for the privity of the Greek tongue) and so I published a History of all that had hapned in the foresaid wars: which History of mine is so true, that I fear not to call Vespasian and Titus Emperors in those wars, to witness for them. I first gave a copy of that book to them, afterwards to many noble Romans, who also were present in those wars; I sold also many of them to our own Nation, to such as understood the Greek language, amongst whom were Julius, Archelaus, Herod the honest, and the most worthy King Agrippa, who all do testifie, that my History containeth nothing but truth: Who would not have been silent, if any thing either for ignorance or flattery I had changed or omitted any particular. Yet notwithstanding all this, some ill disposed persons endeavour to discredit my History, as though they were disputing pro and contra amongst children in schools, being sometimes on a sudden to forge a feigned accusation, and otherwise to feign a slanderous and sudden detraction, never considering that he who promiseth other men a true relation of things past, must either be privy unto them by his own knowledg, as having been present in the affairs, or else have that which he speaketh from other mens mouths, by report of them who know them: both which I have done. For I gathered my other books of Antiquity out of holy Scripture, being my self a Priest, and skilful in our Law; and the History of our wars I have written, my self being an Agent in many matters therein contained, and an eye-witness of the rest; so that nothing was said or done whereof I had not notice. How then can any one excuse them from impudency and malice, who labour against me to prove my relation false? They perhaps alledge, that they have read the Commentary containing the Emperours acts, yet for all

Some do derogate from Josephs History.

all this, they were not preſent in any action, repugnant to that, which my Hiſtory re- G counteth.

Thus have I (as I thought it neceſſary) made a digreſſion to ſhew how they are able to perform their word, who diſcrediting my Hiſtory, promiſe to ſet down truth in writing. I have alſo ſufficiently (as I think) demonſtrated, that the regiſtring of things is more ancient amongſt other Nations, then amongſt the Greeks. I will now firſt of all diſpute againſt thoſe, who with all might and main labour to prove our Nation of no Antiquity, for that (as they ſay) no Greek Writer maketh any mention of it. This done, I will bring forth proof and teſtimony of the Antiquity hereof out of other Writers, and ſo I will ſhew that their tongues are no ſlander, who ſeek to diſcredit our Nation. Firſt therefore, our Nation neither inhabiteth a Country bordering upon the Sea, neither are we delighted in merchandize, nor for this cauſe wearied with pilgrimages from place to place. But our Cities are ſcituate far H B from the Sea in amoſt fertile ſoyl, which we till with all induſtry, and our whole endeavours are how to get food for our children, and to keep our Country Laws, and how to leave unto our poſterity the knowledge of Piety, which work we think all our age ought to be employed in. Beſide all this before mentioned, we have a form of living, different from all other Nations: all which concurring together, we had no need to traffick with the Greeks, as the Egyptians and the Phœnicians do, who give themſelves to bargaining and merchandize only for the covetouſneſs of money. Neither were our Anceſtors delighted in theſts and robberies, nor did our fathers make war upon any Nation, for deſire of larger poſſeſſions: Notwithſtanding, our Country was furniſhed with many thouſands of ſtrong warlike men. Wherefore the Phœnicians ſailing unto the Greeks to traffick with them, they were thus made known unto them, and by them the Egyptians, and all other Nations, who ſayling I upon the Seas, brought Merchandize into Greece. The Medes alſo and Perſians were known C unto them, after ſuch time as they openly reigned over Aſia, and the Perſians warred even to the other oppoſite continent.

Two things which Joſeph intendeth.

The Jews care to bring up their children.

The ancient Jews had no need to traffick with the Grecians.

Moreover, the Greeks knew the Thracians, becauſe they were their neighbours, and the Scythians by ſayling to Pontus; and finally, all that were diſpoſed to write, knew all the Nations bordering either upon the Eaſtern and Weſtern Seas; but ſuch as dwelt far from the Sea and Sea-coaſt, were long time unknown, as alſo appears in Europe: for neither Thucydides nor Herodotus, nor any other of that time, maketh any mention of Rome; notwithſtanding, that ſo long ſince it was ſo mighty, and made ſo great wars: yet at laſt with much ado the Greeks heard of it. Yea, their moſt curious Writers, and namely Ephorus, were ſo ignorant K D of the Frenchmen and Spaniards, that they thought the Spaniards to be a people only denominated of one City, wherein they inhabited, whereas the whole world now knoweth them to inhabit a vaſt Country, and a great part of the Weſtern world. Likewiſe the ſaid Greek Writers relate the manners of the foreſaid people to be ſuch, as neither are, nor were ever uſed among them. And the only cauſe why they were ignorant of the truth, was the diſtance of the place; and theſe writers would ſeem to tell ſomething which others of former time had not ſpoken of. No marvel therefore though our Nation was unknown, and none of them in their writings made any mention of us, being both ſo far from the Sea, and living after a different manner.

The Romans were lately known to the Greeks.

Certain Hiſtoriographers report Spain to be only one City.

Put caſe therefore that I denied the Greeks to be of any antiquity, and to prove my aſſer- L E tion ſhould conclude their Nation to be modern, for that our Hiſtories made no mention of them, would they not laugh at this reaſon, and uſe the teſtimony of their neighbour Nations to prove their Antiquity? I therefore will do the like, and uſe the teſtimony of the Egyptians and Phœnicians, whoſe Record, the Greeks cannot deny. For all Egyptians in general, are our Enemies, and among the Phœnicians they eſpecially of Tyre; Which I cannot juſtly ſay of the Chaldees, who having been Princes over our Nation, and becauſe of their affinity and alliance with our Countrymen, have in their Chronicles made mention of the Jews. Yet when I have proved what I now aver, and refel the ſlanderous reports againſt us, I will then alſo ſhew who amongſt the Greeks ſpake of us, that ſo the Greeks may alſo be deprived of this ſhift and refuge, to excuſe their malicious lies falſly forged againſt our Nation. And firſt F of all I will begin with the writings of the Egyptians, who as they well know, do nothing at M all favour us. Wherefore Manethon, an Egyptian born, ſkilful in the Greek tongue, as by his works appears (for he writ in Greek) compiling a Hiſtory of the cuſtoms and religion of his fore-fathers, collected (as himſelf reporteth) out of the Egyptian holy writings, often reprehendeth Herodotus, who being indeed ignorant, did much help the Egyptians. This Arguments to prove the Jews of more antiquity then the Greeks.

Manethon an Egyptian Writer.

Mane-

A Manethon, in his ſecond Book of the Egyptian Cuſtoms, ſaith thus (I will ſet down his own words, becauſe I uſe them as a witneſs) We have a King (quoth he) named Timæus, in whoſe reign God being angry with us, contrary to all expectation, an obſcure people taking courage, came from the Eaſt, and pitching their Tents in our Country, conquered it by force, no man reſiſting them; and committing our Princes to bonds, did finally burn our Cities, and deſtroyed the Temples of our gods, and behaved themſelves moſt cruelly againſt the Inhabitants, killing many of them, and making ſlaves of the reſt with their wives and children: finally, they choſe a King amongſt themſelves, who ſhould be then of our Country, his name was Saltis, who coming to Memphis, made both the higher and lower Province tributaries, leaving Garriſons in ſtrong holds, and fortifying thoſe places in the Eaſt: Likewiſe, foreſeeing that the Aſſyrians were more mighty then he, and would invade his Country, he found out in this Province a City called Saite fit for his purpoſe, being ſcituate on the Eaſt ſide of the River Bubaſtis, which by an ancient Divine was called Avaris, he builded up this City, and compaſſed it with moſt huge Walls, and placed in it two hundred thouſand armed men to keep it. This Saltis came in harveſt time, to the intent that he might both pay his Souldiers, and be a terrour unto other people, and after he had reigned nineteen years, he dyed. Saltis ſubdued the Egyptians.

After him ſucceeded another King called Bæon, who reigned four and forty years, next to him Aphinas, who reigned thirty ſix years and ſeven months, then Apholis, who reigned threeſcore and one years, and then Iandas, who reigned fifty years and one month, after them alſo reigned Alſis, nine and forty years and two months; and theſe ſix were the firſt Kings amongſt them, ever deſtroying and warring upon the Egyptians, and labouring to extinguiſh their race. This Nation was called Hicſos, which ſignifieth Kings ſhepherds: for Hic in the ſacred tongue, ſignifieth a King, and Sos a ſhepherd or ſhepherds, according to the common ſpeech, and Hicſos is a compound word. Some ſay theſe people were Arabians: but in other Copies I find that Hicſos, is not interpreted Kings ſhepherds, but ſhepherds that were Captives: for Hic, and Hac alſo when it is pronounced, doth in the Egyptian tongue ſignifie a Captive; and this latter expoſition ſeemeth to me to be the trueſt, for it is more agreeable with the Hiſtory. Wherefore Manethon reporteth theſe foreſaid Kings and Shepherds to have ruled Egypt five hundred and eleven years: and after theſe, the King of Thebes, and the King of the reſidue of Egypt, uniting their forces together, invaded the ſaid Shepherds and held on great and long Wars againſt them, and that the ſaid Shepherds were overcome by the King Alisfragumthoſis: alſo that then they loſt all Egypt which he had in their power, and that they were ſhut up in a place called Avaris containing ten thouſand acres of ground, which as Manethon reporteth, theſe ſhepherds environed round about with a huge Wall, to the end that all their whole proviſion might be fortified, and all the preys which they got, defended. Moreover, that Themoſis ſon of the ſaid Alisfragumthoſis endeavoured by force to ſubdue them, and for this cauſe beſieged them with four hundred and 80000 armed men: and at laſt deſpairing to take them by ſiege, he covenanted with them that they ſhould ſafely depart out of Egypt whither they would; and that they upon theſe conditions together with all their families and goods, and cattel, departed out of Egypt into the Wilderneſs, and ſo into Syria, being in number two hundred and forty thouſand, and that fearing the puiſſance of the Aſſyrians, who at that time reigned in Aſia, they builded a City in the Country now called Judæa, which they made ſo large, that it might receive them all, and this City they called Jeruſalem. Further, the ſaid Manethon in another Book of the Egyptian Affairs ſaith, that in the holy Writings, he findeth the foreſaid ſhepherds called Captives, wherein he ſaith moſt true. For our Anceſtors were wont to feed cattel, and ſo leading a paſtoral life, were called Shepherds, neither are they unjuſtly called Captives: for our forefather Joſeph told the King of Egypt that he was a Captive; and long time after he called his brethren into Egypt by the Kings command; but we will hereafter examine this point more ſtraightly: I will now cite the teſtimony of the Egyptians concerning this point, and alſo relate the words of Manethon touching the time when this befel, who ſaith as followeth. Kings Shepherds.

After that the Nation of Shepherds were departed out of Egypt unto Jeruſalem, King Themoſis who drave them out of the Land, reigned twenty five years and four months, and then dyed: and his ſon Chebron ſucceeded him, who reigned thirteen years, and after him Amenophis twenty years and ſeven months, next, his ſiſter Ameſſes one and twenty years and nine months, then reigned Mephios twelve years and nine months, and Mephamuthoſis muthoſis twenty five years and ten months, Themoſis nine years and eight months, Amenophis thirty years and ten months, Orus thirty ſix years and five months, after him his daughter Achemcheres, twelve years and one month, and the brother of Rathotis nine years, Achencheres twelve years and five months, another Achencheres twelve years and three months, Armais four years and one month, Armeſis one year and four months, Armeſeſmiamus threeſcore and ſix years and two months, Amenophis nineteen years and ſix months. Moreover, that Sethoſis having made ready a huge Army both of foot and horſe, and alſo a Navy at Sea, left the Government of Egypt unto his brother Armais, and permitted unto him all other Kingly Authority, only forbidding him to wear a Diadem, and to oppreſs the Queen, mother to his children, commanding him alſo to abſtain from the reſt of the Kings Concubines. And Sethoſis himſelf went to Cyprus and Phœnicia, againſt the Aſſyrians and Medes, and ſubdued them all, partly by the ſword, partly by the fear of his power and greatneſs: and being proud of all this his fortunate ſucceſs, he bent himſelf againſt the Eaſtern Country, and deſtroyed with fire and ſword the Cities of that place, with whole Provinces: and ſpending much time in theſe Wars, his brother Armais whom he left in Egypt, did without fear commit all that he forbade him to do: for he oppreſſed the Queen violently, and daily lay with the reſt of the Kings Concubines, and being thereto counſelled by his friends, he put a Crown upon his head and rebelled againſt his brother. Alſo that he who was then Chief of the Egyptians holy cuſtoms, ſent letters unto Sethoſis, containing all that had happened, and how Armais had rebelled againſt him: who returning to Peluſia, came and enjoyed again his own Kingdom which by his name was called Egypt: for Manethon writeth that this Sethoſis was named Egyptus, and his brother Armais Danaus.

Sethoſis King of Egypt, made his brother Armais Governor of his Country.

Whereupon Egypt took his name.

Thus far Manethon, out of whom it is evident by computation of the foreſaid times, that our Nation was delivered out of Egypt, three hundred ninety and three years before Danaus, and inhabited this Country of Judæa ſo long, before Danaus came unto Argos: notwithſtanding the Inhabitants of Argos boaſt their City is moſt ancient. Wherefore Manethon recounteth two things for us out of the Egyptian letters: firſt, that we came from another place to them, afterwards went out of their Country again, and that ſo long ago, as it was almoſt a thouſand years before the Trojan Wars. Touching thoſe things which Manethon profeſſeth himſelf, not to have gathered out of the Writings of the Egyptians, who did write out of certain tales and reports, I will hereafter ſhew, how they are alledged without any reaſon for them. For I will once again leave theſe, and go to the teſtimony of the Phœnicians, which they writ concerning our Nation. The Tyrians therefore have Chronicles of very great Antiquity, which they have kept with all diligence, concerning that which hath been done among them, and indeed they are worthy of memory. Amongſt theſe Records it is written, that King Solomon built a Temple at Jeruſalem, a hundred forty three years and eight months, before the Tyrians erected Carthage. So they have regiſtred the building of our Temple, for Hircanus King of the Tyrians, was our King Solomons friend, obliged unto him for his fathers ſake, who for this cauſe alſo of his own liberality, gave Solomon a hundred and twenty talents of gold towards the building of the Temple, and cut down the moſt goodly wood called Libanus, which he beſtowed upon him, to make the roof of the Temple withal: for which bounty, Solomon gave him again many liberal gifts, and among the reſt a Country of Galilee named Zabulon: but Solomons wiſdom was the chief cauſe of this Kings friendſhip towards him. For they ſent Problems one to the other to be anſwered, and Solomon in his anſwers appeared moſt witty, as alſo he did in many things elſe; and even until this day, many of the Epiſtles ſent one unto another, are kept among the Tyrians. And that I do not fear the Authority amongſt the Tyrians, I will prove by the teſtimony of Dius, a man who by common conſent hath faithfully written the Phœnician Hiſtory, wherein he writeth as followeth.

Manethon ſheweth the Jews coming into Egypt & their departure.

Solomon built a Temple in Jeruſalem 143 years and 8 months, before the Tyrians builded Carthage.

The friendſhip of the Tyrian King and of King Solomon.

Problems of Hircanus and Solomon.

After the death of Abibalus, Hircanus his ſon reigned in his ſtead, who encreaſed the number of his Eaſtern Cities, and inlarged Jeruſalem, he alſo joyned the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, ſcituate in an Iſland, unto it, filling up the water with earth, adorned it with golden gifts. After this aſcending into Libanus, he cut down the Wood to build Temples, and that the King of Jeruſalem named Solomon, ſent unto him certain riddles to be expounded, and he again the like unto him, covenanting together, that he who could not tell the meaning of one anothers riddles, ſhould pay unto the other a ſum of money, and that Hircanus confeſſing he could not expound Solomons riddles, did pay unto him much money: Laſtly, that one Abdemonus a Tyrian did expound the ſaid riddles, and writ more unto Solomon, which which if Solomon could not interpret, he ſhould pay unto Hircanus a ſum of Money, and this teſtimony Dius beareth us concerning the foreſaid matter. But I will now recount the words of Menander an Epheſian, who hath regiſtred the acts of all Kings both at home and abroad, endeavouring to make a true Hiſtory out of the writings of every Country. This man writing of the Tyrian Kings, and coming to Hiramus, he ſaith thus of him: Abibalus dying, there ſucceeded in the Kingdom his Son Hiramus, who lived 34 years: and this King with a rampire conjoyned Eurychorus, and erected there a Pillar of Gold in Jupiter's Temple, and went into the woods, and cut down the Cedars of Libanus to make coverings for the Temples; of which, pulling down the old, he erected new, and dedicated the Temple of Hercules and Aſtartus: but that to Hercules in the Month of Peritius, and then the other to Aſtartus, when he with an Army went againſt the Tyrians, who did not pay him tribute, whom when he had ſubdued, he returned again.

The teſtimony of Menander the Epheſian. The Genealogy of King Hiramus.

At this time lived Abdemonus a ſervant unto the King, who was wont to expound the parables, which King Solomon of Jeruſalem ſent unto King Hiramus: now how long it was from this Kings time till the building of Carthage, we may thus calculate. After the death of Hiramus, his Son Beleaſtartus, ſucceeded him, who lived forty and three years, and reigned ſeven: after him his Son Abdaſtartus, who lived twenty years, and reigned nine; but this King was treacherouſly ſlain by the four Sons of his Nurſe, the eldeſt of whom reigned twelve years. Next whom, Aſtartus the Son of Beleaſtartus, who lived fifty and four years, and reigned twelve: after him ruled his Brother Aſtarimus, who lived fifty and four years, and ſate in the Kingdom nine, then he was ſlain of his brother Phelletes, who reigned eight months, and lived fifty years, and was ſlain by a Prieſt of Aſtarta named Ithobalus, who lived threeſcore and eight, and reigned thirty two years: him ſucceeded his Son Badezorus, who lived forty five years, and reigned ſix years, to him ſucceeded his Son Mettinus, who lived thirty two years, and reigned nine. After him Pigmalion who lived fifty ſix years, and reigned forty: in the ſeventh year of whoſe reign, his Siſter Dido builded a City in Africa, and named it Carthage: ſo that from the time of King Hiramus unto the building of Carthage, is by this computation a hundred fifty five years, and two Months: and for as much as the Temple of Jeruſalem was built in the twelfth year of Hiramus his reign, the computation of the time ſince that year until the building of Carthage is a hundred forty three years and eight Months. What need we alledge more, ſeeing this teſtimony of the Phœnicians? The truth is now ſufficiently made manifeſt; for our Anceſtors muſt need have come into this Country we inhabit, before ſuch time as they built a Temple in it, as I have alſo made manifeſt in my Books of Antiquity, collected out of our holy Scripture.

Carthage built in Africk by Dido Pigmalion's Siſter.

I will now ſpeak of that which the Chaldees writ of us in their Hiſtories; which do much agree in all other matters with thoſe of our Nation. And firſt let Beroſus be my witneſs, who was a Chaldean born, yet a man famous and known unto all that love learning, for he in the Grecian tongue did write Aſtronomy, and the Chaldees Philoſophy. Beroſus imitating the moſt ancient Hiſtories writeth of the Deluge, and how mankind was therein extinguiſhed, and he in all things imitateth Moſes. He alſo ſpeaketh of the Ark wherein our forefather was preſerved, and affirmeth that it was carried into the tops of the Mountains in Armenia: after this he proſecuteth the Genealogy of all that reigned from Noe, until Nabulaſſarus King of the Babylonians and Chaldeans. He likewiſe ſetteth down how long every one reigned, and in proſecuting the deeds of this King he recounteth how he ſent his Son Nabuchodonoſor into Egypt, and to our Country with great power, who finding them rebels, ſubdued them and burnt the Temple at Jeruſalem, and ſo departed, carrying with him all our Nation into Babylon: whereupon our City was deſolate ſeventy years until the reign of Cyrus King of the Perſians. Moreover he affirmeth that the Babylonian kept Egypt, Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia, exacting more of his ſubjects than ever any King of Babylon or Chaldea had done before his time. And the words of Beroſus muſt needs be to this effect: Nabulaſſarus his Father hearing that his Subſtitute in Egypt, Cœloſyria, and Phœnicia had rebelled, he himſelf not being able to take ſuch pains, committed theſe Affairs unto his Son Nabuchodonoſor, and gave unto him a part of his Army; for that he was in the flower of his age, and ſent him againſt him: and Nabuchodonoſor fighting with the ſaid Champion, overthrew him, and ſubdued the Country which of old belonged unto them, and at the ſame time his Father Nabulaſſarus fell ſick in Babylon, and died, having reigned twenty nine years. But Nabuchodonoſor long after underſtanding his Fathers death, he diſpoſed of Egypt and other Provinces as he thought good, and taking the Captives of Judæa, Phœnicia, Nabuchodonoſor ſucceedeth in his fathers Kingdom.

Phœnicia, and the Syrians that lived in Egypt, he committed them to certain of his friends, G to be brought with other Carriage and his Army to Babylon; and ſo he himſelf, accompanied with a very few, took his journey to Babylon through the Deſart: and finding that the Chaldees ruled all, and that their Nobility reſerved the Kingdom for him, he was made King, and commanded Houſes to be built for the Captives that were coming, in the moſt convenient places of Babylon, and he of the ſpoil beautified the Temple of Belus and other places moſt richly, and built a new City without the Wall of the old: and providing, leſt hereafter the Enemies might turn the River and ſo have acceſs unto the City, he invironed the inner City with three ſeveral Walls, and the outmoſt City likewiſe. The Walls whereof were made of Brick, but the Walls of the inner City were of Brick and Bitumen: H this done, he builded moſt ſumptuous Gates which might have become Temples: and moreover, neer unto his Fathers Palace he builded another far greater, and more coſtly than it was, the pomp whereof it were hard and perhaps tedious to expreſs. Yet this we will rehearſe worth the noting, that this ſo ambitious and above all credit gorgeous Palace, was builded in fifteen days: in it he erected rocks of ſtone like mountains, beſet with all ſorts of trees; he alſo made a famous Garden, all ſupported with Pillars, for that his Wife being brought up in the Country of the Medes, deſired to have a proſpect into the fields and mountains.

Nabuchodonoſor builded a Palace.

This he relateth of the forementioned King, and many things more in his Book of the affairs of the Chaldees, wherein he reproveth the Greek Writers, who falſly affirm that Semiramis the Aſſyrian Queen built Babylon, and that they falſly report thoſe wonderful I works about Babylon, to have been by her made and finiſhed. We muſt needs think that the Chaldean Hiſtory is true, ſeeing it agreeth with that of the Phœnicians, which Beroſus writ of the King of Babylon, who ſubverted both Phœnicia and all Syria: with them alſo accordeth Philoſtratus in his Hiſtory of the ſiege of Tyria, and Megaſthenes alſo in his fourth Book of the affairs of India; where he laboureth to prove, that the ſaid King excelled Hercules in ſtrength and valour, affirming that he ſubdued the greateſt part of Africk, and Spain, and that the Temple of Jeruſalem was burnt by the Babylonians, and again re-edified by Cyrus; and we may prove it out of Beroſus, who in his third book ſaith as followeth: Nabuchodonoſor having begun the third wall, fell ſick and died, when he had reigned forty three years, and K his Son Evelmeradochus ſucceeded him, who for his iniquity and luſtful living, was treacherouſly ſlain by his Siſters Husband, named Nirigliſſoroor, after he had reigned two years. He being dead, the Traytor Nirigliſſoroor uſurped the Kingdom, and reigned four years; whoſe Son then a child was made King, called by name, Laboroſardochus, and he reigned nine months; who for that he ſeemed to be of very corrupt manners, was ſlain by his own friends: after whoſe death, they who ſlew him conſulting together, did make one Nabonidus a Babylonian King. At this time the walls of Brick and Bitumen about the River of Babylon were built. In the eighth year of this Kings reign, Cyrus coming with an Army out of Perſia, conquered all Aſia, and came with his Forces againſt Babylon: but the King of Babylon having notice of his coming, levied an Army meeting him in the way, and joyned battel L with him; but being overcome in the fight, he accompanied with a very few of his men, was forced to flye into Borſippa. Cyrus now beſieged Babylon, and purpoſed to deſtroy the outward walls thereof, but by reaſon that it was too ſtrong and too hard to win, he returned to Borſippa to beſiege Nabonidus the King of Babylon who was fled thither. But Nabonidus not abiding the event of war, yielded himſelf unto Cyrus, who dealt mercifully with him, and gave him a Territory in Carmania, but expelled him out of Babylon: ſo Nabonidus led the reſt of his life in that Province. This Hiſtory agreeth with ours; for in our writings we find that Nabuchodonoſor in the eighteenth year of his reign did deſtroy our Temple, and that it ſo remained threeſcore and ten years: alſo that in the ſecond year of King Cyrus, the foundations thereof were laid again, and that it was finiſhed and re-edified in the ſecond year of M
King Darius his reign. This done, I will alſo relate the Hiſtories of the Phœnicians, that we may abound with proof of that we ſay, for they make a computation of the years after this manner: In the reign of King Ithobalus, Nabuchodonoſor beſieged Tyre thirteen years, after whom Baal reigned ten years, next him Judges were appointed, to wit, they that follow; Ecnibalus the Son of Balachus judged two Months, Chelbis the Son of Abdæus ten Months, Abbarus the High Prieſt three Months, Myttomus and Geraſtus Sons of Abdilimos judged ſix years, after whom Balatorus reigned one year, and after his death the Tyrians called Merbalus from Babylon, and made him King, and he reigned four years: and he then dying, they ſent alſo to Babylon for his Brother Iromus, who reigned twenty years, Semiramis did not build Babylon.

The King of Babylon excelled Hercules in ſtrength and noble valorous deeds.

The walls of Babylon built of brick and bitumen.

in whose reign Cyrus obtained the Persian Empire, so that this whole time is fifty four years and three months: for Nabuchodonosor began to besiege Tyre in the seventh year of his reign, and in the fourteenth year of King Ironus his reign Cyrus was made Emperour of Persia. Nabuchodonosor besieged Tyre.

Wherefore both the Chaldees and Tyrian Historiographers agree with us concerning our Temple. So that the Antiquity of our Nation above mentioned is now made manifest, and without all controversie. And that which is already alledged to this end, may be sufficient for them, who are not upon purpose contradictious. It is therefore requisite (to satisfie them who give no credit to the Writings of other Nations, and contend that the Grecian Historiesonly are to be believed) to bring many testimonies from the Greeks themselves, who have as opportunity served, made mention of our Nation, and known it. Pythonis a Samian born, both of great Antiquity, and excelling all other Philosophers in holiness towards the gods, is not only convinced to have known the customs of our Nation, but he did also, as it plainly appeareth, imitate them in many things. His writings are in no place extant, but divers have recorded many notable things of him, and especially Hermippus a man most diligent in searching of Histories. This Hermippus recounteth in his first Book of Pythagoras, that the said Philosopher (having one of his familiar friends,named Calliphon, dead, who was a Crotonian born) reported this mans soul to be perpetually with him, and that the said soul commanded him not to pass the place where his Ass fell, and that he should abstain from unclean water, and that he should with all diligence eschew blasphemy: and then it followeth, this he did and said, imitating the opinions of the Jews and Grecians, and applying them to himself. For it is certainly reported that this man gathereth much of his Philosophy out of the Jews Laws. Our Nation in times past was well known to divers Cities, so that many of them do now observe our customs, and others esteem them worth the imitation, as Theophrastus doth witness in his Book intituled De legibus: for he saith that the Tyrian Laws forbid to swear by any strange Sacrament, and amongst these strange and forreign Sacraments, he reckoneth the oath called Corban, which oath is used only amongst the Jews, and in our language signifieth the gift of God. Herodotus of Halicarnassus knew our Nation also, and in a manner maketh mention of it: for speaking of the Colchians, he saith thus in his second Book: The Colchians, Egyptians, and Æthiopians only amongst all other Nations did use Circumcision in the beginning: for the Phœnicians and Syrians living in Palestina do confess themselves to have learned this custom from the Egyptians, and the Syrians living near unto Thermodoontes, and the River Parthenius, and their neighbours the Macronians, are reported lately to have learned it of the Colchians: and these are they only that use Circumcision, and they do like unto the Egyptians, but I am not able to say, whether the Egyptians or Æthiopians learned it of the other. Herodotus therefore affirmeth the Syrians in Palestina to use Circumcision, and it is manifest that of all that inhabit Palestina, the Jews only use it, which he knowing writeth so of them. Cherilus also an ancient Poet maketh mention of our Nation, and affirmeth that our Country-men warred under Xerxes against the Greeks, and numbring them of the Countries that followed him, he lastly spake thus of our Nation: The Chaldees and Tyrians agree with the Jews History. Hermippus writings and testimony of Pythagoras. Theophrastus. Corban the gift of God. Herodotus the Halicarnassian touching the Jews Circumcision. Cherilus an ancient Poet his testimony of the Jews.

A people strange followed this royal throng,
Their language was th'unknown Phœnician tongue:
In th'hills of Solymus their dwelling was,
Near to a Lake for greatness which did pass:
Their heads were shav'd, and for the heads attire,
They wore an horse-skin dryed at the fire.

It is evident as I think that he speaketh of the Jews: for the Mountains of Solymus are in our Country, and that Lake also called Asphaltites, which is the greatest and vastest of all Lakes that are in Syria, and thus Cherilus maketh mention of us. And that the Jews were not known only of the Greeks, but also admired of them, it is easie to prove not out of the obscurest Writers, but by the testimony of their wisest Philosophers: For Clearchus disciple unto Aristotle, and the best amongst all the Peripateticks, in his first Book De somno, saith, that his master Aristotle spake thus of a certain Jew, and reporting Aristotles words, he saith thus: It were too tedious to recount all things else which he alledgeth, but I will set down that only that may cause the man to be admired. Hyperochides answered that they were all very desirous to hear it: then quoth Clearchus, according to Aristotles precepts in his Rhe- Asphaltites the Lake. The testimony of Clearchus disciple of Aristotle touching the Jews.

torick, I will firſt recount of what Nation the man was, leſt I ſeem to oppoſe my ſelf to him, G that ſet down the foreſaid precept. Do ſo, quoth Hyperochides, if ſo you pleaſe. Then he ſaid, This man before mentioned was by Nation a Jew (born in Cœloſyria) one of the ſect of the Indian Philoſophers, and they are called (as I here reported) among the Indians, Calani, and among the Syrians, Jews, taking their name from the place where they inhabit, called Jury; the name of their City is hard to pronounce, for they call it Jeruſalem. This man entertained many ſtrangers, and he came from out of the higher Country down unto the Sea-coaſt, and he was very eloquent and of great courage. We at that time lived in Aſia, when this divine man came unto the place where we were, and began to confer with us, and with other Philoſophers, making tryal of their knowledge: and for that many learned men were aſſembled about him, he at laſt for this cauſe more willingly imparted ſome of his H knowledge unto them. Thus far Ariſtotle in Clearchus; recounting moreover at large the admirable abſtinence of the foreſaid Jew from meat, and his chaſtity: all which they that are deſirous to know may read in Clearchus, for I am loth to write any thing ſuperfluous.
Hecataus Abderita brought up with King Alexander. So now it is evident how Clearchus by the way of a digreſſion ſpeaking of another matter, maketh mention of us. But Hecatæus Abderita a Philoſopher, and one brought up with King Alexander, and dwelling with Ptolomæus of Lagus, did not only briefly make mention of us, but alſo writ a whole Book of our Nation the Jews, out of which I will briefly note ſome few points that occur, but firſt I will ſhew of what Antiquity he is. For he recordeth the time when Ptolomæus near unto Gaza fought with Demetrius, which happened the eleventh year after Alexanders death, in the hundred and ſeventeenth Olympiad, as Caſtor writeth: who ſpeaking of this Olympiad ſaith, that in this time Ptolomæus Lagus overcame Demetrius the I ſon of Antigonus at Gaza in fight: which Demetrius was called Poliorcetes, and all men confeſs that Alexander died in the hundred and fourteenth Olympiad: ſo that it is evident that at time wherein Alexander lived, our Nation flouriſhed. And Hecatæus ſaith, that after that battel fought at Gaza, Ptolomæus was made Lord of the places bordering about Syria, and that many men hearing of the clemency of Ptolomæus, followed him into Egypt, and converſed with him: amongſt the which one was called Ezekias the Jews high Prieſt, a man about threeſcore and ſix years old, and of chief notice and dignity of all his Nation,
A thouſand and five hundred Prieſts receive the Jews tenths. and moſt prudent and eloquent, one alſo who in all affairs had more experience then any man elſe. He likewiſe reporteth that the number of the Jews Prieſts who receive their K tenths, and rule all in general, is a thouſand and five hundred or thereabout: and again making mention of the ſame Ezekias, he ſaith, This man being in this reputation and honour, and converſing with us, by the help of ſome about him, declared all things wherein we and this Nation differ, and ſhewed unto us the place of his dwelling, and the manner of his converſation, which he had in writing.

After this, Hecatæus ſheweth what manner of people we are, and how religious in our laws, and how that we rather will ſuſtain all torments and death it ſelf, then violate them in any thing, and that we account it a worthy thing ſo to do: adding moreover, that being much ha-

Kings and their Officers, yet that we could not be forced to change our opinions, but that we are continually exerciſed to give a reaſon thereof. He alſo recordeth an example of our con- L ſtant minds: for Alexander (quoth he) being at Babylon, and purpoſing to re-edifie the Temple of Bell, he commanded all his ſouldiers to carry timber to the building thereof, and the Jews only diſobeyed his command, for the which they endured many ſtripes and torments, till ſuch time as the King freed them from it: and they (quoth he) returning to their own Country, deſtroyed all the Temples and Altars that they found there, and ſome of them were by the Officers therefore puniſhed, other eſcaped free; adding that we may juſtly be admired for theſe things, and that our Nation is exceeding populous; likewiſe that many of us were carried Captives into Babylon, and there ſerved the Perſians. Moreover, that many more F were diſperſt into Egypt after Alexanders death, for a tumult begun in Syria. He alſo record- M eth the greatneſs of our Country, and the fertility thereof; they inhabit (quoth he) a Country that hath almoſt thirty hundred thouſand acres of moſt fertile ground; for Jury
The largeneſs of Jury. is of this largeneſs: and that in times paſt we inhabited a large and very great City, which have many other Towns and Villages in every Province, but they have one moſt ſtrong City, the compaſs of whoſe Walls is fifty ſtounds, and in it inhabit a hundred and fifty thouſand men, and this City they called Jeruſalem, in the midſt thereof is a building of ſtone with four Porches a hundred cubits about, it hath alſo double gates wherein is a four-ſquared

Altar

A Altar made of unhewn ſtones joyned together, and it is twenty cubits ſquare every way, and ten cubits high, and about it is a moſt huge building, wherein is an Altar and a Candleſtick both of gold, weighing two talents, and there is kept a continual light night and day, which never goeth forth. Therein is no image nor gift, no trees nor wood growing there, nor any thing of this ſort. Therein inhabit Prieſts both night and day, celebrating certain purifications, and they drink no wine in the Temple.

The Prieſts do dwell in the Temple and drink no wine.

Moreover, he ſhewed how our Nation warred under Alexanders ſucceſſors, and he reporteth that which he heard of a certain Jew in the army, and I will ſet down the Authors own words. As I went (ſaith he) to the red Sea, a certain Jew, one of the horſmen that conducted us, named Moſollamus, who was a courageous man, and one who excelled all Archers
B elſe, both Greeks and other Nations; This Jew (every one haſting on forward of his journey, and being willed by a Sooth-ſayer to ſtand) asked for what cauſe the multitude ſtayed and went not forward? Preſently the Sooth-ſayer ſhewed him a bird, which he diligently viewed, and told the Jew, that if that bird did ſtand ſtill in the place, then it was expedient for them to ſtand, and if the bird did mount up and flye, that then they ought to march on forward; but if it flew towards the place from whence they came, that then it was wiſdom to retire. The Jew hereat was ſilent, yet drawing his bow, he ſhot an arrow and killed the bird; whereat the Sooth-ſayer and certain others were offended, and curſed him. But he, taking the unhappy bird in his hand, ſaid unto them: Are ye ſo mad, as to think that this bird, not having the foreſight to preſerve her ſelf from this death, is able to direct us in the C ſucceſs of our journey? Had this bird foreknown future events, ſhe would have eſchewed this place, for dread, that Moſollamus, a Jew ſhould have ſtrucken her with an arrow. But we will now leave the teſtimony of Hecatæus: for every one that liſt may read his Book, and there underſtand this more at large. I will not omit the teſtimony of Agatarchides, a man of no evil in his own opinion, yet indeed one who hath uſed detraction to our own Nation. This man ſpeaking of Stratonice, how leaving her husband Demetrius, ſhe came into Syria, and how Seleucus would not marry her as ſhe hoped (who having an army at Babylon, warred againſt Antioch, and had taken the City) and that ſhe fled into Seleucia, whereas ſhe might have made a ſpeedier eſcape by water, but that ſhe was forewarned in a ſleep ſo to do, and that ſhe was there taken and died, &c. Agatarchides, having uſed this preface, and in-
D veighed againſt Stratonices ſuperſtition, uſeth an example of our Nation on this manner: the people that are called Jews, inhabit a moſt ſtrong City, which they call Jeruſalem; theſe people are wont to reſt upon the ſeventh day, and do neither bear arms, nor till their grounds, nor do any other buſineſs on that day, but their cuſtom is to remain in their Temple, and there with ſtretched out arms continue in prayer till night. And ſo upon a time they perſevering in that foolery whilſt they ſhould have defended their City, Ptolomæus Lagus entred it with many people and a great Army: who greatly tyrannized over them; and ſo they found by experience, that the ſolemnity appointed by their Law, was prejudicial unto them: ſuch like Churches as this, did teach them and all Nations elſe to flee unto dreams, which their Law teacheth; neither conſidering that humane policy cannot prevail
E againſt that which muſt neceſſarily happen. Agatarchides thought this which he reports of us to be ridiculous; but they that weigh it with indifferency, ſhall perceive, that it is greater commendation to our Nation, who rather ſuffer their Country and our ſafety to be loſt and endamaged, then to violate the Laws of God.

Agatarchides his teſtimony of the Jews.

The Jews Sabbath.

I think, I am thus able to ſhew, that many Writers omitted to make mention of our Nation, not for that they knew us not, but for envy. For Jerom, who writ a Book of ſucceſſion, in the ſame time that Hecatæus lived, who was a friend unto King Antigonus, and being Preſident of Syria, never mentioneth us in all his Hiſtory; notwithſtanding he was brought up almoſt in our Country. But Hecatæus writ a Book of us; ſo different are the minds of men: for one of them thought our Nation worthy to be diligently recorded, the other through
F malice was hindred from ſpeaking the truth: yet the Hiſtories of the Chaldees, Egyptians and Phœnicians, may ſuffice to prove our Antiquity, together with the Greek Writers: for beſides thoſe before mentioned, Theophraſtus alſo, Theodotus, Manaſſeas, Ariphanes, Hermogenes, Euemerus, Conon, Zepyrion, and many others, no doubt (for I have not peruſed all mens books) have manifeſtly teſtified of us. For many of the foreſaid men were blinded with errors, as not having read our holy Scriptures, yet they all jointly teſtifie our Antiquity, for which I now alledge them. Truly Demetrius Phalereus, Philon the elder, and Eupolemus did not much erre from the truth, and therefore reaſon it is they ſhould be born withal: for they were not ſo skilful as to teach our Writings with ſo much curioſity. Being come

Why certain Writers omit to ſpeak of the Jews.

thus

thus far, it reſteth that I now preſent one point more, whereof I made mention in the beginning of this Book: to wit, that I declare the detractions and ſlanderous reports of divers concerning our Nation, to be falſe and void of truth; and I will uſe the teſtimony of thoſe Writers, who record, that the lying Hiſtoriographers, at ſuch time as they committed to writing the foreſaid detractions, did alſo even againſt themſelves regiſter ſuch like ſlanders as they did againſt us. And I doubt not, but that all thoſe who are converſant in Hiſtories can teſtifie, that the like hath been done by moſt Writers for certain private hatred, or ſuch like reſpects. For ſome of the Gentiles have attempted to deface the honour and reputation of the moſt renowned Cities, and to defame the manners of their inhabitants. Thus did Pheopompus to Athens, and Tolycrates to Lacedæmon; and the Author that writ Tripoliticum (for it was not Theopompus as ſome ſuppoſe) uſed the City Thebes very hardly: and Timæus in his Hiſtories of the foreſaid places, doth many times detract both them and others. And this they do, calumniating the moſt excellent that are, in ſomething or other; ſome for envy and malice, others, that their fond babbling may make them famous, and ſo indeed it doth among fools, that are known to have no ſound judgment, but wiſe men will condemn their malice. To be ſhort, this is the cauſe of ſo many ſlanderous reports forged againſt our Nation: ſome to gratifie the Egyptians have attempted to deprave the truth, and ſo have neither reported the variety concerning our Anceſtors coming into Egypt, nor touching their departure from thence, and they have had many cauſes of malice and envy urging them hereto. And chiefly for that our progenitors in their Country waxed mighty, and ſo departing to their own Country, were made happy and fortunate. Secondly, the diverſity of our two Religions made great diſcord and variance amongſt us, our Religion ſo far excelling theirs in piety, as the divine eſſence GOD excelleth unreaſonable creatures (for they commonly worſhip ſuch brute beaſts for Gods, and every one worſhippeth divers kinds:) vain and fooliſh men, who from the beginning have been accuſtomed to ſuch ſottiſh opinions, as would not permit them to imitate us in our divine Religion, and conformable to reaſon: and yet ſeeing many favour and follow our Religion, they were hereby incited to ſuch hatred, that to derogate from us, they feared not to falſifie their own ancient Records, not conſidering that in ſo doing they were led through a blind paſſion, to write againſt themſelves. Moreover, I will prove all I have ſpoken to be true, by one mans words, whom a little before (being a famous Hiſtoriographer) we have produced as a witneſs of our Antiquity:

The laſt part, againſt certain detractions and ſlanders.

The cauſe of malice between the Egyptians and Jews.

The Egyptians Idolatry.

Manethon therefore, who confeſſeth himſelf to have gathered the Egyptian Hiſtory out of their holy writings, having by way of a Preface recounted how our predeceſſours came into Egypt with many thouſands, and there conquered the inhabitants, he afterward confeſſeth that loſing all their poſſeſſions in Egypt, they got the Country which is now called Jury, and in it builded a City named Jeruſalem, and a Temple; and thus far he imitateth ancient Writrrs. And then uſurping to himſelf authority to lye, proteſting that he will inſert into his Hiſtory certain reports divulged amongſt the common people, he reports things of the Jews altogether incredible, intending to mix with our Nation the lepers of the Egyptians, and other ſick people of other Countries, who (as he ſaith) being abominable to the Egyptians, made an eſcape from thence; affirming alſo that they had a King named Amenophis, which is a fained name, and therefore he durſt not preſume to ſpeak determinately of the time of his reign: whereas he ſpeaketh exactly of the reign of all other Kings. Hereupon alſo he adds certain fables, forgetting himſelf that he reported the ſhepherds departure out of Egypt to Jeruſalem, to have been almoſt five hundred and eighteen years before his time: for King Themuſis reigned when they departed out of Egypt, from whom the time that other Kings did reign, until the two brethren, Sethon and Hermeus, accompliſhed the term of three hundred fourſcore and thirteen years. He alſo ſaith, that the eldeſt of theſe two, Sethon, was called Egyptas, and the other Hermeus, was called Danaus, whom his brother Sethon expelled, and afterward reigned fifty nine years; and after him Rampſes, his eldeſt ſon, reigned threeſcore and ſix years. Having therefore confeſſed, our Anceſtors to have departed out of Egypt ſo many years before, now laſtly he addeth, that Amenophis was their King, who was a contemplator of the Gods, as Orus their King before him was, and that one Amenophis a Prieſt, the ſon of Papius, did in all things moſt excellently accompliſh his deſire: which Prieſt ſeemed to participate of ſome divine nature, for he excelled in wiſdom, and could foretel things to come, and that he gave the King his ſirname, that he might alſo ſee the gods, if ſo be he would endeavour to cleanſe the Country from lepers, and other unclean people. Whereat the King rejoycing gathered together all

A the impotent people of his land, amounting to the number of 80000, and ſent them, and other Egyptians appointed to this work, in the Eaſt part of Nilus, there to hew and ſquare ſtones. And that amongſt them there were alſo certain learned Prieſts infected with Leproſie; alſo that this divine Prieſt Amenophis, greatly feared, leſt the indignation of the Gods would fall upon the King and himſelf (who had perſwaded and counſelled the King to do violence to the foreſaid Lepers) likewiſe that he ſaid that becauſe he uſed the help of unclean perſons, they ſhould obtain dominion over Egypt for thirteen years; yet durſt he not preſume to ſignifie this to the King, but he kill'd himſelf, leaving this written in a Book, where men might find it: and the King, having notice hereof, fell into great ſorrow and heavi-
B neſs. This done, he ſpeaks as followeth: So the King being requeſted for their quietneſs and defence to aſſign them a City to inhabit, appointed unto them a deſolate place called Avaris, which had been the ſhepherds City (this City the ancient Divines call Triphonis) but they, having got the poſſeſſion of this place fit for rebellion, made choice of one of the Prieſts of Heliopolis to be their Captain, whoſe name was Oſarſiphus, and bound themſelves with an oath to obey him in all things: and he preſently made a law, that they ſhould neither worſhip the Gods of the Egyptians, nor that they ſhould abſtain from thoſe beaſts which the Egyptians count holy, and that they ſhould marry with none but ſuch as they judged to be their friends.

Oſarſiphus Captain of Avaris.

Having ordained this and many things elſe contrary to the Egyptians Religion, he com-
C manded them with great labour to inviron their City with a wall, and to make preparation to war againſt King Amenophis: and he himſelf making choice of ſome Prieſts, & a few other unclean perſons, ſent to Jeruſalem to the ſhepherds which were driven out of Egypt by King Themuſis, declaring unto them their own and their fellows injuries, and requeſted them to levy an Army to fight with them againſt Egypt, promiſing them free entrance into Avaris, the Country where their fore-fathers inhabited, and that he would furniſh them with all neceſſaries, telling them that they ſhould now fight in ſo happy a time, as that without all doubt they might conquer the country. The ſhepherds hereat rejoycing, all of them armed themſelves to the number of two hundred thouſand, and leaving their City, they came to Avaris. But Amenophis, King of Egypt, hearing of their invaſion, and remembring what Amenophis,
D the Son of the Prieſt Papius, had left in writing, was in great fear, and preſently aſſembling together the people of Egypt, and conſulting with the Princes of his Country, he ſent all holy Beaſts, and all that the Prieſts eſteemed before him, giving the Prieſts eſpecial charge to hide their Idols: and he commended his Son Sethones (who alſo by his Father Rampſes was called Rhameſſes) being but five years old, unto the cuſtody of a friend of his: and then accompanied with three hundred fighting men, he met his Enemies, but would not fight with them, fearing leſt he ſhould fight againſt the pleaſure of the Gods; and ſo he retired himſelf to Memphis: and taking Apis and the reſt of the Egyptian Gods, he, with all his Troops of Egyptians took Ship, and fled into Æthiopia. For the King of Æthiopia upon courteſie obeyed him, and for this cauſe he entertained him and his followers, and provided
E all neceſſaries for them, for that fatal thirteen years baniſhment, and this was done in Æthiopia. In the mean time, the inhabitants of Jeruſalem came down into the Country with the unclean Egyptians, and did ſo tyrannize over the inhabitants, that all their beholders judged their victory to be full of cruelty: for not content to fire the cities and towns, and to commit all manner of ſacriledge, and to deſtroy the Idols of the Gods, they did alſo moſt cruelly tear in pieces the ſacred Beaſts, and forced the Prieſts and Prophets to lay violent hands upon them, and kill them: after which deed they drave them out of the Country naked. It is therefore reported, that a Heliopolitan Prieſt, Oſarſiphus by name, made laws for them, and ſtatutes to govern them. This Prieſt was called Oſarſiphus, taking his name from the God of Heliopolis, called Oſiris, who being now thus converſant with this people, changed
F his name, and called himſelf Moſes.

The war of the baniſhed againſt the Egyptians.

The Egyptian King fled Into Ethiopia, and was by the Ethiopian King courteouſly entertained.

Oſarſiphus was afterwards call'd Moſes.

Thus the Egyptians report of the Jews, and many things elſe, which for brevity ſake I omit. Manethon furthermore writeth, that afterward, Amenophis the King came with a great power out of Æthiopia, and his Son Rampſes with him accompanied with a great Army; and that joyning battel with the ſhepherds and polluted perſons, he gave them an overthrow, & purſued them unto the borders of Syria. And this is Manethon's report: but for as much as he writeth old wives tales, dotages, and lies, I will by manifeſt reaſon convince him; firſt, diſtinguiſhing that whereof I am to ſpeak hereafter. He of his own accord granteth and confeſſeth, that our Anceſtors at firſt were not Egyptians, but ſtrangers that came thither from another place, and conquered the Country, and again departed from thence. I will now out out of his own writings endeavour to ſhew, that the weak people of Egypt were not mixed with us, and that Moſes, who indeed was our conductor out of Egypt, and lived many ages before, was no leper. He therefore firſt of all ſetteth down a ridiculous cauſe of this foremention'd faction, which was, that King Amenophis was deſirous to ſee the Gods: which Gods trow ye? he could already ſee the Ox, the Goat, the Crocodile, and the Munky, but the God of Heaven how could he ſee? And why had Amenophis this deſire? Forſooth, becauſe a certain King one of his predeceſſors had ſeen them; he therefore knowing by him what things they were, and how he came to the ſight of them, needed no new device to accompliſh his deſire: but perhaps the foreſaid Prophet was a man of great wiſdom, by whom the King had confidence to attain his deſire: but if ſo he had been, how chanceth it that he was ſo unwiſe he could not perceive, that it was an impoſſible thing to ſatisfie the Kings deſire? for that which he promiſed was not brought to paſs. Or what reaſon moved him to think that the Gods were inviſible, becauſe of lepers and weak people? The Gods are offended with mens impieties, not with the defects of their bodies. And how was it poſſible that at one inſtant ſo many thouſand lepers and infirm perſons ſhould be gathered together? or wherein did not the King obey the Prophet? He commanded that the lepers and infirm perſons ſhould be exiled the Country, and the King did not baniſh them the Country, but ſent them to hew ſtones, as though he had needed workmen, and not purpoſed to cleanſe the Country from lepers. Laſtly, he ſaith, that the Prophet foreſeeing that Egypt was to ſuffer, and fearing the wrath of the Gods, killed himſelf, and left his mind in a book written unto the King. How chanced it then that the Prophet did not at firſt foreſee his own death, and ſo oppoſe himſelf to the Kings deſire to ſee the Gods? or wherefore did he fear ſuch calamities as were not to fall in his life? or what great miſery hanged over his head, which might worthily cauſe him to kill himſelf to prevent it? But let us hear that which followeth, more ſottiſh than all the reſt.

Manethon's words repeated.

The King (quoth he) hearing this, and ſtricken with fear, did not for all this expel thoſe lepers he ought to have exiled, but at their requeſt gave them (as he ſaith) a City, wherein before time the Shepherds did inhabit, called Avaris; whereinto they being come, they made a Prieſt of Heliopolis their Prince, who deviſed Laws for them: commanding them neither to adore the Gods, nor to abſtain from offering violence to ſuch beaſts as amongſt the Egyptians are ſacred, but that they ſhould kill and ſpoil all things, that they ſhould marry with none but ſuch as were their confederates, that he bound the people with an oath to keep thoſe laws, and that they fortified Avaris to fight againſt the King. Adding moreover, that he ſent to Jeruſalem for help, promiſing to yield Avaris unto them, being a place ſometime poſſeſſed by the Anceſtors, and that they from that place leading their Forces, might eaſily ſubdue all Egypt: he then ſaith, that the Egyptian King, Amenophis, came againſt them with 300000. and yet for that he would not ſtrive againſt the decree of the gods he fled into Æthiopia, and carried with him Apis and other holy beaſts, and that the inhabitants of Jeruſalem coming down invaded the Land, fired the Towns and Cities, ſlew their Nobles, uſed all ſorts of cruelty poſſible, and that the Prieſts name, who made Laws and Statutes for them to live under, was one of Heliopolis, Oſarſiphus by name, deriving the ſame from Oſiris, the God of Heliopolis: and that this man, changing his name, was afterward called Moſes.

Moreover, that Amenophis, having lived in baniſhment thirty years, came with a ſtrong power out of Æthiopia & fighting with the ſhepherds and polluted, he ſlew many of them, and put the reſt to flight, purſuing them unto the borders of Syria. Manethon remembreth not, that here again he telleth a very unskilful tale: for although the lepers and impotent perſons were offended with the King, for appointing them to hew ſtones; yet it is to be thought that they receiving their own deſire at the Kings hands, to wit, a City to dwell in, that now they again became the Kings well-willers. Suppoſing alſo their hatred ſtill continued towards him, they rather ſhould have attempted revenge by treaſon againſt him, then towards all their Nation, wherein they had many dear friends and alliance. And although they had purpoſed to war againſt theſe men, yet would they not have been ſo impious as to have rebelled againſt the Gods, and to have violated the laws wherein they were brought up.

A confutation of Manethon's words alledged.

We have therefore cauſe to thank Manethon, in that he cleareth us, and affirmeth his own country-men (yea a Prieſt) to be authors of this impiety, and that by oath they bound themſelves ſo to do. But is it not againſt all reaſon, that neither any of their country-men nor kinſmen rebelled with them, but that the poor diſtreſſed people were glad to ſend to Jeruſa-

lem

lem for ſuccour ? But what ſociety of friendſhip had they with the people of Jeruſalem, of whom they came to demand help ? Why ? they were more their enemies then the reſt of their Country-men, and were all of quite different manners from us. They of Jeruſalem (ſaith he) preſently did as they were willed to do, in hope that, according as they were promiſed, they might ſubdue Egypt. Were they ignorant of that Country out of which they had been driven by force ; had they lived in poverty or miſery, perhaps they might have been induced to have done it : but ſeeing they inhabited a fortunate and rich City, and poſſeſſed a goodly fertile ſoil far better then Egypt, what might move them thereto ? What reaſon had they, at the requeſt of their ancient enemies (and they alſo ſo diſeaſed, as they of Jeruſalem could not abide their own friends among them that had the like diſeaſes) to thruſt themſelves into danger ? they could not fore-know the Kings intent to flye ; as for Manethon himſelf ſaith, he met them at Peluſia with 300000 men. And this they that went to war well knew. But what reaſon had they to conjecture that the Kings mind would change, and he flye ? Then he ſaith, the Army of Jeruſalem getting the Granaries of Egypt into their hands, did much harm : and this he upbraided them withal, as who ſhould ſay, they were not requeſted to come as enemies ; or as though theſe matters be to be caſt in ſouldiers teeths that are ſtrangers and ſent for from out of another Country ; when as the Egyptians themſelves before their coming had done the like, and bound themſelves with an oath to perform the ſame. But ſhort time after, Amenophis fought with his enemies, and got the victory of them, and put them to flight, and purſued them unto the borders of Syria. As though that Egypt were a Country ſo eaſily to be won by any man, that at any place or part thereof invadeth it ; and that the ſouldiers of Jeruſalem, having now by the Laws of Arms poſſeſſed that, and knowing Amenophis to be yet alive, would not have fortified that part of the Country, whereby he might have invaded them, having all opportunity to do it ; or at leaſt they would have gotten more help from one place or another. Amenophis, as he ſaith, purſued them even unto Syria thorow the ſandy and dry places : as though it were eaſie for an Army that had nothing elſe to do, but to march on forward, to paſs leiſurely thorow them. To conclude therefore, our Nation neither came of the Egyptians, as Manethon confeſſeth, neither was mingled with the diſeaſed of that Country : for it is probable, that many of thoſe ſick people periſhed in the ſtone-works, many in the great fight and battel, and the reſt of them in the flight. It now remaineth that I refute that which he ſpeaks of Moſes.

The Epilogue that the Jews came not of the Egyptians.

The Egyptians do all agree that this man was a divine perſon, and one to be admired, and they commit great impiety in labouring to challenge him for their Country-man, ſaying, that he was a Prieſt of Heliopolis, baniſhed with the reſt for leproſie. For he is recorded to have lived five hundred and eighteen years before this time, and to have guided our Anceſtors out of Egypt, into that Country wherein we now inhabit : and his own words teſtifie his body to have been clean from that diſeaſe of leproſie : for he commandeth all lepers to be expelled out of the Towns and Villages, and to live apart by themſelves, alſo to be cloathed in ſome torn garment, and that whoſoever toucheth them, or cometh under the ſame roof with them, is to be accounted an unclean perſon. And if ſo be a leper happen to be cured of that diſeaſe, he appointed certain purifications, cleanſings, and baths of fortunate waters, and all his hair ſhould be ſhaved off ; and that then after many and ſundry ſacrifices, he ſhould be admitted into the holy City. But contrariwiſe, had he been urged with that misfortune and calamity himſelf, he would ſurely have been more provident, and more merciful to ſuch as ſhould have been afflicted with that diſeaſe.

An anſwer to Manethons ſlanders touching Moſes.

Moſes was not a leper.

He did not only make theſe ſevere Laws againſt lepers, but he alſo interdicted all that wanted any joynt or parcel of the body, from being Prieſts, or exerciſing any office at the Altar : yea he alſo appointed, that if any Prieſts ſhould have any of theſe defects betide him after he was a Prieſt, that then he ſhould be deprived of the dignity. How can it then be probable, that to his own prejudice and diſcredit he would have enacted ſuch Laws ? Alſo the changing of his name is incredible : for he was called (as he ſaith) Oſarſiph, which nothing agreeth with the tranſmutation of his name, but his true name betokeneth that Moſes was ſaved from the water. For, Moy in the Egyptian tongue ſignifieth water. But I have now ſufficiently, as I think, declared how Manethon, whilſt he followed the ancient Writers did not much erre, but when he fell to old wives tales, he then either abſurdly fained them of his own head, or elſe for hatred he bare to our Nation, believed them. I now think it not amiſs to examine a little the words of Chæremon, who profeſſing himſelf to write the Egyptian Hiſtory, maketh mention of the ſame King Amenophis his ſon Rhamſes, as Manethon doth, and he reporteth that Iſis appeared to Amenophis in his ſleep, checking him for that her her Temple was deſtroyed, and that Phiritiphantes, a holy Scribe, told the King, that if he would expel all polluted an d unclean perſons out of Egypt, that then he ſhould not be any more terrified with theſe ni ght-viſions. Moreover, that hereupon making ſearch for all ſick and diſeaſed perſons, he baniſht them out of his Land, to the number of 250000. And that their Captains were called Moſes and Joſeph, holy Scribes, alſo that theſe Egyptians names were ſo, that Moſes was named Tiſithes ; and Joſeph, Peteſephus : and that they came to Peluſium, where they found 380000 left there by Amenophis, whom he would not permit to come into Egypt : alſo they all entring into a league together, ſuddenly invaded Egypt, and Amenophis not abiding the brunt fled into Æthiopia, leaving his wife great with child, who hiding her ſelf in caves and dens, did bring forth a child whom they called Meſſenes, who afterward drave the Jews into Syria, being in number 200000, and this done, he recalled his father Amenophis out of Æthiopia. And thus Chæremon ſaith.

Moſes took his name of Moy, which in the Egyptian tongue ſignifieth water.

Againſt Chæremon the Hiſtoriographer.

Meſſenes ſon of Amenophis.

But I imagine, that which I have already ſaid, to be ſufficient to declare the vanity of both theſe Writers. For if that which they report were true, it were impoſſible that they ſhould ſo much differ : but they labour to deviſe lyes, and write not any thing agreeable to other mens writings. For Manethon feigneth, that the cauſe of the baniſhment of the lepers was the Kings deſire to ſee the Gods ; and Chæremon ſaith, that it was for that Iſis after appeared unto him in his ſleep. Manethon alſo ſaith, that Amenophis gave the King that counſel ſo to cleanſe the Country ; and Chæremon ſaith, that he that counſelled the King was called Phiritiphantes. The number alſo of lepers hath very good conſonance I warrant you. Manethon ſaith, they were almoſt fourſcore hundred. Chæremon ſaith, two hundred and fifty thouſand. Moreover, Manethon writeth how that theſe lepers were firſt ſent to a place to hew ſtones, and afterward came to Avaris to dwell, and that they having already begun Wars in Egypt, that then they ſent for help from Jeruſalem. And Chæremon ſaith, that they having left Egypt, found at Peluſium two hundred and fourſcore thouſand men, whom Amenophis had kept there ; with whom they joyning again, returned and invaded Egypt, and then Amenophis fled into Æthiopia : and which is worth the noting, he ſetteth not down what Country-men, or to what purpoſe this great Army was, whether Egyptians or ſtrangers, neither doth he ſhew any reaſon why the King would not carry them into Egypt. Moreover, Chæremon feigneth a dream of the lepers and Iſis, and reporteth that Joſeph together with Moſes was expelled, whereas Joſeph lived four ages before Moſes, every age containing at leaſt a hundred and ſeventy years. Rameſſes alſo, Amenophis ſon, according to Manethons Hiſtory, being a young man fled into Æthiopia, and was baniſht with his father, and afterwards aſſiſted him in the Wars : whereas Chæremon reporteth that he was born in a Cave after his fathers departure, and that he getting the victory, did drive the Jews into Syria, who were in number two thouſand. O felicity in lying! for he neither told what Nation thoſe three hundred and fourſcore thouſand were, nor yet how a hundred and fourſcore thouſand of them periſhed, neither were they ſlain in the fight, or fled unto Rameſſes : and which is moſt to be admired, one cannot gather out of his words whom he calleth Jews, or whether he attribute this name unto the 250000 lepers, or unto the three hundred and fourſcore thouſand which were at Peluſium.

Manethons and Chæremons hiſtory compared together.

The difference between Manethons and Chæremons Hiſtory.

But it is folly to oppoſe my ſelf againſt them who have ſufficiently contradicted themſelves : for had other men controlled their Writings, they had been the more to be born withal. I will add Lyſimachus unto the two former, who hath the ſame lye that they have ; yet far more abſurd a fiction then theirs. For he ſaith, that at ſuch time as Bocchoris reigned in Egypt, the people of the Jews being ſcabbed and infected with leproſie, fled into the Temples to beg maintenance, and that ſo many men were with this diſeaſe infected, that a dearth and ſcarcity did fall upon Egypt. Likewiſe that King Bocchoris went unto Ammon to know of the Oracle what cauſed the dearth, and that anſwer was made, that if he would expel all lepers and unclean perſons from out of the Temples into the Deſart, that then the famine would ceaſe, and that he ſhould drown theſe lepers, as if the Sun diſdained that they ſhould live, and that then he ſhould purifie the Temples, and ſo the earth would again yield fruit : alſo that Bocchoris having this anſwer from the Oracle, he called together the Prieſts and Sacrificers, and having gathered lepers and unclean perſons together, he delivered them to ſouldiers to be conducted into the Deſart, and that then they ſhould be lapt in lead, and caſt into the Sea. Moreover, they being drowned, other diſeaſed people were gathered together, and were carried into the Wilderneſs to be deſtroyed, and that they taking counſel one of another what to do, the night following they made great fires

Lyſimachus is reproved for lying.

According to Lyſimachus, the ſcabbed and leprous Jews were to be conveighed into the Wilderneſs, and caſt into the Sea.

fires and lights, wherewith they terrified and drave away the Souldiers that kept them, and that they fasted the day following, requesting God to be merciful unto them, and that the next day, one Moses counselled them to go all one way, as thick together as they could, till such time as they came to some place inhabited, and that he then commanded them never hereafter to be friendly to any man, but always rather to give bad counsel than good, and to destroy all Temples, and Altars of the Gods they came by: unto which counsel they all agreeing, journeyed together through the wilderness, and after much sorrow came to places inhabited; using men by whom they past injuriously, firing Temples and robbing them: at last in this manner, they came unto that place which they now called Judæa; and there building a City, they began to dwell, and of this fact called the City Hierosyla, and shortly after growing more potent, they for avoiding shame changed the name thereof, and called it Jerusalem, and themselves the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

When the Jews got Judæa, and built Jerusalem.

This fellow found not that King, which the two former speak of, but he joined a more new name, and leaving the Dream and the Prophet, he goeth to Ammon, to know an answer of the old, touching the scabbed and lepers; for he saith, that a multitude was gathered together at the Temples; but he leaveth it uncertain, whether the Jews only were infected with this disease; for he saith the people of the Jews: which people, whether they were strangers or such as were born in that Country, why dost thou call them Jews, when they were Egyptians? If they were strangers, why dost thou not tell of whence they were? Or how came it to pass that the King having drowned so many of them in the Sea, and left the rest in the wilderness, that still so many should be left? Or how did they pass the wilderness, and get the Country we now inhabit, and build a City and a Temple famous thorow all parts of the world? thou shouldest not only have told the name of our Law-maker, but also what Country-man he was, and of what Parents, and what moved him in his journey to make such laws against the gods, and against men. For if they were Egyptians, they would not so easily have forgotten the Religion wherein they were brought up: or of what place else soever they were, they had some laws or other, which they had been accustomed to keep. If they had vowed to have born no good will unto them by whom they were driven out of their Country, they had some just occasion so to do. But to undertake war against all the world, and deprive themselves from all friendship and help of mortal men, doth not shew their sottishness, but the foolishness of him who doth thus belie them, who most impudently affirmeth, that their City took the name of Church-spoiling, and afterward changed it. For what cause forsooth did they change the name thereof? marry for that the former name was ignominious to their posterity. But the Gentleman understood not, that Jerusalem signifieth otherwise in our language, than it doth in the Greek. And therefore what should I stand to inveigh against a lie so impudently told? But my Book hath now been long enough making a new beginning: and therefore I will endeavour to finish the residue of this work.

Lysinius his opinion confuted.

Nothing is to be said against an impudent lye.

The SECOND BOOK of the ANTIQUITY of the Jews;

Written by Flavius Josephus against Apion of Alexandria, and Dedicated to Epaphroditus.

THrice honoured and beloved Epaphroditus, I have in my former Books, so fat forth as I was warranted by truth, both protested and approved the Antiquity of our Nation, out of the writings of the Phœnicians, Chaldees and Egyptians: and for the further confirmation thereof, I have produced the testimony of divers Greek Authors. Furthermore, I have opposed my self against Manethon and Cheremon, and divers others. At this time likewise I will undertake to contradict all the rest of those Writers, that have published any thing against us; for in respect of Apion, who pretendeth himself to be learned, I grow half suspicious, whether it be a matter answerable to my discretion and judgment, to vouchsafe him any reply at all. For as touching the one part of that which he hath written, it seemeth to be one and the same with that which the rest have written: and as touching the other, it is very cold and barren. The greatest part thereof is farced with follies and detractions, and betrayeth his ignorance, approving him to be a man both loose in condition, and turbulent in his life. And for as much as divers men are so disfurnished of judgment, that they rather suffer themselves to be won by these follies, than to be wearied and wrought by that which is written with better consideration, vainly doating on detractions, and growing discontent to give ear to other mens well deserved praises: I have thought it necessary to examine such a mans labours, the rather, for that he hath written against us, as if he intended to accuse us before a Tribunal, and convict us by a publick trial. For I see that it is an ordinary course for the most part of men, to hug and take hearty pleasure, when as he that beginneth to blame another man, is himself convicted and found guilty of those defaults, which he imputeth and objecteth against another.

Apion wrote something very coldly.

Truly it is no easie matter to lay open the ambiguous and doubtful speeches which Apion useth, neither to understand perfectly what he intendeth to express. But like a man that is grievously distracted, and confused in his fooliſh lying, he groweth almost to that point to recapitulate that, which hath been heretofore set out, and searcht for, as touching the departure of our forefathers out of Egypt: and afterwards he falleth to accuse the Jews that inhabited Alexandria: and thirdly he intermixeth his blameful blasphemies against the Ceremonies accustomed in our Temple, and depraveth our laws, and ordinances likewise. Now, that our predecessors have not taken their original out of Egypt, neither have been driven from thence for any infirmity, or deformity of their bodies, or for any wound, ulcer, or pollution; I suppose that I have not only sufficiently approved the same, but also produced far more than was requisite. I will therefore briefly report and repeat that which Apion alledgeth: For in the third Book of his Egyptian History, he writ thus: Moses, as I have heard it from most ancient Egyptians, was born at Heliopolis, who being instructed in the fashions of his Country, converted such Prayers which were wont to be said in open places and abroad, and caused them to be practised and accustomed in private Cloysters, such as were within the City, and ordained that in praying they should turn themselves towards the rising Sun. For such is the situation of the City Heliopolis, and instead of Obelisques or Pyramides, he erected certain Pillars, under which there were certain ingraven Basons, on which the shadow hapning to fall (the place wherein they stood being discovered and in open air) they observed the same course that the Sun doth in the firmament. See here what eloquence this learned man used.

Apion concerning Moses and the Jews.

Now,

A Now this lye of his needeth no words to refute it, seeing it is clearly refelled by the effects. For when Moses first built that Tabernacle in honour of God, he had no such intent, nor fashioned any such form, neither ordained his successours to do the like: and after this when as Solomon builded the Temple in Jerusalem, he never thought of any such curiosity as Apion forgeth. He saith that he hath been informed by those of Antiquity, that Moses was a Heliopolitan, for you must understand that Apion himself was young, and believed the relation of the aged sort of his acquaintance which conversed familiarly with him; yet cannot this learned Grammarian justifie where Homer was born, neither from what Country Pythagoras came, although in respect, they lived but yesterday: and as touching Moses, who lived so many ages, and so great a number of years before them, he decideth the matter so B easily, and giveth credit to the reports of Antiquity so slightly, that it appeareth most manifest that he is but a lyar. As touching the time wherein he saith that Moses led away the blind, leprous, and lame: this diligent Author accordeth very willingly with that which he himself hath said. For Manethon saith, that the Jews departed out of Egypt about the reign of Themosis, three hundred ninety six years before Danaus fled out of Greece. Lysimachus, he saith, that this thing happened during King Bocchorus time, that is to say, one thousand and seven hundred years before that time; Molon also and some others have alledged their opinions. But Apion, who pretendeth to be a man of more credit then the rest, hath precisely and exactly set down the time, averring that our departure was about the seventieth Olympiad: nay more, in the first year thereof, wherein, as he saith, Carthage was builded by the Phœnicians. Now hath he only and purposely made mention of Carthage in this place; supposing it to be an infallible argument of the truth of his allegation: yet con- C ceiveth he not, that he maketh a rod for his own tail, and draweth an argument against himself, by which himself may be convinced. For if we may give credit to the Phœnician Chroniclers as touching this Colony, it appeareth by them that King Hiram lived more then one hundred and fifty years before the foundation of Carthage. The truth whereof I have heretofore approved out of the words of the Phœnicians, who report that Hiram was Solomons friend, who builded the Temple of Jerusalem: and that he furnished him with much timber and other matter toward the finishing of that building. Now Solomon builded the Temple six hundred and twelve years after the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt. And after he had inconsiderately reckoned the number of those which were driven D out of Egypt in like manner as Lysimachus had done, namely, of one hundred and ten thousand men, he yielded a most admirable reason, and such as may be easily believed: from whence he pretendeth that the name of Sabbath was derived. For (saith he) after they had travelled for the space of six days, there grew certain inflammations in their groins, by reason whereof they rested on the seventh day, being safely arrived in the Country which at this day is called Judæa, because the Egyptians call Sabbatosis an Ulcer that groweth about the groin.

Apions fiction concerning the Temple and Moses is refuted.

The computation of the time is different among the Historiographers.

The friendship between Hiram and Solomon, whereof we made mention in the first Book against Apion in the beginning.

The Egyptians do call a disease about the privy parts, Sabbatosis.

Who can otherwise chuse but laugh at this foppery? or contrariwise who would not hate such an impudent custom in writing and coining lies: for he reporteth as far as a man may conjecture by his writings, that all the Jews, who were to the number of an hundred E and ten thousand persons, had these Ulcers in their secrets. Now had all of them been halt, lame, blind, and sickly, as Apion reporteth, they could not have journied one day, but since they travelled through the Desart, and vanquished all Armies that resisted them, it is no likely matter that all of them were sick of a disease in their privy parts every seventh day: neither is it naturally possible, that such a disease should befal so many thousand men in their journey, and that they every day should travel a certain space and a limited march, neither standeth it with any probability, but rather a manifest absurdity, that any such thing should befal them: but this admirable Apion saith, that they arrived in Judæa within the space of six days.

Again he writeth, that Moses ascending up the Mount Sinai, which is betwixt Arabia and F Egypt, hid himself in that place for the space of forty days, and descending from thence, gave Laws unto the Jews. But how, I pray you, was it possible for him to remain forty days in a Desart without water? or how could all the Jews within six days travel from Egypt into Jury? As for his Grammatical divination of the word Sabbath, it savoureth too much of impudence, or at least of ignorance: for these words Sabbo and Sabbatum do greatly differ: for Sabbatum in the Jews language, signifieth rest from work: but Sabbo in the Egyptians tongue, betokeneth a disease about the privy parts, as Apion saith. See here what cavilling fictions this Egyptian Apion useth concerning Moses, and our departure out of Egypt; wherein he counterfeiteth and coineth abſurdities unthought of by any others. Shall we then wonder if he belie our forefathers, who maketh no bones to belie himſelf? for being born at Oaſis a Town in Egypt, this high unreputed honour of the Egyptians, foreſweareth both his Country and Nation, and counterfeiting himſelf to be an Alexandrian, he ratifieth his Nations wickedneſs. No marvel then though he term them Egyptians whom he hateth and raileth againſt, for if he had not been perſwaded that the Egyptians were wicked baſe people, he would never have denied himſelf to be their Country-man: for ſuch as proudly boaſt of their famous Country, eſteem it a credit to bear the denomination thereof, and reprehend ſuch as without juſt cauſe make themſelves of their Nation. Wherefore the Egyptians are one of theſe two ways affected towards us Jews, for either they claim us to be their Country-men, as glorying of us and their Country; or elſe for that, they and their Country being infamous, they deſire that we ſhould be partakers of their ignominy. But indeed this worthy Apion ſeemeth ſo to inveigh againſt us, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians for beſtowing their Cities upon him: and knowing them to be at variance with the Jews at Alexandria, he as it were caſteth a bone between them, and raileth not only on the Jews of that City, but on all whereſoever: but he belieth both them moſt impudently. But let us examine thoſe hainous and enormous matters, (and as he ſaith) ſuch as are not to be ſuffered, of which he accuſeth the Alexandrian Jews. Coming (quoth he) out of Syria, they ſeated themſelves near the Sea-coaſt, where there was no Haven near unto the ſurges of the water.

Apion raileth againſt the Jews, as thereby rewarding the Alexandrians.

The Sea-coaſt of Alexandria.

Now if this place which they inhabited were ignominious, yet it followeth not that the Jews own Country was ſo alſo: yea herein Apion raileth againſt Alexandria, which he maketh his own Country: for the Sea-coaſt is part of Alexandria, and as all men judge the beſt place thereof to dwell in. Now if the Jews by force of arms ſo vanquiſhed this place, that they could never ſince be driven out of it; it is no diſcredit to them, but rather an argument of their valour. But Alexander gave them that place to inhabit, and the Macedonians did allot them as great priviledges as the Alexandrians had. I know not what Apion would have ſaid, if the Jews had dwelt about Necropolis, and not about the Kings ſeat; their Tribes being even at this time called Macedonians. If therefore Apion have read the Epiſtles of King Alexander, and Ptolomæus Lagus, or others their ſucceſſours Kings of Egypt, or ſeen the pillars that are erected in Alexandria, containing the priviledges that Cæſar the Great granted unto the Jews; if I ſay he knew of theſe, and yet did preſume to write the contrary, then he was a bad fellow: but if he was ignorant hereof, he was then an unlearned perſon. The like ignorance alſo diſcovereth he, where he wonders that the Jews in Alexandria were called Alexandrians. For all that are one Colonie, though very different people, yet do they all bear the name of their founder: and that I may ſhun prolixity, the Jews of Antioch are called Antiochians; for Seleucus the founder made them alſo Citizens: the like may be alſo ſaid of the Jews of Epheſus, and at the other Ionia, who by the Kings gifts enjoy the ſame priviledges with the reſt of the Citizens. The Romans alſo of their clemency have granted the name of their Nation, which is no ſmall gift, not only to private perſons, but to great Nations in general. To be ſhort, the ancient Spaniards, the Tyrrhenes, and Sabines, are called Romans; or if Apion will take away this denomination of the City wherein men inhabit, let him ceaſe to call himſelf an Alexandrian: for he being born in the heart of Egypt, can in no wiſe be an Alexandrian, if the priviledge of the City be taken away from him, as he would have it from us. And the Lords of the whole world, the Romans, have amongſt all other Nations only prohibited the Egyptians from having the priviledges of any City: and ſo this gallant Gentleman being himſelf incapable of dignity, endeavoureth likewiſe to hinder them from it, who have true right unto it.

The liberties and priviledges granted unto the Jews.

Alexander.

For Alexander labouring with all diligence to build that City, did not make choice of us for want of people to furniſh the ſame withal: but for that he beſtowed the liberty thereof upon us as a reward and teſtimony of our vertue and fidelity, endeavouring indeed to honour and credit our Nation thereby: for Hecatæus reporteth that Alexander for the Jews good ſervice and fidelity, beſtowed upon them the Country of Samaria, and freed them from paying tribute for it. The ſame good affection towards the Jews of Alexandria, Ptolomæus Lagus continued after him, for he delivered into their hands the ſtrong holds of Egypt (for that he judged that their valour and fidelity would keep them) and intending to make himſelf Lord of Cyrene and other places in Lybia, he ſent certain Jews to inhabit the ſame. After him Ptolomæus Philadelphus did not only releaſe and ſet free all Captives of our Nation in his Country, but alſo did many times remit their payments of money, and (which

A was the principal point of all) he desired to be instructed in our Laws and holy Scriptures, and for this cause sent unto us, requesting that we would send him some learned men to interpret them unto him: and that this might be performed with more diligence, he committed the care hereof not to any but Demetrius Phalereus, Andreas and Aristæus, Demetrius being the only mirrour of Learning in his Age, the other two being Esquires of his own body: neither would he have ever desired to have been instructed in our Laws and Customs, if he had despised us, and had not rather admired us. But Apion knew that almost all the Macedonian Kings his Successors in order, did peculiarly affect our Nation. For Ptolomæus the third which was also called Euergetes, conquering Syria by force, did no sacrifice unto the gods B of Egypt for his Victory, but came to Jerusalem, and there after our manner sacrificed mans hostes unto our God, and to him dedicated gifts worthy of such a Victory. Ptolomæus also sirnamed Philometor and his wife Cleopatra, committed the Rule of his whole Kingdom unto the Jews, and Onias and Dositheus, both Jews, were Generals of his Army, whose credit Apion detracts: whereas he rather ought to have admired them, and have thanked them for delivering Alexandria, whereof he maketh himself a Citizen.

The 70 Interpreters.

3. Ptolomæus Euergetes.

4. Ptolomæus Philometor.

For when there was a Rebellion in Cleopatras Kingdom, and all was in peril to be destroyed, these two men delivered Alexandria from civil War: But Apion saith that after this Onias came and brought a little Army into the City at such time as Termus, the Roman Embassadour was there present. True it is, and that fact of his was most just. For Ptolomæus C Physcon after the death of his father Ptolomæus Philometor, coming out of Cyrene, endeavoured to expel the Queen Cleopatra, and the Kings Sons, to the end that he (contrary to all justice) might possess the Kingdom: and this was the cause why Onias took Arms against him in Cleopatras behalf, not forsaking his fidelity unto Kings in the time of necessity: yet God himself did manifestly witness his justice in this action. For when Ptolomæus Physcon presumed to fight against Onias his Army, and took all the Jews, their wives and children that were in the City and bound them, and stripping them naked, cast them before Elephants to be destroyed, (and to the intent that the Elephants might the rather tread upon them, made the said beasts drunken) all which fell out contrary to his expectation: for the Elephants forsaking the Jews which were cast before them, did fall upon Ptolomæus his D friends that stood by, and slew many of them: which done, there appeared unto Ptolomæus a most horrible vision forbidding him to harm the Jews: and his chiefest best beloved Concubine (also whom some call Ithaca, other Herene) came unto him and besought him to abstain from such impiety: whereupon he being sorry, did penance for that he had already committed, and that which he thought to commit: so that the Jews of Alexandria celebrate this day in remembrance that upon it God did manifestly deliver them; yet Apion (who speaketh well of no man) accuseth the Jews of impiety for bearing Arms against Physcon, whereas indeed he ought rather to have commended them for it. But Apion extolleth Cleopatra the last Queen of Alexandria, only for that she was unjust, and ingrateful unto us; when he rather ought to have reproved her, in whom all impiety and wickedness reigned, both concern- E ing her own kindred and her husbands who loved her, and also generally against all the Romans, and the Emperours his benefactors, who killed her own Sister Arsinoe in the Temple, who had not any ways offended her: she also treacherously slew her own Brother, and destroyed her Ancestors gods and sepulchres: and receiving the Kingdom from the first Cæsars gift, she ingratefully rebelled against his Son and Successor; and infecting Antony with her poysoned drinks and amorous inchantments, she made him rebel against his Country, and to be unconstant unto his own friends, depriving some of Kingly dignity, and compelling others to be instruments of her impiety: And what else shall we say of her, who in the battel by Sea forced Antonius her own husband (who also had many children by her) to yield himself, the Empire, and Army unto her, and become one of her followers? Lastly, when F Alexandria was taken by Cæsar, she was so cruelly minded, that not remembring her own estate, she accounted this her safety, if with her own hand she might kill the Jews, that she might be cruel and trothless to every body.

5. Ptolomæus Physcon ceased to persecute the Jews.

Of Cleopatra the last Queen of Alexandria.

Antony the husband of Cleopatra.

Is it not a glory think you to us, that (as Apion reporteth) in time of dearth and famine, wheat was plentiful in Jury, that it was not sold by measure? But Cleopatra was punished as she deserved. And we call great Cæsar himself to witness of our fidelity, and the service we did him against the Egyptians, the Senate also and their Decrees, and the Writings of Augustus Cæsar, wherein our deserts are testified. These Letters Apion ought to have read and to have examined all testimonies of us, which were left first by Alexander, and then by all the Ptolomies, and what the Senate of Rome decreed, and the mighty Emperours. And if ſo be Germanicus could not get corn to ſuffice all the Inhabitants of Alexandria, that was a token of ſcarcity and dearth, and not the Jews fault. For what all Emperours thought of the Alexandrian Jews it is manifeſt enough: for the Jews want of corn was not only left unſupplied, but alſo the want of other Alexandrians. But they have always kept that wherewith the ancient Princes did put them in truſt, to wit, the keeping of the River, and whole Country, as not being thought unfit for their purpoſes. But Apion thus urgeth us; If (quoth he) the Jews be Citizens, how hap they worſhip not the ſame God, nor have the ſame Religion, that the reſt of the Alexandrians have? To whom I thus anſwer; How hapneth that you Egyptians do ſo contend and war againſt one another only for diverſity of Religion? ſhall we hereupon conclude that you are all Egyptians, or not all men, becauſe you worſhip and with great diligence nouriſh beaſts againſt nature? yet our Nation ſeemeth one and the ſame. If therefore amongſt you Egyptians ſuch difference of opinions be; why doeſt thou ſo marvel at this, that we in a ſtrange place, to wit, at Alexandria, do conſtantly perſevere in our firſt Religion? But he ſaith that we are the cauſe of all ſedition; which ſuppoſe he ſpeak true of the Jews of Alexandria, yet are not all Jews in all places the cauſe of ſedition, for we are known to be peaceable amongſt our ſelves. But indeed as every one may perceive, the people like Apion himſelf, are Authors of ſedition in Alexandria. For whilſt the Greeks and Macedonians held Alexandria, they and we lived peaceably together, and they permitted us quietly to uſe our own Solemnities: but when the number of Egyptians encreaſed, by confuſion of time, ſedition alſo by their means encreaſed: but our Nation remained unpermixted. They therefore were Authors of thoſe troubles, not having the Government of the Macedonians, nor the wiſdom of the Greeks; but uſing their Egyptian manners, and renewing their old hatred againſt us, and that wherewithal they hit us in the teeth, befalleth them: for moſt of them not having the priviledges of the City themſelves, call us ſtrangers that have them. For none of the ancient Kings beſtowed the liberty of the City upon the Egyptians, neither have any of the Emperours of Rome beſtowed the priviledge. But Alexander himſelf brought us into the City, the Kings after him encreaſed more priviledges, and it hath pleaſed the Roman Emperour to ratifie and confirm them. But Apion detracteth us for not erecting Statues to the Emperours, as though the Emperours knew not hereof, or that they needed Apion to ſpeak for them: whereas he ſhould rather admire the Romans magnanimity, and modeſty, who compel not their Subjects to violate their ancient Laws and Religion, but content themſelves with ſuch honours as the giver may with piety and equity give them. For they account not of forced honours which come of compulſion.

The Jews have been always truſty to their Prince.

The diſcord of the Jews and the Alexandrians in Religion.

The cauſe of diſcord between the Jews and Alexandrians.

Apions fiction touching the Jews being Authors of ſedition at Alexandria is confuted.

The Romans magnanimity towards the Jews,

The Greeks and divers others think it not amiſs to erect Statues; for they delight to have the Pictures of their Anceſtors, Wives, and Children, and ſome of their beloved Servants alſo: what marvel then if they accord to yield the like honour to Princes and Emperours? But our Law-maker, not as prophecying the Romans power not to be reverenced, but foreſeeing that it was neither profitable to God nor man, forbade us to make an Image of any living creature, much more of a not living God (as we will prove hereafter.) But he permitted us to reverence all good men, with any honour elſe not due to God, and all thoſe we give unto the Emperours, and people of Rome, and make our continual Sacrifice for them; and not only upon working days do this, at the proper coſt of all the Jews, but upon ſuch days as we offer no other Sacrifice, no not for our own children, we then ſacrifice for the Roman Emperour, yielding that honour to the Roman Emperour which we do to none elſe. And let this ſuffice to anſwer that which Apion alledgeth againſt the Jews of Alexandria: yet can I not but admire at them who gave him this occaſion, namely, Poſidonius and Apollonius Molon, who accuſe us for not worſhipping the ſame gods that others do, although they lye all alike, ſlandering our Temple moſt abſurdly: and yet for all this they do not believe that they herein commit any impiety: whereas it is a moſt ignominious thing for any free-man to lye upon any occaſion: much more of a Temple famous over all the world for ſanctity. For Apion affirmeth that the Jews in that ſacred Temple placed the head of an Aſs, and worſhipped it moſt religiouſly. And this (quoth he) was manifeſtly known at ſuch time as Antiochus Epiphanes ſpoiled that Temple, who found that Aſſes head being of maſſie gold, of great value. To this firſt ſlander I firſt anſwer, that were that true which he reporteth, yet an Egyptian ought not to have ſpoken againſt us for it: ſeeing that an Aſs is of no leſs worth then a Goat, and other brute beaſts that they honour for Gods. Was it poſſible that he knew not the contrary of his own affirmations, by our Deeds and Scriptures? For we uſe the ſame Laws that at the firſt we did, and remain in them without change, and for all

The Jews may have no Images.

How Emperors and Magiſtrates ought to be honoured.

The lye of Poſidonius and Apollonius concerning the Jews is confuted.

An anſwer to the objection of the Aſſes head.

A all that our City (as others alſo have) hath by the variable event of War, been vexed and troubled, and that Antiochus ſirnamed the God, and Pompey the Great, and Liſinius Craſſus, and now laſtly Titus Cæſar have all vanquiſhed our Temple, yet did they never find in it any thing as Apion affirmeth, but ſincere piety, not lawful for us to diſcloſe to ſtrangers. And as touching Antiochus, many Writers of good credit report that he never had any juſt cauſe to ſpoil our Temple, but that he was drawn unto this fact for want of money; Not for that he was our enemy, but for that as from his friends and fellows, he ſought ſupply, and found nothing in that place that was worthy of deriſion: and thus do Polybius Megapolitanus Strabo the Cappadocian, Nicholas Damaſcene, Timagenes Caſtor the Chronicler, and Apollodorus
B avow, who all do witneſs, that Antiochus wanting money, brake the League he had with the Jews, and rob'd and ſpoiled their Temple being full of gold and ſilver. Apion ought to have conſidered this, had he not had an Aſſes heart, and a Dogs impudency, which he and his Country-men worſhip for gods. As for us, we do neither honour nor reverence Aſſes, though the Egyptians do their Crocodiles and Aſpes, eſteeming them that are bitten by Aſpes, and devoured by Crocodiles, to be happy and fit for God.

But we eſteem thoſe to be Aſſes which all our wiſe-men do, to wit, them who bear burdens impoſed upon them; and if coming into a field they fall to eat, and do not that which they ought to do, we uſe to beat them with many ſtripes, and force them to till the ground, and do other drudgery. But Apion was either the greateſt Aſs that ever was, in telling a lye; or
C elſe having begun to do it, he could not compaſs his enterprizes, in that he found not any juſt cauſe of detraction againſt us. He addeth another Fable of the Greeks detracting us: to the which I will make only this reply, that it is more commendable and agreeing to piety, and leſs uncleanneſs, to paſs through the Temple, then for Prieſts to come and fain impious words and ſpeeches: which they not reſpecting, laboured rather to excuſe the ſacrilegious Kings, then to write the truth of us and our Temple, endeavouring to curry favour with Antiochus, and to cover and hide his Sacriledge, uſed againſt our Nation, for that he wanted money, believing us even in things that are to come. And Apion as prophecying of the reſt, ſaith that Antiochus found a bed in our Temple, and in it a man lying, and a table ſet before him, furniſhed with all fowls that uſe either Sea or Land, and that the man was hereat
D aſtoniſhed: And that ſo ſoon as Antiochus came into the Temple, he adored him as though he hoped for great help from the King, falling down at his feet, and with a ſtretched out arm, craving licence to ſpeak: which the King granting, and willing him to declare what he was, and why he dwelt in the Temple, and the cauſe of his meats before him, the man with ſighs and tears bewailed unto Antiochus his calamity, ſaying, 'He was a Grecian; and that 'travelling in the Country to get his living, he was ſuddenly ſeized upon by certain Out-'landiſh men, and brought unto the Temple, and ſhut up therein, and that no man might 'ſee him, and that he was there fed or fatted with all dainties that could be provided; and 'that at firſt this dainty fare made him joyful, but afterward he began to ſuſpect it, and laſt-'ly, he was hereat amazed; and then demanding of a Jew that adminiſtred unto him, for E 'what cauſe he was there kept, he underſtood the Jews purpoſe, and Law not to be revealed, 'for the fulfilling whereof he was there nouriſhed, and that the Jews were wont to do the 'like every year upon a day appointed: and to take a Grecian ſtranger, and feed him a 'year, and then to carry him to a Wood, and there to kill him, and ſacrifice him according 'to their Rites and Ceremonies, and to taſte and eat of his entrails: and in the ſacrificing of 'the Grecian, to ſwear to be enemies to the Greeks, and the reſidue of the murthered man 'they caſt into a certain pit. And that then this Greek reported unto Antiochus, that the 'time allotted unto him by the Jews to live was now almoſt expired, and therefore reque-'ſted, for the reverence he bare to the Grecian gods, to ſave his blood from being ſpilt by 'the Jews, and to free him out of that imminent calamity.

Who are accounted Aſſes amongſt the Jews and other wiſe men.

Certain Hiſtoriographers endeavour to cover & hide Antiochus his perjury and ſacrilledge.

That the Jews ought once a year to ſacrifice a Grecian.

F This Fable is not only ſtuft full of all tragical cruelty, but alſo mingled with cruel impudency: yet for all this, the firſt deviſers hereof do not free Antiochus from Sacriledge, as they hoped hereby to do, who write it purpoſely to flatter him. For that which they report of the Greek found in a bed, did not move him to come and ſack our Temple, he not knowing of it before he came and found it ſo (as they ſay.) Antiochus therefore was moſt impious, and not aſſiſted by Gods favour in that enterprize, (whatſoever thoſe lyes mutter) as it is eaſie to learn of the fact of him committed. For we do not only differ from the Greeks in Religion, but a great deal more from the Egyptians, and other Nations; and what Nation in the World is there, that ſometime doth not travel thorow our Country? Is it

then

then probable that we only renew that Conſpiracy againſt the Greeks? Or how is it poſſi- G ble that ſo many thouſand people as are of our own Nation, ſhould all eat of the entrails of one man, as Apion reporteth? Or why did he not name this man, whoſoever he was? Or why did not the King carry him with Trumpets into his Country? ſeeing that in ſo doing he might have been eſteemed full of piety, and a great favourer of the Greeks, and greatly ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the hatred of the Jews by their aide? But I omit to ſpeak more of this: for inſenſible people void of all reaſon, muſt not be reprehended in word, but by deeds: for all men that have ſeen the building of the Temple, can teſtifie what it was, and the undefiled purity thereof. For it had four Porches about, and every one of them by our Laws had ſeveral keepers: and into the outward Porch, all people, yea ſtrangers might en- H ter without breach of our Laws, women only excepted that have their monthly courſes. Into the ſecond Porch it was lawful for only Jews to come: and all Jews might go into it, and their wives alſo when they were free from pollution of their flowers. Into the third Porch, they only of our Nation that were purified and ſanctified might come. Into the fourth might only the Prieſts enter, who were cloathed with Prieſtly Stoles, and into the ſecret part of the Temple might only the high Prieſt come, attired with a Stole proper to him only: yea we are in all things ſo careful of piety, that our Prieſts are appointed hours when to enter into the Temple.

The deſcription of the Temple and Porches.

For in the morning when the Temple was opened, the Prieſts that were to ſacrifice the hoſtes which were given them, entred into the Temple, and at noon again when it was ſhut; I yea it was not lawful to carry any veſſel into the Temple, but there was only there an Altar, a Table, a Cenſer, and a Candleſtick, as is in our Law mentioned, and there is no other ſecret or hidden myſtery done, neither is there in that place any eating; and all the people can teſtifie this which I have here ſet down, and our Writings do the like. For notwithſtanding that there are four Rites of Prieſts, and every Prieſts Tribe containeth above five thouſand men: yet every one waiteth on certain appointed days in their turn, and their time of waiting being expired, others ſucceed them in ſacrificing; and the day before they are to finiſh their waiting, they deliver up unto their ſucceſſors the keys of the Temple, and all veſſels belonging thereto, in the full number that they received them: and nothing is brought into the Temple, pertaining either to meat or drink: yea and are forbidden to K be offered at our Altar, thoſe things only excepted, whereof we make our Sacrifice. What then ſhall we ſay of Apion, who examining nothing of all theſe, hath raiſed ſuch incredible reports of us? How ignominious a thing is it for a Grammarian, not to be able to deliver the truth of a Hiſtory? Well, he knew the piety uſed in our Temple, but he purpoſely omitted it: yet could he remember to tell a fained tale of the ſacrificing of the Greek, his dainty fare, and that hidden food, that all men alſo that would, paſſed thorow our Temple: whereas the moſt noble among our whole Nation, are not permitted to come there, except they be Prieſts.

What was in the Temple.

Four Tribes of Prieſts, and of every Tribe more then five thouſand men.

This therefore is great impiety, and a voluntary forged lye, to ſeduce them that will not examine the truth. For they have attempted to ſlander us by thoſe impieties before mention- L ed, not to be ſpoken of. And again, like one full of all piety, he derideth the vanity of theſe fables, and reporteth that at ſuch time as the Jews for a long time together warred againſt the Idumæans, Zabidus departing out of a City of Idumæa where Apollo was worſhipped, came unto the Jews, promiſing them to deliver unto them Apollo the Dorians god, and bring him unto their Temple, if ſo be that all of them would there aſſemble themſelves together: and that afterwards Zabidus did make a moſt excellent kind of wooden inſtrument, and placed it in three ranks of candles, and put it upon him, and walked like a Star gliding on the ground (for that ſhape he reſembled to them that were afar off from him.) And that the Jews hereat (ſeeing this ſtrange viſion) admired and were aſtoniſhed, and ſtanding afar off, they were all ſilent, and how by this ſhift Zabidus eaſily got into the Temple, and took away M the golden Aſſes head (for ſo he writeth plainly) and ſo to have returned ſpeedily to Dora. Wherefore we may ſay that Apion leadeth an Aſs, to wit, himſelf with fooleries and lyes; for he nameth places that are not, and ſetteth down Cities to himſelf unknown: for Idumæa is a Province near unto us, and bordering upon Gara, and there is no City in it called Dora; but in Phœnicia near unto the Hill Carmelus, there is a City of that name, yet nothing conſonant to Apions ſlanders, for it is four days journey from Judæa.

Another tale deviſed by Apion of Zabidus.

Dora is a City of Phœnicia and not of Idumæa.

Why therefore doth he ſo raſhly accuſe us for not worſhipping the ſame gods that other Nations do, ſeeing (as he ſaith) our Predeceſſors did ſo eaſily believe that Apollo would come come unto them, and that he walked upon the earth with ſtars about his back? Perhaps indeed they had never before ſeen a candle or lamp, themſelves having ſo many: or is it likely that he walking thus quite through our Country, where ſo many thouſand men are, no one of them all met him? Did he in the time of war find the Towns and Villages, by which he paſt, without any Watch-men? Well, I omit the reſt. The gates of our Temple were threeſcore cubits high, twenty cubits broad, all covered with gold, yea, almoſt all of clean gold, and theſe gates every day were ſhut by two hundred men: and it was too impious a thing to leave them open. Is it then credible that this Candle-bearer could eaſily open them, who alone was judged to have the Aſſes head? So that now it remaineth doubtful whether Zabidus did bring back again the Aſſes head, or elſe Apion took it of him, and brought it again to our Temple, that there Antiochus might find it, and ſo Apion might have another occaſion of lying. He alſo belieth us concerning the oath which he ſaith we Jews do take, ſwearing by the God of heaven and earth, and ſea, never to favour any ſtranger, and eſpecially the Greeks. This lyar might better have ſaid, not to favour any ſtranger, and eſpecially the Egyptians, and ſo his former lyes and theſe ſhould have had better correſpondence with the beginning, if our Anceſtors had been expelled by their Predeceſſors out of Egypt, not for their wickedneſs, but for their own calamity. But we are ſo far from the Greeks, that we ſcarcely ever think of them: ſo that no man can ſay that there is any enmity between us and the Greeks. But contrariwiſe, many of them have embraced our Religion, and ſome of them therein perſevered: others again have forſaken it; yet none of them will ſay that he heard this oath ſpoken of among us: but it ſhould ſeem that only Apion heard of it, in that he himſelf indeed forged it. Truly his wiſdom and great providence is worthy to be admired (as ſhall hereafter appear:) for he, to prove theſe his lyes to be true, ſaith, that it is a certain teſtimony that the Laws we obſerve are moſt unjuſt, and that we worſhip not God as we ought to do, in that we are ſubject to divers Nations, and our City endured many calamities: Whereas touching themſelves, they are of a City that flouriſheth in abſolute Authority, accuſtomed to govern from the foundation thereof, and not to ſerve the Romans. In effect, who can reſiſt their valour? Truly no man but Apion would ever have flouted us herewith, ſeeing that few Cities ſo flouriſh and reign over other, that they again at no one time have been brought into ſubjection; for many Nations are ſubject to others: only the Egyptians are freed from the Captivity of ſuch as rule Europe and Aſia, for that (as they ſay) the gods fleeing into their Country, were ſaved by entring into the bodies of beaſts. Yet have they not indeed had one days liberty ſince the beginning of the world, neither under the Government of their own Princes, nor under ſtrangers.

The gates of the Temple.

Apions lye concerning the oath is confuted.

Apion upbraideth the Jews with captivity.

I will not ſtand to reckon how often the Perſians have waſted their City, deſtroyed their Temples, and ſlain their ſuppoſed Gods. For it is not decent that I ſhould imitate herein Apions fooliſhneſs: neither am I calling to memory what befel the Athenians and Lacedemonians, the laſt of which, are recorded to have been moſt valiant, and firſt to have been moſt devout and religious: neither will I reckon up thoſe moſt godly Kings, amongſt whom Cræſus was one, who notwithſtanding fell into great calamities. Moreover, I will not recount how the Caſtle of Athens was ſet on fire, and the Temples of Epheſus and Delphos likewiſe, and many others. There is now one Apion, a new accuſer of the Jews, who upbraideth them with their calamities, forgetting quite all miſery that hath befallen his Country-men the Egyptians: but he was blinded with the fable of Seſoſtris (whom he ſaith to have been King of Egypt.) We could report and boaſt of our Kings, David and Solomon, who ſubdued many Nations unto them: but it is not fit here to ſpeak of them. But Apion was ignorant of that which all the world knoweth, to wit, that the Egyptians have ſerved firſt the Perſians, and afterwards the Macedonians, and that as bond-ſlaves: where we remaining in free liberty, reigned over all Cities round about us 120 years, even unto the time of Pompey the Great; and when all the other Kings were ſubdued by the Romans, only our Kings for their fidelity and friendſhip towards them, were dear unto them. O but this ſticketh upon Apions ſtomach! that we have not had any famous men of our Nation, who have invented Arts and Sciences, and been excellent in wiſdom, ſuch as Socrates, Zeno, Cleanthes, and others, whom he ſetteth down, were: and which is moſt to be admired, Apion puts himſelf into the number of theſe famous men: and ſaith, that Alexandria is bleſſed and happy, that hath deſerved to have ſuch a Citizen as he is: and great reaſon that he himſelf ſhould teſtifie that of himſelf, which all men elſe perceive in him, to wit, that he is an impudent deceitful ful fellow, both of corrupt life and manners. So that any Alexandrians had juſt cauſe to be ſorry that they ever had any better opinion of him. But that our Nation had men equal at leaſt unto thoſe whom he mentioneth, all men know that pleaſe to read the Book of our Antiquity. The reſt that his accuſation containeth, it is not amiſs to let paſs without anſwer, for that it rather impeacheth the Egyptians, his own Country-men, then us: for he doth complain of us for ſacrificing ordinary beaſts, and from abſtaining to eat ſwines fleſh, and greatly laughed at circumciſion. Touching the ſacrificing of theſe beaſts, we do as all Nations elſe do: and Apion, inveighing againſt our ſacrificing, ſheweth himſelf to be an Egyptian; for were he either a Grecian or a Macedonian, he would not be herewith offended; for both Greeks and Macedonians do vow to ſacrifice (Hecatombs) to their gods, and uſe Prieſts in the banquets; and yet for all this, the world is not deſolate of living creatures, as Apion feareth. 100: Catel:

Why the Jews do ſacrifice common beaſts, and do not eat ſwines fleſh.

But were all men ſo mad as the Egyptians, it would indeed be deſolate of men, and filled with cruel beaſts, which they (ſuppoſing them to be gods) do diligently nouriſh. If any man ſhall ask of Apion, whom of all the Egyptians he judged to be a wiſe man, and moſt religious towards their gods, no doubt he would anſwer that the Prieſts are. For they ſay, that their firſt Kings in the beginning gave them theſe two commandments in charge; firſt, to ſeek wiſdom; and next, to worſhip the gods: they alſo are all of them circumciſed, and abſtain from ſwines fleſh, and no other Egyptian ſacrificeth with them unto their gods. Apion therefore was ſurely blind, when, inſtead of detracting us, he ſpeaketh ill of them, to gratifie whom, he took all this pains. For the Egyptians do not only uſe thoſe cuſtoms which Apion in us diſalloweth, but alſo to teach others to circumciſe themſelves, as Herodotus reporteth. So that I verily think, that Apion was juſtly puniſhed for blaſpheming his Country-laws and Religion. For being forced to circumciſe himſelf to avoid a great diſeaſe, he was hereby nothing helped, but for all this, his privy member rotting, he in extream grief and miſery gave up the ghoſt. For wiſe men ought to perſevere in their Country-laws in all piety, and not to deride and detract others: but Apion forſook his own Religion, and ſlandered and belied ours. And this was Apions end: and here alſo ſhould end this Book, but that Apollonius, Molon and Lyſimachus, and certain others, partly for ignorance, partly for madneſs, have moſt injuriouſly belied our Law-maker Moſes, and the Laws he made, detracting him as a deceitful Magician, and then as the Author of all malice and impiety amongſt us; and for ſuch as teach no vertue nor goodneſs at all. I will therefore, as far as in me lyeth, declare both our converſation in general, and in particular: for if my judgment be any thing, our Laws are moſt forcible both to piety, and to all humanity in general, as alſo to juſtice, pains-taking, and contempt of death. I only requeſt this favour of the Reader, that he will not with a prejudicate or malicious opinion, peruſe theſe Writings: for I do not write this as a praiſe and vain oſtentation of our Nation, but as a juſt Apology, refuting the ſlanderous reports that ſome have uſed againſt us.

The Egyptian Prieſts circumciſed, and eat no ſwines fleſh.

The defence of Moſes againſt Apollonius and Lyſimachus.

Apollonius doth not continually inveigh againſt us as Apion doth, but only here and there; ſometimes affirming us to be ſomewhiles hated both of God and man, ſometimes to be Cowards, other ſometimes contrariwiſe complaining of our Nations boldneſs. Saying moreover, that we are more ſottiſh then any barbarous Nation; and that therefore we only have had none of our Nation founders of Arts or Sciences, which are profitable for mans life; all which objections are eaſily refuted, if we ſhew the contrary to all theſe by him reported; both that we have obeyed our Laws, and lived in all integrity. If therefore I be forced to ſhew that other Nations have made contrary Laws, not I, but they are to be blamed, who comparing ours with them of other Nations, affirm ours to be the worſe: neither of which can charge us, either that theſe Laws which I will briefly ſet down are not ours, or elſe that we have not perſiſted in them as we ought. Making therefore this beginning, I affirm, that they who have framed themſelves to live together under certain Rules and Ordinances, and kept them inviolate, and were the firſt founders of them, were more to be commended for humanity and vertue, then they who live under no Rule nor Ordinance at all: and every Law-maker endeavoureth ſo to challenge Antiquity for their own Ordinances, as that they may not be thought to imitate others, but to be themſelves the firſt Authors thereof, and guides to direct other mens lives. Which being ſo, it is the duty of a good Law-maker to make choice of that which is beſt, and moſt convenient for them, who are to obey their Laws, and to ſatisfie them as much as may be, in proving their Laws to be good and right, and both in wealth and wo, calamity and felicity, to remain in them, never changing nor

A nor altering them. I therefore aver that our Law-maker is more ancient then any Law-maker mentioned. For Lycurgus, and Solon, and Seleucus of Locris, and those the Greeks admire, are modern, of late times in respect of him, as it is well known. For the Greeks themselves confess, that in times past they wanted the name of Law. This Homer can witness, who in his whole Works never mentioneth this word, Law, for the people of those times were not governed by Laws, but by indefinite sentences, and the Princes pleasure, using customs but not written, and altering and changing them also as occasion served.

Moses more ancient than all other Law-makers.

Νόμος. This word, Law, is not in Homer.

But our Law-maker being very ancient (for this is every way manifest, even by our adversaries own confessions) shewed himself both a good Prince and Counsellor unto his people: for making Laws to direct and govern mens lives, he perswaded them voluntarily, to B imbrace them, and firmly to persist in them with all wisdom. And first of all, let us consider the works of his greatness. For he undertaking the conduct of many thousand of our forefathers out of Egypt into our own Country, he delivered them from many calamities, almost impossible to be avoided: for they being to pass through a place wherein was no water, and a very sandy ground, being also to war and to keep their wives and children, and goods for the variable event of Wars, he in all these shewed himself a most wise and prudent Counsellor, and a true Patron and Guide unto them all. For he made all the multitude so to depend upon him, that he might perswade them whatsoever he pleased, and yet in none of all these did he usurp any Authority over them: and in that time and place wherein all men of authority assume power unto themselves, and use tyranny, at such time as the people do oftentimes offend, and live in all manner of impiety; he then being in authority did C contrariwise use all lenity and mildness, to the intent that he might be a pattern of vertue and justice to all the rest, giving all those that willingly followed him most assured safety, using in all accidents most strange works. And for this cause he rightly deemed God to be his Captain and Counsellor: and first examining himself, and finding that all the Laws he had set down were agreeable to the will and pleasure of God, the chiefest care he now had was how to perswade his people the same, which he himself now knew: for they who direct their lives according to the will of God, avoid all sins as our Law-maker did, being neither Magician nor deceiver, as his enemies injuriously report, but such a one as the Greeks do boast Minos and others after him to have been: for some of them affirmed their Laws to be D made by Jupiter, others by Apollo and Delphos Oracle; either so believing themselves, or else thinking that the people would be easily so perswaded. Now who of all the Law-makers made the best Law, and who did most rightly think of God, he that compareth all their Laws together may easily know; for now occasion is offered to speak of them: there are therefore an infinite company of Nations and Laws amongst men, and some Nations are ruled by Monarchs, othersome by the common consent of the people. But our Law-maker doing neither of these, did as one should say therein declare his Common-wealth to be Divine, chiefly assigning all power and principality over us to God, causing all men to fix their minds and cogitations on Him, as the only Giver and Author of all goodness, giving them to understand, that whatsoever in their necessity they intreat him for, He heareth their E prayers, and understandeth what every man doth in private, yea, his very cogitations; and that he is One, Unbegotten, and in all times Immutable and Eternal, differing in a most excellent shape from all mortal creatures: and this we knew, but we are altogether ignorant what God is as touching his Substance and Essence.

The life of Moses.

Moses maketh God his guide and counsellor.

The origen of Laws amongst the Greeks.

And thus the wisest Greeks that ever were, judged of God, who how learned they were (he giving the ground of all their knowledge) I now omit to rehearse: and that these things afore rehearsed are best and most agreeable to the nature and magnificence of God, many do witness, as Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, and Plato, and after them the Stoicks, and almost all other Philosophers have so thought of the Divine nature. But they delivering this their Philosophy in short speech, durst not publish the truth of their doctrine among the people F already seized upon by superstitious opinions. But our Law-makers works and words so agreed, that he satisfied at large all his people, and they that were to be born of them, and their successours, inspiring as it were a certain constancy into them to persevere in the same, still referring the cause of his Laws to their profit and commodity. For he did not affirm the worship of God only to be part of vertue, but he assigned other part thereof, to wit, fortitude, justice, and mutual concord of all his Citizens. For all our actions, speeches, and what else soever, are all referred to divine piety. Which he left not touched without any more discourse of it. For these two are the methods of all discipline and morality, whereof one frameth and directeth the ſpeech, the other the manners and actions; which being ſo, other Law-makers were indeed wiſe in advice and counſel, and yet they made choice of one of theſe methods, and left the other; for the Lacedemonians were inſtructed in manners and not in words, as alſo they of Crete were: but the Athenians and almoſt all the Greeks were directed and trained up by Laws in every thing they were to do, yet never could they put their written laws in practice. But our Lawmaker very induſtriouſly did conjoin both theſe together, for he neither omitted the training them up in manners and good exerciſes, neither did he ſurceaſe to leave them written laws. And firſt of all, making his entrance from the very meats, and preſcribing to every one a convenient diet, he left no man liberty amongſt us to direct himſelf in the leaſt matter concerning his meat, but he by laws defined, both from what meats we were to abſtain, and what to eat, and what ought to be our ordinary diet, as alſo when we ought to labour, and when to ceaſe from work; ſo that we as it were under the government of a Father or Maſter, might neither ſin willingly, nor for ignorance: for he did not appoint puniſhment for them that were ignorant of it, but by law enacted a moſt neceſſary and mild chaſtiſement for the voluntary offenders: and for this cauſe he did not only will, that we ſhould once or twice or often hear the laws, but that once every week we all, omitting other buſineſs, ſhould come to hear the laws, and ſo learn them perfectly, which things all other Law-makers, as it is well known, omitted: All which laudable cuſtoms all other Law-makers have neglected, and the moſt part of men are ſo far from living according to their own laws, that they are altogether ignorant of them; and having offended their laws through ignorance, they then learn by other mens means, that they have made breach of their laws; yea, the chiefeſt and moſt eminent men amongſt them, do profeſs herein that they are ignorant, cauſing thoſe that are learned and skilful in their Laws, to ſit as it were in commiſſion with them to direct them. Whereas every one of our Nation being demanded of our Laws, can anſwer as readily as he can tell his own name: for every one of us learning them as it were ſo ſoon as we come to the uſe of reaſon, we have them as it were written and printed in our minds, and by this means both we offend more ſeldom, and when we offend we are ſure to be puniſhed.

Moſes commandeth all the Jews to come and hear the Law.

And this eſpecially is that which hath cauſed ſuch an unity and concord amongſt us. For to worſhip one God all after the ſame manner, and nothing differ in manner and converſation one from another, is the only way to eſtabliſh amity and concord in a Common-wealth. For only amongſt us no man ſhall hear any different ſpeeches and opinions concerning God, which thing amongſt all Nations elſe is moſt frequent and ordinary: for amongſt them not only every one of the common people doth ſpeak his pleaſure in this point, but divers Philoſophers alſo preſume to do it, ſome of them with their blaſphemous ſpeeches altogether deſtroying the nature of God, and others with the like impudency denying him to have any care of men; neither is there any difference amongſt us of affairs pertaining to mans life, but all men with us follow one common expreſs labour, and we all jointly affirm the Son of God, and that he hath care of humane affairs, and all our actions and exerciſes: yea, any one may learn of our women and children, that all things whatſoever are to be reduced to piety. Hence it groweth that ſome detract our Nation; for that amongſt us were no men inventers of new matters and acts: to whom we will thus anſwer, that other Nations account it a glory not to perſiſt in any thing that their forefathers uſed, and hold them of moſt account amongſt them, that can beſt tranſgreſs their forefathers wiſdom. But we contrariwiſe do account it the chiefeſt point of wiſdom and virtue, neither to do, nor think any thing contrary to that which our anceſtors have decreed, which is a token that our law was eſtabliſhed by as good advice as was poſſible. For thoſe laws that in all points are not as they ought to be, are often by experience found faulty. But amongſt us who believe that our law was firſt eſtabliſhed by the will and pleaſure of Almighty God, nothing is pious and virtuous which may any wiſe impugne the ſame. For who can take away any tittle thereof, or add better in the ſtead? or who is he that can tranſfer and carry us from the obſervance of them, and ordain for us better laws to govern our Common-wealth? Or what law can be more juſt and better, than that which the wiſdom of God (who is the Lord of all things) hath eſtabliſhed? he firſt of all permitted the diſpoſing of all principal affairs to the Prieſts in general, and moſt wiſely conſtituted a high Prieſt as their head: neither were they choſen to this dignity by our Lawmaker, who either excell'd in nobility of birth, or riches: but he appointed ſuch to ſacrifice unto God, who were known to excel others in wiſdom and ſanctity, theſe do both keep our Laws, and obſerve all other things belonging to their office with all integrity; for our Prieſts are appointed over-ſeers of all things, and to judg all ſtrifes and controverſies, and to puniſh the offenders. What Monarchy then or Kingdom can be more holy then this? Or how can God be better honoured then amongſt us; where all the people are prepared to piety, and the Prieſts commanded ſo to rule and govern the Common-wealth, as if they were celebrating ſome feſtivity? And whereas other Nations cannot celebrate their myſteries, which they term ſacrifices, in a few days; we with joy, and pleaſure and immutable wills, do celebrate our ſacrifices continually without intermiſſion: It reſteth now that I ſet down our precepts and laws, as argument of that which I have ſaid. The firſt is of God: of whom our law ſaith, God hath all things, he is moſt perfect, moſt bleſſed, he is ſufficient both for himſelf and all things elſe, he is the beginning, midſt, and ending, famous amongſt all things for his works and benefits, more manifeſt then any thing elſe, but his ſhape and greatneſs is to us unſpeakable, all matters (how precious ſoever) being compared with his excellent beauty are nothing worth, and all art compared with his invention is unartificial, we can neither ſee, conceive, nor imagine any thing like him. He is holy, for we ſee his works; the Light, the Heaven, and the Earth, the Sun, the Moon, Rivers, and Sea, ſo many different ſhapes of living Creatures, and encreaſe of fruits: All theſe God himſelf made, not with hands or work, nor as one needing any to help him, but he ſeeing them to be good, they were preſently made. He is to be followed of all men, who ought to worſhip him by the exerciſing of vertue; for this is the moſt holy way to pleaſe him. We have one Temple, as alſo one God, which Temple is common to all men, as he is the common God of all men. For ſimilitude always pleaſeth, him do all our Prieſts honour with ſacrifice, and he amongſt them hath the firſt place, who by birth is the chiefeſt: and he firſt ſacrificeth to God, ſeeth the Laws obſerved, judgeth controverſies, and puniſheth thoſe that are convicted by the law: whoſoever diſobeyeth him, ſhall be puniſhed as one that rebels againſt God himſelf: he offereth ſacrifices not pertaining to gluttony or drunkenneſs, for God is not pleaſed with ſuch ſacrifices, but is rather injured, and ſuperfluous expences are thereby made.

What ſort of people are to be made Prieſts.

The works of God.

The ſacrifices of the old Teſtament.

But God loveth them that are temperate, and orderly, and of good behaviour, and eſpecially requireth in us that ſacrifice, an inviolable chaſtity. In our ſacrifices offered for our common good, we firſt of all pray in common, and then every one for himſelf, becauſe we are all fellows, and he that delighteth herein more then in his own life, is moſt acceptable to God. We pray and vow unto God, not requeſting riches of him, for he of his own accord beſtoweth them upon every one, and left them amongſt us: but we pray that we may have part of them, and having gotten them may keep them. Our law hath alſo appointed purifications both from our Chamber-bed and carnal copulation, and many other things, which are too long to rehearſe: And this is our ſpeech and opinion of God, who himſelf is our Law. And what concerning marriage? Our law only alloweth natural copulation between man and wife, done to the intent to get Children. But that men ſhould abuſe one another againſt nature, it altogether diſalloweth, and puniſheth ſuch offenders with death. It commandeth us to marry, not reſpecting the dowry, neither muſt we take women violently and by force, nor allure them by deceitful perſwaſions, but that we rather obtain his good will, who may grant and uſe ordinary means to perſwade. It alſo appointeth that a woman ſhall be in all things inferiour to the man, neither is ſhe to obey in committing wickedneſs, but as one under government. For it is God that gave man this authority. With her the Huſband only may lawfully accompany, and it is abomination for her to make trial of another man: and who ſo attempteth this, can no ways avoid death: the like penalty attendeth him, if he offer violence to a Virgin eſpouſed unto another man, or if by perſwaſions he overcome a married woman or other, that hath Children under her, and all this our Law commandeth: It hath alſo interdicted all women from concealing their Children being born, or otherwiſe to deſtroy them, for ſo ſhe ſhould be a Child-killer, deſtroy Souls, and mankind: Whoſo therefore uſeth carnal copulation and corruption is unclean by our laws, and women after lawful copulation muſt waſh themſelves, judging that a part of their Soul was by this act defiled, and ſhe being puffed up was wounded in her body, and therefore our Law ordained water of purification for them. Neither is it lawful for them to feaſt and banquet at their Child-birth, whereby an occaſion of drunkenneſs may grow, but that their beginning ſhould be temperate: they are likewiſe commanded to train up their Children in learning that they may learn the Law, and actions of their Forefathers, and imitate them; that ſo being trained up in the Law, they may not ſin nor tranſgreſs them by ignorance.

Of the funerals of the dead.

Our Law hath alſo provided for the burial of the dead, that our Funerals ſhould neither G be pompous, nor our Sepulchres gorgeous, commanding every Houſhold to perform all neceſſaries touching the burial of their dead, permitting all men at any ones death to aſſemble themſelves together, and bewail the dead: It alſo commandeth every one (yea even the dead mans own family) to purifie themſelves after the burial, and to go afar off, as ſeeming to be unclean. It alſo appointeth puniſhment for them that have committed murder, either wilfully, or againſt their will. It bindeth every man to obey his Parents next after God, and commandeth that thoſe children that do not ſhew themſelves grateful unto them, or in any thing do grieve them, that they ſhould be ſtoned to death: It alſo commandeth all young men to reverence old men, becauſe God is Elder to us all. It permitteth not friends to H conceal any impiety; for God is not their friend, who doth not diſcloſe them: And if friends fall out that do know one anothers ſecrets; yet they are commanded not to bewray them. If any Judge take a bribe, he is to be puniſhed with death for omitting Juſtice, and aſſiſting the guilty. No man muſt take any thing away that he himſelf placed not, and no man muſt take that which is not his own. No man for lending muſt take uſury; and many ſuch like things our Law commandeth, concerning cauſe of communion between us and others.

The honour due to Parents.

Againſt theft and uſury.

It is alſo not amiſs to recount how our Law-maker provided for the entertaining of ſtrangers amongſt us: For he ſeemeth ſo to have provided, that to our knowledge we neither corrupt our own Laws, nor deny to impart them to others: but he entertaineth all liberally, that will come and live under our Laws, judging the community of mans life, not ſo much to conſiſt in the Nation whereof we come, as in the unity of our minds and converſation. He forbiddeth others that are ſtrangers, and come not with that intent to be admitted to our ſolemnities; yet he commanded us to exhibite unto them all other things neceſſary: and that we ſhould give unto all men, fire, water, meat, and bury them being dead. He hath alſo moſt mildly determined how we ought to deal with our Enemies, that we neither deſtroy their Country with fire, not cut down their Fruit-trees. We are alſo forbidden to rob and ſpoil thoſe that are ſlain in fight, and deal injuriouſly with our Captives; and eſpecially, if they be women: yea, he ſo endeavoured to teach us humanity and mildneſs, that he provided, that we uſe even unreaſonable beaſts courteouſly, and only imploy them to ſerve our K lawful need, and no further: for he forbiddeth us to kill any tame thing bred in houſes, and that we ſhould not kill the old Birds and their young together; and although many wild beaſts, enemies to mankind, do aſſiſt us in our labours, yet he commanded to ſpare them alſo. And in every point he eſtabliſhed humanity and mildneſs amongſt us, uſing (as is before ſaid) Laws to direct us therein, enacting alſo other, how they who infringe the foreſaid Laws, may be with all ſeverity puniſhed: for the puniſhment allotted to the violaters hereof, is for the moſt part death: as if any man commit Adultery, raviſh a Virgin, uſe the ſin againſt nature with another, or ſuffer himſelf to be ſo abuſed. We alſo have Laws concerning our ſervants, and our meaſures and weights, and unlawful bargains and ſales, or deceit, if either one take any thing that is another mans, or which is not his own; all theſe are to be puniſhed not as L other Nations puniſh them, but much more grievouſly. But whoſoever either injureth his Parents, or committeth impiety againſt God, he ſhall preſently be deſtroyed: but they that obſerve this Law are rewarded, not with gold or ſilver, nor with a Crown beſet with precious ſtone: but every one having his Conſcience to witneſs, doth greatly profit and gain Eternity; as both our Law-maker propheſieth, and God himſelf doth moſt aſſuredly promiſe to them that obſerve them. And if it chance that we be forced to ſuffer death for them, yet do we joyfully go to execution, nothing doubting but that we ſhall ſo exchange this life for a better. I ſhould be loth to report this, if our deeds did not make it manifeſt: for, many of our forefathers, only for that they refuſed to ſpeak againſt our Laws, or otherwiſe then our Laws permitted, have moſt manfully and conſtantly endured all torments and M death it ſelf. If our Nation were unknown to all the world, and that this our voluntary obſervation of our Laws were not manifeſt to all the people, if any man ſhould report unto the Greeks, that either he had read this which I have declared, or elſe that he had found people in a ſtrange land, ſuch as we be, having ſo pious and honeſt opinions concerning God, and who had for many ages perſevered therein; I doubt not but they would all admire and wonder hereat, conſidering the great mutability amongſt themſelves. To be ſhort, there are ſome, who ſtick not to deride them who have lately written of the Government of Commonwealths and Laws, as though they had written things fabulous and altogether impoſſible. And that I ſpeak nothing of other Philoſophers that have written of this Argument, that divine Plato amongſt the Greeks, a man who in honeſt life, virtuous ſpeech, and ſound Philoſophy excelled all others. This man is almoſt continually ſcoffed at by them, who in their own conceit are ſkillful in civil affairs, and brought in as a Vice in a Comedy. Whereas, whoſoever conſidereth his Writings with diligence, ſhall often and eaſily find matter agreeable with moſt mens manners: yea this Plato himſelf confeſſeth, that he dare not by reaſon of the common peoples ignorance ſet down the true opinion of God. But many think Plato's words full of vanity, and licentiouſneſs, and admire Lycurgus, and every one commendeth the City of Sparta, for that it ſo long time perſevered in his Laws. It is therefore an evident demonſtration of Virtue to remain in their Laws. But if thoſe who ſo admire the Lacedemonians, do compare them with us, and the time during the which their Laws were in force, with the time of our Common-wealth; they ſhall find that ours hath continued more then two thouſand years. They ſhall alſo find that the Lacedemonians did only perfectly obſerve their Laws, during ſuch time as they were in proſperity and liberty, and that when their fortune changed, they then became unmindful of their Laws.

Plato admired amongſt the Greeks.

Lycurgus the Law-maker amongſt the Lacedemonians.

But we, who have felt many thouſand miſ-haps, by reaſon of the often change of Princes in Aſia, have not in theſe our laſt miſeries and evils forſaken our Law. Neither can any man ſay, that liberty and licentious life is the cauſe, why we ſo diligently obſerve them, ſeeing, that whoſo pleaſe may ſee ſufficient proof, that they tye us to more ſtrict life and laborious, then thoſe of the Lacedemonians did them. For they neither tilled the earth, nor uſed any handy-craft, but ceaſing from all labours and pains-taking, lived in their City, fat and fair-liking, having both their meat and all other neceſſaries provided and prepared for them by others, and eſteemed that only their felicity to do and endure any thing, ſo that they might prevail againſt thoſe againſt whom they enterprized Wars: and that they failed alſo herein, I omit to rehearſe. For not only one or two of them at once, but oftentimes whole Companies of them, forgetting their own Laws, yielded themſelves to their Enemies. And can any one tell of, I ſay not ſo many, but of one or two of us that ever was treacherous to his own Laws, or that feared to dye for them? I mean not a common death, ſuch as Souldiers are ſubject unto, but ſuch a death as is effected by all torments and tortures that can be deviſed. Which I think thoſe that prevailed againſt us, impoſed upon us, not for hatred, but that they deſired to ſee ſo admirable a matter; and to ſee we being but men, and ſuch who eſteemed it the greateſt impiety poſſible to do it, could be compelled by them to ſpeak or do any thing contrary to our Laws. Yet it is no wonder that we for our Law do dye with ſuch conſtancy, rather then any other Nation: for other Nations cannot abide to endure that which we account a trifle, to wit, labour and ſimple fare, and that no man eat whatſoever, or what he deſireth, to lye with them whom he ought not, or to be idle, (except he be of noble birth) or go gallantly attired: and we are always careful that when we fight againſt our Enemies, we obſerve our Laws concerning our meats. And thus we take pleaſure to obſerve and keep our Laws, and to exerciſe fortitude in obeying them.

Let now Lyſimachus or Molonus paſs, and ſuch as they be, wicked lying Writers, and Sophiſters, deceivers of young men, and detracters of our Nation, as though we were the wickedeſt people living. As for me, I will not examine the Laws of other Nations: for it is our cuſtom to keep and obſerve our own, not to detract others; yea, and our Law-maker openly prohibited us from blaſpheming ſuch, as other Nations hold for gods, only for the Name of God attributed unto them: yet may we not leave the objections of our accuſers unanſwered, ſeeing that which we are to ſpeak againſt them, is not our own device, but many before us have ſpoken it. Who then of all the wiſe Greeks will not condemn the moſt famous Poets, and eſpecially the Law-makers, who at firſt brought and ſetled ſuch vain opinions of the gods among the common people? affirming the number of them to be ſo many as they thought good, and to be born at divers times one of another, allotting to every one his proper place, as unto other living Creatures: ſome to be under the earth, others in the Sea, and the ancienteſt amongſt them in Hell, fettered and bound: and thoſe whom they place in Heaven, in words they do term him a Father, but in deeds they ſhew him to be a Tyrant, and for this cauſe they report that his wife, his brother, and his daughter, whom they affirm to have been born of his brain, conſpired againſt him to bind him, and hang him, as they report him alſo to have dealt by his Father. Againſt theſe vanities all excellent and wiſe men do worthily inveigh, who beſide this already rehearſed, in deriſion adde, how ſome of the gods are young, and ſome old, and ſome infants, others are gods of Arts and Sciences, and one is a Smith, another a Weaver, another a Pilgrim, and is at variance with mortal men, others delight in Muſick, others in ſhooting: moreover, that they are at variance one with another amongſt themſelves, and that they fall out one with another in mens behalf, and that not only one of them layeth violent hands upon the other, but that alſo they are wounded by mortal men, and ſorrow, and feel grief for the wounds; and that which is moſt abominable of all, do uſe carnal copulation with mankind, and that moſt undecently, that their unbridled luſt is extended both to men and women. Then that their chief god of all whom they call father, contemned and drowned certain women whom he himſelf had deceived and gotten with Child, and that he could not deliver the Children born of theſe women from calamity, for that deſtiny had obliged him, nor ſee their deaths without tears. This is all good ſtuff, as alſo is that which followeth, to wit, adulteries committed in Heaven, ſo openly, and impudently amongſt the gods, that ſome profeſs themſelves to envy their fellow gods and goddeſſes tied together in ſuch filthineſs. And what ſhould the reſt of them do, when as their King and the moſt ancienteſt amongſt them, could not refrain his luſtful licentiouſneſs from the Company of women? Moreover, ſome of them became ſervants unto men, and ſome built houſes for money, and others became ſhepherds, others like malefactors were chained in Hell. What man then that ever was accounted wiſe, would not bluſh at theſe follies, and reprove the inventors hereof, and the fooliſh believers alſo? Others preſumed to fain both terrour, and fear, and madneſs, and ſuch ſimplicity, as that they might be deceived, and all other naughty paſſions to be found in the nature of their gods, and have perſwaded whole Cities to offer ſacrifice to the moſt noble amongſt them. And they are in great perplexity, thinking that ſome of the gods are the givers of all good things, others again to be their enemies, and ſo ſeek to pleaſe them with gifts as they would do wicked men; and they are verily perſwaded, that they ſhall ſuſtain great damage by their means, except they do daily pacifie their wrath by frequent gifts. What is the cauſe of this ſhameful ignorance, and erroneous iniquity concerning God? Truly I am perſwaded, for that their firſt Law-makers were themſelves herein to ſeek, and ignorant of the nature of God, and that they did not faithfully deliver unto their Common-wealth, ſo much as themſelves knew concerning this point: but as though it had been a thing of leaſt moment, did willfully let it paſs, giving licence to Poets, and permitting them to deifie and make gods whom they pleaſed, and that the Orators ſhould write of the Common-wealths affairs, and tell what them liked of ſtrange gods. Moreover, the Painters and Image-makers amongſt the Greeks, had a great hand in making of gods, it being lawful for them every one to frame what ſhape he liſt, and how he liſt, ſome of earth, others of colours: and the chiefeſt god-makers amongſt them uſe Ivory and Gold to make their god of; a true argument of their mutable novelty. And then the ancient gods whom they firſt ſo honoured and reverenced, as they could poſſibly deviſe, being now withered with age, are out of credit, and other youngſters poſſeſs their places, and honours: their Temples alſo, ſome are deſolate, others newly erected, as men pleaſe. Whereas contrariwiſe, they ought moſt conſtantly to keep their opinion of God, and his Religion.

Moſes forbideth to deride and blaſpheme falſe gods, only for the name of God imputed unto them.

The number of gods amongſt the Gentiles infinite.

The Fable of Jupiter and Pallas.

Jupiter.

Poets and Painters cauſe the multitude of gods.

What is the cauſe of ſuch error concerning God.

Apollonius Molon was one of theſe proud Fools: but thoſe Grecians that follow true Philoſophy, knew all that is already ſaid, and the cold reaſons of this Allegory, and therefore did juſtly deſpiſe them, and agreed with us in the true and decent opinion of Gods nature. Which Plato well ſeeing, affirmeth that Poets are not to be permitted in a Common-wealth, and ſendeth Homer away very honourably crowned and anointed, leſt that he with his Fables ſhould deſtroy or deprave the true opinion of God. For Plato of all others eſpecially imitated our Law-maker, as he did herein alſo, commanding all his Citizens, that all of them ſhould perfectly learn his Laws, and that for no caſualty, any ſtrange forreign cuſtom ſhould be admitted into their City, but that their Common-wealth ſhould be pure, and they perſiſt in the obſervation of their laws. But Apollonius Molon not reſpecting this, inveigheth againſt us, for not receiving into our ſociety men of ſtrange opinions or Religion, whereas not only we do ſo, but commonly all Greeks, yea and the moſt prudent amongſt them. The Lacedemonians did expel all ſtrangers, and did not permit their Citizens to travel into other Countries, fearing that by both their ways their laws might be corrupted. They therefore are to be ſpoken againſt rather then we, ſeeing they neither admit ſtrangers to converſe with them, nor to inhabit amongſt them, no nor impart their Religion unto them; but we, though not deſirous to learn other Nations Religion, yet do we not deny to impart ours to ſtrangers that deſire to embrace it: which if I be not deceived is a token of magnanimity, and clemency in us: but this ſhall ſuffice concerning the Lacedemonians. Apollonius was ignorant how matters ſtood with the Athenians, who boaſt that

Plato decreed that no Poet ſhould be permitted in a Common-wealth.

The Lacedemonians did expel all ſtrangers.

The Athenians manners.

A that their City is free from all Nations: for they did moſt ſeverely and without all mercy puniſh thoſe that did but ſpeak any word againſt their God. For what was the cauſe of Socrates his death? he neither betrayed the City to enemies, nor deſtroyed their Temples, but only ſwore by a ſtrange Oath, which as he ſaid (whether in jeſt or in earneſt) a Devil taught him, and for this offence he was put to death, by drinking Hemlock: his accuſers alledging, that he corrupted young men, and contemned the Laws and Religion of his Country. And this Socrates ſuſtained being a Citizen of Athens. Socrates a Citizen of Athens.

Anaxagoras was of Clazomenia: and for that he affirmed the Sun which the Athenians worſhipped for God, to be a fiery ſtone, he was by the ſentence of ſome few condemned to B dy. They alſo proclaimed that whoſoever would kill Diagoras of Melus, ſhould be rewarded with a talent for his labour, only for that this Diagoras was ſaid to deride their myſteries: Protagoras alſo had been by them taken and put to death, had he not made quick eſcape, only for that they ſuppoſed him to have written certain doubts of the Athenian gods. And what wonder is it that they ſo uſed theſe famous men, who ſpared not to uſe the like cruelty upon women? For they killed a Prieſt, for that ſome accuſed her to worſhip ſtrange gods: and their Law appointed, that whoſo did introduce ſtrange gods into their City, ſhould be puniſhed with death. It is therefore evident that they who enacted ſuch ſtraight laws, believed not the gods of other Nations to be gods: for had they believed in them, they would not have deprived themſelves of the benefit of many gods. The very Scythians (who de- C lighted in man-ſlaughter, ſo that they very little differ from brute Beaſts) yet do they think themſelves bound to maintain their own laws, as beſt, ſo that they ſlew Anacharſis a famous Greek, that came unto them, only for that he ſeemed to attribute too much unto the Grecian gods; yea, thou mayeſt find many among the Perſians, who for this cauſe have been tortured. And it is evident that Apollonius approved the Perſian Laws: for when the Greeks admired their fortitude and concord of opinions concerning God, I mean the fortitude they ſhewed in burning of their Temples, this Appollonius in all things imitated the Perſians, violating other mens Wives, and putting out their Childrens Eyes; whereas our Laws adjudge him to death that ſo uſeth unreaſonable beaſts: And neither the fear and terrour of Potentates, nor the favour of them whom all men reverence, could ever cauſe D us to forſake or abandon theſe Laws: neither do we exerciſe fortitude, to the end to deprive other men of their goods and fortunes by War, but to keep our own Laws: and we who patiently put up all other injury, yet if any man do in our Religion provoke us, we preſently ſeek revenge, not reſpecting our own ability; yea, though thereby we work our own utter ruine, and calamity. What therefore ſhould move us to imitate the Laws of other Nations, when they that made thoſe Laws (yea even the Law-makers themſelves) did tranſgreſs them? or how can the Lacedemonians avoid reproach for their inhoſpitality, and neglecting marriage? Or the Elians and Thebans for accompanying with men contrary to the Law of Nature, which fact moſt ſhameful, they deemed good E and neceſſary. Yea not content to do ſo themſelves, they alſo aſcribed the like unto their gods to be done by them (which the Greeks alſo now of late have done) and for this cauſe they refuſed to marry with their own women, judging their ſatisfaction to be contrary to the preſcript of Nature: But I will ſpeak no more of puniſhment, neither how great malefactours thoſe firſt Law-makers freed from puniſhment, being bribed with money, and how unjuſt they were in the Laws appertaining to Wedlock. It is long to examine how great occaſions of impiety they gave. For many have already long ago forſaken their Laws: which cannot be ſaid of us, who for our Laws have ſuffered loſs of our Cities, fortunes and lives, we keeping and perſiſting in our Laws even unto death; and if any Jew be in a ſtrange Country, where there is a Tyrant King, yet doth not he ſo fear him, that he would F for his command in any jot tranſgreſs our Laws. If therefore we do valorouſly endure thus much for our Laws, all men muſt needs grant our Laws to be very good: but if they ſay we ſuffer all theſe calamities for to maintain wicked or naughty Laws, what puniſhment are they not worthy of, who having (as they ſay) better Laws then we, do ſo eaſily forſake them, whereas we do maintain ours even with our own lives? But ſeeing Antiquity of Laws is the greateſt argument to prove their goodneſs, I will ſet down of what Antiquity our Laws are, together with our Law-makers opinion of the Deity; if therefore any one compare our Laws with the Laws of all Nations, he ſhall find that ours are of more Antiquity then theirs by many Ages. For our Laws eſtabliſhed amongſt us, have been imitated of all other Nations: For though the firſt Greeks did colourably obſerve Laws, yet all their Philoſophers did imitate ours, and our opinions of God; and in humility taught others, communion of life, and converſation: yea, the common people did long ſince imitate our Piety. Neither is there any Nation, either Greeks or Barbarians, who have not after ſome manner obſerved a Sabbath as we do, and faſting days, and Candleſticks with light, all which they learned of us, yea many do alſo obſerve our Cuſtoms concerning their meats, and our unity and concord, wherein we excel all other Nations, our community alſo and induſtry in Arts and labours, and ſufferance for our Laws. And which is moſt to be admired, our Law, not having any to force us to obſerve it, hath ſo obliged our hearts, that as God is of all the world honoured without compulſion, ſo are our Laws amongſt us all, we not forced thereunto: And whoſoever doth diligently conſider his own Nation and family, ſhall find that which I have reported, to be true. I will now generally reprehend the voluntary malice of all men, for either they mean that we having theſe good Laws do yet little eſteem them, and follow worſe, or if they do not ſo mean, let them hold their malicious tongue from any further calumniation. For I do not take upon me the defence of this cauſe, for that I bear any hatred to any man, but for that I and all the Jews do honour and reverence our Law-maker, and believe that whatſoever he propheſied, proceeded from God: yea, although our ſelves did not know the goodneſs of our Laws, yet the multitude of them that imitate them, were a ſufficient motive to induce us thereunto. But I have at large, and with all ſincerity diſcourſed of our Laws and Common-wealth, in my Books of our Antiquity. And now again, I have made mention of them neither in contumely of other Nations, nor in praiſe of our own, but only to reprove ſuch as have moſt maliciouſly and impudently belied us, contrary to the known truth: And I think I have already fully performed that which I have promiſed. For I have ſhewed our Nation (contrary to their affirmations) to be moſt ancient, which I have proved by the teſtimony of many ancient Writers, who in their works have mentioned us.

The Epilogue of this Book.

The cauſe why Joſeph writ theſe Books againſt Apion.

A brief rehearſal of all that is above-ſaid.

Our adverſaries affirm us to have come of Egyptians: I have ſhewed that our forefathers came into Egypt out of ſome other place. They alledge that we were expelled Egypt for their miſery, in that they were infected with diſeaſes; I have proved that they came from thence to their own Country, by means of their own proweſs and force, of their own accord. Other labour to defame our Law-maker as a wicked perſon, whoſe vertue many of ancient times, and ſo long time as hath been ſince him, do witneſs. It is not needful to ſpeak more largely of our Laws: for they by themſelves appear pious and good, and ſuch as do not invite or incite us to the hatred of other Nations, but rather to communion and friendſhip, being both enemies to iniquity, and commanders of Juſtice, baniſhers of luxurioufneſs, and teachers of frugality and labour: forbidding all Wars enterprized for avarice, and preparing the people to ſhew fortitude in them, and for them; inflicting inevitable puniſhment upon their tranſgreſſors, not eaſily to be deceived by glozing ſpeeches; and executing in action, all that they in word command: yet amongſt us the execution of them and obſervation is more ready then the words of them: I therefore confidently affirm that we do teach more pious and vertuous manners then other Nations do: For what can be better then inviolate Piety? what more juſt then to obey the Law? what more profitable and commodious, then to be at unity and peace amongſt our ſelves? and neither to forſake one another in calamity, nor injure one another in proſperity, to contemn and deſpiſe death in time of War, and in peace to labour and till our grounds, and to uſe other Arts and works, and always to think and believe, that God beholdeth all our actions, and ruleth and diſpoſeth all things? If this be either written or reſerved by any one before this time, we are then to thank them as being their Scholars: but if they are known never before to have been extant, then we are known to be the firſt Authors and inventers of it. Let therefore all Apions and Molons go, and all others that with them are convicted of lying and ſlandering. And this Book is written to thee Epaphroditus who loveſt the truth, and to others who by thee will, or are deſirous to know the ſame.

DESIDERIUS ERASMUS
ROTERODAMUS,

To the moſt Vertuous and Learned Father, HELIAS MARCEUS,
The Maccabetian Ruler of the Renowned Colledg of the MACCABEES.

I Have not grudged, vertuous Father, to Dedicate unto thee a days labour; wherein I have perused, and what in me lieth, amended the Book which Joſeph writ of the ſeven Maccabees brethren: and would it had lien in my power more abundantly to have anſwered your expectation: I have now (for that I counted the Greek Copy) by the Latine conjectur'd the Greek, and altered ſome things, yet but very few. Joſeph doth not falſly boaſt himſelf to have attained to the excellency of the Greek Tongue, and this Book will ſufficiently witneſs the ſame; wherein he ſhewed both great variety and emphaſis, inſomuch as he eſteemeth to have handled that famous work with eloquent ſtile, and the Ornament of diſcourſe. Saint Jerome for this cauſe entitleth this Book, Great Eloquence; Suidas δεινότητα; out of them both we amend the corrupted Stile, and call it αὐτοκρατὲς τοῦ λογισμοῦ, that is, the Rule of Reaſon: for the ſcope of this Book tendeth all to prove, that Reaſon is of no force in man, except it bear Sovereignty over all inordinate appetites. This is moſt evidently proved by the Books of the Maccabees, in the Scripture: which Books the Jews did not receive as Canonical, yet do they account it among their ſacred Writ. I cannot but congratulate this worthy Colledg (which though famous for many other things, yet is more happy) for that it is ſo bleſſed as to enjoy ſo worthy and unſpeakable a Treaſure: Or rather all Colonia Agrippina, that happy and fortunate City; yet in nothing more happy, then for that it alone doth in her boſom ſhrine ſo many, ſo ſacred, and excellent pledges of Piety: yet ſhould it be more happy, if it could expreſs their Vertues, whoſe ſacred Reliques it ſo Religiouſly keepeth, and imitate their manners whoſe bodies it poſſeſſeth, to wit, if in ſincerity of Religion, it imitated the Piety of three Kings, and the ſacred purity of the eleven Virgins, if it reſembled the moſt valiant young men, the Maccabees, and the invincible courage of that woman, whoſe valorous conſtancy no miſery could conquer. And this beſt portion and part of her felicity, this worthy City might beſtow upon her ſelf, yea, and double the ſame. Do thou go forward in that which thou haſt in hand, to wit, in ſpreading the praiſe of thoſe Martyrs, making that vertuous example more commendable, and your City more famous.

Farewell.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

Of the RULE of REASON;

A moſt Eloquent Book, corrected by

DESIDERIUS ERASMUS,

Moſt lively ſetting down the Martyrdom of the MACCABEES.

I Am at the inſtant requeſt of Polybius of Megalopolis, to put in writing the conſtant ſuffering of the Maccabees, worthy all admiration, not in a Rhetorical and pleaſing ſtile, but rather after our own Country faſhion, thereby to exhort our Nation to patience in their Calamities. But firſt of all, it is neceſſary for us to ſpeak ſomething of Reaſon, and aſſign unto it the power and vertue to deliberate. For he who hath once fully determined to ſuffer all miſery for Gods ſake, is in my opinion already a Martyr: it is therefore a great merit once to have ſo determined; and therefore, as is above-ſaid, Reaſon beareth the rule of all inferiour paſſions; and then if deſtiny deny us opportunity to ſuffer, yet have we ſuffered all, becauſe we purpoſed to ſuffer all. Whoſo therefore will renounce the World, and aſpire only to celeſtial things, he muſt exerciſe ſobriety, baniſh gluttony, with his page laſciviouſneſs, and all other ſuch like vices as may poſſeſs and captive the mind: he muſt likewiſe mount up to the top of Vertues Tower, that, after he may from thence war againſt the vices of his body, grief and fear; the firſt whereof aſſaulteth us when we begin, the laſt when we have begun. There are many examples of the valiant Souldiers of God, which I would uſe, but that the Ornaments ſprung from the womb of one woman may ſuffice me, which ſhe brought forth, not at one birth, but with the ſame piety and zeal. And firſt, I will ſpeak of Eleazar, the cauſe and example of their paſſion, and then I will relate what tortures and torments their mother endured: yet cannot man, but only God determine, who amongſt them was firſt, and who laſt in this noble agony. They therefore, being all ſetled in one opinion, reſembling one another more in mind then they did in body, duely conſidered the frailty of this life, and therefore neither delighted in the flatteries of the World, nor any alluring enchantments thereof. They ſhewed themſelves not to eſteem of torments, fetters, nor no other ſorts of tortures impoſed upon them: and to return to our firſt ſaying, they premeditated patience, to endure whatſoever the Judges cruelty could deviſe. I will therefore, what I may, praiſe the fortitude of theſe brethren, or rather I will with all truth rehearſe the moſt worthy agony of theſe holy men, which deſerves all commendations; and ſetting all adulation apart, proſecute with a bare Hiſtorical narration, the manner of their Martyrdome.

Reaſon hath dominion over our paſſions.

The death of the ſeven brethren, and their mother.

But before I begin to declare the death of Nobility, I will a little entreat of Reaſon, which, as I have affirmed, is no ſmall motive to Martyrdom. Reaſon it is, that maketh us obſerve faſts, and uſe abſtinence, it is Reaſon that makes us deſpiſe money, and by it we are taught not to account of dignities and honours, which all men generally aim at, yea Reaſons gift it is that we do reſiſt the heat of luſtful deſires. Hence cometh it, that having once overcome ſuch things as the fleſh delights in, we find our ſelves a little able to reſiſt, we alſo learn

The deſcription of Reaſon and Wiſdom.

to

A to deſpiſe pains and torments, and ſo reſolute to ſuffer all things that ſhall be impoſed upon us. Which, that it may more plainly appear, let us ſearch out the cauſe of this order, and we ſhall find wiſdom to be the cauſe hereof. For no man can determine and diſtinguiſh good from evil, that is not endued with wiſdom; this wiſdom is always accompanied with juſtice, and juſtice is ſtill joyned with vertue, and vertue and temperance cannot be ſeparated; ſo that this wiſdom conſiſteth upon four parts. Beſides theſe, there are two things that either do cauſe or hinder paſſion, to wit, pain and pleaſure; one of which we do always refuſe, and the other we do always deſire; yet where pleaſure ariſeth, and is preſently by reaſons rule put away, the mind is there ſtrengthened; and pain compared with glory, is B through hope of a greater reward contemned before it come; and being come, our mind is aſhamed not to ſuffer that which before it was reſolved to do. Reaſon therefore is the guide of all our actions, and by it we deſpiſe torments, and deteſt vice, which like a ſkillful Huſbandman pruneth and cutteth away ſuperfluous branches, and killeth the heat of all corrupt and hurtful humours, only leaving that to remain in uſe, which may ſome way be profitable to us.

Grief and pain cauſe or hinder paſſion.

Reaſon reſembleth a ſkillful Gardiner.

Thus reaſon purifieth us by paſſion, encouraging to ſuffer, and in our ſuffering and Agony ſtrengtheneth us. Who is not deſirous to eat of the fleſh of wild beaſts and fiſhes? And who luſteth not to eat of feathered Fouls? nay, do not the dainty diſhes got either in Sea or Land invite us to eat of them? What then cauſeth us to abſtain from them? that all C men deſire them, yet no man eats them? even in this thing the mind is taught to overcome it ſelf in delightful objects, and to bridle all pleaſure, that when occaſion of Martyrdom is offered, the mind ſetting aſide all vanities, will not for a little pleaſure forget his accuſtomed virtue.

For this cauſe was Joſeph juſtly praiſed in that he was not overcome by luſt, which reigneth in a youthful body: this reaſon ſo worketh with ſound advice and mature counſel, that it again recovereth loſt friendſhip, and getteth new, and ſuffereth no cruelty to be committed. Of this we have alſo the example of Moſes, who had he not juſt occaſion to be angry againſt Dathan and Abiram, reaſon (no doubt) would have cauſed him to have ſmothered all grief of mind. Did not our father Jacob with great vehemency reprove his Sons Simon D and Levi, that without reaſon they had uſed ſuch cruelty, ſaying, Curſed be your anger? Which anger and wrath of theirs had it been bridled with reaſon, neither had they been curſed, nor the other had periſhed. For this cauſe, God, the maker of mankind, when he faſhioned us and our manners, having finiſhed all lineaments of the body, he now placed the mind to be in it, and to rule it, leaving it certain precepts to obſerve and keep, to wit, temperance, and to imbrace and follow that which is good, and cleave unto juſtice, and rule and bridle all paſſions in the body ſubject unto it, and obſerve the precepts of God.

An inſtance of Joſephus chaſtity.

But ſome will aſk me wherefore we offer to commit wickedneſs, ſeeing that reaſon ruleth our paſſion? But it is a ridiculous thing to think that reaſon ſo ruleth, for reaſons rule cannot hinder the appetite from deſire, but only correct deſire, and ſo prevail, that it ſuffer E with patience the loſs or abſtinence from ſuch things as it deſired. For example ſake, reaſon cannot hinder thee from being angry, but it can ſo work that thou commit no impiety when thou art angry: in like manner, it cannot hinder thee from deſiring filthy pleaſure, yet can it cauſe thee not to yield unto it.

Reaſon therefore cannot utterly extinguiſh vice, but only bridle it. Witneſs in this the example of holy David, who fighting againſt ſtrangers with great ſucceſs, and being at Evening weary and faint, he came unto his Princely Tabernacle, that was guarded by his Souldiers, where he found them all at meat: yet himſelf being thirſty, durſt not drink, notwithſtanding water was hard by, only for that Religion diſſwaded him, for he had vowed not to drink before he had conquered his Enemies. He alſo forbade his men to drink, ſo that they F might fight more couragiouſly, if not for that they were valiant, at leaſt for that ſo they might have drink. Whilſt thus his thirſt encreaſed, three young men of ſtrong bodies armed themſelves, and taking with them a veſſel to put water in, they went unto their Enemies Camp, and there aſſaulted the watchmen, who for fear of death fled, and ſo they paſt thorow the Camp, till ſuch time as they came where the water was, and taking ſome from thence, they brought it to the King. But holy David ſo bridled his humane appetite, that by reaſon he quenched his deſire, and ſhewed an excellent token of patience, teaching how the fear of God was to be preferred before all things. For taking the water he had much wiſhed for, and which had been gotten with ſuch danger, he preſently powred it on the ground, as a ſacrifice to God; chuſing rather to die for thirſt, then to offend the divine Majeſty:

Majesty: yet reason is not so forcible, that it is able without due consideration to repress G the inordinate motions of the mind, and mitigate the grief of the body. But it is now time to come to our History, yet is not this former discourse to be thought impertinent, for that it is somewhat appertaining to the matter ensuing. Such was the wisdom and fidelity of our forefathers, that Seleucus, King of Asia, enriched our Priests, and being a man of another Religion, did ascribe all his actions and worthy deeds to the Religion and faith of our Ancestors. But wicked mens madness could not herewith be satisfied. For one Simon, hating the high Priest Onias, and finding no ways or means to be revenged of him in his own Country, went unto Apollonius, Governour of Syria, Phœnicia, and Cilicia, and before him in a publick Assembly told him, that he could help the King to an infinite trea- H sure, for (quoth he) there is hidden in Jerusalem an infinite deal of gold and silver, which by right belongeth unto King Seleucus. Apollonius hearing this, praised and commended Simon, and confiscated the gold and silver to the Treasure-house of Seleucus; and having authority from the King to get it, he levied an Army, and so accompanied with Simon, came unto our Country, purposing if any violence were offered, to use the defence of his Souldiers.

Seleucus and Nicanor.

Simon a Traitor to his Country.

Apollonius, Captain of Syria, came with an Army to Jerusalem.

When the treasure-house of our Temple was now a sacking, Onias wept bitterly, and said, that it was a heavy sight to them to whom this treasure was committed, to see it, or any part of it taken away. But Appollonius, neither respecting the tears and intreaties of the old men, women, nor children, pressed into the Temple, they all praying God to punish him, and I to defend their Temple. Being now with a great guard of armed men entred into the holy Temple, there appeared certain Angels on Horseback with weapons in their hands, and shining with a fiery flame about them, and they daunted the courage of this infidel Apollonius, who presently fell down flat upon his face: and lying so a great while, at last he came a little to himself: and rising up, he leaned upon his shoulder who kept the Temple, not being able to stand alone, he was so terrified with the vision he had seen. When he came a little to himself, and was in some hope of recovery, he stretched both his hands towards Heaven, and himself despairing to obtain pardon for his offence committed, he besought the Hebrews (whose Temple he came to spoil) to make intercession for him, himself with tears craving pardon for his offence, and not only acknowledging his fault, but also confessing K himself to have deserved death, and all punishment possible. Holy Onias seeing this, and fearing also that if Apollonius should then dye, the Hebrews would be suspected to have made him away, he made prayers to God for him, and so obtained his Enemies life. Apollonius presently hasted to Seleucus to let him understand what had hapned: but when he came he found Seleucus dead, and Antiochus reigning in his stead, a man of tyrannous nature, who bare an ancient grudge to Onias the high Priest: and therefore made Jason his Brother high Priest in his stead; Jason promising Antiochus, in lieu of this good turn, to pay him 3660. Talents of silver every year.

Angels upon Horses, shining with fiery brightness.

Onias by prayer obtained Apollonius his life.

Antiochus his rage against the Jews.

This Jason being now made high Priest, and chief amongst all the Nation of the Jews, he presently forced all the people to impiety, and to forsake Religion; so that to build baths, he L hindred the defence and building of the Temple, and all Doctors of our Nation conspired with him in this iniquity. But hereat God was presently wroth: who being displeased, it was not needful to seek forreign Enemies, for Antiochus himself was incited to rage against them, who warring against Ptolomæus King of Egypt, he heard it reported that the Jews did deem him to be dead, yet was he very gallantly entertained by the inhabitants of Jerusalem: and presently after the fight, he made an edict, that who so amongst the Jews refused to offer sacrifice to the Gods, he should presently dye upon the wheel. But the godly-minded of our Nation did little esteem this edict, yea the women circumcising their infants (as our Law requireth) did afterward cast themselves down headlong, to the end that they might so obtain a present death without longer delay. Antiochus perceiving that the severity of his edict M could not compel the Hebrews to forsake their Religion, but that men voluntarily did chuse death; he sitting in an eminent place from whence all the Jews might behold him, calling all of them together, he caused Swines flesh to be sacrificed upon the Altar, and to be offered to every Hebrew to eat. Amongst this whole multitude assembled from all places, was one Eleazar a Priest, well instructed in learning, and the fear of GOD; a man of aged years, and of a very reverend countenance, one that was known to all men, and famous for his virtue. To this man Antiochus said thus:

Eleazar is brought unto Antiochus. 2 Macc. 6.

Antiochus exhortation to Eleazar.

Be advised by me, holy old man, to eschew those torments prepared for such as are obstinate, preserve thy reverend age, and contemn not the benefit of this life, take the sacrifice and eat of the

Swines

A Swines flesh: for it is contrary to all wise mens advice to credit the Jews opinions, and to refuse that meat which Nature hath as well ordained for Mankind as any other. We shew our selves ungrateful for Gods benefits, who contemn his graces, and make difference where Nature hath made none; or what reason is there to shew that this beast is more abominable then others? Either all beasts are to be eaten, or else all to be eschewed: it is superstition and idleness to bar our selves from any thing by a Law, when we have no other for it, but our will. Set apart these vain and sottish opinions, and at least in this venerable age change thy opinion into better. Or suppose your Laws are forcible and to be observed, yet will they excuse thee, seeing thou dost not sin voluntarily, but by compulsion?

B Eleazar being permitted to speak, thus replied to Antiochus, who both exhorted and forced him to breach of his Laws. We, Antiochus, do not follow a vain report, but we observe the verity of Religion which our Fathers kept, and fear of torments cannot make us embrace another Religion, and forsake our own: yea, suppose our Religion delivered to us by our Fathers had no firm grounds, yet would I in nothing, no not compelled by torments forsake it. Do not esteem it a small matter to eat impious meat, and to tast of that which is sacrificed to Idols, for it is a prophane thing to touch things that are prophane. Our Law condemneth your Philosophy, wherein he is most ignorant that thinketh himself most wise. Eleazars answer to Antiochus.

We are taught to embrace sobriety, to subdue in us all inordinate appetite, to keep our bodies chast, and to suffer with patience whatsoever for Gods sake is inflicted upon us, and not to deny the C Truth, Justice, or Piety, or God, who alone is true: and therefore I refuse this prophane meat, well knowing what I ought to eat, as warranted therein by the Precept of the Almighty God, whose Laws I have learned to obey, and eschew all meats sacrificed to Idols, and embrace with all my force that which is expedient for the Soul: It is open Tyranny to compel any one to that which Religion forbiddeth, and to command that which is contrary to Justice.

Do what thou wilt, mock at thy pleasure, yet shalt thou be more derided, then thou thy self derideſt. I will persist in the holy steps of my forefathers; notwithstanding, thou therefore with Tyrannous hands pluck out mine eyes, and with a sharp knife rip up my entrails, thou shalt never conquer me. I will dye safe and sound, and patient in the love of God; neither flatter thy self for that I am aged, and that my body is now feeble: If need be, that I must be sacrificed for Gods sake,
D thou shalt find me in these years as lusty as a Child, as constant as a young man, yea, and most joyfull in torments: and prepare an extraordinary fire for me, or what else soever, thou shalt find me more constant amidst torments, then now I am, before I come to them.

O sacred Religion! I will never violate thee the foundation of my salvation, the defence of the believer, the grounds of faith; never will I lift up my hands contrary to thy Precepts, never will I believe any thing to be just, which is repugnant to that which thou hast taught me: I will not lose the merit of so many years, nor relinquish the faith I have hitherto embraced. The chast, pure, and devout Company of Fathers shall receive me into their number, where I shall not fear (O impious King) thy threats. But thou hast changed the name of King, to Tyrant, yet thou shalt never alledge against me my deed, my consent, my word. Eleazars constancy.

E Whilst Eleazar, full of constancy and liberty, spake thus, the Souldiers that stood thereabout haled him to be tortured; and stripping him naked, they hanged him up, and whipped him, and whilst on either side he was beaten, a Crier with an impious voice still cried unto him, Obey the Kings pleasure and command. But worthy Eleazar was not overcome by torment, but suffered all tortures, as though he had been in rest and sleep, and did manfully, and without fear endure all torments: and fixing his venerable Eyes upon Heaven, he knew in whom he believed, and to whom he sacrificed his Soul; and beholding the flesh on each side rent and torn from his body, and the bloud issuing out in great abundance, he admired his own patience, and thanked God the Authour thereof. At last, seeing in himself the frailty of all flesh (which is scarcely able to endure so sharp torments) he fell
F upon his face, which with stripes was all rent and torn, still glorifying God, as he did before his fall. Then one of the Souldiers, to gratifie the King, did like a mad man spurn and tread upon him, thereby to increase his torments more. But Eleazar, both strong in body and mind, did like a right Champion of the true GOD, never shrink at those pains, but this patient old man did by patience overcome the cruelty of his torturers, so that even the torturers themselves admired, that he endured so many torments. Then the Kings Officers coming unto him, said; Eleazar cruelly whipped.

How long Eleazar, wilt thou neglect to obey the King, and to free thy self from torments? eat of the flesh of swine, and redeem thy self from all thou endureſt. Eleazar, although in this Martyrdom he had been silent, yet could he not without answering, endure to hear so profane counsel, counſel, but as tormented with this ſpeech, he cried out; We Sons of the Hebrews are not G ſo effeminate as to forſake the way of our ſalvation, wherein we have walked even until our old Age, neither are we taught for the avoiding of contumely, which will not long continue, to give others example and occaſion to ſin. It is but a while that this life is to continue: ſo that we forſake but a ſmall trifle, yet hope we for that which is of great moment. Wilt thou Tyrant, eſteem of us if we ſhould yield unto thee? Nay, thou mighteſt juſtly reprove our inconſtancy. We will therefore dye, and reſign our Souls (O venerable Father Abraham*) into thy boſom.*

The Souldiers ſeeing his conſtancy, did by the Kings command caſt him into the fire, and poured ſtinking and loathſom liquors into his noſtrils. All which this reverend old man H did moſt willingly ſuffer, and ſo was conſumed with the flame: yet when Nature began to fail, he ſpake after this manner, lifting up his dazled Eyes to Heaven: Thou art He (O God) from whom life and ſalvation proceedeth: behold, I dye for obſerving thy Laws, be merciful to this thy Nation, and do not forſake them whom thou haſt hitherto protected, even in thy boſom, and under the ſhadow of the Wings of thy Clemency; let my death end all miſery, and pacifie thy wrath bent againſt our whole Nation for their offences, receive me for them all, and beſtow them all upon me. And amidſt theſe ſpeeches he joyfully yielded up the Ghoſt.

Eleazars laſt words in the fire.

It is moſt true therefore which we at firſt affirmed, to wit, that the enduring of pains and torments is wrought by our reaſons lore: which once determined and reſolved, maketh a proſperous ſuffering of pains with all patience, which wiſely adviſing men to that which is I beſt, doth ſettle and confirm our opinions to follow it. If therefore reaſon and the inferiour powers be at variance, we muſt ſubject them to reaſon if we will make a perfect Victory. With this guide of reaſon our Father Eleazar was moſt ſafely directed, neither to be overcome with pains, nor to give place to unlawful inticements and allurements, he ſaved the ſhip of his body from all ſhipwrack that might ariſe by the tempeſtuous ſtorms of vanity, and ſuffered himſelf with no contrary wind to be driven from the right courſe: yea, though it was toſſed upon the waves of Tyranny, yet did it remain ſound and unbroken, and keeping a direct courſe, arrived in the haven of ſalvation. Never any man did ſeek ſo valiantly to defend his City from an Enemy, as this holy old man did his Soul, who amongſt ſtripes, croſſes and flames, was ſtill the ſame man he was before. For as the top of a high Rock K ſtandeth ſafe, and reſiſteth the wave without any damage unto it ſelf; even ſo did the Rock of Reaſon in this man beat back the rage of thoſe tempeſtuous waves that did beat againſt his body, nor permitting them to break in, and pierce the Celeſtial and Divine power of the Soul. O happy old man, more bleſſed then all of thy Age! O Prieſt more ſacred then all other Prieſts, who didſt not pollute thy ſacred lips with profane meats; impiety found no enterance that way, from whence ſo many prayers to God had proceeded. The Tyrants cruelty could not prevail againſt thee; Thou therefore art made an example for all Prieſts of God to imitate. Such a one behoved it a Prieſt to be, more ſtrong then torments, more able to ſuffer, then the torturers to inflict puniſhment, more forcible then Princes commands, yea, and more potent then the fire, wherein thou didſt periſh: and finally, thou waſt or- L dained to be crowned with the Lawrel of Martyrdom for thy ſufferance. Thou haſt ſurpaſſed all Antiquity, thou ſhalt be an example to all poſterity. If then feeble old Age, wherein all ſtrength and heat of body was extinguiſhed, now unfit to ſuffer torments (as being already broken with Age) could by the advice of reaſon endure ſo many torments, ſo many miſeries, who dare deny reaſon to be the chief cauſe of our ſufferance? We have ſeen that all cruelty hath been overcome by a determination to perſiſt in the ſervice and fear of God: yet many affirm, that not all men who uſe the advice of reaſon are able to undergo ſuch agonies; but their aſſertion is vain, and of no force: for moſt evident it is, that he only is overcome by pain, whom wiſdom hath not armed with patience. And no marvel if he, who raſhly enterpriſeth ſo weighty a matter, and without due conſideration, M do at laſt forſake and repent himſelf of that which he ſo unadviſedly undertook. But if we with due advice and deliberation arm our ſelves, it is not an eaſie matter to remove us by any misfortune from our determination; when we make account that misfortune will betide us, we are not eaſily diſmayed thereat, when it doth betide, for that nothing befel us that we expected not.

Reaſons victory.

A ſimilitude taken from the Rock.

Eleazars praiſe.

Therefore, he that is wiſe and valiant, is able to conquer his paſſions, for that he doth well deliberate, and when he cometh to his agony, can put his determination in execution. Neither is the wiſdom of this old man ſo much to be admired, ſeeing Children, and as it were infants, have ſo deſerved commendations in this point, that they did work aſtoniſh-

ment

ment in their tormentors; for the courage and cruelty of Antiochus, being overcome by the wisdom of old age, was now the more increased, and by wicked counsel caused seven worthy children of the Hebrews to be brought unto Antioch, out of their Castle Sosandrum, who being young in years, and so as he thought weak and unable to suffer torments, his hope was that either by perswasions, or terrours, [redacted], he might force them to renounce their Religion. He therefore commanded these seven together, with their mother Salomana, who now grew well in years, to be brought before him: so they according to his command were brought, being of excellent beauty, and worthy children of so vertuous a mother; yea, they resembled Angels, their faces shining like the clear light of the Sun, their eyes sparkled in most comely and decent manner, as testifying, that they surpassed in vertue all other of humane race and condition. She was descended of most vertuous and noble parentage, and so she her self had continued and lived; but that excellent feature of body, enriched with nobility of blood and dignity, was now also made more noble by vertue and fortitude, wherein she passed all other things that could be said in her commendation. The Tyrant beholding them, and their mother amongst them, with merry and gladsom countenance, he thus craftily spake unto the children:

Antiochus causeth seven noble young men of the Hebrews and their mother to be brought to Antioch. 2 Mac. 7.

I wish your good (O admirable young men) for so both your beauty of body and noble Parentage perswade me: do not therefore like mad men resist my command, avoid not only torments but death also. For I desire not only to exalt you unto honour, but also to encrease your riches and possessions; contemn the superstitious, and superfluous belief of your Countrymen, and embrace our Religion: Which if you refuse to do (as I hope you will not) I will devise all torments, whereby I may by a lingring and painful death consume you. And to the end to terrifie them the more, he commanded all instruments of torments to be presented unto their view and eye-sight. So Wheels, Rods, Hooks, Rakes, Racks, Cauldrons, Cages, Gridirons, were brought forth; and Engines to torment the fingers and hands, Gauntlets, Awles, Bellows, brazen Pots, and Frying-pans: for these are the names which we find. For that which I term Bellows, was a thin plate of Iron to kindle or blow the fire with, like a Fan; and far more horrible devices of torments were shewed unto them, too long to rehearse: whereof they having had a sight, Antiochus said:

The Kings exhortation to the seven brethren.

Consent unto me, O prudent young men: for if that I command you to commit a sin; yet do not you offend in doing it, seeing you commit it only upon compulsion. But the young Youths inflamed with a divine spirit and sense, contemned so many kinds of torments, and despised the Tyrants threats and flatteries; and most godly (for they gave him no just occasion) they did drive the Tyrant into a great rage. And by this it is evident how reason is master over passion: for if any slothful man not before trained up to it, should of a sudden come to such a push, at the very sight of such torments, his mind would have been troubled, and his countenance appalled, his legs under him would have trembled, and he with fear confounded: so that he would presently have stept back from such an agony, and would forthwith have alledged himself unable to bear so many and so grievous torments, saying:

The young mens constancy.

My self being unwise, what should I have made choice of? Whether to endure these torments, or accept of their promised benefits? Whether should I have been moved to pity mine own age, or to compassionate my mother? God would not have denied pardon for this deed, I being forced thereunto: and by doing it though against my will, I shall get the Kings favour. But where reason and advice taketh place, and hath well trained the mind to perfection, the other consequently followeth: As by the example of these brethren I will declare, who as it were all with one voice denied to eat the sacrificed swines flesh, as they were commanded. Wherefore (said they) O Tyrant, dost thou persecute us that are innocent? We both desire and wish to die, and will until such time as death expelleth life, firmly keep that which God commanded, and Moses taught us. And thou Tyrant, do not seek to seduce us, by protesting fained love towards us: thou lover of injustice, master of cruelty, deviser of iniquity, the pardon which thou doest offer is to us more painful then punishment: we are armed with contempt of death, and esteem not thy words, as being by our late master Eleazar taught to despise them. Why then doest thou esteem such pusillanimity to be in us young men, seeing of late thou foundest such courage in an old man? We follow him: thou canst not try, and know our minds, except by tearing our bodies thou search them out: We will safely and securely suffer for our God any thing, and leaving this earth, we shall be entertained into Heaven: and thou for so tyrannizing most cruelly upon innocent souls, shalt be reserved to eternal fire.

The seven brethren reply to Antiochus.

The Tyrant greatly moved, to see that he could neither prevail by fair promises, nor Antiochus commanded Maccabeus to be racked.

by threatnings, he cauſed them to be beaten with Bulls pizzles: and firſt of all he commanded Maccabeus, the eldeſt of the ſeven brethren, to be ſtript, and ſtretched out upon a rack, and his hands to be bound behind him, and then to be moſt cruelly beaten, who wearied his tormenters ſuffering, (ſo great the force of vertue is) ſo that they deſired more to leave beating him, then he requeſted they ſhould leave. This done, he was put upon a wheel, and a weight hanged at his feet, and ſo ſtretched round about it, that his ſinews and entrails brake, and ſo his pains increaſed: yet he being overcome with pain, his mouth was not for all this ſtopped, or hindred from calling upon God, who beheld all; and reproving the Tyrant who deviſed thoſe torments for the innocents, and taking ſtrength, he is ſaid to have cried out after this manner.

Bloody Tyrant, who perſecuteſt the Majeſty of God; I whom thou thus tormenteſt, am no Witch, nor one who have murthered and killed another man, but one who dies for juſtice; obſerving the Law, and for Charity. Then when the torturers, overcome with compaſſion, willed him to ſubmit himſelf unto the Kings pleaſure; he anſwered: O ye wicked miniſters of tyranny! your wheels are not ſo ſharp and cruel, that I thereby will be forced to forſake Heaven, whereon my mind is fixed: tear my fleſh; yea, if you ſo pleaſe, roſt it at the fire: torture and torment each parcel of my body with ſeveral cruelty; you ſhall for all this find your ſelves unable to force us young men to impiety.

The death of the eldeſt brother.

As he thus ſpake, a fire was kindled, and he, as he was upon the wheel racked, was ſo thrown into the fire: and thus he was by flames and torments ſo burned, that his bowels appeared; his mind nothing moved when his fleſh yielded overcome with pains, who amidſt his pangs cryed thus unto his brethren. O beloved brethren, learn of me an example of vertue, conſider the ſtrength of an invincible courage, contemn and deſpiſe the alluring baits of this world, and rather obey God then this Tyrant, who can if he pleaſe humble the proud and mighty, and exalt the lowly and dejected. As thus he ſpake, he was taken out of the flame, and ſlain alive, his tongue was pulled out of his mouth, and he put into a frying pan, and ſo he departed out of this life, to the great admiration of all that beheld him, and the joy of his brethren and mother; and went before them to Heaven, there to prepare a Kingdom for himſelf and them.

The ſecond brother brought.

After him, the ſecond brother, called Aber, was haled by the ſouldiers: and before the tyrant asked him whether he would relent, he cauſed all theſe torments to be ſhewed him, thereby to terrifie him: but he nothing thereat moved, and denying to eat of that foreſaid ſacrifice, his hands were bound with iron chains, and he being hanged up by them, the skin of his body was flain off from the crown of his head unto his knees: ſo that the entrails in his breaſt appeared naked; yet in ſuch manner as yet he might abide greater torments. For he was caſt before a cruel Libard, thirſting moſt extremely after blood, to the intent that he might devour with his teeth the reſt of his body, but the beaſt ſmelling of him (no doubt by the great handy work of Almighty God) forgot his cruelty, and turning away his face, he did no hurt to the Martyr.

But hereat the Tyrants rage increaſed; and the Martyr by ſuffering ſuch torments, was made more conſtant, crying aloud:

O how pleaſant is that death unto me, which is cauſed by all ſorts of torments for Gods ſake! yea, ſo much the more pleaſant, for that I aſſuredly hope to find reward for it in Heaven. Let theſe torments inflicted upon me (O Tyrant) ſatisfie thy cruelty, for my pain is not by thy tortures increaſed, but rather my pleaſure, as thou ſhalt find by my patience in this Agony. More willing am I to ſuffer, then thou to puniſh; yet my pain in ſuffering, is leſs then thine by inflicting the ſame upon me. I am tormented for vertue and obſerving the Law, and the juſtice of God ſhall baniſh thee from thy Regal ſeat: Thou by tormenting art tormented, and almoſt conſumed, thy wrath and fury being almoſt ſpent upon me in vain, thou ſhalt not eſcape the day of judgment: eternal torments are there prepared for thee, which neither thy prophane mind is able to endure, nor thy cruelty of power to decline, thy ſinful ſoul being condemned to eternal puniſhments. Thus, remaining conſtant in his faith, and animated by his brothers example, he departed to Heaven.

Machir the third brother is brought.

Then Machir, the third ſon was brought, whom all men now pittied for the death of his two brethren, and many exhorted him by his Brothers examples to deſiſt from his Opinion, and ſo avoid puniſhment: but he being angry hereat, thus replyed; One Father begot us, one Mother bore us, one Maſter inſtructed us, we are all of one mind, and all like affected, do therefore no longer prolong the time in vain. I came hither to ſuffer, and not to ſpeak; uſe all your tyranny poſſibly againſt this body: for you have no power at all over my ſoul.

The

The Tyrant hereat moved to ſee this third nothing relent by his brothers death, he deviſed more cruelty then humane wit alone could invent. Wherefore he commanded a globe to be brought, and tyed the holy martyr about it in ſuch ſort, that all his bones were ſet out of joynt and diſplaced: whereat the holy martyr was nothing diſmaid. The skin alſo of his head and face was pull'd off, and then he was put on the wheel: but he could not be rackt any worſe for that his bones were all diſplaced, and did hang one ſeparated from another in moſt pitiful manner: and when blood iſſued from him abundantly, he was deprived of the uſe of his hands and feet; but perceiving his life to be ſpent, he ſpake thus and dyed: We, O Tyrant endure this torment for the love of God, and thou the author of ſuch unjuſt cruelty ſhalt ſuffer everlaſting pain. Then his tongue being cut out of his mouth; he was put into a frying pan, and ſo amidſt thoſe torments yielded up the Ghoſt.

Next after, followed Judas, the fourth brother, whom all the people perſwaded and entreated to obey the King: but he contemning their prayers and exhortations, ſaid thus with all conſtancy: Your fire ſhall neither ſeparate nor ſever me from the Law of God, nor from my brethren, who inſtead of this mortal life enjoy life everlaſting. I denounce unto thee, O Tyrant, deſtruction and overthrow; but to ſuch as believe, ſalvation: make tryal of me therefore thou cruel wretch, and ſee if God will forſake me, who hath with open and ſtretched out arms received my three brethren that are gone before me, and whom the womb of ſo holy a Mother at ſeveral times brought forth unto glory. The cruel Tyrant hearing this, was much moved, and leapt down from his chair to torment this Martyr himſelf, that ſo he might overcome him, and in his fury commanded his tongue to be cut forth: but he hereat not terrified, ſaid to Antiochus; 'This cruelty will nothing avail thee, neither 'ſhalt thou hereby, tyrant, as thou ſuppoſeſt, conquer me. Our God needs not by voice to be 'awakened, but rather by ſecret cogitation to be prayed unto to help his ſervants: he provi- 'deth for them that hold their peace, and heareth the prayers of ſuch as do call upon him, 'if they deſerve to be heard, and only requireth purity of ſoul. For our God knoweth all 'things before we ask, and before we our ſelves enter into cogitation thereof, he under- 'ſtandeth our neceſſity: cut out my tongue, thou canſt not cut out my mind while my life 'remaineth. Thoſe prayers which by it I have uttered to Almighty God, have taught it to 'ſuffer: would God thou wouldſt ſo ſanctifie all parts of my body by puniſhing them, for 'thou therein inflicteſt puniſhment on thy ſelf, and reward upon me, and think not that thou 'ſhalt thus eſcape long unpuniſhed. When he had thus ſpoken, his tongue was cut out of his mouth, and he bound to a ſtake, and there he was beaten with ropes ends, and he did patiently endure this, notwithſtanding the colour of his face became dead and wan. Being looſed from thence, he was put upon the wheel: and then praying for his countrey-men, he by death went unto the reſt of his brethren.

Judas the 4. brother is brought.

The death of the 4. brother

Then Achas, the fifth brother, before he was haled to torments, ſpake in this manner; 'Be- 'hold (thou Tyrant) I come to be puniſhed before thou command me, hope not therefore 'any jot to alter his mind, who as thou ſeeſt deſireth to be tormented. The blood of my 'four innocent brethren, which thou haſt ſhed, hath condemned thee to hell-fire: I am to 'make them up the number of five, that by it thy pains may be encreaſed. Tell me (bloody 'wretch) for what offence by us committed doſt thou thus puniſh us? for what impiety doſt 'thou ſo perſecute us? what villany have we committed? what wickedneſs? what naughtineſs 'have we attempted? This is all thou canſt alledge againſt us, that we honour God our Crea- 'tor, and live juſtly in obedience of his laws, and therefore do not eſteem thy puniſhments: 'but they are to us honour and ſalvation, and not puniſhment: we ſhall be greatly rewarded 'by God, if no part of us be left free from torment. Whileſt thus he ſpake, his executioners by the Kings command took him and caſt him into a brazen pot, and was preſt down in it, his head to his feet: and afterward he ſuffered all other torments, which his brethren had endured; yet not amazed hereat, he ſuddenly ſtarted up, and thus bitterly inveighed againſt the Tyrant: 'Cruel Tyrant, how great benefits doſt thou againſt thy will beſtow upon us! 'yea, the more thou art incenſed againſt us, the more acceptable to God ſhalt thou make 'us: yea, I ſhould be ſorry if thou ſhewdſt mercy upon me. This ſhort affliction gaineth us 'life everlaſting; if this temporal death ſhould not betide me, everlaſting life could not be- 'fall me. And thus he finiſht his agony, and dyed.

Achas the 5. brother preſenteth himſelf to torments before he was called.

Then the tormentors laid hands upon the ſixth brother, who was called Areth, whom the Tyrant permitted either to chuſe honour or puniſhment: but he aggrieved at his offer, ſaid; 'Although (Tyrant) I be younger in years then my martyred brethren, yet my conſtancy of 'mind to theirs is not inferiour: for we were all nouriſht up together, all together inſtructed and we will all die together in the fear of God. Haſten therefore to thy deviſed torments, G

He alſo com'manded him as he hung to be pricked with awls, that ſo the heat might pierce into the 'holes they made in his fleſh. Whileſt thus he was tormented, much blood like froth gathered
'about his head and face. and he then ſpake in this manner. O noble fight! O valiant war! O H
'ſtrife between piety and impiety! Theſe men have paſt their agonies, whoſe crown of Mar'tyrdom is the puniſhment of their perſecutors: I do moſt willingly follow my brethren,
'that as by blood I am conjoyned unto them, ſo by death I may not be ſeparated from them.
'Deviſe O tyrant, ſome new torment, for theſe which thou haſt already deviſed, are already 'overcome. O maſter of cruelty, enemy of piety, perſecuter of juſtice! we ſix worthy

Thy fire is cold and heateth not, and the Kings weapons are bended and blunted in our bodies; our God giveth us more courage to ſuffer, then thou haſt to puniſh: and ſo the precept of God remaineth firm in us. And as he thus ſpake, one took hold of his tongue with a hot pair of tongs, and ſuffering the ſame torments that his brethren had done, and fryed in a frying pan, he gave up the Ghoſt. I

Six of the brethren being now dead by diverſity of torments, only one of the ſeven remained alive with his mother, named Jacob, younger in years (but not in conſtancy of mind) then the reſt of his brethren: he, preſenting himſelf before the Tyrant, moved him to compaſſion, both for that he was left alone, and the laſt of his brethren, and alſo that he

'red for thee if thou diſobey me, deliver thy ſelf therefore from theſe torments, and I will 'give thee what honour my Kingdom can afford: thou ſhalt be a Magiſtrate and General

'and mollifie his obſtinate mind by wholſom counſel. The Mother having heard what the King ſaid, ſhe inclined her ſelf unto the King: which done, that the King might not underſtand her, ſhe ſpake in Hebrew to her child, as followeth: 'Pity thy Mother, O ſon, and 'comfort thy ſorrowful Mother, who bare thee nine months in my womb, and gave thee
'ſuck three years, and with great induſtry have brought thee up to this age. I pray thee,

Tyrant

A Tyrant hearing this was wroth, and cauſed him to be tormented: but his Mother in torment comforted him, and with her kind hands held his head, when with violence of the tortures blood iſſued out of his mouth, noſe and privy parts, the tormentors not ceaſing till life in him was almoſt ſpent: but they (by Gods appointment) gave over, and ſo he took ſtrength again to endure more then any of his brethren had done; at laſt, his hands and arms being cut off, he lifted up his Eyes to Heaven, and cryed, O Adonai, O Sabaor be merciful unto me, and receive me into the company of my brethren, let thy wrath now ceaſe, and grant them mercy, who by us do make interceſſion to thee; having ſaid thus, his tongue being pulled out, he of his own accord went into the fiery Frying-pan, and ſo to the great B admiration of Antiochus died.

The death of the youngeſt brother.

Behold how evident it is, that reaſon can rule our affections, ſeeing that Children hereby ſhewed more conſtancy then the Tyrant could ſhew cruelty. For, it was reaſons force that wrought in them that determination to ſuffer all torments, rather then to forſake the way of Salvation. Theſe conſtant young men do fitly reſemble inexpugnable Towers; and them, who after a great tempeſt and ſhipwrack, do ſafely enter the harbour of Salvation, who guiding their courſe amidſt the boyſterous waves, at laſt obtain the wiſhed ſhore. For every one of them ſtrengthened the other by advice and good counſel, and none of them was like an effeminate perſon, loth to ſuffer Martyrdom. None uſed delay herein, but one followed anothers example. Let us therefore dye for our Law, and imitate the three Children C whom the Aſſyrians fury condemned to the fiery Furnace, whoſe patience ſpread their fame even unto Heaven. Whilſt thus one of them exhorted the other, it came to paſs, that none of them offended, but each one reſolute in his Religion, took example of the virtue, courage and conſtancy of their forefather Iſaac, who underſtanding that it was Gods will that he ſhould be ſacrificed, he refuſed not to ſubmit his body to his Fathers Sword. Let us (quoth they) yield our Souls to him of whom we received both Soul and Body: It is a ſmall matter for us to ſuffer loſs of theſe members, ſeeing that we ſhall in lieu of them receive everlaſting bliſs. Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, do joyfully expect us, as Co-heirs of their Kingdom: let us glorifie that womb wherein we were for ten months ſpace, let none of us be more coward then the other, nor none of us degenerate from the other. We that were all be- D gotten of one Father, and ſucked of one milk, muſt in all things reſemble one another: we had one teacher, and one law inviolate. And in this golden bond of concord were theſe brethren linked together, and none of them mourned to ſee the other tormented, but all rejoyced at the others death. O Children, whoſe dignity ſurpaſſeth the Royalty of Kings and Princes, whoſe glory and virtue is unſpeakable! None of you were terrified with fear, but you ſo haſtened to your deaths, as though you had only been to go to bliſs and felicity: you were truly brethren, who even by death were linked together. God hath greatly in you magnified our Nation, and in you ſhewed us all one example of fortitude: whom therefore I think he cauſed to be ſo many in number, as were the days wherein he created the world, ſo that theſe ſeven brethren may reſemble the ſeven days wherein all things were made. And E why ſhould we ſo admire this fortitude in theſe young men, when a woman armed her ſelf with contempt of death? Who indeed is not to be called a Mother, but to be honoured with a higher title then humane frailty can afford, who bare into this world ſo many triumphs.

Reaſon, Miſtreſs of our affection.

A ſimilitude of the waves. The ſeven brethren exhort one another to ſuffer death manfully.

True brotherhood.

A pledge and ſign of brotherly amity.

For the Mother ſeeing her Children dead, was with a kind and godly zeal inflamed alſo to ſuffer: and no marvel, ſeeing that the very brute beaſts if they perceive violence offered to their young, do expoſe themſelves to perils in their defence, and protect them with their wings, teeth, and tallons; yea, and every one that is any way able to make reſiſtance, oppoſeth her ſelf to the enemy to defend her young. And not only brute beaſts do this, but even Bees do defend not only their young, but alſo their honey, threatning their ſtings to F them that offer to taſt thereof, and more eſteeming the good of their young, then their own lives. But this zealous mother directed by the Spirit of God, and reaſons lore, haſted that her Children might dye before her; who not being to live deprived of her Children, choſe rather to ſee them dye joyfully then to periſh in care and ſorrow. Therefore when all her family had ſuffered, ſhe then the laſt and glory of them all came to her agony, deſpiſing the Tyrants threats, and offering her motherly breſt to thoſe torments which her Children had ſuffered. O bleſſed ſtock and bleſſed increaſe of the ſelf ſame womb! Why ſhould I not affirm that in all lineament and feature of the body you are like your mother: and if this be a commendation in them, that beſide the ſhape of body receive nothing elſe

of their mother, I will say more of you, that you are like your mother in fortitude, virtue, and Religion; and that you so in all things resemble her, that you are every way equal unto her, save only herein, that she with her Eyes beheld the immanity of your torments, being also as constant in her own Martyrdom, as you in yours. She therefore herein excelled you, that she suffered seven torments before she came to suffer in her own person, and feared in every one of them lest she should be overcome. But O thou example of all women, I cannot tell, whether thou bare these Children in thy Womb, or created them, who could with dry Eyes look upon them whilst they were torn in pieces: yea, I say little, affirming that thou patiently didst behold these sights, for even thou thy self didst exhort them thereunto, thou rejoycedst to see one of them torn in pieces with Flesh-hooks, the other to be racked upon the Wheel, and the third to be bound and beaten: thou joyfully admiredst the others burning, and exhortedst the rest not to be terrified herewith, and although whilst thou beheldest their torments, thy grief was greater then that which thou hadst in Child-birth, yet didst thou frame a lightsome and merry countenance, as though it had been one triumphing. While they were a killing, thou didst laugh, and seeing only one of all thy Children left, hereat thou didst nothing relent. Can I describe how every one perished, seeing thou their mother didst laugh at their deaths, and when their sinews were cut in two, their heads flaied, their tongues pulled forth by the Roots, their hands broken, their bodies in the fire, and cast upon iron plates red hot, and upon wheels, and their ribs pulled in sunder, and many other torments for which we want names? Never was any Swan, which (by report of Antiquity) sung so sweet a note before her death (sweeter then the most melodious harmony, and the most pleasant voice) as were the Funeral Verses of those thy Children that perished.

The mother suffereth seven torments before she was tormented.

You Children were not overcome by the fabulous Syrens enchantments, who to honour God, doubted not to leave your Mother without Children: And she sprung of noble stock, chose rather to want you for a short time, then to incur eternal damnation, wishing rather that the bodies of her Children should be tormented then their Souls. Well she knew, that nothing was more frail and infirm then our bodies; which though persecution be wanting, are often killed with Agues, and abundance of blood or fluxes: And who is ignorant of shipwrack incident to Sailers, hazard of life unto them that travel, and sudden death to those that live at ease? sudden casualty by fire, and by the hands of Thieves, and a thousand other ways to dispatch our lives? Seeing then that our mortal bodies are subject to so many miseries to bring us to our end, who would not make choice of a quick dispatch, whereby we lose goods of this world and gain life everlasting? O thou most reverend of all women, the credit of thy Nation, and honour of our Religion, who like the Ark of Noe didst persist inviolate amongst such stormy waves! for as it withstood the force of the deluge, and being built strongly with firm boards, did not suffer any thing within it to perish: so thou sufferedst not the Tyrant to overcome the holy Ghost which thou hadst received in thy heart.

A similitude from the Deluge.

Behold of what force and efficacy reason is! which oftentimes maketh us men inferiour to women. For neither was Daniel so terrified at the sight of the Lions, nor the three Children with the fiery Furnace, as this woman was grieved at the death of all her Children, before she came to her own Agony. What would another woman and mother have done in this Case, but wept and with pitiful lamentations have cryed: Ah wretch that I am, most unhappy and miserable of all that breath, who therefore bare so many children into this world, that their several deaths might be so many several occasions of my grief and sorrow! she would have iterated her frequent births, and her toil in her ten Months bearing them, she would have bewailed her hapless fortune who brought forth so many deaths and dangers, she would have recounted the milk wherewith she fed them, and their meat she had prepared for them, the pains she had taken with them, how she had carried them in her Arms, and sung to them and taught them to speak; her cares, her watchings, her fear, lest any mis-hap should betide them: and with weeping tears would have said, Shall I a Grandmother embrace your Children? who a while ago was too fruitful a mother, and am now deprived of you all? If this day I dye, I have none to bury me. But this handmaid of God forgot all these laments that another mother would have had, and with an Adamant sence stouter then the never yielding Rocks, did neither forsake her Children in their torments, nor in their death, but in a manner compelled them to perish, and never sorrowed thereat. For being apprehended together with her seven Sons, she considering Eleazars martyrdom, did thus exhort them in the Hebrew tongue. 'O my most dear and loving Children, let us

The mothers speech exhorting her seven Sons to suffer.

hasten

A ‘haſten to that Agony wherein we may be a credit to our Nation, and gain of God an ever‘laſting reward; let us without fear preſent our ſelves unto thoſe torments which Eleazars ‘aged body endured; calling to mind our Father Abraham of worthy memory, who having ‘but one only Son, did ſacrifice him being willed by God ſo to do, and feared not to bring ‘him to the Altar, whom he ſcarcely in his age obtained. Iſaac alſo was willing to be ſa‘crificed by his father, knowing that God was to be obeyed in all things: the like may be ‘ſaid of Daniel, and the three Children: believe me, we are rather tried then tormented.
‘For whatſoever this world affordeth is mortal and like a ſhadow.

Thus did this mother arm her Childrens minds with fortitude, and ſhe a woman wrought
B in men man-like minds. Laſt of all, her Children being all dead, ſhe a worthy mother of ſo many Champions, kneeling down in the place of torment, beſought of God an end of this life, proteſting, that ſhe had not for love of life ſo long deferred to dye, but only for her Childrens ſake, and that now ſhe had ſeen them all ſeven triumphing. The fury of Antiochus now waxed hot, and he commanded this worthy mother to be tormented, who was (as the Tyrant will'd) ſtripped naked, and hanged up by the hands, and moſt cruelly whipped: her dugs and paps were pulled off, and ſhe put into the red hot Frying-pan, being moſt willing to follow her Childrens ſteps in torment; and lifting up her Eyes and hands to Heaven, ſhe prayed for all women with Child, and ſo yielded her chaſt Soul to God. But Antiochus was ſtricken with fire from Heaven. O miſtreſs of Juſtice, who followed thy triumphing Chil-C dren! O Conquerer of Tyrants, and a Looking-Glaſs for all Martyrs! O example of patience! not only to women, but to all men that ſhall be after thee, reverenced of them that now are, and to be worſhipped of them that are to come, and to be admired not only of our Nation, but of all other people. Thy light obſcureth the bright ſhining Moon: and though ſhe fill the World with her brightneſs, yet is ſhe not comparable to thy ſhining light.
Seven lights inviron thee about, dazling the brightneſs of the ſeven Planets: could any Painter expreſs, or any hand in writing declare the torments of your paſſions? none could with dry eyes read or behold them; all people would flock about to ſee it, all people would praiſe and eſteem him to have offered a great gift, who to Gods glory had painted that golden ſtratagem. And if any ſkillful workman ſhould ingrave this Tragedy upon a Sepulchre, or D in his houſe, doubtleſs he ſhould be freed from all plague and misfortune. But where could a ſtone be found able to contain ſo many torments? Therefore the old man Eleazar, the Mother and her ſeven Sons, are for their Nobility graced with a Sepulchre, and a great reverence is done unto them of all men, yea, even by men that are not of our Religion: and there is a conſtellation of eight ſtars ordained as an argument of their juſtice, and Angels did execute their Funerals. The Tyrant himſelf was aſtoniſhed to ſee the conſtancy of ſuch godly minds. And thus have they found ſuch favour in the ſight of God, that they have obtained remiſſion of the ſins of our Nation: For preſently after the Tyrant was deſtroyed, and Iſrael there was freed from his Tyranny.

But Antiochus, ſeeing the greatneſs of their Faith, and their contempt of death, gathered E an Army of Footmen out of the Hebrews, by whoſe help he terrified his Enemies, and got great Renown. O bleſſed ſeed of Abraham! behold what benefit the Agony of the Mother and her ſeven Sons brought to us their Country-men: let us perſiſt in this piety, that ſo we may be like our Forefathers: behold, the death of a few did end all the miſeries and ſins of our whole Nation, and you by your Country-mens hands vanquiſhed their perſecutors Enemies, and after that victory our ſins were remitted; and laſt of all, Antiochus being mad, and his entrails devoured with worms, he ſmelling moſt like Carrion, gave up the Ghoſt; and was ever after death puniſhed for his offence. For when he could not make the Citizens of Jeruſalem to forſake their Law, he made War againſt the Perſians, and there received that which he deſerved.

F It now remaineth that we briefly repeat all that is before ſaid. For in her Agony, this ſa-cred mother ſaid thus unto the ſtanders by; Whilſt it was lawful for me, I kept my ſelf a Virgin, and then I married and lived a chaſt wife, and forſook not my own houſe, I brought forth ſuch Sons as I need not be aſhamed of; and though daunted with my Huſbands death, yet I did not forſake my Faith: this, and many things elſe ſhe recounted. And what more?
She ſet before her Childrens Eyes the examples of the Prophets, how Abel by his brother was ſlain, Iſaac to be offered in ſtead of a ſacrifice, how Jacob was baniſhed, Joſeph kept in priſon, Daniel caſt before the Lions, the three Children into the fiery furnace: ſhe rehearſed alſo unto them the Book of Iſaiah, where it is ſaid: Although thou do go thorow the fire,
the

the flame ſhall not burn thee. That of David, The juſt ſhall have much tribulation; and G Solomon, who propoſeth the tree of life to ſuch as do the will of God; not omitting that of Ezechiel, Theſe dry and withered bones ſhall live again: Alſo that of Moſes Canticle, I will kill and reſtore to life, and the length of your days is in my hand. Unhappy Tyrant, what did thy Cauldrons red hot, and thy torments profit thee? what availed thee to cut away their Eye-lids, and to pull out their tongues? thou thy ſelf for ſo doing doſt now endure far worſe then all theſe. And they whom thou killedſt (believe me) enjoy Everlaſting comfort, and are now ſecure of bliſs and revenge. For they who ſuffer for Gods ſake, ſhall have happy ſucceſs, when God the Father of all things, ſhall reward them with life everlaſting that follow him. Thus have I conſecrated theſe worthy memorials, which I find H in the holy Scriptures of the ſacred Maccabees, to the reading of all men, that ſhall live in any age hereafter.

An

An exact and orderly Collection of all the Scriptures which are handled by Josephus in his History of the Antiquity of the Jews, set down in Chapter and Verse as they lye in the Bible, whereby a man may find on a sudden any thing wherein the Author doth either expound, enlarge, or alter the words of Scripture. And hereby the Reader may turn to every Verse as familiar as in the Bible.
